But it is not pretended by the Church of Rome, either that none of the Popes have been bad men, or that no Popes have fallen into error and made important mistakes, both in matters of fact and doctrine, or that all priests or even all bishops are infallible, or that their own Douay Bible is an infallible translation, or that the Pope's supremacy and infallibility are matters of instinct, which require no proof; therefore the fitness, the great utility, or desirableness of such things is clearly no proof whatever of their existence, and, by parity of reasoning, the utility and desirableness of an infallible tribunal is no proof at all of the existence of one.

The argument, therefore, from what is called by some common sense, appears to be resolvable into nothing more than what is fully answered by saying, that wishing is not having, any more than mere assertion, however bold, is proof.

Those, therefore, who would not be induced blindly to jump to a conclusion, and by the process which is called "begging the question," assume it to be mere pride of understanding which prevents Protestants from submitting to the guidance of the Church of Rome, must take the pains to examine the nature and strength of the pillars on which its pretensions rest, and see whether they are built on a rock or on the sand remembering that a man may be very willing to follow a guide, when he first sees good ground to believe that it is his guide, but that, as it is humility to obey him whom God hath plainly set over us, so it is credulity to follow every one that will take on him to lead us—inasmuch as, "if the blind lead the blind," not only the leader but the follower shall perish.

We purpose in regular course examining, fully and seriatim, the various grounds and pillars on which this vast fabric of the Church's infallibility is said by her ablest advocates to rest—viz., Scripture, the Fathers, tradition, and miracles—and we think all who have the manliness and courage to examine and discuss the matter with us, in a fair spirit and unprejudiced mind, will probably ultimately come to the same conclusion at which we have ourselves arrived—viz., that it is neither necessary nor suitable to the method of God's providence and the declarations of His will, that there should be a final end and infallible judge of all controversies in this life—that what the advocates of Rome tell us was fit to be done, God hath told us He did not judge fit—that it was His pleasure to permit the Evil One to sow tares among the wheat, and heresies to arise (1 Cor. xi. 19); and that even as He thought fit to allow stones of stumbling and rocks of offence to exist for the punishment of disobedient and wicked men, so for sincere Christians, who live holily and humbly, believe and pray fervently, and seek the true way diligently, He hath not thought such an earthly judge necessary, but hath Himself provided for them another safe and certain way to all saving truth, by giving them the promise of His Spirit to guide them into all essential truth, so that they may say with the Psalmist, "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterwards receive me into glory" (Psalm lxxiii. 24); and if they be so guided and kept by God's power by faith unto salvation (1 Peter i. 5), we think there is no reason for any one to despond for lack of guidance, but on the contrary, we may safely ask, what need a Christian desire more?

Correspondence.

INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the last number of your monthly journal I find the following sentence, viz.:—"Will any of the Bishops or Priests of the Church of Rome now come forward, in or ont of our pages, to grapple with and discuss the question of the boasted infallibility of their Church?" &c. (page 104.)

I beg leave to say, in answer to this defiance, that the Bishops and Priests of the Church of Rome have the requirements of their flock (lately so wonderfully increased by conversions from Protestantism) to attend to—their episcopal and sacerdotal duties to perform—and, consequently, cannot afford to lose any time by the discussion of questions which they have repeatedly, over and over again, proved to the satisfaction of every man, whose reason is not hood-winked by prejudice, and who does not allow, to use a vulgar word, the "times" of this world to overrule and nullify his firm convictions. But the Roman Catholic layman will come forward to "shiver a spear" with you; and, notwithstanding their "intellects being confined and their souls enslaved," are able to prove any article of their creed which you may assail. As an humble and unlearned member of this body, I undertake to prove, in a simple, concise, but, I trust, cogent manner the infallibility of the Church which our Lord established on earth.

This infallibility of the Church I discover in the positive and most unequivocal promises of our Lord Jesus Christ—viz., "Upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."—Matt. xvi. 18, Protestant Bible. If the Church could possibly teach errors, then the gates of hell could prevail against her, contrary to the above promise. Therefore she is infallible.

"Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world."—Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, P. B. Our Lord, addressing his twelve Apostles on the present occasion, speaks to all his ministers, successors of the Apostles to the end of time, which I think needs no proof.

Now, sir, upon that subject I form the following argument, which I defy any one to refute. Christ promises that He will be with His Apostles, baptizing, teaching, and preaching to all nations, until the consummation of time. Now, Christ cannot tell a lie; therefore, it is evident that Christ has fulfilled His promise, and that during these 1800 years past He has been with His ministers, and that He will continue to be with them to the end of time; and that he will accompany and guide them when they preach his word and administer his sacraments. Therefore, His Church is infallible.

"And I will ask the Father, and he shall give you another Paraclete, that he may abide with you for ever, the Spirit of truth."—John xiv. 16, 17, P. B.* It appears that Christ asked his Heavenly Father to bless his ministers, the pastors of his Church, with the spirit of truth for ever. Pray, sir, did Christ ever offer up any prayer in vain? And if his prayer was heard, how could the Church teach any false doctrine? Therefore, she is infallible.

"Therefore, as the Church is subject to Christ, so also let the wives be to their husbands in all things. Husbands love your wives, as Christ also loved the Church, and delivered himself up for it, that He might sanctify it, cleansing it by the laver of water in the word of life; that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."—Ephes. v. 24, 25, 26, 27, P. B. The Church is always subject to Christ—that is, not only under him, but ever obedient to his words and commandments. Which is an evident and invincible demonstration that she never rebelled against Christ, never falleth from him by error, idolatry, or false worship. Therefore, she is infallible.

We also see by this passage from St. Paul, that Christ loves the Church, for which he suffered his passion; but if she was liable to err, He could not love her. Therefore, she is infallible.

"And if he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and publican."—Matt. xviii. 17, P. B. By this, it appears, if I refuse to hear the Church that I am an outcast, and no better than the heathen. Our Lord would never command me to hear the Church, nor punish me so severely for refusing to hear her, if that Church could teach me anything contrary to his holy law, or lead me astray, by teaching antichristian doctrines. Of this I am as satisfied as I am of my own existence. Therefore, I most firmly and undoubtedly believe that the Church is infallible.

With these plain texts of the Sacred Volume staring you in the face, how could you, with any show of reason, make Edith Marley insinuate, in the discussion between her and the Roman Catholic bishop, that the Church which Christ founded on earth departed from the things that he commanded, and taught other things?—CATHOLIC LAYMAN, page 100, September number. And here let me parenthetically observe, that you were not guided by the spirit of impartiality (pardon me for saying so) in conducting that discussion, because you make the argument against the Sacrifice of the Mass as strong and as powerful as Protestants can make it; but the argument in its defence is weak, poor, impotent. Is that fair? Is it honourable? This, however, may be excusable, but I say it is almost unpardonable to wilfully mutilate, as you have done, the text from the prophecy of Malachy, in this discussion.

In this story of the Marleys you represent the Roman Catholic bishop and Major Marley as being grossly ignorant; the former not knowing where to find, in the Bible, the Prophecy of Malachias; and the latter a Roman Catholic, having never heard a word of the Gospel of our Lord.

Now, this is a frightful calumny on both priests and people; and violates, in a shameful manner, one of God's holy and eternal commands—viz., "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." Allow me to tell you that it is not by calumny that your journal can command the attention and respect of Roman Catholics. They treat a journal in which such appears with supreme contempt. I beg now to give a quotation, on the infallibility of the Church of Christ, from a work recently published:—

"But when He, the spirit of truth, shall come, he will teach you all truth."—John xvi. 13, P. B. "The Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth."—1 Tim. iii. 15, P. B. If the Church itself, as it comes out of the hands of God, is the very ground and pillar of truth, it will hardly want the reforming hand of corrupted man to put it right; it will always teach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and instead of reforming this, or attempting to do so, the most precious of all the works and institutions of God, you and I must be reformed by it.

To quote all the texts that prove the holy Church of Jesus Christ to be infallible, or invested by Christ with a supreme and unerring authority in matters of faith, would be endless. I said, that we discover this unerring authority even in the dictates of common sense. Yes, common sense tells us that the works of God are perfect in their kind.

Now, the Church being most emphatically the work of God, it most assuredly must be perfect; the Church, however, must be very imperfect, indeed, if it wants the main perfection, which, as our guide and director to heaven, it must have, that of always teaching truth: that of always supplying the wants of our limited and corrupted reason: that of always carrying before our eyes the bright and Divine light of revelation.

Show us a Church which is not infallible, which owns itself fallible, wanting, of course, the main perfection which the Church of Christ must have, and you show us a Church of corrupted man, not the Church of Christ. Common sense tells us that without an infallible tribunal unanimity in faith is a thing impossible. Without a centre of unity, a fixed standard, an absolute and infallible tribunal, a living oracle to determine the mind, it is absolutely impossible that men, framed as they are, should ever come to one and the same way of thinking. Whoever renounces this infallible authority of the Church, has no longer any sure means to secure him against uncertainties, and to settle his doubts; he is in a sad and perplexed situation, tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine.

We are confirmed in the above suggestions of common sense by our observations. Unity in faith we find nowhere but in the Catholic Church. Above two hundred millions of Catholics, scattered over the face of the earth, are perfectly one in matters of faith. We meet from the most distant parts of the globe, ignorant of one another's language, manners, &c., yet our thoughts and principles about religion and its mysteries are exactly alike. Pray is that unity to be found among those who have shaken off the authority of the Church? Since they have presumed to reform (as they call it) the Catholic Church, what do we see but one reformation on another, hundreds and hundreds of different Churches, one rising on the ruins of another, each styling itself the Church of Christ, each appealing to the Gospel for the orthodoxy of her doctrine, each calling her ministers ministers of Christ, each calling the sermons of her ministers the Word of God, &c., &c? Can we be wrong in believing that our pastors are really in possession of the power which Christ himself asserts He gave them, and which he promises shall remain with them for ever; since Jesus Christ has pledged his sacred veracity for the existence of those several powers in the Pastors of his Church, and since he has likewise promised that the very fountain of truth, the Holy Ghost, shall be and remain with those pastors for ever, we should think ourselves guilty of a great sin if we refused submission, of either understanding or will, to their decisions and their precepts; and of a most daring presumption and diabolical pride, if we would ever, for one moment, permit our limited reason to sit in judgment over the decisions and precepts of those, whom Jesus Christ declares to be guided by the Holy Ghost for ever.

Seeing, then, that the pastors of the Church of Christ have always been secured by the infinite power of God against the danger of being led astray, and leading those under their care astray into false and erroneous doctrines, we rest assured under their guidance, knowing that the understanding of the most transcendent genius can never penetrate into the mysteries of the Most High; we, both learned and unlearned, take the only safe way of submission—that path in which the Holy Spirit assures us that "the very fools cannot err."—Isa. xxxv. 8, Protestant Bible.

Now, every person whose mind is susceptible of conviction, on reading those plain texts of the Holy Scriptures, and the unvarnished comments thereon, must discover that the Church which our Lord established on earth is infallible; and I defy any man to prove that any other but the Roman Catholic Church is this true, unerring Church, which hitherto has continued "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing," and will continue to the end of time in transcendent purity and heavenly truth. This Church will be teaching the doctrine of Jesus when the apostate temples—whose "profane novelties" distract the world—shall have ceased to exist, and, if remembered, only to be deprecated.

I am, Mr. Editor, your very humble servant,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

P.S.—May I request that you will give this letter (to which you may append, if you like, a fictitious name) a place in the next number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, that your Protestant readers may see that there exists on earth an infallible Church.—W. R.

We cannot say that we think our correspondent's excuse of "want of leisure" is a satisfactory explanation of the obstinate silence with which the Roman Catholic clergy have hitherto shunned all controversy in our pages. Some of those in the West of Ireland, at least, we certainly think might of late have found some spare time on their hands. We find, however, in the letters we receive from the educated Roman Catholic laity, compensation for the silence of their clergy. Though the priests may think it no part of their business to satisfy the doubts of Protestants, no doubt they consider it their duty to find time to instruct their own flocks, and to supply them with the best arguments for the authority of their Church that are to be had. Mr. Rourke's spiritual guide has certainly not neglected his duty in this respect. We do not think that any priest in Ireland can supply better arguments for the infallibility of his Church than those which our correspondent has so cleverly brought forward. If, therefore, we show, as we hope to do, that his case utterly breaks down, and that his arguments wholly fail to establish the point which he wishes to prove, our readers need not imagine that any stronger arguments on that side remain behind.

* It is curious that though Mr. Rourke marks his quotations P. B.—meaning, as we suppose, "Protestant Bible"—none of them in reality are from the authorized version.

Mr. Rourke's arguments are reducible to two heads—arguments from Scripture, and from reason, or "common sense." We have, in conformity with the plan which we had laid down for ourselves in our August number (vide page 86) discussed in a separate article the proofs alleged from Scripture in support of the doctrine of the infallibility of the Church, and as that article (see page 121) includes the texts brought forward by our correspondent, we content ourselves here with replying to the other topics which he has introduced in his letter.

Argument I.—"Every work of God is perfect in its kind; the Church is most emphatically the work of God, and must therefore, be perfect, and consequently must have the main perfection of always teaching truth."

If this argument were a good one, we might go on to reason in like manner thus—If the Church be perfect, it must have the main perfection of always having a perfect Head; but the Pope is the recognised head of the Church of Rome; either, therefore, any given Pope (for example, Alexander VI.*) was perfect, or else the Church of Rome is not the Church of Christ.

But though this conclusion (which follows legitimately from our correspondent's principles) may be more satisfactory to us than to him, we must confess that the argument is not a good one. Its fallacy is that it assumes that our "common sense" is sufficient to decide what amount of perfection any work of God must of necessity possess. Test the argument by applying it to a similar case, and the falsity of the assumption becomes at once apparent. In place of the word "Church," let us insert the word "man"—or, to make the matter clearer, imagine Adam in the Garden of Eden, to have reasoned thus concerning himself—"Every work of God is perfect in its kind; I am emphatically the work of God, declared by God himself to be very good (Gen. i. 31); consequently I must have the main perfection of always doing right." But it was only before the fall that this could pass for a good argument. The fall, alas, has taught us that works of God, declared by himself to have been originally created perfect, are liable to the corruption of evil. God designed his Church to possess perfect truth and perfect holiness, in the same way in which he designed man to possess similar qualities; and whenever we can give a satisfactory account of the entrance of evil into the world, we shall then also be able to explain why God permitted corruption to assail the doctrines and undermine the purity of his Church.

Argument II.—Without an absolute and infallible tribunal, there can be no certainty. "He who renounces the infallible authority of the Church has no longer any sure means to secure him against uncertainties, and to settle his doubts; he is in a sad and perplexed situation, tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine."

If this argument be good, we may reason, too—"Without an infallible certainty that we have an infallible guide, we must be full of doubt and perplexity. "For what should we think of a man who said that he would never think it safe to live in a house unless the ground floor were built of solid stone, and yet who never troubled himself to think whether there were good foundations. For it is evident that the certainty of the man who professes that he is following an infallible guide, can never rise higher than whatever certainty he may have that his guide is infallible. Now, how is this proposition to be proved? Not on the testimony of the professed infallible guide himself, for it would be absurd to admit any one's claims to infallibility merely because we had his own word for it. No; it is established by the same kind of proofs from Scripture and from reason as Mr. Rourke has here employed, and as Protestants are accustomed to employ in proof of the articles of their faith. If, then, it be possible, by Scripture and reason alone, to obtain a certain proof of the infallibility of the Church of Rome (a doctrine about which the Bible is strangely silent, as we have observed elsewhere) much more may Protestants obtain, in the same way, certain proofs of their articles of faith, all of which do happen to be mentioned in Scripture. On the other hand, if Protestants cannot attain to any certainty for want of an infallible guide, neither can this proposition, "that an infallible guide exists," ever be certainly proved, since in the proof of it the assertion of the guide claiming infallibility cannot be admitted to reckon for anything.

It may be well to add a caution as to the sense in which we use the word "certainty." A man is not certain because he is positive in his opinions, and is free from all doubt and hesitation. It would be no recommendation to any system that its adherents were all confident they were in the right, unless it could be shown that their confidence rested on good grounds. But, in point of fact, men's confidence in the correctness of their opinions, depends more on their temperament than on the religious system to which they belong. Thus, it is not true that all members of the Church of Rome are free from all doubt. Not to speak of the infidelity which has too often arisen from her over-strained demands on men's credulity, many of the thoughtful members of her communion must be disturbed by an uneasy conviction that there is something unsound in the basis of her enormous structure. While again, as to the grand question, "Is the Church of Rome fallible or infallible?" no Roman Catholic can be more completely free from all doubt and hesitation than we are ourselves.

Again, this certainty we are speaking of is not the certainty of mathematical demonstration. God has judged fit that, in matters of religion, we should be obliged to act, not on mathematical demonstration, but on evidence of the same nature as determines our conduct in the common affairs of life; even those in which our most important earthly interests are concerned. When, therefore, we assert that proofs drawn from Scripture and reason are sufficient (if they be good ones) to produce certainty, without the authority of an infallible guide, we mean to say that they are sufficient to produce such a well-grounded confidence as renders doubt practically unreasonable.

Argument III.—"Without an infallible tribunal, unanimity in faith is a thing impossible. Men can never come to the same way of thinking without some living oracle to determine the mind. Unity of faith is found by experience to exist nowhere but in the Roman Catholic Church."

It certainly must be acknowledged, that the Christian world is very far from being united, but is, on the contrary, broken up into a great variety of sects. We shall not now inquire whether the points of agreement between the principal of them are not more numerous and of more importance than Roman Catholic writers would represent; but we shall admit this disunion as a melancholy fact. But now we are wholly at a loss to see how this division of the Christian world into sects affords an argument in favour of any one of them. Any one sect may, if it pleases, set itself on one side, and all the rest on the other, and exclaim, "See here is unity on the one side, and on the other dissension." Members of the Greek Church might say, "Here are all we Greeks united, while you Westerns, some of you call yourself Roman Catholics, some of you Presbyterians, &c." Or, again, the Quakers might say, "See what perfect unity there is amongst us." One of our "Friends comes from the remotest part of America or Australia, and yet our thoughts and principles about religion and its mysteries are exactly alike. Pray, is that unity to be found among you who use carnal ordinances, broken up as you are into hundreds of different Churches, each styling itself the Church of Christ?" We do not see why the argument is not as good in the mouth of the Greek Church, or of the Quakers, as it is in that of the Roman Catholics, when they triumph in the fact that they agree with themselves, and that those who disagree with them do not agree with each other.

Once upon a time a jury, after a night spent in stormy discussion, were called into court, and asked by the judge, "Gentlemen, do you agree in your verdict?" "Yes, my lord," said the foreman. "No, no," exclaimed half-a-dozen voices from the jury-box. "How is this?" said the judge. "Why, my lord," replied the foreman, "it is true, there are seven or eight wrong-headed fellows, who refuse to submit to the decision of the foreman, and who, therefore, don't deserve to be reckoned as jury-men; but, not counting them, we are all agreed."

We leave our intelligent readers to make their own application of the story to the manner in which Romanists make out the unity of the Church, by simply not counting those who differ from them.

But, perhaps, when we say that the Quakers are as much united among themselves as the Roman Catholics, it may be replied, "But they are not near so numerous." "We are two hundred millions," says Mr. Rourke; and though we believe this computation is about double the truth, there is no doubt the Roman Catholics do considerably outnumber the Quakers. We beg our readers, however, to turn back to the article in our last April number (page 40), "Are Numbers a Test of Truth?" We showed there that if truth were to be judged of by the numbers of its adherents, Romanism must be condemned, since there are more Christians who are not Roman Catholics than those who are; nay, Christianity herself must be condemned, since the Christians are far outnumbered by the heathens; and we showed that numbers cannot be used as a test of truth by any one who remembers our Lord's warning—"Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who go in thereat. Narrow is the way that leadeth to life, and few there are that find it."

It must be added that the unity in the Church of Rome is more apparent than real. We need not speak of the dissensions that have so often torn her communion; the debates about the superiority of a Council to the Pope—about the immaculate conception, and a hundred others, which Protestants cannot easily forget, and which we may possibly discuss more at large hereafter; but even when there is outward agreement, what is this worth unless it be the result of agreement between men who are thinking independently and judging for themselves? But the Church of Rome discourages independent examination into the truth by her members; she prefers that they should assent to her dogmas without inquiry; and where she has the power she suppresses all expressions of dissent from those who are not convinced by her authority. She thus obtains a number of voices to resound her doctrines; but what are they all but echoes of a single voice? Numbers of those whom she keeps in ignorance do agree with each other, just as in the dark all things are the same colour. It only requires light to make their differences appear. But this is not the unity which distinguishes the Church of Christ. That unity is, as a distinguished man described it, "Not the unity of belief in the bond of ignorance—nor unity of profession in the bond of hypocrisy—but unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

We cannot leave the subject, however, without returning our correspondent's argument. We say that the dissensions which exist among Christians are a sufficient argument that God has not interfered to prevent them by supplying them with a living infallible guide. Let any man say, is it a credible assertion, that God, with the view of securing absolute unity in his Church, supplied it with a living infallible guide, and yet that he so neglected to supply this guide with credentials, that considerably more than half the Christian world have, in consequence, been unable to satisfy themselves of his infallibility, and have been, therefore, as much divided among themselves as if no such guide had been given; and this when a single text in the Bible, "Receive the Bishop of Rome as the infallible interpreter of my will," would have settled the whole matter. Is it credible that God instituted an infallible Church or purpose to prevent disputes, and yet that he should have left the question, Is the Church infallible? the most disputed point in all theology. Would he have left it a disputable point where men were to settle their disputes? We conclude, therefore, that whatever be the evils of disunion in the Church, God has not thought fit to prevent them by relieving man from the necessity of searching the truth for themselves, and by imposing upon them a guide whom they could certainly know to be infallible.

Having now discussed the leading arguments of our correspondent, we are compelled, by want of space, to abstain from commenting on some of his incidental remarks, which offer a tempting subject for correction. Our conclusion, then, as to the result of the whole argument on the subject of infallibility, from reason and common sense, is—Our correspondent has succeeded in showing that infallibility is what we should fancy to be a great perfection in a Church—that if we had any infallible way of knowing where an infallible judge was to be found, it would relieve us from all need of hesitation, and would make Christians more united than they are at present. All this, however, does not approach to being proof that such an infallible guide exists. If so, we might make out just as good a proof that Holloway's pills would cure the cholera; since undoubtedly it would be a great benefit to have a certain cure for that disease, and would free us from much doubt and hesitation, and would prevent the doctors from differing with each other. It would certainly be a comfortable world if the mere circumstance that we should like to have a thing was a sufficient proof that we had got it.

We must be satisfied for the present with having demolished all the arguments that have been brought from reason and common sense for the infallibility of the Church; but did space permit, we should like to show that we can discern many reasons why God should not have given Christians an infallible guide. For it would be easy to prove that the result of men's having, or thinking they had such a guide, would be that the people would sink into uninquiring ignorance and neglect of the Word of God. Our remarks on this head must be reserved for some other opportunity.

*See our article, p. 123.

ON THE VISIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—In apology for trespassing still farther upon your courtesy, in resuming a protracted discussion, I beg, very respectfully, to urge again the paramount importance of the subject, and the lively interest I feel in it. Being led to expect, in last month's publication, an explicit elucidation of your opinions respecting the visibility of the Church, I felt much disappointed in finding that you had been expiscating the writings of St. Augustine, for the purpose of deducing premises, which, if once admitted, would lead to most preposterous consequences—viz., "That some lying in heresies, and in the superstition of the Gentiles, are of the number of the elect, who truly constitute the Church; and that even schismatics in those things in which they do not separate, are in connection with the Church."—(C. L. Oct., 53, p. 113.)

Relying, I presume, on some tortuous explanation of the above isolated passages, you will make room by your side for the Pelagians, the Eutychians, the Nestorians, the Sociniaus, "et hoc genus omne," the spawn of heretics, who have just as much connection with the Church as lopped off branches have with the parent tree. Far from shunning those who cause divisions (Rom. xvi. 17), you do not disown even Pagan superstitions. This, sir, I beg to retort upon you, is but your own individual opinion. I deny that it is a true exposition of Protestant doctrine, and I call upon you to prove the affirmative by such evidence as you require of others—viz., creeds, liturgies, public documents, or formularies of faith.

The residue of your somewhat elaborate dissertation amounts merely to what is briefly expressed in the 26th Article of the Church of England—"That in the visible Church the evil is ever mingled with the good, and sometimes preponderates." Though this may be, alas! too true, though the worldly and wicked may outnumber the moral, the pure, and the regenerate, still the latter will preserve the faith (Matthew xvi. 18; Isaiah lxii. 6,) and the form of sound words (1 Tim. vi. 20, 21, and 2 Tim. i.

13), to which formula, if the degenerate will not submit, the faithful will at once disenthral themselves from the degrading connection, and unite in a separate community, "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners."—Cant. vi. 10. I appeal to candid and enlightened Protestants, if the 16th Article does not distinctly refer to such "a congregation of faithful men, among whom the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance?" I am satisfied that my appeal is not in vain; for I find the above passage of the Canticles applied to the Protestant Reformed Churches, as they existed in the time of Luther, Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, by one of the brightest luminaries of your Church at the present day.

But to come more decidedly to the point, you must assume, as a hypothesis, that the Church of England, and the various Protestant Churches with which she acknowledges a connection, or joins communion, constitute the true visible Church of Christ upon earth; or, that they do not. If they are not the true Church of Christ, you are walking in the "the valley of the shadow of death;" and if they are the true Church of Christ, of course, this Church must have been perpetual and always visible, according to your great first principle.—(See C. L., January, '53, p. 10).

I assert, that in the beginning of the eleventh century, no Church or congregation existed professing the peculiar negative doctrines of the Church of England; or with which she can consistently identify herself; inasmuch as Protestantism, in globo, was condemned in the person of Berengarius. This man denied the doctrine of Transubstantiation. He stood alone, was condemned by the whole world, and had not one place under heaven to look to for countenance or support. Your Church was then invisible, and the undeniable consequence is, that it is not the true Church.

Respecting the faith of the Greek and Eastern Churches, I beg to refer you to the public liturgies in use amongst them.

The Graeco Arabic Liturgy of St. Basil, Renaudot. tom. i. p. 153.

The Coptic Liturgy of St. Basil, Renaudot. tom. i. p. 2.

The Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril, idem. tom. i. p. 39.

The Syriac Liturgy of St. Basil. idem, tom. ii. p. 549.

The Liturgy of St. James, idem. tom. ii. p. 38, 39, with many others, including the Liturgy of St. John the Silent, used at Constantinople; some of which call the Eucharist a tremendous and unbloody sacrifice; others the life-giving flesh which Christ, our God, took from our holy Lady, Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary; others of them call it a propitiatory sacrifice, and offer it for all creatures, and for the remission of sin; and in the last-named liturgy it is expressly specified that the priest, the deacon, and the people offer, not only the marks of external adoration, by the gesture and bowing of the head, but also internal adoration, by the prayers addressed to Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. Read also pages 204 and 205 of the Hammersmith Discussion, London edition, 1841, where the eloquent and talented controvertialist, Rev. J. Cumming, unhesitatingly admits that the Greek and Eastern Churches always retained this dogma. See also, Townsend's Accusations of History against the Church of Rome, page 105, where he acknowledges that the Greek Churches, in their public liturgies, invocate the saints and the Blessed Virgin: and that they believe a purgatory, or medial state, may be seen by consulting the above liturgies.

Now, sir, if you obstinately oppose yourself to this formidable phalanx, which I have arrayed against you, eminent Protestant writers, both ancient and modern, of different countries, public liturgies and the articles of your own Church, &c., I can well afford to leave you to the indulgence of this very singular and unenviable scepticism.

In order to elicit some tangible or definite avowal from you, I have assumed successively the Roman, the Greek, and Eastern Churches to be the true visible Church of Christ. "Oh!" you say, "our correspondent, by an instinct peculiar to his tribe, is ever taking a part for the whole — we did not mean any one part, but the whole." That is to say:—The Church of Rome—the Scarlet Lady, and the Greek and Eastern Churches, denying the Holy Ghost (the error of Photius), believing transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass, purgatory and the invocation of saints—all these corrupt, erratic, superstitious, blasphemous, and idolatrous Churches to compose the true visible Church of Christ, 'fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners.'"

It has been asked, in derision, how many fallibles will make an infallible. Per contra—how many corrupt and idolatrous churches will make the pure Church of Christ—"the pillar and the ground of truth?" I need not press this argument farther. Your readers will see that you have not got out of the dilemma in which I placed you respecting the Greek and Eastern Churches; and that you did not account for the fact of Berenger's not appealing to any of them for sympathy or protection, and not adducing their authority to support his own heterodox opinions.

Besides, you must be aware that there were, at the time of Berengarius, many Greek Churches in Italy, particularly at Venice; and that the Emperor still retained possession of a part of Italy—which part obeyed the Patriarch of Constantinople; and even if this were not the case, I do not see what was to prevent Berengarius from going over to the Greeks, if they espoused his cause, as you would seem to insinuate, even when Rome was in her glory.

I will not presume to violate an established rule, by entering into the merits of the doctrine of transubstantiation, which you have shown such an anxiety to drag into the present controversy, though quite a distinct topic; but if you are not wedded to a set of opinions, or too much devoted to party interests to propose your arguments manfully, and let them stand or fall by their own merits, I am sure you can dispose of the subject of the visibility by a coup de main; and I shall be prepared then to investigate with you the doctrine of transubstantiation—"ab ovo usque ad malum."

Φιλαληθης.

Dated 1st November, 1853.

We cannot think that so intelligent a correspondent as "Philalethes" would have written so much to us that is quite wide of the mark, if he was clearly aware what the real point of difference between us is. His present letter enables us, we hope, to bring the matter to a point, and to set the subject in a clear point of view.

He asks us, as a very puzzling question, with what Church of the eleventh century does the present Church of England identify herself? We answer very simply—with the Church of England, to be sure. We hold that the Church presided over by Archbishop Sumner, who now fills the See of Canterbury, is identical with that presided over by Lanfrane, who filled the same see, at the time referred to by "Philalethes." We believe this to be as historically certain as it is that Dr. Wiseman, the head of the Roman Catholics in England, is not the successor of Lanfranc or Augustine, but the first occupier of a bran-new see, made about three years ago. But, then, since we do not believe in the infallibility of the Church, we do not hold, and are not bound to prove that the doctrines held in the eleventh century are exactly the same as those taught in the nineteenth century. We maintain that the Church of England in those days taught, in addition to the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, some errors from which she is now happily free, though we also maintain that the Church of England, in the eleventh century, was free from some errors (as, for example, the notion of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary), with which the Church of Rome is now infected. Does not "Philalethes" now see that all he has written about the visibility of the Church does not affect our views in the least? What he has to prove is her perpetual purity. If he can show that it is impossible that any error whatever can be taught in any part of the Church of Christ, then, without going back to the eleventh century, the Church of England, which professes to have reformed herself in the 16th, is condemned at once. But until he has proved this, the line of argument "Philalethes" has taken is only calculated to excite prejudice against his views. He plunges into the very darkest period of the Church's history, and calls on us to believe, not as the Apostles believed—not as the primitive Church believed—but as the eleventh century believed. What force has this until it is proved that the belief of the majority of Christians in the eleventh century must necessarily be in every respect the same as that of Christians in the first and second? We recommend "Philalethes" to examine well the foundations of his argument, and to entertain suspicions of those who shrink from light, and who would send him to grope in the dark ages for his religion.

What we have said would, we think, be a sufficient reply; but as we should be sorry "Philalethes" should think we were disposed to treat his argument lightly, we shall go a little more fully into the matter with him, even at the risk of wearying some of our readers.

"Philalethes" accuses us of "expiscating" St. Augustine. If "expiscating" a man be a wrong thing to do, and if we have done it, we are very sorry; but as we really do not know what it means, we are at a loss whether to plead guilty or not.

If "expiscating St. Augustine" means quoting from St. Augustine's works passages which are contrary to the doctrine of the Church of Rome, and therefore seem "preposterous" to "Philalethes," we are then very sorry that the Church of Rome should have departed from the doctrine of St. Augustine, and that "Philalethes" should be offended at him. But if this be our offence, we fear we shall have to "expiscate" all the Fathers in turn.

"Philalethes" accuses us of "deducing premises from St. Augustine, which, if once admitted, would lead to most preposterous consequences—viz., that some, lying in heresies and in the superstition of the Gentiles, are of the number of the elect, who truly constitute the Church." Now, these were the words of St. Augustine, which we quoted—"There are some of that number (the elect) who, as yet, are living wickedly, and are lying even in heresies, or in the superstitions of the Gentiles; and yet, even there the Lord knoweth them that are his; for in that unspeakable forehnowledge of God, many who seem to be without are indeed within, and many who seem to be within are without. Of all those who, so to speak, inwardly and hiddenly are within, consists that garden enclosed, that fountain sealed, that well of living water."

We drew no conclusions from this; much less such preposterous conclusions as "Philalethes" seems to fancy do follow from it; but which, if he had looked at the words marked in italics, he would never have dreamed of. We only asked Roman Catholics to consider how St. Augustine distinguished between the Church visible and invisible, and we still ask them to do so.

"Philalethes" retorts that this is only our individual opinion. We say it is St. Augustine's opinion, not ours. He denies it to be "a true exposition of Protestant doctrine," and calls on us "to prove it by such evidence as we require from others—viz., creeds, liturgies, public documents, or formularies of faith." A very fair demand, provided "Philalethes" will allow us, for this purpose, the free use of all the formularies of the Church of England and Ireland. It was natural, perhaps, that "Philalethes" should forget the Holy Scriptures as a source of proof; but we must remind him that it is the chief "formulary of faith" in the Church of England and Ireland. The Sixth Article adopts all that is "read therein, or may be proved thereby." Everything relating to faith that we find in the Bible is adopted by that Sixth Article. And in the Bible we find St. Paul thus speaking of himself—"When it pleased him (God), who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace to reveal his Son in me." (Galatians i. 15, 16, Douay Bible.) This is exactly what St. Augustine means. St. Paul spent the first part of his life in spiritual pride, in blasphemy and persecution; yet, "in that unspeakable foreknowledge of God," St. Paul was "separated from his mother's womb;" and yet no Christian was to hear him till the Son of God was revealed in him, and so none of the preposterous consequences that "Philalethes" fears do follow from this doctrine.

The other passage in which "Philalethes" thinks we have "expiscated St. Augustine" (whatever that means) is this—"that even schismatics, in those things in which they do not separate, are in connection with the Church." Now, the facts were thus: the Donatist schism was itself founded on the notion that schism wholly separates from Christ, and from his Church, visible and invisible. St. Augustine, St. Optatus, and all the African Church, maintained the contrary; they conducted the controversy on the principle that schism does not wholly separate; they professed to treat the Donatists as still brethren in Christ, in respect of all things in which they were agreed; and the course thus taken by the African bishops was approved of at the time by the Church of Rome, and by the whole Catholic world. And we are at a loss to know why the principles of St. Augustine, Optatus, &c., should now be regarded with such aversion by the present Church of Rome, and by "Philalethes." That Donatist controversy is, indeed, most instructive in relation to the controversy of the present day; but it is too large a subject to enter on here.* We hope to treat of it fully some other time. It will then appear who now hold the opinions which Catholics held then.

We come now to the precise question between "Philalethes and us." We are disappointed that he does not yet understand us more clearly, but still mistakes our opinions. It is perhaps natural that he should not easily comprehend opinions that are so new to him; and we are willing to take all possible pains, in hopes that we may understand each other yet.

All the difficulties which "Philalethes" raises against our view of the visible Church are no difficulties at all, except on this supposition that the visible Church must of necessity be free from all error or corruption. We have said that we believe the visible Church to be subject to error and to corruption—more or less dangerous, more or less extensive in different ages and countries. "Philalethes" thinks it enough to show that this is our opinion. But what we want is, that "Philalethes" should show us that this opinion of ours is wrong. Until he can show us this, he cannot expect us to give up that opinion. We hope he will now understand what our opinion is; and that he will show us (if he can) that this opinion is wrong.

We are equally anxious to understand exactly what "Philalethes'" opinion is. We want to know plainly, 1st. does Philalethes think that "the visible Church must of necessity be always free from error and corruption in doctrine?" 2nd. "In the case which we are now discussing (that of Berengarius), was the Church of Rome actually right?"

It is not our fault if we do not yet understand what the opinion of "Philalethes" really is about this. We have asked him these questions as plainly as we could, and he has not yet given us any answer.

We now reprint here what we said in our remarks on "Philalethes'" last letter in our number for September.

"'Philalethes' brought forward the fact that Berengarius was condemned, and forced to retract his opinions in various Councils. We selected the most important—that which has been put into the canon law, consisting of Pope Nicholas II. and 113 bishops, held at Rome, in the year 1059. We gave the words which Berengarius was compelled to sign—that the true body and the blood of Christ is 'in a sensible manner (sensualiter) handled by the hands of the priest, broken and ground by the teeth of the faithful.' We affirmed that the word sensualiter can mean nothing else than this, 'in a way that our senses can judge of and perceive.' Now we want to understand what 'Philalethes' thinks of this. Does he think that the Pope and Council were right — or does he think that they were wrong? He has not told us, AND WE CALL ON HIM TO TELL US: we cannot discuss this matter with him without knowing what his opinion is; WE THEREFORE CALL ON HIM TO ANSWER THIS. Our opinion is, that he will never venture to say that the Pope and Council were right." "Philalethes" has not answered this. He leaves us still totally in the dark, whether he does believe, or does not believe, that the visible Church must be always free from error and corruption in doctrine, and that the Church of Rome was right in that question of Berengarius.

* We touched slightly on it in our July number, p. 75.

Now, this is the very question at issue between "Philalethes" and us, "whether the visible Church must always be free from error and corruption in doctrine; and whether the Church of Rome was free from error in the case of Berengarius." How can we discuss that question with him, till we know which side he takes, and what his opinion is?

If he think that the visible Church is liable to error and corruption in doctrine, then he thinks as we do, and there is no difference between us about the visible Church. If he think that the visible Church is not liable to error or corruption of doctrine, and will tell us plainly that this is his opinion, then we will discuss that opinion with him. But it is not possible for us to discuss his opinion with him without knowing plainly what his opinion is.

We therefore call upon him again to answer this plain question, and when he answers it, as we hope he will in our next number, we will go on with the discussion.

In like manner, if our correspondent wishes us to discuss whether the Greek Church be a part of the visible Church of Christ, we would ask him to state his own opinion whether it be a part of the visible Church or not. If he think it is, we have no difference with him; if he think it is not, we will discuss it with him. He speaks of the Eastern Churches as "denying the Holy Ghost;" we were not aware of this; but if he can show us that it is so, we will not claim the Greek Church as a part of the visible Church of Christ.

We trust our correspondent will think that we have put the question fairly now.

THE CHURCH VISIBLE AND INVISIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Carlow.

Sir—In the last paragraph of "The Church Visible and Invisible" you earnestly invite Roman Catholics to the statement of Augustine's doctrine of the Church, then asking how can we pretend to say our Church is without "spot or wrinkle?" (Before I go farther, I consider this article the most temperate and candid that I have seen in any Protestant journal—it is almost Catholic.) When we quote "without spot or wrinkle," in defence of our Church, it is for her infallibility and teaching, not for the moral rectitude of her sons individually, for the cockle must needs grow among the wheat to the end of time.

You fairly remark that the Church is visible and invisible. Nothing can be more plain and simple, if you allow those that are yet to be gathered in to the true fold to be the invisible, and those that are now of the Church are visible. By their fruits you will know them.

Now, the true Church being always visible, as can be proved by many texts of Scripture, may I ask what became of its visibility at the dawning of the Reformation? Before Martin Luther was born there was a visible true Church; when he was a monk there was a visible true Church; when he broached his new doctrine there was a visible true Church; when he said emphatically he stood alone, there was a visible true Church. I stand alone! Against what? Against a Church—the true, visible Church. This was a true admission of Luther's. He stood alone—the one, solitary spark, that was afterwards to be fanned into a flame, as it were, by the four winds of heaven, and then settle down, like the lava of some burning mountain. This doctrine of Luther's was not in accordance with the then visible Church. Either Luther in person was the visible Church, or he was not. If he was the true Church, what became of the Church Catholic? for he could not then claim that title, and those that were afterwards his followers were not of his Church, visible or invisible, as they knew not his teaching while yet in the embryo of his brain. We no more contend for the infallibility of an individual than we do for the spiritual supremacy of the reigning monarch over the Catholic Church.

I am, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

A ROMAN CATHOLIC.

We sincerely thank our correspondent for his kind expressions and his candid opinion of our article; and we sincerely assure him that it is our earnest desire to be, not only almost, but altogether Catholic; and that any attempt to show us where we fail to be Catholic, or where we fall into any error, will always be esteemed by us as a kindness.

We are aware that many Roman Catholics do quote "without spot or wrinkle," rather in respect of the infallibility of their Church, than for the moral rectitude of her sons individually. One chief object in that article was to lead candid Roman Catholics to consider that distinction more carefully, and to examine how far it can be sustained.

We find in Scripture many great and glorious promises made to the Church of Christ. We find also a great tendency in many Roman Catholics to apply all those promises generally to the visible Church of Rome, as she now is. We show them some promises which appear to speak of the Church as without sin, and then they admit that these must be spoken of the Church as she appears in the sight of God, who alone knows who do truly and really belong to him. Then we show them other promises which speak of the Church as being without error, and we ask them to consider whether it may not also be possible that these promises, too, belong to the Church as God sees her, rather than to the Church as she is visible to man.

We ask them to consider why they admit that the promises of being all holy cannot be applied to the visible Church of Rome and to all her members; they will say—"because we see many sinful persons, popes, bishops, clergy, and laity, in her." A very good reason, no doubt. In the same way, if it should appear that the Church of Rome has really erred, then it will be equally necessary to apply, just in the same way, those promises that seem to speak of infallibility. We now ask our correspondent to consider carefully the articles now in progress in our pages about the question whether the Apocrypha be really the inspired Word of God. If, as we proceed with our proofs, he should see reason to think that the Church of Rome has really erred in this great question, he must surely then see, that promises that seem to speak of infallibility cannot be applied rightly to the visible Church of Rome; and then the article in our last paper, which he already considers "almost Catholic," may help him out of that difficulty.

We ask him, also, to consider whether the decision which the Pope and Council made against Berengarius was right or not. If he cannot venture to say it was right, why are we talking about infallibility any longer? He will find that decision again in this number, in our reply to the letter of "Philalethes."

We now ask him to consider again what he has said—"When we quote, 'without spot or wrinkle,' in defence of our Church, it is for her infallibility and teaching, not for the moral rectitude of he sons individually." Now, we think the question is—"Did St. Paul mean to say it of her infallibility and teaching?" Here are St. Paul's words, from the Douay Bible—"That he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."—Eph. v. 27. Was St. Paul speaking here of infallibility in teaching, or of holiness in heart and life? It seems clear to us that St. Paul speaks of the latter; and if this be so, what right have Roman Catholics to insist on applying it to infallibility?

Our correspondent has not quite correctly understood the distinction between the Church visible and invisible. By the Church visible, we mean the Church as men see it; by the Church invisible, the Church as she really is in herself, and as God sees her—who sees all things as they really are. A man who makes an outward profession of believing and obeying the Gospel, without having the Holy Spirit in his heart, appears to men to be a member of the Church; but God, who looks into the heart, sees that such a one is no real member of the Church of Christ.

Our correspondent's difficulty about Luther reminds us of a famous saying about a famous case in the ancient Church. The stand which the great Athanasius made for the Catholic faith about the Trinity was thus described—"All the world against Athanasius, and Athanasius against all the world." Will our correspondent, therefore, deny the Trinity? Will he say, "How could Athanasius be the Catholic Church? and, if he were not, where was it?"

This question about Luther is, in fact, no difficulty at all to us. Luther was not a member of the Church of England and Ireland. Nor was that Church founded by Luther; nor did it even consist of followers of Luther—though agreeing with Luther in many things. Our correspondent will agree with us that there was a Church in England before the Reformation. We say that very Church rejected some errors which it had formerly held: rejecting error does not make a Church cease to be a Church; because it is not holding error that constitutes a Church. If any one can show us that the Church of England and Ireland at the Reformation rejected any part of the Catholic faith, as it was held in the first ages, then we willingly admit that she ceased to be a true Church. But no one has shown us anything of this kind yet. And how can they, so long as she holds all the Catholic creeds.

We are truly happy to see that our correspondent does not reject the doctrine of St. Augustine, or count it preposterous in its consequences. We trust that friendly and candid discussion may yet bring him and us to be Catholics altogether and alike.

ORIGEN A HERETIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—As Mr. E. Power (most unreasonably, I think,) still asserts that you have yet given nothing against Origen, "more convincing than than mere assertion or individual opinion," will you allow me to refer him to St. Augustine de civitate Dei lib. 21. cap. 17.

St. Augustine there says—

"Illum (i.e Origenem) non immerito reprobavit ecclesia."

"The Church, with good reason, hath rejected him (Origen)."

And the chief ground of this rejection he explains to be, that Origen held that all future punishments, even those of Satan, were purgatorial.

The Benedictine editor adds the following note:—

"St. Jerome testifies that the errors of Origen were condemned by Pope Anastasius (Apol. adv. Ruff.* and epist. 78 ad Pammach); also by Theophilus, in a Council of Alexandria; after the time of Augustine, also, by Pope Vigilius and the Emperor Justinian. The fifth (Ecumenical Council condemned the impious and absurd dogmas of Origen with many anathemas."

I know not, with this before him, how any Roman Catholic can continue to cite Origen as a faithful exponent of the Church's mind, and especially on the doctrine of purgatory.

I am, sir, yours,

DIDCO.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

WHEAT sowing should now be proceeded with—completed within the month, if possible; and as the season advances, the quantity of seed should be increased.

Winter Vetches should be sown, if omitted last month, and finished as early as possible; so late in the season, they are best sown in ridges, and the water furrows well cleared up.

Bere.—Winter barley and bere and rye may be sown any time during the month, either for soiling, or to stand for seed.

Beans and Peas.—The sowing of winter beans, such as the Russian or Mazagan, should be no longer delayed; and gray peas may also be sown.

Swede Turnips, Mangel-wurzel, Carrots, and Parsnips should be all lifted, and stored early in the month. For details, see Operations for last month.

Parsnips for table use are better left in the land, and lifted fresh and fresh as required; but large field crops, intended for cattle-feeding, should now be lifted and stored.

Stall-feeding.—The cattle put up last month should now be so much accustomed to hand-feeding and house-management, as to be thriving rapidly; and their daily rations of turnips, oil-cake, bean, or other meal, be generally on the increase, till they get from 6 to 9 lbs. of oil-cake, or a compound of 4 to 6 lbs. of bean-meal, and 2 to 3 lbs. of oil-cake, according to size; they must be kept dry and warm, and well-bedded down with clean straw.

Sheep, also, intended for house-feeding, should soon be placed under cover; and when just put in should have cut turnips given them, very sparingly at first, to prevent scouring, when the allowance may be gradually increased to 1½ or 2 stones, with from ½ to 1 lb. of oil-cake, bean, or barley meal daily.

Breeding Ewes, by the close of the month, should be removed from the ram, and be allowed a spacious run on their winter pastures, which should be sound and dry, with good shelter to resort to in case of storms, and free access to good, sound hay.

Lambs, also, should now have good, sweet, but not rank pastures, and free access to dry, well-littered coverd hovels, with hay, and be supplied with cut turnips, rather sparingly, just as much daily as they can eat up clean, and no more.

Stores.—Sheep should also have a liberal supply of roots and meal; and, as a general rule with all sheep, should have access to salt. The feet of sheep should also be constantly attended to, kept pared, and clean; and if there be any tendency to soreness or tenderness, dress immediately with the butyr of antimony.

Pigs.—Both fattening and stores should now have abundance of cooked food. The stores on steamed turnips and beans, with the offal from the dairy and kitchen; but those fattening should have a liberal allowance of grain with their turnips and potatoes. By the end of the month it will be a good time to send the sows to the brawn.

Grass Lands.—Continue manuring the grazing and meadow lands, with rich composts, farm-yard manure, bones, marl, or manure-gravel.

Water Meadows.—The sluices, ducts, and drains for irrigation should be looked to, and put in order; and any necessary alterations or improvements made without delay; that advantage may now be taken by those having a command of water to commence flooding the water meadows; and that those dependant on floods may be prepared to take advantage of them when they occur.

Fences.—This is a good time to plash and lay old fences; and lay out and plant new ones, when requisite.

Potatoes should still be planted in dry weather; early varieties and early planting being the best security from the disease.

Odds and Ends.—Keep the flail or thrashing-machine at work, to supply fresh straw for the stock; and, as the state of the market may advise, for the sale of grain; keep the teams either at plough or cart; go on draining and subsoiling where necessary; plough up grass lands where intended; scour out ditches and water courses; repair gates and roads; turn over compost heaps; cart home fuel, limestone, &c.; proceed with planting, felling timber, and cleansing coppices; and see that the water let over the irrigated meadows flows freely and constantly, without stagnating on the surface, and that the outlets are free and unobstructed.

* "Quid facient epistolæ Theophili episcopi? quid Papa Anastasius in toto orbe hæreticum persequens?" Who the heretic was that was to be thus persecuted over the whole world, we learn from the previous sentence—"Non valet apud eos super Origenis damnatione episcoporum auctoritas." St. Jerome Apol adv. Rufinum, lib. i. p. 196.

New, Recent, and Illustrated Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Any Book or number of Books together, within a pound weight, can be sent by post for 6d., and at the rate of 6d. for every pound weight additional.

HEATH'S KEEPSAKE FOR 1854. Edited by Miss Power, with Illustrations on Steel. Elegantly Bound. 21s.

THE COURT ALBUM; or Book of Beauty for 1854, a Series of Portraits of the Female Aristocracy. In an Elegant Binding. 21s.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE; from the downfall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852. Vol. 2. 8vo. 15s.

BURKE'S PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE; corrected to the present time. Royal. 8vo. 38s.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, in the Autumn of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. With Illustrations. 14s.

MEMOIRS OF CONVICTED PRISONERS; accompanied by remarks on the cause and prevention of crime. By the Rev. H. S. Joseph. 8vo. 4s.

PRINCIPLES OF THE INTERIOR OR HIDDEN LIFE; designed particularly for the consideration of those who are seeking Assurance of Faith and Perfect Love. By Thomas C. Upham, D.D. Foolscap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE BYE-WAYS OF THE BIBLE. By the Rev. Richard Brown. Fcap. 8vo 2s. 6d.

BENEDICTIONS; or, The Blessed Life. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. Fcap. 8vo. 7s.

THE SECOND COMING OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST; and the Millenial Reign of the Saints. By the Rev. Philip Gell. Fcap. 8vo. 6d.

TRUTH SPOKEN IN LOVE; or, Romanism and Tractarianism Refuted by the Word of God. By the Rev. H. H. Beamish. Fcap. 8vo. 6s.

MEMOIR OF RICHARD WILLIAMS, SURGEON, Catechist in the Missionary Expedition to Patagonia, Terra-del-Fuego. By the Rev. James Hamilton, D.D. Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE FRONTIER LANDS OF THE CHRISTIAN AND THE TURK. By a British Resident of Twenty Years in the East. 2 Vols. 28s.

THE RECTORY OF GLENMURRAGH. By an Archbishop's Daughter. 2s. 6d.

CHALMERIANA; or, Colloquies with Dr. Chalmers. By Joseph John Gurney. 2s. 6d.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. Vol. 5. Library Edition. 8vo., Cloth. 12s.

ELLEN MONTGOMERY'S BOOKCASE—MR. RUTHERFORD'S CHILDREN. By the Author of "The Wide, Wide World." Fcap. 8vo. 2s.

KRAUSE'S SERMONS, Preached in Bethesda Chapel. Vol. III. Post 8vo. 5s.

LARDNER'S HAND-BOOK OF ASTRONOMY AND METEOROLOGY. Thick 12mo. With Illustrations. 16s. 6d.

LONGFELLOW'S GOLDEN LEGEND. 8vo. Beautifully Illustrated. Uniform with "Hyperion," and "Poetical Works." Bound in blue. 12s.

WORK; or Plenty to Do, and how to Do It. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 12mo. 2s.

THE CONTRAST; or, a Few Words to Professing Christians on the Use of this World. By the Rev. R. M. Davies, A.B. 18mo. 1s.

HIPPOLYTUS AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF THE THIRD CENTURY; with a Copious Analysis of the newly discovered MS., &c. By W. Elfe Taylor. Fcap 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE DOMESTIC COMMENTARY ON THE OLD TESTAMENT. By a Clergyman of the Church of England; Genesis to 2nd Book of Kings. Imp. 8vo. 16s.

THE DOMESTIC COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. By a Clergyman of the Church of England. Imp. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

DISCOURSES AND SAYINGS OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, Illustrated in a Series of Expositions. By Rev. John Brown, D.D. 3 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d.

AN EXPOSITION OF OUR LORD'S INTERCESSORY PRAYER, (John xvii.) with a Discourse on the Relation of Our Lord's Intercession to the Conversion of the World. By Rev. John Brown, D.D. 8vo. 7s.

EXPOSITORY DISCOURSES ON THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER. By Rev. John Brown, D.D. 2 vols. 8vo. 21s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. Vol. 5. Post 8vo., Cloth. (Oliver and Boyd's Edition.) 6s.

A NARRATIVE OF LITTLE BESSIE; or Advantages of Early Religious instruction. 1d.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE, from the French Revolution of 1789 to Waterloo (1815). Cheaper Edition. Vols. I. and II. 4s. each.

 Subscribers' names received.

THE RELIGION OF GEOLOGY, AND ITS CONNECTED SCIENCES. By Edward Hitchcock, D.D., LL.D. 12mo. Sewed 1s. 6d.; cloth 2s.

GENESIS AND GEOLOGY; or an Investigation into the Reconciliation of the Modern Doctrines of Geology; with the Declarations of Scripture. By Denis Crofton, B.A. 2s.

"I have met with no examination of the connection between 'Geology and Genesis,' so able as this. Other eminent writers, such as Dr. Chalmers, J. Pye Smith, Harris, Buckland, Silliman, Sedgewick, and Whewell, have shown great skill in the examination of the Biblical questions connected with geology, but none of them have gone so fully into the argument as Mr. Crofton."—Rev. Dr. Hitchcock.

THE ART OF QUESTIONING; or, a short Analysis of the Interrogatory Methods of Instruction, designed for the use of Teachers, Pupil-Teachers, and Monitors. By W. T. Young, T.C.D. 1s. By post, 1s. 4d.

"Mr. Young brings a clear brain, and evident experience, to the analysis of his subject. Such a work was much required, and we heartily commend it to the extensive and important class for whom its subject so greatly concerns."—The Advocate.

"The author belongs to the more advanced school of educational reformers, and his production is replete with enlightened sentiments of a truly practical character."—Sunday School Teacher's Magazine.

"The design of this excellent little manual is to afford facilities to the teacher in the 'art of questioning.' The author's plan is a clear and simple one, in which the mind as well as the memory of the pupil is exercised, while the necessity of a clearly-defined and easily-understood question is enforced by appropriate examples, as the true source of a ready and intelligent answer."——Christian Family Advocate.

LIFE OF DR. CHALMERS. By the Rev. William Hanna, LL.D. Cheaper Edition. In four Parts. 10s. (Part I., 2s. 6d., already Published). To be completed in two vols., Crown 12mo., Cloth. 12s.

 Names of Subscribers received.

POCKET BOOKS AND ALMANACS FOR THE YEAR 1854—

Christian Remembrancer. Tuck, 2s. 6d.
Scripture Pocket-Book. Tuck, 2s.
Tilt's Pocket-book Almanac. 9d. Tuck, 1s. 6d.
Tilt's Miniature Almanac. 6d. Tuck, 1s.
Tilt's Scripture Calendar. 1d.
Marshall's Ladies' and Gentlemans' Pocket-books. 2s. 6d. each.
Pawsey's, Poole's, and Carnan's Pocket-books. 2s. 6d. each.
The Christian Almanac. 6d. Gilt edges, 8d.
Tract Society Pocket Almanac. 1d.
Tract Society Pocket Almanac, interleaved. 2d.
Chamber's Memoranda; or, Bill Diary, for 1854. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
Chamber's Memoranda; or, Daily Register of Appointments, &c. Folio. 3s. 6d.

In the Press, and will be Published in December—price to Subscribers, 2s. 6d.; Non-subscribers, 3s. 6d—

Recommended by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

LETTERS FROM SARAWAK.

BY MRS. M'DOUGALL.

Addressed to a Child.

This little Work will give, in language suited for Children, a full account of the manners, customs, and religion of the Inhabitants of Borneo, Malays and Dyaks; and of the progress of the Church Mission during the first five years of its operations, with incidents of Missionary Life among the Natives.

It will be handsomely bound in Cloth, and Illustrated with Engravings from the Pencil of Mrs. M'Dougall; and will be very suitable as a Christmas Present for Children. With this view it is intended to appear about the second week in December.

 Those wishing to secure the Work at Subscribers' Price, are requested to forward their Names, at once, to Messrs. W. CURRY & Co., Booksellers and Publishers, Dublin.

Just Published, 8vo., price 4d.; by post, 8d.,

THE CONNECTION BETWEEN CHRISTIAN FAITH AND PRACTICE; a Sermon Preached in the Cathedral Church of St. Patrick, Dublin, on Sunday, September 25, 1853, on the occasion of an ordination held by his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin. By the Rev. Cadwallader Wolseley, A.M.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND CO., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

NEW WORKS AND NEW EDITIONS IN THE PRESS.

I.

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, Catechetically Explained, Compared with Scripture, and Briefly Commented on, &c.; for the Use of Families and Sunday Schools. By the Rev. Charles Miller, A.B. With Recommendatory Preface by the Bishop of Meath. Fcap. 8vo.

[Immediately.]

II.

TALK OF THE ROAD.

(Reprinted from the CATHOLIC LAYMAN.)

Forming a handsome Fcap. 8vo. Volume.

[Shortly.]

III.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ELOCUTION;

Extracted from

"The Elements of Rhetoric."

By Archbishop Whately.

With some additions and alterations.

NOTICE TO THE READER.

The present compilation from that known and justly celebrated work, "The Elements of Rhetoric," by Archbishop Whately, has been made with the kind permission of the author.

New matter has been introduced by the Archbishop; and the whole, arranged, revised, and corrected under the personal inspection of His Grace.

That this little work may be of use in exhibiting and impressing some principles of elocution, and so aiding the student to express his thoughts "clearly, forcibly, and agreeably," after a simple and "natural" manner, has been the sincere desire and aim of the compiler, who also trusts the reader may be induced to gain a deeper insight into this important branch of Rhetoric, by a careful study of Archbishop Whately's entire work.—Dublin, November 17, 1853.

[In December.]

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 28, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.
November, 1853.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Flóir do Dhia ain fna háidhuib, agus fíoídáin air an dtalaim deagḋoil do na dáoinib.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. II.—No. 24. DECEMBER, 1853. Annual Subscription, 3s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Infallibility Subversive of Christianity	133
Hymn of Secundinus in praise of St. Patrick	134
Results of Intolerance in Spain	136
The Decretal Epistles, genuine and forged, No. I.	137
Talk of the Road, No. XIX.	137
Spirit of the Catholic Layman.—Close of One Second Year	139
Religious Inquiry in America	140
The Irish Wanderer in Search of Truth	140
CORRESPONDENCE—
Infallibility of the Church of Rome—by Bedale	141
Prayers for the Dead and the Burial Service—by Mr. E. Power	141
Church Visible and Invisible—by a Roman Catholic	142
On the Service in Latin—by Michael O'Mara of Waterford	142
Purgatory—What is it?—by Theta	143
Forming Operations for December	143

INFALLIBILITY SUBVERSIVE OF CHRISTIANITY.

THIS somewhat startling assertion may appear, at first sight, to be nothing more than a foolish paradox, which a bigoted and benighted Protestant alone would venture to maintain; but we assure our Roman Catholic readers that we put it forward in sober seriousness, and we undertake to show them, if they will favour us for a few moments with their attention, that we have strong reasons for making the assertion. To avoid misconception, however, it may be as well to observe, that we do not mean by infallibility the infallibility of the great head of the Church, our Lord Jesus Christ, nor that of his divine Word, as recorded in the Holy Scriptures, but the asserted infallibility of the Church of Rome, wherever it may be supposed to be lodged.

With this preliminary observation we proceed to our proof.

It is an established principle of the Church of Rome, that in order to make a right use, or indeed any use, of the Holy Scriptures, the authority and guidance of the living infallible Church is absolutely indispensable. Dr. Milner, for example, in his well-known work, "The End of Controversy" (Let. ix.), maintains that a person who does not believe in the infallibility of the Church cannot be certain that the Bible is the Word of God at all, inasmuch as without this belief nothing can be ascertained respecting the inspiration, genuineness, or authenticity of the sacred volume. It is, moreover, universally held and perpetually insisted on by Roman Catholic theologians that, even admitting the fundamental points just mentioned to be settled, yet the interpretation of the Bible is beset with so many difficulties and doubts, obscurities and objections, that its real meaning can never be arrived at with certainty, except under the infallible guidance of the Church. A belief in the infallibility of the Church is, then, according to the Church of Rome, the sole foundation of a firm and certain belief in Scripture as the Word of God, and in all the articles of the faith. To use the words of Dr. Wiseman:* "I will explain in the simplest manner possible, the grounds whereupon we found our faith, on which we build the doctrines which we profess; I will examine, in other words, whether we are justified in admitting, as the groundwork of all that we believe, an authority, a living authority, established by Christ in His Church, with His security against error."

Now this is all very well, so long as Roman Catholics are engaged in controversy with Protestants, who believe the Bible to be the Word of God. In arguing with those who hold that the written Word of God is the sole rule of faith, it may be very convenient to exaggerate its difficulties, so as at last to make out that it is little better than an inexplicable enigma, except the infallible Church interposes. But there are other classes of opponents beside Protestants, whom it is necessary to argue with and convince—heathens and infidels, for example. What line of argument, then, is to be pursued in controversies with unbelievers of this kind? The following outline is taken from the celebrated "Theological Prelections" of Perrone, professor of Theology in the Jesuit college at Rome. In his treatise, "De Vera Religione contra Incredulos," Perrone begins† by refuting the objections raised by infidelity against the possibility of a revelation. He then proceeds to argue its necessity. We have next an elaborate discussion of the objections which have been raised against the possibility of miracles and prophecy. And here, at length, we arrive at the actual proofs of Christianity. The following postulate is assumed as the basis of the whole argument:—"It is, to us, firm and certain that Moses, and the prophets, and Christ existed, and that the books of the two Testaments are genuine and veracious."† He then lays down his first proposition, which is, "That Christ, by his miracles and prophecies, and especially his resurrection from the dead, proved his divine mission."‡ In proof of the miracles of Christ, he refers to the Gospels; and then, from the same sources, he shows that Christ prophesied the diffusion of the Gospel among all nations, the perpetuity of the church subject to the successors of St. Peter, the fall of Jerusalem, and other events. The resurrection of our Lord he establishes, in a similar way, from the New Testament at large. His second proposition, in proof of the truth of Christianity, is derived from "the excellence and sanctity of the doctrine of the Gospel, which most eminently confirms the divine and supernatural mission of Christ."§ He proceeds at some length to expatiate on the doctrinal and ethical precepts of our Lord, referring throughout to Holy Scripture. Again, in his treatise "On the Incarnation," directed against Jews, infidels, rationalists, and heretics, he deduces his arguments from the law and the prophets,‖ referring to the predictions of Jacob, Daniel, Haggai, Malachi, &c.; and he employs the ordinary methods of criticism to vindicate their interpretation against the objections of the adversaries.

From what has just been said, it will be perceived that Roman Catholic apologists¶ for Christianity have recourse to the same proofs of its divine origin as were employed by the ancient apologists, and which are to be found in the standard Protestant works on the subject. They appeal, and very rightly, to the books of the Old and New Testament, as authentic records of the facts and doctrines of the Jewish and Christian dispensations. The arguments from prophecies and miracles, and from the excellence of the Christian doctrine, pre-suppose, of course, the genuineness and authenticity of the sacred books, and the uncorrupted preservation of their text.

This seems to be all very satisfactory, so far. But a moment's reflection will show, that in the hands of a Roman Catholic, such arguments are utterly futile when employed to prove the truth of Christianity against a rationalist or infidel. The latter must be very ignorant indeed if he cannot reply in some such terms as the following:—"You wish to persuade me that Christianity is a divine revelation, because its founders wrought miracles, and predicted future events, and taught a doctrine which far exceeded in excellence and purity that of any former religion; and you found these assertions on the statements of a book that you call Holy Scripture. But the ablest theologians of your Church, when disputing against Protestant heretics (as you call them), have proved that the genuineness and authenticity of Scripture, and the safe preservation of its true text and its meaning, are altogether uncertain in themselves. To establish the truth of the miracles and prophecies on which you rely, you must first establish the authenticity of the text and the true meaning of Scripture, all which your own divines have proved to be questionable. If, as you yourselves maintain, there are no certain means of knowing from the writings themselves whether they are inspired or not; or whether they are or are not a record which may be implicitly depended on; or what is the meaning which they were designed to convey; or, finally, whether they have or have not been: interpolated it is plain you cannot require me to subscribe to the inferences which you draw from documents, everything connected with which is involved in so much difficulty and obscurity." "Oh!" the Roman Catholic apologist will, doubtless, reply, "these difficulties and obscurities exist only for those who do not belong to the true Church. The members of that Church have her unerring authority, and enjoy her infallible guidance in all these matters." "But how," the other will as surely rejoin, "do you prove that this Church of which you speak is infallible?" "Very easily," says the apologist; and he forthwith refers to the Scriptures as the genuine and authentic record of Christ's promises, commands, and institutions. He produces a number of texts, which, he says, clearly prove the perpetuity, universality, unity, and infallibility of the Church. But here, again, the infidel will reply, "You are arguing in what logicians call 'a circle;' you have proved yourselves that there can be no certainty of any interpretations of Scripture, except vouched for by the authority of the infallible Church; you cannot, therefore, fairly prove this authority from Scripture, since, according to your own doctrine, Scripture itself, as regards its interpretation, depends upon that authority." As the only possible means of evading this objection, the Roman Catholic must have recourse to a "distinction," and say, "The texts which I employ to prove the infallible authority of the Church are plain and indisputable, and are, in fact, the only texts in Scripture which do not need interpretation." The infidel will answer, "You are begging the question; and so far is what you say from being the case, that these very texts are still the subjects of discussion between you and Protestants; and it is notorious that some of the greatest of the Church Fathers have differed from each other, and sometimes even from themselves, as to the true interpretation of them. In fact, these texts are as much the subject of different interpretations as those which refer to any other of what you call the capital doctrines of your faith, such as the Trinity, the Incarnation, Transubstantiation," &c. This reduces the apologist to an awkward dilemma. If the texts upon which he builds the doctrine of the infallibility of the living Church be, notwithstanding the disputes about them, sufficiently plain and unmistakeable, then those relating to all other important doctrines may be so likewise; and thus there is no necessity for any infallible living judge in the Church. If those texts be obscure, and need an authoritative interpreter, they are insufficient to establish the authority of the Church, which Romanists themselves hold be the only certain evidence of the right interpretation, genuineness, authority, and uncorrupted preservation of the Scriptures. This, we say, is an awkward dilemma. The first alternative cannot be conceded without abandoning the field to the Protestant; if the second be allowed, infidelity is triumphant.

Roman Catholic controversialists have been, of course, often pressed with this formidable difficulty. They have, accordingly, endeavoured to evade it by resting the proof of the authority of the Church on Scripture, considered merely as an historical document authenticated by human testimony, and then employing the authority of the Church to determine its true interpretation, and to rest its inspiration.* But this leaves the difficulty in undiminished force. The infidel may rejoin, "You have yourselves proved that human testimony can be no foundation of firm and certain faith. You have shown that the meaning of Scripture is, of itself, dubious. To establish the authority of the Church on Scripture, read and interpreted according to the principles applied to ordinary compositions, would be at once to place your faith on the very basis which, when disputing against Protestants, you have proved to be unsound."

Roman Catholics, when defending their Church against the scriptural arguments of Protestants, find it necessary to involve the Scriptures in as much obscurity and difficulty as possible, and to represent the reading of them as unnecessary and unprofitable, if not dangerous. Thus Pighius—who was patronized by four Popes, Leo X., Adrian VI., Clement VII., and Paul III., and was regarded as one of the greatest divines of his age—calls Scripture a "nose of wax, which allows itself to be pulled this way and that, and to be moulded into any form you please." This is all very well against Protestants. But it is to be hoped that, in making such statements, the divines of the Church of Rome are not aware that they are undermining the evidences of Christianity itself. We would gladly believe that they are not conscious that their arguments against Protestants

* Lectures on the Principal Doctrines, &c. Vol. I., p. 2.

* Perrone, Prælectiones Theologicæ. Vol. I., col. 19, sq. Paris. 1842.
† Perrone, Præl. Theol. Col. 87. ‡ Ib. Col. 89.
§ Ib. Col. 109. ‖ Ib. Col. 911, sq.
¶ Perrone's arguments agree in the main with those of Huet, Bergier, Bossuet, Hooke, Bonvier, and the other Roman Catholic divines who have discussed the subject.

* This is the line of argument adopted by Perrone, Wiseman, De la Luzerne, De la Hogue, and most of the other professed writers on the subject.

may be turned by infidels against Revelation itself. If the principles of the Church of Rome be true, Christianity has absolutely and positively no rational proof whatever. Romanism entirely subverts or renders unavailing the evidences on which the early Christian writers, and the Scriptures themselves, rested the truth of the Gospel. It leaves Revelation, literally, without any evidences.

From what has been said, it is very clear that the Church of Rome is, by her own fundamental principles, unable to prove that Christianity is a divine revelation. When infidels and rationalists compare the arguments of the Romish theologians in defence of Christianity with their arguments in defence of the infallibility of the Church, they will, in an instant, detect and expose the self-contradiction of the whole system. Romish Christianity, based upon the principles which it is forced to avow in opposition to Protestantism, is, in the hands of rationalism or infidelity, weaker and more destitute of proof than heathenism itself, because it is more self-destructive. The argument for Christianity, coming from a Roman Catholic, is only calculated to afford matter of amusement and scoffing to the unbeliever. The fearful prevalence of infidelity in Roman Catholic countries is a notorious fact; may we not say that this is one of the chief causes to which it is to be attributed?

The following is the sad testimony of one who was himself the victim of this miserable sophistry. "Into the authority of the Church I very consistently resolved the certainty of my faith as a Christian, and of my scientific theology as a divine. Yet, I did no sooner allow myself to examine the question of Church infallibility, with a determination not to be intimidated by consequences, than my whole Christianity vanished like a dream. I concluded that Christianity could not be true. This inference was not properly my own. The Church of Rome had most assiduously prepared me to draw it."*

THE HYMN OF SECUNDINUS.

In the second number of this Journal we printed the original text, and translations, of the Irish hymn composed by St. Patrick, immediately after his arrival in this country, when his teaching was opposed, and his life threatened, by his Pagan enemies. We now lay before our readers a document, of nearly the same age, and no less interesting in itself, the hymn composed by Secundinus in praise of the great Apostle of Ireland, after his labours in organizing a Christian Church had been crowned with success. Of its genuineness and authenticity no doubts need be entertained.† A copy of it is preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, in an ancient volume of hymns, believed by Archbishop Ussher to be a thousand years old in his own time. Another copy, written in the seventh or eighth century, exists in the Ambrosian Library in Milan, from which it was printed by Muratori in his Anecdota Ambrosiana. It is frequently alluded to in ancient writings, and invariably ascribed to the same author. Of Secundinus himself but little is known. The ancient Irish authorities concur in stating, that he was the son of a sister of St. Patrick, and that his father was a Lombard, named Restitutus. He arrived in Ireland, according to the Annals of Ulster, in the year 439, being sent to assist St. Patrick in his missionary labours. He usually resided at Dunshaughlin, which derives its name from himself;‡ and his death is recorded in the Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 447. In a catalogue of Bishops of Armagh, printed in Colgan's Trias, we find Secundinus set down as having held that see for sixteen years. If the dates already given be correct, this story cannot be true. It may, however, be accounted for, in part, by supposing that St. Patrick on some occasions intrusted Secundinus with the care of that see during his own absence on missionary circuits through Ireland; or that he permanently retained him as his coadjutor Bishop. The anonymous author of the preface prefixed to the hymn of Secundinus, in the Liber Hymnorum, gives the following account of the occasion on which it was composed:—Secundinus had accused St. Patrick of failing to inculcate charity; meaning thereby, that if St. Patrick had insisted more strongly upon the duty of manifesting a pious liberality by the offering of temporal goods for religious uses, more lands and possessions would have been contributed by the ready devotion of the people for the maintenance and endowment of churches. St. Patrick, vindicating himself from this charge, explained, that out of charity he had been sparing in his exhortations to charity. Satisfied by this, Secundinus asked pardon for his error, and composed the hymn for the purpose of establishing a reconciliation between himself and St. Patrick. Whether this story be true or not, is a matter of small consequence, compared with the internal character of the hymn itself. Dr. Lanigan says of it,§ that it "is well worthy of illustration, as it contains excellent allusions to the most sound doctrine and discipline; and it would be desirable that we had a more correct copy of it." In this opinion of the learned historian we fully coincide, and we think we have accomplished the first of the two objects which Dr. Lanigan has indicated, by annexing to the translation of each stanza a few references to passages of Scripture quoted or alluded to in it. These references will show that the mind of the writer was completely imbued with a knowledge of Holy Scripture, from which most of the thoughts and expressions in the hymn are drawn. As regards the exhibition of a correct text, we have made some approach towards the attainment of this end, by means of a careful collation of the different existing copies.*

The reader will observe, that throughout the hymn the present tense is used in connection with the name of St. Patrick; and no allusions are made to any circumstances that occurred at or after his decease. This does not, indeed, prove that it was written in St. Patrick's lifetime; for a careful forger, in a later age, would use the same mode of speaking. But what, to our mind, irresistibly demonstrates the genuineness of this hymn is its absolute silence respecting any miracles alleged to have been wrought by St. Patrick. All the lives of him printed by Colgan contain accounts of these miracles. The oldest lives relate the fewest miracles. The later ones, curiously exemplifying the theory of development, narrate the most numerous and astounding prodigies—whilst St. Patrick himself, solemnly recording the history of his life and labours in his Confession, written shortly before his death, abstains from taking credit to himself for the possession of miraculous powers. It might be said that his silence was dictated by a modest desire to avoid magnifying his character or acts. But the silence of an eulogist, composing such a hymn as the one before us, is only to be explained on the supposition that the miracles were not wrought, and that he wrote before the legends respecting them obtained currency. Or the argument may be stated in a somewhat different form. If the miracles were truly worked, every biographer and every panegyrist of St. Patrick, from his own time down to that of Joceline, might be expected to take notice of them. Attempts to prove that certain events did not take place, because a writer omits to make mention of them, are often idle, because it cannot be proved that it fell within his scope and intention to notice them. It is only where this latter link in the chain of reasoning can be surely supplied that this mode of reasoning is conclusive. In the present case, we may argue in this way with perfect safety. For a panegyrist, desiring to put forward everything that tended to the honour of the person whose praises he was celebrating, and doing so at considerable length, could not fail to state that he had publicly worked miracles of various kinds, and of the most prodigious nature, if he had really done so. Whatever such a writer neglected to notice, he would surely make mention of the miracles.

There is another omission in this hymn of Secundinus which claims attention. No mention is made in it of St. Patrick's having been sent hither by Pope Celestine.† Now, there occur in the composition occasions the most natural that can be conceived for the introduction of a reference to this circumstance, if it had actually occurred. He is said to have "received his apostleship from God" (C). "The Lord chose him to teach the barbarous nations" (D). "He was sent by God as an apostle, even as Paul to the Gentiles" (G). "He was chosen by God to watch over the people of God" (P). "The Saviour advanced him for his merits to be a bishop" (Q). "Christ chose him to be his vicar on the earth" (X). Here are occasions enough to mention the appointment by Celestine, if it had ever taken place. But there is not a word to this effect. On the other hand, the assertions that St. Patrick obtained his apostleship from God, and that he was our apostle, as St. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles at large, go some way to negative the supposition that St. Patrick derived his appointment from the Pope. For a comparison is suggested between his case and that of St. Paul, who says of himself, that he was "an apostle not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father."—Gal. i. 1.

The reader can hardly fail to remark an expression in this hymn, which bears strongly upon the relation between the Church established by St. Patrick, and the Church of Rome. He is spoken of in the third stanza as a head of the Church, in the same sense as St. Peter was. "On him, as on Peter, the Church is built." Secundinus seems to have discerned the true interpretation of our Lord's promise to St. Peter (Matt. xvi. 18). At all events, he cannot be supposed to have read in it the title of the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff or the Roman Church.

One word more as to the topics of which all mention is omitted in this hymn. Secundinus makes no mention in this long composition of the Blessed Virgin Mary. There may have been, doubtless there was, no special reason for referring to her. But must it not appear strange to any candid Roman Catholic to find mention here of the three Persons of the Trinity, the Angels, the Apostles, the Church, the Scriptures, Earth, Heaven, and Hell, all the chief objects of the Christian faith, but not one word of the Virgin Mary? The same omission strikes us in reading the Confession of St. Patrick. In the second paragraph of that remarkable document he gives us a formal confession of his faith, a very ample paraphrase of the Christian's creed; but neither there, nor anywhere else in his writings, do we meet the Virgin Mary's name. Would this be the case in any composition of equal length, and on a subject relating to religion and the Church, coming from the pen of a Roman Catholic Bishop of the present day?

We must not conclude our comments upon this hymn without pointing the reader's attention to the information it conveys respecting the nature of St. Patrick's teaching. He is represented as freely communicating the Gospel (E), and (I) "He finds a treasure in the sacred volume" (S). "His words were seasoned with the Divine oracles" (T). "His seeds were the Gospels of Christ" (V). The Apocalypse and Psalms also furnished the subjects of his discourses for the edification of the people of God (Y). This is exactly in accordance with what the tenor of his writings would lead us to expect. Both his Confession and his Epistle to Coroticus are so rich in quotations from Scripture, as to prove that his mind was thoroughly stored with scriptural ideas and phraseology, and that he took a delight in imparting this treasure to others. We are also told that it was his practice to leave behind him copies of the Old and New Testaments in places where he established Christian Churches for the first time.* On this head, however, we need say no more here; the difference between ancient Irish saints and modern Roman Catholic bishops, as regards the free use of the Holy Scriptures, having been discussed at some length in a former number of this journal.†

In the Book of Armagh the recitation of this hymn of Secundinus, and St. Patrick's own Irish hymn, is mentioned as a fixed part of the solemnity observed in celebrating the anniversary of St. Patrick's death.‡ We hope that our Catholic countrymen will revive this usage, not in the superstitious expectation of thus obtaining any miraculous benefits,§ but for the purpose of keeping up a lively recollection of the scriptural character of the Church established by St. Patrick in Ireland.

HYMNUS SANCTI PATRICII EPISCOPI SCOTORUM.

A.

Audite, omnes amantes
Deum, sancta merita
Viri in Christo beati,
Patricii episcopi;
Quomodo bonum ob actum
Similatur angelis,
Perfectamque propter vitam
Æquatur apostolis.

B.

Beati Christi custodit
Mandata in omnibus;
Cujus opera refulgent
Clara inter homines;
Sanctumque cujus sequuntur
Exemplum mirificum;
Unde et in cœlis Patrem Magnificant Dominum.

---

* Life of Blanco White, i., pp. 256, 111.

† The antiquity of this hymn has been questioned by a modern German author (Schöll, Ecclesiarum Brittanicarum Origines), for no better reasons than because it is alphabetical, and its style barbarous. He seems to have forgotten the existence of the alphabetical psalms; and takes no account of the fact that there have been unlearned and inelegant writers in ancient as well as in modern times.

‡ The Irish form of the name Secundinus is Sechnall; and Domnach Sechnaill, the Dominica, or church, of Secundinus, was corrupted into Dunshaughlin.

§ Dr. Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, vol. i., p. 295.

* Attention to the metre, such as it is, has enabled us to make some obvious corrections of the text. In each stanza there are eight lines, alternately of eight and seven syllables, hiatus and quantity being wholly disregarded; generally speaking, there is an accent on the penultimate syllable in the first, third, fifth, and seventh lines; and on the ante-penultimate, in the second, fourth, sixth, and eighth. This metre seems to be a rude imitation of the classical trochaic tetrameter catalectic.

† Neither does St. Patrick himself speak of it in his Confession, though he refers to the circumstances connected with his mission to Ireland. It does not appear to have been known to Muirchu Maccu Machteni (Ussher's Maccuthenius), who wrote his life of St. Patrick in the latter part of the seventh century. The headings of the chapters relating to this part of St. Patrick's history prove this more plainly than the body of the narrative. They stand as follows:—

De ætate ejus quando Iens videre sedem apostolicam voluit discere sapientiam.

De inventione Sancti Germani in Gallis, et ideo non exivit ultra.

De ætate ejus quando visitavit eum angelus ut veniret adhuc.

De reversione ejus de Gallis, et ordinatione Palladii, et mox morte ejus.

De ordinatione ejus ab Amathorege episcopo defuncto, Palladio.—Betham's Irish Antiquarian Researches, Appendix, p. 43, corrected from the original.

* Portavit Patricius per Sinium secum . . . libros legis, evangelii libros, et reliquit illos in locis novis.—Betham's I. A. R., Appendix, p. 17.

† April, 1852, vol. I., p. 37.

‡ Betham's I. A. R., Appendix, p. 36.

§ Colgan (Trias, p. 210) quotes passages from the lives of St. Kevin, St Colmanel, and St. Canice, for the purpose of showing that miraculous benefits were consequent upon the recitation of this hymn. One of these is so extraordinary that we cannot forbear quoting it.

"Quodam autem tempore Sanctus Cannicus volens fugere homines, sine navi suis pedibus intravit divina virtute in Insulam stagni Cre: ibique exemplo Domini quadraginta diebus, et quadraginta noctibus mansit: sed cibum humanum non habuit, nec domum; sed super nudam terram habitavit. Ipse autem non sensit famem, vel sitim neque frigus; neque pluvia sibi nocuit: Solus ergo orationibus divinis vacabat, et nemo scivit quod ibi fuit. Quodam autem die, cum esset in oratione in illa insula, vidit turbas demonum sedentes super equos secus se festinantes. Interrogante autem illo demones, quo pergerent; unus ex illis respondit ei; nos festinamus ad contendendam animam unius divitis in regione Muscraighi. Cui dixit S. Cannicus venias ad me iterum, cum fabulis, ut dicas de illa anima aliquid mihi. Cumque post pugnam ad eum rediisset dæmon, vidit S. Cannicus eum sine equo, et tristem valde: et interrogans, Ille respondit; nos victi sumus: nam vir ille tria capitula de hymno S. Patricii ante mortem, nobis nescientibus, cantavit: et perhoc liberatus est de manibus nostris."

Ex vita Sancti Cannici, c. 43.

C.

Constans in Dei timore
Et fide immobilis;
Super quem ædificatur,
Ut Petrum, ecclesia;
Cujusque apostolatum
A Deo sortitus est;
Inferni portæ adversus
Eum non prævalebunt.

D.

Dominus illum elegit
Ut doceret barbaras
Nationes, ut piscaret
Per doctrinæ retia;
Ut de seculo credentes
Traheret ad gratiam,
Dominumque sequerentur
Sedem ad ætheriam.

E.

Electa Christi talenta
Vendit evangelica,
Quæ Hibernas inter gentes
Cum usuris exigit;
Navati hujus laboris
Tum operæ pretium
Cum Christo regni celestis
Possessurus gaudium.

F.

Fidelis Dei minister,
Insignisque nuntius,
Apostolicum exemplum
Formamque præbet bonis;
Qui tam verbis quam et factis
Plebi prædicat Dei,
Ut quem dictis non convertit
Actu provocet bono.

G.

Gloriam habet cum Christo,
Honorem in seculo;
Qui ab omnibus ut Dei
Veneratur angelus;
Quem Deus misit, ut Paulum
Ad Gentes, apostolum,
Ut hominibus ducatum
Præberet regno Dei.

H.

Humilis Dei ob metum
Spiritu et corpore;
Super quem bonum ob actum
Requiescit Dominus:
Cujusque justa in carne
Christi portat stigmata,
In cujus sola sustentans
Se gloriatur cruce.

I.

Impiger credentes pascit
Dapibus celestibus,
Ne qui videntur cum Christo
In via deficiant;
Quibus erogat ut panes
Verba evangelica,
In cujus multiplicantur,
Ut manna, in manibus.

K.

Kastam qui custodit carnem
Ob amorem Domini;
Quam carnem templum paravit
Sanctoque Spiritui,
A quo constanter cum mundis
Possidetur actibus;
Quam ut hostiam placentem,
Vivam offert Domino.

L.

Lumenque mundi accensum
Ingens, evangelicum,
In candelabro levatum,
Toti fulgens seculo;
Civitas regis munita
Supra montem posita,
Copia in qua est multa
Quam Dominus possidet.

M.

Maximus namque in regno
Cœlorum vocabitur,
Qui quod verbis docet sacris
Factis adimplet bonis.
Bono præcedit exemplo
Formaque fidelium,
Mundoque in corde habet
Ad Deum fiduciam.

N.

Nomen Domini audenter
Annuntiat gentibus,
Quibus lavacri salutis
Æternam dat gratiam;
Pro quorum orat delictis
Ad Deum quotidie,
Pro quibus, ut Deo dignas
Immolatque hostias.

O.

Omnem pro divina lege
Mundi spernit gloriam;
Qui cuncta ad Christi mensam
Æstimat quisquilias,
Nec ingruenti movetur
Mundi hujus fulmine,
Sed in adversis lætatur,
Cum pro Christo patitur.

P.

Pastor bonus ac fidelis
Gregis evangelici,
Quem Deus Dei elegit
Custodire populum,
Suamque pascere plebem
Divinis dogmatibus;
Pro qua, ad Christi exemplum,
Suam tradit animam.

Q.

Quem pro meritis Salvator
Provexit pontificem,
Ut in celesti moneret
Clericos militia,
Celestem quibus annonam
Erogat cum vestibus,
Quod in divinis impletur
Sacrisque affatibus.

R.

Regis nuntius invitans
Credentes ad nuptias,
Qui ornatur vestimento
Nuptiali indutus;
Qui celeste haurit vinum
In vasis celestibus,
Propinansque Dei plebem
Spiritali poculo.

S.

Sacrum invenit thesaurum
Sacro in volumine,
Salvatorisque in carne
Deitatem pervidit;
Quem thesaurum emit sanctis
Perfectisque meritis;
Israel vocatur hujus
Anima videns Deum.

T.

Testis Domini fidelis
In lege Catholica,
Cujus verba sunt divinis
Condita oraculis;
Ne humanæ putrent carnes
Esæque a vermibus,
Sed celesti saliuntur
Sapore ad victimam.

V.

Verus cultor et insignis
Agri evangelici,
Cujus semina videntur
Christi evangelia,
Quæ divino serit ore
In aures prudentium,
Quorumque corda ac mentes
Sancto arat Spiritu.

X.

Xps illum sibi legit
In terris vicarium,
Qui de gemino captivos
Liberat servitio;
Plerosque de servitute
Quos redemit hominum,
Innumeros de Zabuli
Absolvit dominio.

Y.

Ymnos cum apocalypsi
Psalmosque cantat Dei,
Quosque ad ædificandum
Dei tractat populum;
Quam legem in Trinitate
Sacri credit nominis,
Tribusque personis unam
Docetque substantiam.

Z.

Zona Dominî præcinctus
Diebus ac noctibus
Sine intermissione
Deum orat Dominum:
Cujus ingentis laboris
Percepturus præmium,
Cum apostolis regnabit
Sanctis super Israel.

THE HYMN OF SAINT PATRICK, BISHOP OF THE SCOTS.

A.

Hear, all ye who love God, the holy merits of the Bishop Patrick, a man blessed in Christ; how, on account of his good actions, he is likened unto the angels, and for his perfect life is counted equal to the apostles.—2 Cor. xi. 6.

B.

He keepeth the commandments of the blessed Christ in all things; his works shine brightly before men, who follow his holy and admirable example; whence, also, they glorify the Lord, his Father which is in heaven.—John xiv. 15; Matt. v. 16.

C.

Steadfast in the fear of the Lord, and immoveable in faith; on whom, as on Peter, the Church is built; who received his apostleship from God. The gates of hell shall not prevail against him.—1 Cor. xv. 58; Gal. i. 1; Matt. xvi. 18.

D.

The Lord chose him to teach the barbarous nations, to fish [for men] with the nets of doctrine, to draw believers from the world unto grace, that they might follow the Lord to the heavenly seat.—Matt. iv. 19.

E.

He trades with the choice Gospel talents of Christ, which he puts out at usury amongst the Hibernian nations, destined hereafter, along with Christ, to possess the joy of the heavenly kingdom as a recompense for this labour.—Matt. xxv. 14-30; John xiv. 3.

F.

A faithful minister and distinguished messenger of God, he shows to the good an apostolic example and pattern; who preaches to the people of God, as well by deeds as by words, so that by good works he may provoke those to imitation whom he does not convert by his sayings.—1 Tim. iv. 6, 12.

G.

He has glory with Christ, and honour in this world, being venerated by all as the angel of God: whom God sent, even as Paul, to be an apostle to the Gentiles, to guide men unto the kingdom of God.—2 Tim. i. 11; Gal. i. 1.

H.

Humble, through fear of God, both in spirit and behaviour, upon whom on account of his good actions rests the spirit of the Lord: who beareth in his righteous flesh the marks of Christ, in whose cross alone he glories and sustains himself.—Gal. vi. 14–17.

I.

He diligently feedeth believers with heavenly food, lest those who are seen with Christ should faint by the way: to whom he distributes the words of the Gospel like the loaves: in whose hands they are multiplied like the manna.—Matt. xv. 32; Exod. xvi.; John vi.

K.

Who, through the love of God, keepeth his flesh pure, having prepared it to be a temple for the Holy Spirit, by whom it is constantly possessed with good motions: and who offers up his body a lively sacrifice, well pleasing to the Lord.—John iii. 3; 1 Cor. vi. 19; Rom. xii. 1.

L.

He is a great and burning Evangelical light of the world, set up on a candlestick, shining unto the whole world; a strong city of the King, set upon a hill, in which is much store of the riches of the Lord.—John v. 35; Matt. v. 14, 15.

M.

He shall be called the greatest in the kingdom of heaven who fulfils, by good works, what he teaches in his holy discourses. He goes before with a good example and a pattern to the faithful; and in a pure heart has faith towards God.—Matt. xviii. 1–3; 1 Tim. iii. 9, iv. 12.

N.

He boldly preaches the name of the Lord to the Gentiles, to whom he gives the eternal grace of the laver of salvation; for whose offences he daily prays to God, for whom also he offers up sacrifices worthy of God.—Acts ix. 29; James v. 16; Phil. iv. 18; Heb. xiii. 15, 16; 1 Pet. ii. 5.

O.

He despises all the glory of the world in comparison with the divine law, counting all things as but dung compared with Christ's table: nor is he disturbed by the violence of the thunder of this world; but rejoices in tribulation when he suffers for Christ.—Phil. iii. 8; Acts v. 41.

P.

A good and faithful shepherd of the Gospel-flock, chosen by God, to watch the people of God, and to feed, with Divine doctrines, the nation, for which, after the example of Christ, he is giving his life.—John x. 14; John xxi. 15; John xv. 13.

Q.

Whom the Saviour advanced for his merits to be a bishop, that he might exhort the clergy in the heavenly warfare, to whom he distributes the bread from heaven, along with garments, which is fulfilled in his Divine and holy discourses.—1 Tim. i. 18; John vi. 11; Matt. xxii. 11.

R.

A messenger of the king inviting believers to the marriage, who is arrayed in the wedding garment; who draws the heavenly wine in heavenly vessels, pledging the people of God in the spiritual cup.—Matt. xxii. 2.

S.

He finds in the Sacred Volume a sacred treasure, which he purchases with his holy and perfect merits; he discerns also the Godhead of the Saviour in the flesh, whence he is named Israel, beholdingGod in his spirit.*—Matt. xiii. 44; Gen. xxxii. 28, 30.

T.

A faithful witness of God in the Catholic doctrine, whose words are seasoned with the divine oracles, so that they are not corrupted like human flesh, and eaten of worms, but are salted with a heavenly savour for the sacrifice.—Mark ix. 48-50; Col. iv. 6.

V.

A true and excellent cultivator of the Gospel field, whose seeds are seen to be the gospels of Christ, which he sows from his divine mouth into the ears of the wise, and tills their hearts and minds with the holy Spirit.—Matt. xiii; Mark iv. 14.

X.

Christ chose him to be his vicar on the earth, who liberates captives from a two-fold bondage; and of the many whom he has redeemed from the bondage of men, releases numberless persons from the dominion of the devil.—Is. lxi. 1; John viii. 31.

Y.

He sings Hymns with the Apocalypse, and the Psalms of God, on which also he discourses for the edification of the people of God: which Scripture he believes in the Trinity of the sacred name, and teaches the one substance in three persons.—Rom. xv. 4.

Z.

Girt with the girdle of the Lord, by day and night, he prays without ceasing to the Lord God, receiving the reward of which great labour, he shall reign with the holy Apostles over Israel.—Is. xi. 5; Eph. vi. 14; 1 Thess. v. 17; Matt. xix. 28.

* This has reference to the ancient interpretation of the name ISRAEL, vir, aut mens, videns Deum. St. Jerome, though he disapproved it this etymology, allowed it to stand in his Liber de Interpretatione nominum Hebraicorum.

RESULTS OF INTOLERANCE IN SPAIN.

THERE is one principle of the Romish Church in which the boasted immutability of her doctrine and teaching must be admitted by all readers of history, and that is, the principle of intolerance. The same spirit which, at the present day, excludes all whom she is pleased to call heretics from the rights of Christian sepulture and prohibits the erection of a place of worship—which, in Tuscany, consigns to prisons those who dare attempt to dispute her infallibility—and which, even in our own land, calls it an insult to be invited to a discussion of her doctrines—has also pervaded her rulers at all former periods of her history, and there is hardly a country in Europe which does not afford examples of the practical application of her intolerance when possessed of the power.

In making this charge particularly against the Romish Church, it is necessary to call our readers' attention to a distinction between the intolerance of the Romish Church and that of all other religions. We believe there is no nation which has not, at some period of its existence, made a difference in political privileges between those conforming to the religion established and recognised by the state and those dissenting from it. The Greek Church in Russia—the Mahometans in Turkey—our own government in former years—all adopted this course. But the Romish Church stands alone in claiming a right to extirpate altogether those who dissent from her doctrines. And there is not a country in Europe which does not afford melancholy examples of the crimes and folly which the enforcing of her principles has led rulers to be guilty of. Nor is it an unnecessary task to recall the attention of our readers to these transactions of former years; for though we altogether deem it an invidious and false argument to impeach any religion because of the crimes of its professors in bygone years, yet, when we find the same principles actuating those who hold that religion at the present day, and enforced with the same rigour wherever they possess the power; and when we also find the exercise of that power justified by their own organs, we surely may fairly recall to mind the evils which ensued from the enforcement of their principles in past times, and may call upon Roman Catholics to ask themselves can that Church, whose principles have led to such results, be that safe and infallible guide which her priesthood would wish us to believe her to be?

Our first historical reference shall be to Spain, ever foremost in the display of bigotry and intolerance.

At the present day Spain is without industry and without commerce, dependant on foreigners for the supply of almost every production that can add comfort to existence; her finances are dilapidated, and her credit gone. Can we wonder when we find in her past history that her rulers, at the dictation of an intolerant priesthood, banished from her soil or drove into separation all those of her subjects who were most distinguished for industry and enterprise?

In the 15th century the Jews, from their wealth, their devotion to literature and science, their industry and skill, formed a most important element in the prosperity of the Spanish monarchy. In number they exceeded 160,000, and even the mass of their common people possessed a dexterity in various branches of industry which raised them far above similar classes in most other nations. But all this would not save them. In 1492 the royal confessor, Torquemada, at length extorted from the reluctant hand of Isabella the fatal decree which banished the whole body of the Jews from their homes, and stripped them of all their property. Well might the barbarian prince who saw Ferdinand and Isabella, at the bidding of a priest, sacrifice the most important and permanent interests of Spain, dispeopling it of a class of citizens who contributed beyond all others, not only to the general resources, but also to the direct revenues of the crown, exclaim—"Do they call this Ferdinand a politic prince, who can thus impoverish his own kingdom and enrich others?"

Soon was this precedent of intolerance, set by the greatest of the Spanish rulers, followed by their successors. Actuated by the same devoted zeal, and unrestrained by any feeling of compassion, Philip II. resolved that no heretic should dwell in peace within the wide circuit of his dominions. In a distant province of his vast empire, amid the swamps through which the Rhine discharges its waters into the ocean, an energetic and industrious race dwelt happy and contented on the lands recovered and preserved by their unremitting industry from the dominion of the sea. By that industry, and by the pursuits of commerce, they had added largely to the revenue and naval power of the Spanish monarchy. But they were heretics. The same independence and energy of purpose that had converted their swamps into pleasant pastures and trim gardens, had also emancipated their minds from the thraldom of Rome. Philip, in the blindness of his devotion to Rome, sent the merciless Alva to convert them from their heresy. We need not repeat here the well-known story of the cruelties of Alva, the revolt of the United Provinces, their long struggle, and their ultimate success. But we may recall to the recollection of our readers that Holland, once an obscure province of the Spanish monarchy, at the close of another century became the foremost naval power of Europe; and, though long since she yielded the supremacy of the seas to Great Britain, still, in industry, in commerce, in all that can elevate a nation, she affords a striking contrast to that Spain of which she was once an inconsiderable province.

Scarcely had the struggle with her revolted province terminated, when the successor of Philip II. meditated, and ultimately carried into execution a measure at which even the zeal and intolerance of that stern monarch was staggered. But the history of the final expulsion of the Moors, in 1609, is too full of interest to be treated cursorily.

On the Eastern side of Spain, in the sunny plains and through the valleys of Murcia and Valencia, there dwelt a numerous, a happy, and a contented people. Long subject to the kingdom of Arragon (for their conquest had been completed nearly 100 years before the union of the crowns of Arragon and Castile), they had ever been treated with kindness and consideration by their conquerors. The nobles of Arragon, on whose lands they lived, were too well aware of the value of a thriving and industrious population not to be desirous to protect them from violence and oppression; and as long as the Cortes of Arragon retained its independence, the Moors followed the pursuits of industry in security, and were, in the words of their bitterest enemy —"an industrious and laborious people, and withal very frugal and temperate."

Indeed, so jealous were the Cortes of the grasping ambition of the priesthood, and of their desire to extirpate the Moors, that they passed a law by which all disturbance of the Moors was prohibited, and also made it part of their king's coronation oath—"That he should, upon no pretence whatsoever, expel the Moors, nor force them against their will to be baptized; and that he should neither directly nor indirectly ever desire to be dispensed with as to that oath, or, in case of a dispensation, should not accept it."

At length the Cortes fell, and all power passed into the hands of the crown. Charles, indeed, had taken the oath not to disturb the Moors or accept a dispensation from the obligation of that oath; but that proved a weak and ineffectual obstacle. In 1524 a formal dispensation was sent by Pope Clement VII. releasing Charles from the obligation of his oath. The terms of that document are too important to be omitted.* After a preface of some length, it proceeds thus:—

"And we do further release your Majesty from the obligation of the oath which we are informed was taken by you in the General Estates of the kingdom, absolving you from all censures and penalties of the guilt of perjury which you might incur thereby. And we do further grant free and full power to the Inquisitors to compel all that shall contradict the same, or prove refractory, by ecclesiastical censures and other proper and lawful methods, requiring the assistance of the secular arm, if it shall be judged necessary: all ordinances, statutes, and privileges of the said kingdom to the contrary notwithstanding, though confirmed by an oath, and notwithstanding it should be provided that a release from the said oath should not be desired, nor ever be made use of if granted. And in case the Moors do persist, in the hardness of their hearts, so as not to embrace the faith of Christ within a term prefixed by the Inquisitors, they shall be commanded, upon pain of perpetual servitude and bondage, to depart out of the said kingdom; which if they do fail to do within the time, they shall be all slaves, and treated as such."

This dispensation and decree of the Papal See was not given effect to in the full measure of its atrocity at that time. The terrors of the Inquisition were first tried. As that tribunal, however, professed to exercise its jurisdiction only over those who had once been baptized, and subsequently relapsed into their former opinions, the Emperor Charles V., by an ordinance issued immediately after the receipt of the dispensation, commanded all the Moors to be baptized, and threatened expulsion on their refusal. Against this ordinance the nobles of Arragon energetically protested, but without effect; and ultimately the Moors of Valencia were forced, at the point of the sword, to profess outward conformity, and receive the rite of baptism. Thenceforth the Inquisition never wanted an annual supply of relapsed Moors to grace their autos da fe.

But still the great purpose was uneffected. The Moors, in the midst of persecutions, still increased in numbers, and, in 1609, were estimated to amount to 600,000 souls. At length the time arrived when full and complete effect was to be given to the Pope's decree. At length the Spanish priesthood, headed by the Archbishop of Valencia and the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, extorted from the weak and superstitious mind of Philip III. the fatal decree which drove out of Spain upwards of half a million of her most industrious and thriving population. The arguments and inducements held out by his clerical advisers must not be passed over in silence.

The Archbishop of Valencia, under whose jurisdiction the great body of the Moors were placed, in one of his memorials, addressed to Philip, after noticing the destruction of the Amalekites by Saul, and of the Philistines by David, thus proceeds:—

"From which examples it is manifest that your Majesty, as king, is bound in conscience to defend and preserve your kingdom, which you cannot do if you do not banish the Moors—men, women and children; out of them only the children, male and female, under seven years of age, may be dispersed among the old Christians. And it is the opinion of learned men that your Majesty may lawfully make all their children slaves; neither would your Majesty, in banishing all the Moors, do a thing that was never done by any of your ancestors; for they, in the year 1492, expelled all the Jews out of Spain, to the number of 24,000 families."

See Geddes' Tracts, vol. I, p. 60.

In another memorial the same prelate says:—

"That if, as was notorious, on an information being taken, the Moors should be found guilty of being Mahometans, they might be condemned to lose all their goods, and to perpetual banishment out of the kingdom, within a prefixed period, which ought to be short. And though it is sufficient to engage your Majesty to rid Spain of all the Moors, only to let you know that you are bound in conscience, and under the pain of a mortal sin, to do it; nevertheless, since the expelling of them will be attended with great advantages, both spiritual and temporal, I cannot forbear laying some of them before your Majesty. Amongst these advantages are these, your Majesty, by selling all the children that are under seven years old, who are reckoned to be above 30,000, will both receive a good sum of money and will gain a great many subjects, who, being sold to old Christians, will all become Christians.

"Your Majesty may either send the strongest men to your own galleys or sell them. And on this occasion I will repeat, what I have often affirmed, that your Majesty may, without any scruple of conscience, make slaves of all the Moors, and may either put them into your own galleys and mines, or sell them to strangers; and whereas their number is very great, you may, after you have supplied your own galleys and mines, sell the rest of them in Italy."

And his last argument for their expulsion was:—

"The Moors being a laborious and industrious people, do, by working cheaper than the Spaniards are able to work, eat the bread out of the Spaniards' mouths, and being also very frugal and temperate, they do contribute little to the public excise."

These memorials of the archbishop were enforced and supported by the other prelates of Valencia, who, after a consultation, which lasted some months, came to a resolution which was privately presented to the king. That resolution was:—

* The document will be found at length in vol. I of Geddes' Tracts, p. 39.

"That the Moors of Valencia were all certainly apostates, and so obstinate, that there remained no hopes of their conversion."

This was in April, 1608, Geddes, vol. 1, p. 87.

These memorials and resolution were enforced by all the authority of the Primate of Spain. Their teaching was impressed on the King's mind by the Royal Confessor, and their effort was aided by the weakness and superstition of the royal conscience, which was instructed to believe that every portent of nature and every public miscarriage was sent to warn or punish him for the delay his own better feelings still interposed.

The Spanish priesthood at last prevailed. In 1609, notwithstanding the strong and earnest remonstrances of the Cortes of Arragon, the decree of expulsion was promulgated, and a whole people, remarkable only for their industry and manufacturing skill, for their quiet and peaceable demeanour, were at one blow deprived of their property, exiled from their pleasant homes, and driven forth, homeless wanderers, to perish in the deserts of Africa. And what did Spain gain? Her priests were no longer offended by the presence of a people who refused to listen to a religion that was forced on their attention by armed soldiers and by autos da fe. And the King of Spain became the sovereign of the most orthodox and the feeblest of the great monarchies of Europe.

THE DECRETAL EPISTLES.

No. 1.

THE POPES OF THE FIRST 400 YEARS, AND THE LETTERS THEY WROTE.

EVERYTHING which tends to throw light on the ancient Church of Rome is interesting alike to Protestants and Roman Catholics. Our readers, we are sure, would like to have a list of the early Popes, or Bishops of Rome, and the letters they wrote. We therefore give the list for 400 years. We give a column, showing the year in which each Pope succeeded the one before him; in the next column we state how many letters, said to be written by each Pope, we now have. It being acknowledged on all sides that some of those letters are genuine (that is, really written by the Popes whose names they go under), and it being also acknowledged on all sides that some of those letters are forged (that is, written by other people in after times, and passed off under those Popes' names, as if written by them), we give another column, showing which are forged, and which genuine. We shall afterwards show on what authority we pronounce some of them to be forgeries. We give also a column containing the references by which the letters themselves may be found in the Concilia Generalia of Labbe and Cossart.*

We do not give as our own the list of the Popes' names, and the years they succeeded each other; we give it as the list which Roman Catholics give for themselves. We take it from Vol. XVI. of Labbe and Cossart, p. 130. There are, no doubt, great difficulties about the list. Our readers will see in the list, that Liberius is counted the 37th Pope, and Damasus the 38th, and yet there is a Pope Felix between them! This is so in the list of Labbe and Cossart, which we copy exactly. The fact is, that Roman Catholics have never been able to agree whether this Felix were really a Pope or not. One party says he was; another party says he was not. It turns on an ugly question whether Pope Liberius were a heretic or not; and agreement about that can hardly be expected; because the proof of it is too strong to be got over by some,† and the inconvenience of it is too great to be admitted by others: so, to reconcile both parties, they put Felix's name in the list of Popes, and they do not count him in the number; and we, of course, adopt this arrangement. There is another difficulty, too, about Linus and Cletus, who stand second and third on the list. If (as Roman Catholics say) St. Peter was himself Pope of Rome until the day of his death; and if (as some of the early Fathers say) St. Peter himself, during his lifetime, ordained Clement as the first Bishop of Rome, it is not very easy to see how two other Popes could have come in between them. Protestants, who think that St. Peter was an Apostle to all the world, and not a Pope of Rome, may, perhaps, be able to solve this difficulty; but it is a difficulty to Roman Catholics. It is also a great question whether there ever were such a man as Cletus, who stands third on the list. Eusebius, the oldest ecclesiastical historian, says that Clement succeeded to Anacletus (Book III. chap. 15), and Evaristus to Clement (chap. 34), leaving no room for Cletus. And it is thought by some, that the name "Anacletus" has, by some accident, tumbled out of its proper place in the list, leaving a bit of itself behind to grow into another Pope.

There are also great difficulties about the dates at which some of the Popes succeeded. But we only mention these questions; we do not go into them; our chief business is with the letters said to have been written by the Popes; and for this purpose we are content to take the list as Roman Catholics give it, and to leave the difficulties to them. So here follows the list:—

A TABLE OF THE EARLY POPES, AND THE LETTERS THEY WROTE.

No	Names of the Popes.	Year in which each came Pope.	Number of letters written by each.	Whether Forged or Genuine.	Vol. and Col. in Labbe and Cossart, Con. Gen.
1	St. Peter (as alleged by R. Catholics)	43	2 Epistles	Genuine	Vol. I.
2	Linus ..	67	None
3	Cletus ..	78	None
4	Clement I. ..	91	2 to Corinth 1 to St. James 7 & others	Genuine Forged	123 82
5	Anacletus ..	101	3 Epistles	Forged	512
6	Evaristus ..	110	2 Epistles	Forged	541
7	Alexander I.	119	3 Epistles	Forged	542
8	Sixtus I. ..	130	2 Epistles	Forged	554
9	Telesphorus	140	1 Epistle	Forged	559
10	Hyginus ..	152	2 Epistles	Forged	566
11	Pius I. ..	154	4 Epistles	Forged	570
12	Anicetus ..	165	1 Epistle	Forged	580
13	Soter ..	173	2 Epistles	Forged	581
14	Eleutherus ..	177	1 Epistle	Forged	586
15	Victor I. ..	193	4 Epistles	Forged	592
16	Zephyrinus..	201	2 Epistles	Forged	603
17	Callistus I...	219	2 Epistles	Forged	609
18	Urban I. ..	224	1 Epistle	Forged	614
19	Pontianus ..	230	2 Epistles	Forged	623
20	Anterus ..	235	1 Epistle	Forged	629
21	Fabian ..	236	3 Epistles	Forged	640
22	Cornelius ..	251	26 Epistles	3 Forged 3 Genuine	668
23	Lucius I. ..	253	1 Epistle	Forged	721
24	Stephen I. ..	255	2 Epistles	Forged	729
25	Sixtus II. ..	257	2 Epistles	Forged	821
26	Dionysius ..	268	2 Epistles	Forged	847
27	Felix I. ..	270	3 Epistles	Forged	904
28	Eutychian ..	275	2 Epistles	Forged	911
29	Caius ..	283	1 Epistle	Forged	925
30	Marcellinus	296	2 Epistles	Forged	932
31	Marcellus I.	301	2 Epistles	Forged	948
32	Eusebius ..	310	3 Epistles	Forged	1381
33	Melchiades	311	1 Epistle	Forged	1395
34	Silvester I.	314	None		Vol. II.
35	Marcus ..	336	1 Epistle	Forged	470
36	Julius ..	336	4 Epistles	2 Forged 2 Genuine	475
37	Liberius ..	352	15 Epistles	5 Forged 10 Genuine	741
	Felix II. ..	356	2 Epistles	Forged	841
38	Damasus I.	367	10 Epistles	5 Forged 5 Genuine	862*
39	Siricius ..	385	5 Epistles	2 Forged 3 Genuine	1017
40	Anastasius	398*	3 Epistles	2 Forged 1 Genuine	1191

On first looking down the column in which the word "forged" occurs so often, our readers may be tempted to think that we are only trifling with the subject, and with them, and telling stories too monstrous to be believed.

This, however, is not so; we are serious, and we speak truth.

All the letters entered in our list may be read in the places referred to.

All these letters, for 300 years at least, were universally believed to have been written by the Popes whose names they bear.

All these letters which we have marked as forgeries are now acknowledged (with hardly a single exception) by all learned Roman Catholics to be forgeries indeed, by which the world and the Church were imposed on for so long. No learned men among Roman Catholics will now venture to deny all this; and we have proof enough, if any one should attempt to deny it.

Now, look at the results of this Table.

We have ONE HUNDRED AND NINE letters of forty Popes, in 400 years. EIGHTY-FOUR of these are forgeries. Only TWENTY-FIVE are genuine: and if we take away the two Epistles which were written by St. Peter, whom we consider an Apostle, not a Pope, we have only TWENTY-THREE genuine, out of one hundred and seven.

In saying that twenty-three are genuine, we do not vouch for all these being genuine. Some we are sure are genuine; of some, the evidence is very little (if any) that they were really written by the Popes whose names they bear; of some we have little doubt that they, too, are forgeries. But those which are doubtful are of so little consequence, that it is not worth while to dispute about them; we are therefore content to admit them, for the present, as genuine, setting down as forged those only which we find to be acknowledged as forgeries by Roman Catholics themselves. Of all which we have set down as forgeries, there is ONLY ONE of which we have not Roman Catholic testimony that it is forged.

Who are our witnesses?

The learned Du Pin, Doctor of the University of Paris, testifies for all in our list except one.

Labbe and Cossart, the two French Jesuits who collected the Councils, testify for all in one list, excepting about five" (and those mostly of the least consequence).

And in general, all learned men in the Church of Rome, for 250 years past, have admitted that nearly all those we call forgeries are really forgeries. Labbe and Cossart, vol. I. p. 78, name the following as making this admission:—Cardinals Baronius, Bellarmine, and Perron; Coustant, Antonius Augustinus, Lorinus, Sirmond, Ducaeus, Petavius, Marca, Bosquetus, and others, they say, too many to mention.

Devoti, Archbishop of Carthage, and Secretary to Pope Pius VII., is the latest Roman writer on Canon Law, having written in this present century, and he says, "All Catholic writers, excepting a few who would not take the trouble to examine carefully, have willingly confessed they are forged." (Institutiones, Preface, p. [illegible].

That all these witnesses are not agreed about the precise numbers of the forgeries, may be easily understood. These witnesses lived at various times during the last 250 years. Three hundred years ago all Roman Catholics held that all these letters were true: when Protestants first began to question these letters, Roman Catholics cried out at them, that the arguments they were using would prove the Holy Scriptures themselves to be forgeries! But by degrees, as the arguments of Protestants got stronger, the Roman Catholics gave up one after another of the letters, when they found they could defend them no longer; so in each age more and more of these letters were confessed to be forgeries, until the learned Du Pin, who lived about 150 years ago, and who is one of the last who has published an accurate examination of all of them, fairly gave up every one in our list, except one.† And, therefore, we may hope that some candid Roman Catholic may yet be found to give up even this one too.

If any Roman Catholic now doubt the fairness of our list, and the statement we have made, we urge it on him to take this paper straight to his priest, and to call on the priest to shame us by exposing us in our own paper. And, according to our regular practice, we promise to insert anything that may be so sent to us.

Our readers are now perhaps ready to ask, What were all these letters forged for? and what are they all about?

An answer to the latter question, what these letters are about, will help to tell also what they were for.

Our readers may like to have the answer from a Roman Catholic; we take it from Severinus Binius, Archbishop of Cologne, in Germany, who published a collection of the Councils, about the year 1608.

He was one of the last of the learned men in the Church of Rome who made a vigorous effort to defend all these letters, when all others were giving them up as hopeless. We may therefore take his evidence as to what is in them: He says "most of those letters of the Popes were written about the Primacy of Peter; the dominion of the Roman Church; the ordination of Bishops; that priests are not to be injured nor accused, nor deposed; about appeals being made to the Apostolic See." There could not possibly be a truer or fairer statement of the general contents of these letters. A very few extracts may suffice for the present.

Anacletus in his first Epistle is made to say, "We confirm the laws of the Church by our Apostolical authority."‡ It is certainly odd that Pope Clement should not have done this already.

In his third Epistle, Anacletus is made to say, "This Holy and Apostolic Roman Church obtained the Primacy, and pre-eminence of power over all Churches, not from the Apostles, but from the Lord and Saviour himself."§

Pope Marcellus is made to say, "Charges of crime are not to be brought against priests, ... for Christ is the head of the Church, and priests are the Vicars of Christ."¶ Ep. 3. And Pope Fabian says, "The Apostles determined that they (priests) should not be accused; or, if this could not be otherwise accomplished, that the accusation of them should be made very difficult—" Ep. 2. And Pope Julius is made to declare, "that all bishops, as often as they are attacked or accused in any more weighty causes, as often as may be necessary, may freely appeal to the Apostolic See, and fly to it as to their mother, that by it, as always was, they may be tenderly supported, defended and liberated."

* The edition of Labbe and Cossart referred to in the articles in this number is that published at Paris, 1672.

† The proof of Pope Liberius' heresy may be seen in this number, in our observations on the letter of "A Roman Catholic," page 142.

* As the last Pope here mentioned succeeded in 398, and died in 402, our list embraces four centuries.

* Of some of these five it is very likely that Labbe and Cossart thought them forgeries too, but as they have not expressly said it, we do not say it on their authority.

† See Du Pin's Hist. of Eccl. Writers, Vol. I. p. 582, Ed. 1722, Dublin; and also under each Pope's name.

‡ Leges Ecclesiæ apostolica firmamus auctoritate.—Labbe & Coss. Vol. I. 518.

§ Hæc vera sacrosancta Romana et apostolica Ecclesia, non ab apostolis, sed ab ipso Domino Salvatore nostro primatum obtinuit, et eminentiam potestatis super universas Ecclesias.—Labbe & Coss. Vol. I. 525.

¶ Criminationes adversus Doctores non debere recipi. . . . Caput enim Ecclesiæ Christus est, Christi autem Vicarii Sacerdotes sunt.—Vol. I. p. 1559.

 Ut omnes Episcopi qui in quibuslibet gravioribus pulsantur vel criminantur causis, quoties necesse fuerit, litteras apostolicam appellent sedem, atque ad eam quasi ad matrem confugient, ut ab ea (sicut semper fuerit) pie foveantur, defendantur et liberentur.—Labbe & Coss. Vol. II., p. 497.

These are fair specimens of the things which Binius says the forged letters are about.

And now the reader may have some notion what the forged letters were for.

He may have a better notion of it still, when we tell him, that in the true and genuine letters of the early Popes there is nothing at all of this kind; nothing to show that Popes then either exercised or claimed the powers which they claim and exercise now; but much to show that they made no such claim.

Of course when Popes began to claim these powers, this was felt to be a great deficiency; for it gave a sad handle to people to say that Popes were usurping powers that did not belong to them; so, to put down perverse opposers, letters were forged for the early Popes, such as they ought to have written, if they had known their business and duties as later Popes know them now.

We can only give brief answers now, to questions which we shall answer more fully in future numbers.

Roman Catholics may also wish to know when these forgeries were first imposed on the world?—how long the world and the Church were imposed on by them?—and how they were at length proved to be forgeries? Briefly then,

1st. These letters (with a few exceptions) were first published by Antgarius, Bishop of Mentz, in France, about the year 836. No one had ever heard of most of them before.

2nd. The Church was imposed on by them until after the Reformation, or for more than 700 years.

3rd. They were proved to be forgeries, chiefly by the monstrous blunders that the forgers had made. Letters of Popes dated years after the Popes were dead—Popes quoting books and Councils that were not written or held till centuries after the Popes were dead—the evident marks that letters pretended to be written by Popes who lived centuries asunder were really written by the same person—the monstrous ignorance in the Popes' letters of the history of their own times—the absurd perversions of Scripture—the nonsensical and heretical things found in them. These, and many other marks of this kind, at length made Roman Catholics see that it was too late to try to defend them any further.

This is but a brief outline of the nature and purpose of these letters. We shall fill up this outline in future numbers. We conclude this number, as a general illustration, with some extracts from those letters, which, if true, would be of the greatest importance—viz, the letters said to be written by Clement to St. James the Apostle.

In his first Epistle to St. James, Clement recites that St. Peter, when dying, had ordained him as his successor, and had directed him to write a full account to St. James. He commences his first letter thus—". . . Simon Peter, who, for the merit of true faith, and the upholding of sound preaching, was appointed to be the FOUNDATION of the Church. . . ."* Clement goes on to relate how St. Peter, when about to die, had taken him (Clement) by the hand, and said to all the people, "I ordain this Clement as your Bishop, to whom alone I deliver my chair of preaching and doctrine. . . . I deliver to him that power of binding and loosing which was delivered to me by the Lord; so that what he shall have decreed upon earth, ABOUT ALL THINGS WHATSOEVER, that may be decreed also in heaven."† He then relates how Peter ordained him, and made him to sit in his own seat, and all the directions that Peter gave him, concluding his letter thus—"In the judgment of God he shall suffer the torments of eternal fire who shall have neglected THE DECREES OF THE CHURCH."‡

It has been a great puzzle to Protestants, and to many Roman Catholics too, whether Clement, as Pope and successor to St. Peter, had the command and direction of the other Apostles who outlived Peter. These letters undertake to settle the question. Besides many other directions which Clement gives to James, and powers and authorities which he confers on him, he says, in his second Epistle to St. James—"Since, as we have received from the Blessed Apostle Peter, the FATHER of all the Apostles, in what manner we ought to hold concerning the sacraments which are performed among the saints, it becomes us TO INSTRUCT YOU in order."§ He then goes on to tell him with what "fear and trembling of the clergy they ought to guard the remains of the fragments of the Body of the Lord, lest by any means it might be found to putrify in the Sacrarium,"‖ with many other directions about celebrating mass, and about the altar and its furniture, which are not found in any genuine records of the early Church, but which are not unlike those now in the Roman Missal. It is true, Clement falls short in some things; for instance, he strictly commands that if any of the consecrated bread remain, "it should not be reserved to the morrow, but be diligently consumed, with fear and trembling of the clergy;"* however, it was not bad for a beginning.

Considering that St. James was present when our Lord instituted this Sacrament, and that St. Clement was not, it might seem unnecessary for him to instruct St. James about it; but, considering further, that the subject of instruction was the mass of the ninth century, it would certainly have been new light to St. James, only that he never got the letter, as it was not written until 800 years after his death.

We deeply regret that space does not allow us here to place the genuine letter of St. Clement in full comparison with the forged ones. One specimen must suffice from that most heavenly Epistle ever written by an uninspired man.

After teaching the Corinthians out of the Scriptures, Clement goes on:—"This is the way, beloved, in which we may find our Saviour, even Jesus Christ, the high priest of all our offerings, the defender and helper of our weakness. By Him we look up to the highest heavens; and behold as in a glass His spotless and most excellent countenance. By Him are the eyes of our hearts opened, by Him our foolish and darkened understanding rejoiceth to behold His wonderful light."†

The real letter of St. Clement is just what a Protestant Bishop might wish to write now; the forged letters of Clement are just what a Roman Catholic Bishop might write.

But now to illustrate the proofs of forgery: Eusebius tells us that St. James died before St. Peter (Book II. ch. 23, 25), and Roman Catholics admit that this is true: yet here we find Clement, after St. Peter's death, writing to St. James!

The letters contain further proof of forgery, plain to any one who has a Bible and refers to it. For Clement, writing to St. James, quotes to him James's own Epistle (ch. iv. v. 10, 11, 12), as if it were the words of St. Peter! Now, no one can suppose that Clement knew the Apostles' writings so badly as to make so unpardonable a blunder in so important a letter; so that any one with a Bible could detect the forgery at once—a striking proof of God's providential care, that they who look to the word of truth shall not be deceived by the lies of man:‡ a striking instance, too, how the Church may expect to be deceived when she shuts up the Bible, for this rank and impudent forgery imposed on the whole Church for 700 years! Ay, and on part of it for A THOUSAND YEARS!! MARK THIS, Roman Catholics of Ireland; it is but a few years ago that the Church of Rome has ceased to impose this forged letter upon you AS TRUE! until a few years ago, this Epistle of Clement to St. James has been quoted as true in the notes of the Douay Bible!! For 250 years, at least, every learned Roman Catholic has known and confessed that this Epistle was a forgery, and yet all that time you had it held up to you as true in the notes of the Douay Bible! We have now before us the original edition of the New Testament, published at Rheims, in 1582, and also a Douay Bible, printed with the sanction of Dr. Troy, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in the year 1816,§ in both which we find this note on 2 Peter, ch. i. v. 15. "ST. CLEMENT, IN HIS EPISTLE TO ST. JAMES, OUR LORD'S BROTHER, witnesseth that St. Peter, encouraging him to take, after his decease, the charge of the Apostolic Roman See, promised that after his departure he would not cease to pray for him and his flock, thereby to ease him of his pastoral burden."

See here what care the Roman Church has taken, in past time, to teach the Irish people only what is true and certain! Forgeries that she would not venture during later ages to produce to any other people in Europe, were thought good enough for you.

In our next number we will proceed to show how these forgeries came to be believed in the Church; how and by whom they were established; and the use that was made of them. Let Roman Catholics consider if this be worthy of their attention.

Those who have a greater zeal for Rome than for truth, may think it a great pity that all these proofs of the Roman system are but forgeries of the ninth century. And a great pity it would be, and a great wonder, too, if the Roman system had really been established by Christ and his Apostles, that the early Church should not have given us such testimony in support of it.

Those who regard truth will desire to see all false proofs swept away.

We have STRANGE AND STARTLING THINGS to say about these letters—MORE strange and startling than any that we yet have said. Those who dare not look at the light will, of course, look away, or shut their eyes, and will not venture to read, lest light should break in upon their minds. But those who have the courage to see light will, we know, wait for it, and read all we have to say. Let such readers remember that we do not want to leave them without a religion; we only want to clear away all the lies of men, that they may behold the truth of God's Holy Word. We want to clear away the forgeries put on the early Popes, that the Word of God, as spoken by St. Peter himself, may stand for ever. "The word of the Lord endureth for ever; and this is the word which, by the Gospel, hath been preached unto you."—1st Ep. of St. Peter, chap. i., verse 25, Douay Bible.

---

* . . . . Simon Petrus, qui veræ fidei merito, et integræ prædicationis obtenta, fundamentum esse Ecclesiæ definitus est . . . —Labbe & Coss. Vol. I., p. 82.

† Clementem hunc episcopum vobis ordino, cui soli meæ prædicationis et doctrinæ cathedram trado . . . . ipsi trado a Domino mihi traditam potestatem ligandi et solvendi; ut de omnibus quibuscumque decreverit in terris, hoc decretum sit et in cœlis.—Labbe & Coss. Vol. I. 83.

‡ In judicio Dei, ignis eterni tormenta sustinebit, qui Ecclesiastica decreta neglexerit.—Labbe & Coss. Vol. I. p. 97.

§ Quoniam sicut a Beato Petro apostolo accepimus, omnium apostolorum patre qui clavis regni cœlestis accepit, qualiter tenere debemus de sacramentis, quæ geruntur in sanctis, te ex ordine nos decet instruere.—Vol. I. 98.

‖ Qui cum timore et tremore clericorum, reliquias fragmentorum corporis Dominici custodire debent, ne quæ putredo in sacrario inveniatur.

* Quod si remanserint, in crastinum non reserventur, sed cum timore et tremore clericorum diligentia consumantur.—Labbe & Coss. Vol. I. 98.

† Labbe and Coss. Vol. I., p. 146.

‡ The following sentence, from the genuine letter of Clement, seems almost as if he knew the use that men would make of his name in after times, and wished to guard against it—"Look into the Holy Scriptures, which are the true words of the Holy Ghost; ye know that there is nothing wicked or FORGED written in them."—Ch. 45. Is not this wonderfully suitable?—Labbe & Coss. Vol. I. p. 151.

§ It is a large 4to Bible, published by R. Coyne, Dublin—"Approved of by the Most Rev. Dr. Troy, R.C.A.D."

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XIX.

"Well, Pat, my man, any news of Kilcommon those times?" said Jem.

"There is, Jem," said Pat, "for I was in on Monday."

"And how is matters getting on there?" said Jem.

"Why, then, it's all getting mighty quiet," said Pat, "and the readers just able to go about like any one else; and I wouldn't see any stir at all there, maybe, only for the long car."

"And what of the long car, Pat?" said Jem; "wha call had that to the Readers, anyway?

"Why, there was a gentleman out of England stopping at Mr. Owen's, and the word was gone about that it was him sent the Readers to Kilcommon, and to all Ireland; and that he was come to look after them; and, sure enough, when the long car came in, he was waiting for a seat on it; and the word went about that it was himself that was in it. Well, it was market day—and the big market it was, coming on Christmas; and I seen the town sergeant, in his blue coat and red collar, giving the people the wink, and them gathering round the car, and the gentleman on it; and they had the children in the front, and the girls and boys behind them, and the women behind them, and the men at the back of all, (for that's the plan,) and they all screeching "souper," and "jumper," and "devil," and all the names they have, at the gentleman on the car; and all the noises of the market going on too; for there was Ned Kelly, the ragman, singing the ould song 'Tear away, tear away! haul away, tear away!' and Mr. Plunket, the auctioneer, standing on the cart, selling the shawls and gowns, and the people screeching and making all the horrid noises ever you heard; and there was an old mare in the long ear, that was a wee thought "maggotty," and she wouldn't go a step with the people screeching for-nenst her; and when Billy Donaghy, that was driving, fell to laying it into her, she turned to to lashing at him; and it beat all, entirely. Well, then, Mr. Plunket, that's always setting the people on against the Readers, took to canting the souper, when he seen there was no one bidding for the shawls; so, says he, 'Going, going, going,' says he, 'a fine fat souper going—for one quart of soup!' So the people fell to shouting more nor ever; and old Billy Donaghy took to flattering them—'Oh, boys,' says he, 'sure you won't see me kilt entirely? Won't yees be easy one minute, till I get her away? Sure it's the devil's in the mare,' says he. 'You're a liar,' says the boys, 'its the devil's on the ear,' says they, 'and it's a rale Catholic mare she is; better nor you,' says they, 'to be driving what's on the car.' Well, with that if there wasn't noise enough; up comes Nick Flaherty that sells the ballads, with a new song all in strips over his arm, and him calling it through the market, 'Only wan hapeny,' for St. Patrick's hymn, only wan hapeny,' and then he fell to singing it, and of all the songs ever you heard for St. Patrick, it was the quare one, but only one verse stuck to me, and it was what St. Patrick was preaching to the heathens in Ireland:—

Have done with your fighting,
And think of your sins,
Or I'll break every bone
In your impudent skins. *

"St. Patrick's hymn, only wan hapeny;" well, just then, the police came up, and they cleared the way for the old mare, and the gentleman stood up on the car, and he takes off his hat, and gives it a whirl round his head, and says he 'Now boys, one cheer more before we go,' so, with that, they all fell to laughing and cheering him, for a pleasant gentleman as he was, so the long car drove off in the height of good humour. And I'm thinking, maybe that's the last of the bad noises in Kilcommon, for it's all getting quiet now, in spite of Father John, and Mr. Plunket, and the town sergeant too."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "it's time for it to stop, for it was disgracing us all; and sure the people wouldn't keep it up for ever, though they'd be put up to it for a while. But sure that was the quare song for St. Patrick. I wonder what Father John would say to that."

"And what would he say to it?" said Pat, "sure isn't it the very moral for himself. Sure don't I remember, afore the famine, when the people used to be kneeling in the chapel yard, at mass; and don't I mind it as regular as the day came, how Father John, or one of the curates, would go the rounds of the chapel yard, with the horsewhip, to keep the boys and girls to their duties, and all the people in the street and the houses forenint the chapel looking on? And wouldn't it be just the moral for Father John, if that was the way St. Patrick did speak to the heathens? But, I doubt, if St. Patrick was a Protestant, as Mr. Owens says he was, he did'nt do the likes of that at all, for sure, the Protestants does'nt do them things."

* If any of our readers in the neighbourhood of Navan could get a copy of this song for us, we should be obliged.—Ed. C. L.

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "them times is past anyway; the people is got past that, and they would'nt stand it now; and I don't see the horsewhip with the priests at all now, barring of an odd time at an election, or a fight, or the like of that."

"Well, its small call they have for it in the chapel-yard anyway," said Pat, "for you might play ball in the chapel itself, and the people in it."

"And is the readers doing anything in Kilcommon?" said Jem.

"Well, I hear there's a deal of people talking to them now Jem," said Pat, "and there's a deal of people goes to the controversial class now; and I went there myself that night."

"And what were they talking about?" said Jem.

"Well, it was about the Mass," said Pat, "but you would never think, Jem, what came uppermost."

"And what was it at all?" said Jem.

"Why, it was about the candles on the altar, Jem," said Pat.

"Well, was not there more in it to talk about than that, Pat?" said Jem.

"Well, there's more depending to the candles nor you think, may be," said Pat.

"Well, tell us all about that, Pat," said Jem.

"Why, the Rev. Mr. Burke (that's the missioner) he put it to them, was the wafer turned into the body and blood of Christ, and his soul and divinity too, when the priest said the words over it; and then up gets Micky Reilly the schoolmaster, that's a very learned man, and says—'Sure it is,' says he, 'for they're the words of Christ, and won't his word always do what He means?' says he. 'And does it always happen when the priest speaks the word over the bread?' says Mr. Burke. 'Surely it does,' says Micky. 'When the Word of Christ is spoken over the bread how can it fail?' says he. 'And did you never hear of defects in the Mass?' says Mr. Burke. 'How could there be defects in the Mass,' said Micky, 'when it depends on the Word of Christ, that can't fail?' says he. 'There's no defects in the Mass, nor couldn't be,' says he, 'but that's the way the Protestants are always speaking, for they can't make an act of faith, and they can't believe that Christ's Word will always do its work; but the Catholics that can make an act of faith, knows that there can't be no defects in the Mass,' says he. So the Rev. Mr. Burke takes out a book with a fine red cover, and plenty of gold on it, and 'What book is that?' says he. 'It's the Mass Book,' says Micky Reilly, when he looked at it. 'Is it the real Mass Book?' says Mr. Burke. 'It is,' says he, 'and no mistake.' 'Do you know the Latin?' says Mr. Burke. 'I do,' says he. So Mr. Burke opened a place, and says he, 'Will you read that to the meeting in English." So Micky read out mighty clever, 'It's about defects in the celebration of the Mass,' says he. Well, with that all the Catholics that was there began to look mighty quare; and Mickey read on, that 'a defect might occur in the thing that was to be consecrated, or the form that was used, or in the minister himself; and if there is any defect in them, there's no sacrament made,' says he, 'and sure enough your Reverence is right, and knows more about the Mass Book than I do,' says he. And so Mr. Burke just takes the book and turns to another page, and bids him read that; so says Mickey, 'Its about defects occuring in the ministering itself,' says he: and then Mr. Burke puts his finger on a place, and Mickey reads—'If there be not wax candles present,' says he, 'sure enough,' says he, 'it wont do without the wax by this,' says he; 'and if the candles isn't wax it's a defect, and the sacrament isn't made at all,' says he; so with that, up jumps Barney Daly, and, says he: 'Now I know all about it, your Reverence,' says he. 'About what?' says Mr. Burke. 'About what Father John said to the Boord of Guardians,' says he. 'And what was that?' says Mr. Burke. 'Why, I was in the poor-house,' says he, 'the times was so hard, and the Master put me over one of the wards; and he wanted me afore the Boord one day, about some business; and while I was waiting in the boord-room, in comes Father John, and whispers the Clerk, and, says the Clerk to the Chairman, his Reverence wants to address the Boord; so the Chairman says they was ready to hear him. So Father John says he wanted wax candles for the Mass, for he couldn't do it with tallow any longer,* so there was some talk about it, but in course they gave Father John what he wanted, for the Boord always does that; and the wax candles were given from that day out, for the Master still sent me for them. But now, your Reverence, what came of all them people that was going to the Mass for all them years in the poorhouse, and him doing it with the dips?' So, Mr. Burke just turned round on Mickey Reilly, 'and, what do you say to that,' says he, 'does it depend on the word of Christ only, or does it depend on the wax too?' 'Well, your Reverence,' said Mickey, 'that's the sorest thing I heard again the Mass yet.' 'And isn't it the poor thing, your Reverence,' says Barney Daly, 'to have to worship the Host, and we having no way to know, for sure and certain, what it is, at all? How did I know what I was worshipping in the poor-house? How did I know was it the body and blood and soul and divinity of Christ, or was it only just a wafer I was worshipping? and it all depending on the wax or the tallow, and I knowing nothing about that, nor Father John neither, till it was put in his head by the Protestants, maybe? And, isn't it the poor thing to be worshipping we don't know what?' says he. 'So, then,' says Mr. Burke, 'what does Christ say about that?' says he. So then I spoke up, and says I, didn't Christ say to the woman, 'you adore that which you know not; we adore that which we know' (John ch. iv., verse 22); and says I, mustn't we learn from Christ what we ought to adore, and did he ever tell us to adore the bread and wine that he blessed? and Mr. Burke allowed that was right. And then says some one, 'what candles had Christ at all, when he instituted the sacrament?' 'no candles at all,' says Mr. Burke, 'only lamps, for,' says he, 'there was no candles made in the world that time;' and you'll think it quare, Jem, to hear how he proved that, 'for,' says he, 'there was a city just covered over with ashes and cinders out of a burning mountain, just soon after the time of our Saviour, and it was dug out not long ago, and all the houses found, and the people's bones, and their duds, just all as they left them, and not a sign of so much as a tin candlestick, let alone a brass one, found in one of them, only lamps that wouldn't burn wax at all; and if they had candles, wouldn't they have some kind of candlesticks to hold them in?'"*

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "maybe that's true; but what signifies it? sure if the Word of God was to do it all, would'nt it do by tallow-light as well as by wax-light? sure that shows it isn't all right anyway."

"Well, there was more nor that, too," said Pat, "sure Mr. Burke showed us out of the same mass-book, that there was twenty other things by their own showing that would stop the sacrament being made, and things that we could'nt know nothing about; for sure one of them is if the wine is sour; and how would we know that, when we don't taste it? and then there's no sacrament made at all; or if the priest isn't minding what he's at, or if he looks off the book when he says the words; and how can we tell about them things at all? and now, Pat, how do we know at all what we were worshipping at the mass?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I'm sure Christ would not leave us that way, not to know what we were worshipping. But sure don't we know he never told the apostles to worship the bread and wine at all, but only to eat and drink it? and if we keep to what He said, why need we trouble ourselves about what any one said afterwards?"

"That's it, Pat," said Jem; "if we stick to that we can't be astray."

So we hope to tell yet what that brought them to in the end.

* It is a fact that about the time mentioned the priests did make this demand in many workhouses. It was just after the missionaries to the Roman Catholics had called their attention to this defect in the Mass.

* This applies to two cities buried under the eruptions of Mount Vesuvius, soon after the time of Christ, and dug out in the last century; Herculaneum and Pompeii. The word translated "candle" in the Bible, does not necessarily mean such candles as we have. The Greek word is λυχνον, and the Latin lucernæ. The most exact English translation is "a light." The learned Roman Catholic, Calmet, says the "candlestick" in the Temple was, in fact, a lamp—See his Dictionary of the Bible, at the word "Lamp." Moses says it was oil that was used in this "candlestick—see Levit. xxiv. 2-4.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The great mass of communications with which we are favoured renders it impossible for us to insert everything we could desire as promptly as we could wish. At this moment many articles, actually in type, including one on the Apocrypha, are unavoidably postponed.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

We have to thank several obliging friends for assisting us with copies of Nos. 2, 8, and 11, to complete sets of Vol. I., which is in great demand. Nos. 3 and 4 have already been reprinted. If any of our friends could oblige us with additional copies of Nos. 2, 8, or 11, they would be very acceptable, and might save us the heavy expense of reprinting them, which, however, we purpose doing, if necessary.

We beg those kind friends by whose subscriptions and contributions we have been materially assisted during the past year, to remember that the subscriptions for the ensuing year are payable IN ADVANCE, and may be forwarded to Mr. Curry, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin, by Post-office orders or postage stamps. Those who wish the paper to be continued should do so without delay.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1853.

In closing the second year of our labours, we have not only to thank our many friends and supporters for numberless favours, and our many readers for their favourable attention, but to offer up our hearfelt gratitude to God for the blessing that has hitherto attended our exertions, to promote a more calm and candid investigation of religious questions than has heretofore prevailed in our distracted country.

We trust that we have given a substantial proof of the practicability of conducting controversy in a spirit of kindness and brotherly love; and we would further hope, that the cause of what we believe to be truth has not suffered in our hands for want of charity towards those who differ from us.

Whether we have succeeded or not in settling the minds of any, who were previously in want of aid in such matters, we think we have, at least, encouraged and assisted them to pursue their all-important inquiries in the only spirit that can ever lead them to an enlightened conviction, and a real and honest satisfaction of mind upon such a subject as that of religion. Error in a matter so solemn must ever be both sad and pernicious; but no error of opinion is, in our judgment, half so pernicious or destructive as the determined bigotry which wilfully and deliberately shuts its ears and eyes against everything but its own narrow-minded prejudices, and which can see nothing but wilful falsehood and determined vice in any one who holds opinions differing from its own. We have as little sympathy with or respect for the Protestant who ignorantly cries down "Popery," as if no Roman Catholics had anything to say in their defence, and must be perversely and wilfully in love with error, as we have with the narrow-minded Romanist, who would condemn, unheard, every doctrine and practice of another Church as infidel or heretical. Truth is great, and will, no doubt, ultimately prevail; but its progress and success will never be rapid until it is cultivated in a spirit more worthy of it—a spirit of benevolence and brotherly love; a benevolence which can tolerate a difference of opinion without considering it a crime, and endure a free expression of that difference of opinion, without feeling it as an injury or an insult. Were men's minds properly constituted, the feeling towards those whom we believe to be in error would be like the feeling towards those in a state of bodily disease—a feeling of pity, not of hostility; and we should be as solicitous to bring them to truth, as the only medicine for their mental diseases, as we should be to cure their bodies of any loathsome disorder; not to show our own superiority, but simply to do them good. How happy would society be, if men argued less for victory and more for truth!

We assume no superiority over other men on the score of temper any more than of wisdom; but we commenced our periodical under a painful sense of the injury that has been done to the cause of truth and free inquiry by offences against Christian charity, and we have endeavoured to establish, by a practical example, the possibility of conducting such a periodical without degenerating into either polemic strife or personal scurrility. To say the truth, we have felt but small temptation to be led into either; and we entertain a strong conviction, that such modes of warfare are rather expedients to cover the ignominious retreat of ignorance, than the natural weapons of men of learning and ability, whether acting on the defensive or the aggressive side. We can see nothing disgraceful in admitting an error, but, on the contrary, true magnanimity in relinquishing it, when we can no longer defend our position without resorting to ill-feeling or personal abuse. We, laymen, at least, who have nothing either to gain or lose by upholding particular opinions, would, we think, be unparonable if we did not preserve a calm and kindly temper in all our controversies.

If God has given men an infallible living guide, laymen should be but too glad to avail themselves of such guidance the moment they can discover that it is really such. If God has not given men such a guide, all men should be humble enough to bless God, and be contented with his infallible written word, and the assistance of his ordained ministers to interpret it aright. If God has created a purgatory, as well as a heaven and a hell, any man who disbelieves in it is to be pitied for his ignorance; but if God has not created a purgatory, but only a heaven and hell, those who trust in a future purgation for their sins, are under a delusion of the most pitiable kind. But what is there either in the belief or disbelief in such a guide or in such a place to arouse men's passions and engender strife? Truth accepts no homage at the expense of brotherly love, and men in vain delude themselves if they conceive, that in exciting hatred towards men they are promoting either the glory of God or the exaltation of truth. Truth can never lose by fair argument; and if any success has attended our efforts (and we have abundant and most satisfactory reasons to know that it has been great), we attribute it altogether to our fixed resolution, that whether successful or not in defending our own views, or refuting the opinions of those with whom we differ, we would still persevere in attempting to carry on our investigations in a calm and candid spirit of fair play and kindliness.

We had intended, but our space will not permit us to do so in our present number, to take a brief review of the principal topics which have been discussed in our pages, and the propositions which, we conceive, we have established. They include some of the deepest interest, and not a few of which have created great excitement in the world, and, probably, will do so to the end of time; though, doubtless, multitudes will be added to the one side or the other, according to the success or failure of the exertions made on either side to advocate the truth of their respective opinions. We feel, however, that so far from having given publication to all the materials for thought and arguments at our disposal, we are still but at the threshold of our great subject, with a large field of usefulness before us, if it pleases God to afford us time and means to cultivate it to advantage. What we have as yet done appears to us little more than to have somewhat softened prejudice, and gained a hearing among those who at present differ from us; and if our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen will but honestly and spiritedly do their part in the matter, we cannot doubt but that the rising generation in Ireland will be able to come to some agreement, one way or the other, on the great subjects which have so long distracted them; and may be able to realize that amount of Christian unity and brotherly love which befits them as fellow countrymen, and still more as the followers of that lowly but sublime exemplar, who, when He was reviled, reviled not again—whose characteristic precept was, to "love our enemies," and who practically fulfilled it, when, even amid the agonies of the cross, he exclaimed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

RELIGIOUS INQUIRY IN AMERICA.

(From the New York Irish Evangelist.)

DIALOGUE.

Good morning to ye's, Father Donelly.

Pr. Good morning a chuachil. What's the good news with you?

John. Why, your reverence, I am in good health, but I am sorely puzzled by a small question put to me by a spalpeen on the road the other day, and I want the aid of your reverence to answer it in a sensible manner.

Pr. Ah, John, what can it be? The youth are becoming mighty shrewd in our day.

John. Well, your reverence, he asked me, "from how much sin are true believers cleansed by the blood of Christ?" Is it from a little, the half, or the whole of the sin? Now, I want your decision, your reverence, as a learned gentleman.

Pr. Well, John, as a priest, it would have been my duty merely to tell you that you have nothing to do with such questions, but the clergy; but as you have asked my opinion as a learned man, I must tell you, that as Christ is a whole Saviour, his blood or his atonement cleanses from all our sins.

John. Good, your reverence, what you say accords with 1st John i. 7 (Douay Bible), where it says—"The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin?"

Pr. Ah, John, you have been reading the Bible, have you? You must stop that, or you will soon be quarrelling with your mother, the Church.

John. No, your reverence, quarrelling is not very Christian in any one. Still, if the blood of Christ cleanses the believer from all sin, I have been thinking what can be the use of praying to the Virgin, to Peter, Paul, or any other of the saints; and, especially, what can be the need for the fires of Purgatory to cleanse the soul, when Christ has cleansed it already.

Pr. There, John, there—you are going to be a heretic, and if you do not stop reading the Bible, and thinking as you do, I shall be compelled to curse you from the holy altar.

John. O, your reverence, I did not intend to offend you; the blessed book says, "Bless and curse not;" and the only example of cursing we have is, where Peter cursed and swore that he did not know Jesus Christ, and so denied him, which your reverence knows is a very wicked example.

Pr. How dare you, sir, make use of such language in my presence; don't you know that I have power to ask God to send your soul to the lowest pit of hell?

John. Yes, your reverence, but will God do your asking? Your commission requests of you to preach the Gospel, and not to curse your parishioners; that is the work of Satan, and you ought to leave it to him. But if you do, I shall appeal to Jesus Christ, our High Priest in heaven, whose blood cleanseth from all sin.

Pr. Begone—begone out of my sight, you will disgrace your church—always quarrelling with God and his word.

Pr. Begone, I say; begone out of my sight.

THE IRISH WANDERER IN SEARCH OF TRUTH.

I believe I told you in my last what my feelings were while reading the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of Matthew's Gospel. I admired the truthfulness and simplicity with which the Saviour taught the people; and nothing but my eagerness to know what the next chapter contained, hindered me from giving it a second reading. As I passed on to glance at the 8th chapter, my eyes became riveted on the following words:—"And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother laid and sick of a fever. And he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose and ministered unto them." —Matt. viii. 14, 15.

What! said I, Peter's wife's mother! Can it be possible that St. Peter had a wife? I read it again and again, but could come to no other conclusion than the fact, that the Apostle Peter was a married man, had a wife, kept house, lived by fishing, and occasionally had at his house the Son of God. This circumstance, small as it may appear, was to me then a surprising discovery, and suggested a thousand other thoughts, which I cannot now relate.—Amongst other things, I supposed that if it could be right for Peter to have a wife while in the company of Jesus Christ, it certainly would not be wrong for any of those who profess to succeed him in office to have one now, unless there was some law decreed by God to prohibit their having one.

But knowing full well, that the Church of Rome, which pretends to rest on Peter, regards it a much greater crime in one of her priests to marry a wife and live with her, than that he should daily commit adultery, I could not help twisting and turning this matter in my head for a great length of time. I read in the Old Testament (Gen. ii. 18), where God said celibacy was not good, and came to the conclusion that God must have somewhere else contradicted that saying, else the Church which taught that celibacy is good, contradicts their Maker, and in so many words, says we are too holy to keep the commandments of God.

It is a constant boast of the Romish priests that they hold the ancient faith and ancient customs delivered to the Apostles, but here is a very ancient custom, which they have not only neglected sadly, but they solemnly swear upon oath they will oppose during their natural life. I certainly thought all the time, they must have some good foundation, for setting aside and deadly opposing a custom, which is an immutable law of Jehovah, established for the good of man, without limitation or exception.

I kept this thing in view while reading the remaining part of the New Testament, and found, so far from its being prohibited, that the Apostles said marriage was honourable in all; that is, among all classes of society. See Heb. xiv. 4. It appears some heretics in the days of the Apostles opposed it as dishonourable in the clergy to marry and have their wife and children round them; as it was pretended they would have more care for their family than for the Church of God: and this is the very reason now urged by those who are guilty of trampling under foot this holy institution of God. But the Apostle Paul, in writing to Timothy, says no men are fit for the office of bishop or deacon who are not married men; for the man who cannot govern his own family well, cannot govern a larger family; that is, the congregation under his charge: and this he declares to be a direct revelation of the Holy Spirit. See I Tim. 3rd and 4th chapters.

When this subject is urged upon the Romish priests, they tell you at once they hold marriage to be a sacrament, and forbid it to none but those who have taken upon themselves vows of perpetual celibacy. Thus, by subtle and sophistical arguments, they evade the curious and confound the credulous. The truth is, they forbid marriage to none but the very men whom the Holy Spirit commands to marry. These men they forbid to marry, under the pretence that they have voluntarily taken upon themselves vows of perpetual celibacy.

But it is not true that these men are left to their voluntary consent in making these vows; they are compelled to make such vows before they can enter the church. No man can become priest, monk, or friar, until he makes these vows. We have known some men, who, after they had spent years in learning the priest's trade, and their parents had spent the last shilling in supporting them in college (expecting they were sowing a seed which would in a short time yield a rich harvest, for it is generally understood, if a man can make his son a priest, the fortune of the whole family is made,) come home almost broken-hearted, because they could not enter the priesthood, on account of some conscientious scruples they had about making these vows.

There is no alternative, they must make the vows, or else relinquish the idea of being a priest. Now, if these men were allowed to enter the priesthood, and it was afterward left to their own conscientious convictions, whether they would make vows of perpetual celibacy or not, whether they would live married or single, then might it be said, with truth and propriety, that they took voluntary oaths of perpetual celibacy.

The plain logic of the matter, then, is something like this. In the apostolical days, a man may be a bishop or deacon of the Apostolical Church of Christ, and have a wife and children. The Church of Rome claims to be the Apostolical Church of Christ; but no man can be a bishop or deacon of the Church of Rome and have a wife and children; therefore the Church of Rome is not the Apostolical Church of Christ. Again—In the Apostolical days, any one who believed that Jesus was the Messiah, and had faith in him, may become a member of the Apostolical Church of Christ without further taxing his conscience with traditions, vows, &c.; but no man can become a member of the Church of Rome until he believes, or swears that he believes, a numberless heap of traditions, called Apostolical, and a number of doctrines contrary both to Scripture and reason, and makes vows of perpetual celibacy (for a common Romanist is not a member of the Roman Catholic Church); therefore the Roman Catholic Church is not the Apostolical Church of Christ.

Several other things arrested my attention, which I intend to communicate to you in future numbers. Fearing that I have already trespassed on your time and room, I will break off here, which I did not intend to do when I commenced.

We copy the two foregoing articles from a New York paper, The Irish Evangelist, and think they afford a cheering proof that intelligent Irish Roman Catholics are using their intellects in America as well as in Ireland. Truly, the Roman Catholic priesthood seem not quite so likely to have it all their own way during the next half century, as they had during the last. The laity are beginning to bestir themselves in all directions, and there seems to be nothing but trouble before the priesthood in all countries where the freedom of the press exists. Where it does not, men must remain slaves both in politics and religion, and deserve to be so for submitting to have the doors of knowledge closed against them by the iron hand of tyranny, ecclesiastical or civil. The day will come when tyranny will be shaken off even by the most indolent and effeminate races, and then will freedom of speech and of thought gladden the sunny plains and hills of Spain and Italy. In the meantime, all true Britons, whether in England or America, have a deeply responsible duty to perform, in using the freedom of the press aright, and proving themselves worthy of such a blessing. We think the cause of religious freedom among the Irish in America owes much to the exertions of The Irish Evangelist, which we have been reading for upwards of twelve months, and it would give us sincere pleasure to hear that some of our wealthier readers in England or Ireland would assist the good work in which it is engaged, by sending some pecuniary assistance to the editor and proprietor, Mr. John Hurley, No. 265, Bowery, New York, to enable him to distribute his paper gratuitously to our countrymen in America who are anxious to read and think for themselves. We agree with Mr. Hurley, that it requires very different reading from the ordinary tract to meet the wants of inquiring Roman Catholics; and while he conducts his journal in the spirit of candid inquiry and fair reasoning, he may feel secure of our cordial sympathy and co-operation.*

Correspondence.

INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—The following thoughts suggested themselves to the writer on reading Mr. Rourke's letter, in your last number.

Mr. Rourke "discovers the infallibility of the Church in the positive and unequivocal promises of our Lord Jesus Christ;" but Mr. Rourke overlooks the fact, repeatedly proved in Scripture, that God's promises are contingent, and require that man shall faithfully and honestly endeavour to fulfil his part, no other infallible guides than God's Word and God's Spirit being anywhere revealed. Take, for instance, the call of Moses and Aaron—"I will be with thy mouth and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do."—Exod. iv. 15. Immediately after this Moses and Aaron assembled the people, informed them of the commission they had received, and "did signs in the sight of the people, and the people believed."—Exod. iv. 29-31. Here, if ever, we might have acknowledged an infallible guide; yet, within a few short weeks, at the request of the people, Aaron takes the lead in a gross act of idolatry. —Exod. xxxii. 1-6. The people were weary of waiting upon God according to his own word, and desired something more tangible and exciting, and induced him, who should have restrained them, to join in their sin. Just so with the Church of Rome.

The Scriptures were a sufficient guide (infallible in themselves, still to be interpreted by fallible men), but the people liked not the spirituality of the simple faith: they required something more externally attractive, and their guides, seeing this disposition—seeing, also, the wealth and power that would accrue to themselves from a more gorgeous ritual—did as Aaron had done, forget God, and reared up a golden idol in his place.

Again, we are told (Deut. ix. 20), that "the Lord was very angry with Aaron to have destroyed him." He who was preternaturally called to a special mission, and promised Divine guidance in word and deed, was well nigh destroyed at its very commencement (and only saved by the prayer of another), because he was not faithful in that committed to him. Indeed, God himself declares that his promises are conditional.—"At what instant I shall speak concerning a kingdom to build and to plant it, if it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them."—Jer. xviii. 9, 10.

Let Mr. Rourke refer to the apocalyptic Churches, founded by the Apostles and apostolic men, and at the period when the Spirit addressed them under the presidency of the Apostle John, and he will see that the general promises of Christ do not secure infallibility to any Church, and that corporate bodies, even when under the rule of inspired heads, are not infallible. The Church of Ephesus had fallen, and was warned to repent or to be cut off. The Church at Ephesus was planted by St. Paul, who resided there "three years," earnestly preaching the truth.—Acts xx. 31. He appointed his own successor to watch over it, with whom he was in frequent communication; and shortly before his death he wrote his celebrated Epistle to them, in which he declares that they are "fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God, built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone." Here, then, was a Church which must have participation in all Christ's promises, yet even during the life of the beloved disciple who dwelt with her she had fallen; therefore the promises of Christ, together with the inspection of its rulers, do not assure infallibility to any Church. Still Christ's promises shall never fail—he is ever with his Church militant on earth, and will so continue till, triumphant in heaven, it beholds His glory.

Another argument against the pretension to infallibility is supplied by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. Speaking of the Jews, he says—"Well, because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith; be not high-minded, but fear; for if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he spare not thee; behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off." This language, addressed by an inspired Apostle to the very Church of Rome, ought to have warned her against all assumption of high-sounding titles, and especially against that pretension to infallibility which belongs not to anything of earth, for if infallible, it must "continue in the goodness of God," and then there could be no alternative of "cutting off." Mr. Rourke asserts that all God's works are perfect—not absolutely so; they have all the elements of perfection, but being committed to imperfect agents they fall short of the mark. God had built up the Jewish nation and the Jewish Church; but both the civil and ecclesiastical state fell so far short of perfection that God frequently expresses His displeasure against them, and thus speaks to Jeremiah—"Behold, that which I have built I will break down, and that which I have planted I will pluck up, even this whole land." The general assertion, therefore, that all God's works are perfect after they come into the hands of man, is erroneous; but, if it were true, what can the Church of Rome plead more than Israel and Judah that infallibility should be hers?

Your obedient servant,

HEDALE.

* We are sorry to find the C. L. has not reached Mr. Hurley regularly. We are assured by our publisher that it has been regularly forwarded, as published, monthly.

ON PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD AND THE BURIAL SERVICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—Since you have so peremptorily decided (C. L., Vol. ii., No. 21., page 106), that the question of purgatory is settled, as far as the Fathers of the first three centuries are concerned, it may appear preposterous in me again to recur to a subject thus summarily disposed of, and particularly so, as the references supplied by Diego are intended as the seal of your adjudication; but as these references are rather indefinite in application, and convey no specific information, I shall, in the first place, and I presume not "unreasonably," request to be informed, does St. Augustine mean by saying, "the Church hath rejected Origen," that the Church hath rejected all the writings of Origen? Secondly, I find Origen in different parts of his writings maintaining the following points of Catholic doctrine—namely, the real presence in the Eucharist, confession to a priest, invocation of angels and saints, the primacy of St. Peter, celibacy of the clergy, a relcasement out of prison when the utmost farthing is paid, the Church alone the interpreter of Holy Scripture, authority of the Church—with other points of doctrine believed and taught by the Catholic Church of the present day: In this respect, then, I also require a decided reply as to whether any of the above-mentioned points, and, if so, which of them were condemned by the fifth Œcumenical Council? As I am not here treating controversially on these subjects, having only alluded to them for sake of illustration, I have not considered it necessary to refer to them particularly; this I can do should I come to discuss them. In noticing your remarks on the next portion of my letter I have not to contend with anything in the shape of an argument: you cautiously avoid the question at issue. To the argument which I proposed relative to the Fathers of the fourth century, and to which I now again call your attention, you only reply by frivolous objections, unfounded assumptions, or by endeavouring to represent me arguing "unconsciously," from the present in support of the primitive doctrine of the Church. I have selected an argument at once rigorous and conclusive, and strictly limited to one particular period; and the force of your objections to the principles on which I have established this argument vanishes on a candid examination of the passages which I cited from these Fathers, all of whom refer, either directly or by implication, to 1 Cor. iii., 12, 13, 14, &c., and to other corroborating texts of Scripture, and in them they can find the doctrine of a future purgation and cleansing by fire; a punishing, yet saving fire, plainly and unmistakeably established. Now, let me suppose a proposition illogically stated; a principle injudiciously adopted, or even arbitrarily assumed; can such informality justify you in withholding your arguments against the doctrine of purgatory? Is it because I argue the question on principles different from yours that you put your candle under a bushel, instead of dispelling what you call the superstitions darkness of your Catholic brethren? I am a Christian by profession and a Catholic by conviction; convince me that I am wrong and I will subscribe to your doctrine, and write my name Protestant.

Mr. Thorndike says of the faithful departed, "What hinders them to receive comfort, refreshment, rest, peace, and light to sustain them in the expectation of their trial, and the anxieties they are to pass through during the time of it? And though there be hopes for those that are solicitous to live and die good Christians that they are in no such suspense, but within the bounds of the heavenly Jerusalem; yet because their condition is uncertain, and while there is hope of the better, there is also fear of the worse; therefore, the Church hath always assisted them with the prayers of the living, both for their speedy trial and easy absolution, and discharge with glory before God." —(Just Weights and Measures, chap. xvi. p. 107.)

In this extract we have vividly set forth the belief of the Church respecting the trial of Christian souls after death, the anxieties they suffer during their trial, the practice of the Church in assisting them, &c., and their absolution and discharge—or, if you will, a pardon of their sins; and that in a third place, or before they were admitted within the heavenly Jerusalem; whilst, on the contrary, the burial office in the Protestant ritual excludes the idea of any such belief. It is imperative that this office be read over all (save those excepted by the rubric), and a confident hope is expressed of the salvation of all that are buried, though they may have died in a notorious state of impenitence, without any appearance or profession of reconciliation to God; they may, in fact, have lived most notoriously infamous lives—have been Deists or Atheists, and continued so to their last moments; and not having been formally excommunicated, it is presumed of each such person in the burial office (which cannot be refused him) being read over his remains, that he is within the bounds of the heavenly Jerusalem; "that when we depart this life we may rest in him, as our hope is, this our brother doth," is the burden of the prayer. Hence, it is evident that the Protestant doctrine of prayers for the dead is utterly different from that of the early Church, which prayed only for those who died in the sincere profession of the Catholic faith; as also from the doctrine of the Catholic Church of the present day, which refuses to pray for incorrigible, impenitent sinners. It is useless, in an affair of such importance, and when the evidence is so decidedly against you, to endeavour, by any evasive gloss, to ignore the fact, that in this dogma of Protestant doctrine there must be something radically wrong; and how this can be tolerated in a Church which claims to itself the exclusive privilege of being truly Evangelical, you will be called upon to explain. I ask you, was the Church founded by the Apostles so utterly defective in any of its constituent principles? I answer emphatically—No. You may reply, that the connection of your Church with the State has authorized the practice; but can that be any justification of the fact? Can it be consistent with rational charity that, on such an awful occasion, this office, in the name of religion, should be read most solemnly over the remains of a notorious impugner of religion; a debauched and abandoned libertine, or a professed unbeliever, and a hope expressed that he is with God; and that we are to be his future companions in glory? No prayer is offered to entreat comfort, refreshment, &c., to sustain him during his trial to obtain his absolution and discharge from hissins; but the presumptuous hope is expressed that he is with God.

That it may appear how just the foregoing observations are, I shall quote the opinions of some learned Divines of the Protestant Church on this same subject:—

"It must be owned, and it is too plain to be denied, that in such cases as you mention, of men cut off in the midst of notorious sins, drunkenness, adultery, murder, &c., this office is wholly improper; and sure, we need not doubt but that at length some regard will be had to the repeated desires of many of the best defenders of the Church, and this ground of objection against it be wholly removed." (Reas. of Conformity, page 62—By the Bishop of Winchester.)

Here is the evil admitted; also the inability of the Church to supply a remedy. Archbishop Tillotson says, "Was the ancient discipline of the Church in any degree put in practice now, in what shoals and herds would men be driven out of the communion of the Church" (Vol. I., Serm. 67). To the same purpose we have Dr. Wheatly (arguing the cases of ipso facto excommunications, p. 494), declaring "the consequence would be, we presume, that this office (the Burial Office) would comparatively be but seldom read."

This brings me to consider next your alleged charge against Catholics with respect to their ignorance of the first principles of Protestants; a charge which I think the foregoing observations have rendered wholly groundless.

Requesting you will show how the question of prayers for the dead, as I have stated, to be the practice of the Protestant Church, can be supported by Scripture authority,

I have the honour to remain,

Sir, yours in sincere Christian charity,

EDMOND POWER.

As Mr. Power finds it so hard to understand what is meant by the assertion that "the Church hath rejected Origen," we must endeavour to throw a little light on the subject by a parallel case. He will admit, we suppose, that the Church of Rome has rejected Martin Luther. Does this mean that the Church of Rome rejects every doctrine that Martin Luther believed, and that she does not teach the doctrines of the Incarnation or the Trinity, because those truths were acknowledged by Luther? Surely not. Or again, does it mean that the Church of Rome only rejects those of Luther's opinions which she specially names, and that on every other point we may be quite sure that Luther and she perfectly agree? Not that either. But the Church of Rome having rejected Martin Luther, is no longer concerned what truths he may hold, or what falsehoods he may propound; he cannot be understood as having a right to represent her sentiments. Suppose now that a Protestant were to assert that the Church of Rome held that the moon was made of green cheese, and that the angels smoke tobacco, and should give as a proof his assertion that those propositions were to be found somewhere in the works of Martin Luther, what would Mr. Power reply? He would say, unless you give me references I cannot be expected to believe on your bare word that Luther did believe these strange propositions; but even if he did, it is nothing to me, the Church of Rome is not answerable for him. And just so with the list of doctrines which Mr. Power asks us to believe are to be found somewhere or other in the works of Origen. Whether Origen held these doctrines or no can only be decided by quotations with references from the works of Origen. But when we have settled this question we shall be no nearer to knowing what the Church believed in Origen's day, for no church is answerable for the opinions of those whom she rejects as heretics.

Mr. Power next gives an extract from Mr. Thorndike's writings, for what purpose we cannot at all conceive. We readily admit that this extract is more like purgatory than anything we can find in the writings of the Fathers of the first three centuries. If there had been anything in their writings so much to his purpose, we should have had it flung in our teeth at least once a month. Epiphanius, when asked why he prays for the dead, does not give at all so clear an account. But after all, did Mr. Thorndike believe in Purgatory? When Mr. Power says that he "vividly sets forth the belief of the Church," is he aware that Mr. Thorndike notoriously did not hold the belief of his Church on this subject. We have, in fact, here an example how dangerous a thing it is to quote from a book without reading it. The passage quoted by Mr. Power is taken from a place where Mr. Thorndike is arguing that the early Fathers did not believe in Purgatory! and contains his explanation why, nevertheless, they did pray to the dead.

A witness in a court of justice who swore that he perfectly knew Job Tomkins, and that he saw him commit a murder, when asked to point him out, put his rod on the head of the attorney on the other side. Mr. Power's evidence is just as valuable when he says that he finds Purgatory in the writings of the Fathers; for wherever he finds prayers for the dead, he fancies he sees Purgatory; and he is just as successful in finding Purgatory in the writings of Mr. Thorndike and Mr. Johnson as in those of Epiphanius and Augustine.

Lastly, Mr. Power contrasts the practice of the Church of England, which, in its burial service, expresses a hope that those whom she commits to the grave rest in Christ, with that of the Church of Rome, which "refuses to pray for incorrigible, impenitent sinners." Now, we believe that in this respect there is no material difference between the two Churches. We may as well say that the Church of England does not read the burial service over "incorrigible, impenitent sinners." But, then, how are we to know that a sinner died incorrigible or impenitent? We confess, in our experience, we never heard of any priest refusing money when asked to pray for one who died in his communion. We have never heard of any priest saying, "My good man, I cannot take your money; I fear it is a bad case; it would be only robbing you to take money for masses for such a reprobate as your uncle." We believe that, on the contrary, the greater the sinner, the more money and the more prayers, he would maintain, were necessary for his repose. And we do not think that the priest would be very much to blame. If we could be quite sure that any particular man who died was gone to hell, then the Church of England, we suppose, would not read the burial service over him. But if we cannot know this, it is only charitable to hope for the best; and, it seems in the vast majority of cases, at least, impossible that we should know it. Post-mortem examinations of the body may be sometimes needful for the good of the survivors; but how post-mortem examinations of men's souls could be held before interring their bodies, we are at a loss to conceive.

CHURCH VISIBLE AND INVISIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Carlow, 30th November, 1853.

SIR—Of all subjects of discussion that man is interested in, that of religion is the most momentous, and deserves the calmest and sincerest investigation that the mind of man is capable of giving to it, in which I know you will concur. Now, I beg leave to say that your remarks, or rather the answer you gave to my letter on the "Church Visible and Invisible," has not satisfied me. The difficulty I placed Luther in, or rather the difficulty he placed himself in, reminds you of a famous saying about a famous case in the ancient Church—all the world against Athanasius, and Athanasius against all the world. It was a famous case, no doubt; but the saying was not. It might be better put, and with greater truth—"All the Arians against Athanasius, and Athanasius against all the Arians." Yet you cannot find a parallel case between Luther and Athanasius, any way you take it. Here you have the Council of Nice and Athanasius against Arius, and Arius and his cabals against Athanasius and the Council of Nice. You will say, after all, Athanasius was deposed and sent into banishment; very true, but the charges that caused his deposition were not those of belief as regards the Trinity, as you say, but of crimes that I know you will fairly acquit him, as church history tells us he was found innocent of all crimes of faith and morals, in the Councils of Alexandria, Rome, and Sardica. You say that this question about Luther is, in fact, no difficulty at all to you, and that he was no member of the Church of England or Ireland, nor was that Church founded by him, nor consist of his followers. Now, I confess I cannot understand this statement, so opposed to all history on the matter. Before Luther changed his views or opinions he was a member of the Church of England and Ireland, inasmuch as he was a member of the Catholic Church, and as the Church of England and Ireland were a part of that great whole, the universal Church. We deem those who profess Arianism to be the followers of Arius, no matter to what country they belong; and so of England and Ireland. Though Luther never put his foot there, you say "your correspondent will agree with us, that there was a Church in England before the Reformation"; and I ask, was it Lutheran, as it now is—is it now Catholic, as it then was? You say that that very Church rejected errors that she formerly held. Were not those the very errors that Luther opposed; and those errors the then universal Church held in common, and that the universal Church now holds unanimous—errors, as you call them, but, thank God, those errors, falsely so called, have the consent of hundreds of millions of human souls—those that are gone before, and those that are, which can claim, and justly too, more intellect, more deep research, more solid piety, amongst them than all the world beside. This may appear to many narrow-minded individuals a sweeping assertion; but what of numbers, you will say, if they are in error. Very true—"to the law and to the testimony." Well, then, let us go and see are those so called errors to be found therein, and were they condemned thereby. Before I go farther I think it but fair to remark, if a Scripture text is to be found for any article of belief, it ought to stand; and, to be refuted, a stronger and plainer text of Scripture must be found to do so; and if any practice in Church discipline or belief, founded on apostolic tradition, for which we have Scripture to prove the reasonableness thereof, must stand until condemned by a warrant of Scripture. Christ's commission to his apostles will alone establish the infallibility of his Church. "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth, going therefore teach all nations, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and behold I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world"—Matt. 28. I will build my Church upon a rock. The gates of hell shall not prevail against her. She is the pillar and ground of truth. My Holy Spirit will teach her all truth for ever. If the above texts will not prove infallibility, what will they go to prove? what purport were they written for? Their plain, obvious sense proclaims the infallibility of God's Church. The Church, the spouse of Christ, loved by him, and presented her to himself, without spot or wrinkle; holy, without blemish, as Paul asserts; then, as a natural inference, that Church which Christ has sanctified with his blessing, in the above words of St. Paul, must be infallible, otherwise she cannot remain holy and without blemish with regard to her teaching. When Paul says—obey your prelates, for they watch, as being to render an account for your souls, are we to slight that injunction, by allowing our minds to be driven about by every wind of doctrine that private interpretation of Scripture is sure to lead us? Take heed to yourselves, says the same Paul, and to your whole flocks, wherein the Holy Ghost has placed you bishops, to rule the Church of God. Now, if those bishops of God's Church were to lead their flocks into the quagmires and morasses of idolatry, by becoming the ignis fatuus thereof, would God, in charity's name, subject the sheep of his pasture to be led by them? How are we to know the true interpretation of Scripture but by an infallible judge? I will wait to see what Philalethes says of Berengarius.

I am, dear sir, yours respectfully,

A ROMAN CATHOLIC.

Our correspondent, not being satisfied with our answer to his last letter, we must now try and make it more satisfactory. He says we cannot find a parallel case between Luther and Athanasius, for, in that case, it was "the Council of Nice and Athanasius against Arius, and Arius and his cabals against Athanasius and the Council of Nice." In this our correspondent seems to think that the saying which we quoted—"all the world against Athanasius, and Athanasius against all the world"—was meant to apply to the time of the Council of Nice; but in this he is mistaken: it was applied to the state of things which existed a quarter of a century later, when the Arians were making attempts, which for a time seemed to be wholly successful, to make the whole Church Arian. During that quarter of a century the Arians had been making every effort, and in the year 359, the emperor ordered a general council to assemble to settle the question over again: the eastern bishops to assemble at Seleucia, and the western at Ariminum. The bishops assembled were, 160 at Selencia, and 400 at Ariminum, 560 in all; being fourteen times as many as sat in the earlier sessions of the Council of Trent, and nearly three times as many as ever sat together in the Council of Trent. The question between the Arians and the Council of Nice was, whether Christ be "consubstantial" with the Father (that is, "of the same substance"). At both Selencia and Ariminum, the bishops passed decrees that this word, "consubstantial," should henceforth be left out of the creed of the Catholic Church, thereby surrendering what the Arians demanded.

And this was not only decreed by the Councils but confirmed by the Pope. Pope Liberius, it is true, at first refused to agree to it; but, being sent into banishment, in order to obtain his return to Rome, he wrote a letter renouncing the faith of Athanasius and the Council of Nice, and declaring his agreement with the eastern bishops, who were notoriously Arians. Here are the words of his letter to the oriental bishops—"I do not defend Athanasius.... when I knew that you had justly condemned him, since it was pleasing to God. I afterwards supplied my consent to your sentence; and, in addition, I gave letters to be brought to the Emperor Constantius, by our brother Fortunatianus, concerning him (Athanasius) by name, that is, concerning his condemnation. Therefore, Athanasius being removed, all your decrees concerning whom will be reverenced by me, together with the apostolic see, I say that I have peace and unity with all of you, and with all the eastern bishops, and through all the provinces."*

Then it was that Athanasius (as well became his name, which means "the undying one") stood forth alone in defence of the Nicene faith.

Of this it is that St. Vincent Lirinensis says, "when the poison of the Arians had contaminated, not merely a small portion, but almost the whole world, so that nearly all the Latin bishops† being deceived, partly by force, partly by fraud, a sort of darkness fell over the minds of men as to what was to be especially followed in circumstances of such great confusion; then whoever was a true lover and worshipper of Christ, by preferring the ancient faith to the novel perfidy, escaped the defilement of that contagion" (Commonitorium, c. 4).

All this is no "difficulty" to us, for we believe that even when a Pope and a General Council of 560 Bishops fell, Christ had still a true Church; but if, as the Roman Catholic Bishop Milner says (End of Controversy, part II., letter 30), all Roman Catholics agree that a General Council, confirmed by the Pope, must be infallible, as representing the Universal Church—we do not see how Roman Catholics can get over this difficulty. It is certainly a greater difficulty to them, than it is to us, to tell where the visible Church was when Luther began to teach. Does our correspondent get out of this difficulty about Athanasius by saying that, though the whole Church, at the time in question, was against him, yet he had the Church of former times in his favour? Well, supposing that Luther had stood alone, and that we follow him, we should say exactly the same, that we have the Church in the time of the Council of Nice on our side. Can that defence ever lose its force by lapse of time?

But we deny that Luther stood alone, or that we follow him. Athanasius, though for a long time he seemed to stand alone, as respected public controversy and teaching, still had many on his side. So had Luther. To name no more, Vatablus, whose notes on the Bible we shall notice in another place, was a cotemporary of Luther. He, like many others, laboured to restore the religion of the Bible.

But, as we said in our last answer to our correspondent, we are no followers of Luther. We agree with him only so far as he followed the early Church, and we do not follow him at all. Our correspondent says he "cannot understand this statement, so opposed to all history on the matter." Our correspondent does not tell us what history, and we know of none to which it is opposed. But suppose it were, we have learned to know that "history" often tells lies; and we are free to appeal from "history" to historical facts. Is it a fact that the English Church has followed Luther? Were not the corporal presence of Christ in the Eucharist, and the use of images, two main questions of the Reformation? and, is it not notorious that from the commencement of the Reformation up to this day, the English Church has wholly differed from Luther on these two great points? Luther and his followers, to this day, hold the use of images, and the doctrine of consubstantiation, which differs but little from transubstantiation, both of which the Church of England and Ireland has always rejected ever since the Reformation. Will he tell us now that we are followers of Luther? We tell him that we follow the Word of God, and the early Church which followed it. We follow Luther not at all; and we agree with him only so far as he also followed that which we follow.

And if our correspondent supposes that Roman Catholics in England and Ireland are the Church which subsisted in England and Ireland before the Reformation, we are willing to meet him on that ground. Suppose we could go back to England and Ireland as they were in the fifteenth century, before the Reformation was established; suppose we could go to any bishop, priest, or member of the English and Irish Church in that age, and ask him to show us the creeds of his Church, the authorized statement of the articles of the Catholic faith, as held by his Church, what would such priest, or bishop, or layman have shown us? He would have handed us "the Apostles' Creed," "the Nicene Creed," and "the Athanasian Creed." If we go now to any bishop, priest, or layman of the English and Irish Church, and ask him the same question, he hands us still THE SAME CREEDS. But, if we go to a Roman Catholic, in England or Ireland now, and ask him to show us the creed of his Church, he hands us the creed of Pope Pius IV., which no one ever saw in England or Ireland before the Reformation. Which party has the same creed as the ancient Church of England and Ireland? The difference is this; one party has rejected the errors which prevailed in the Church, preserving its creed; the other has made A NEW CREED, that they may keep to those errors.

* Ego Athanasium non defendo..... ubi cognovi quando Deo placuit juste vos illum condemnasse; mox consensum meum commodavi sententiis vestris; literas adhæcquo super nomine ejus, id est, de damnatione ipsius, per fratrem nostrum Fortunatianum dedi perferendas ad imperatorem nostrum Constantium. Itaque amoto Athanasio, super quo statuta omnium vestrum a me cum sede apostolica suscipienda sunt; dico me cum omnibus vobis et cum universis episcopis orientalibus seu per universas provincias pacem et unitatem habere. Lab. and Coss. Gen. Con. vol. 2, col. 751, Ed. Par. 1672.

† The eastern bishops had fallen into Arianism first: when the Latin or western bishops fell too—then was the period of darkness.

Now, for the infallibility of the Church. We are plain men; and our correspondent, perhaps, is a plain man too; and our readers are, mostly, plain men: we ask our correspondent to deal with this question in a plain manner. We ask him to deal with it as a matter of fact. Has the Church of Rome, in fact, been always infallible? Say yes or no. If he say "no," what need of further argument? If he say "yes;" we ask was Pope Liberius and his 650 bishops right? If not, what becomes of the infallibility of the Pope and a council? If they were, what becomes of the Catholic faith? We ask him were Pope Nicolas II. and 113 bishops, in the Council at Rome, right or wrong about the doctrine they imposed on Berengarius? He replies that he will wait for the answer of Philalethes: so do we:* this is a very fair answer for the present; but surely it involves his suspending his judgment until he sees Philalethes's answer. The proofs of infallibility which he gives in the meantime, he speaks of himself, as natural inferences from Scripture. No such inferences, nor no abstract arguments, can stand against acknowledged facts. We ask to have infallibility dealt with as a fact. Is it a fact that the Church of Rome has been infallible?

ON THE SERVICE IN LATIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As you are so kind as to answer anything a poor man may inquire about, I need not offer any excuse for troubling you for the purpose of trying to come by a little information.

Sir, I suppose you know that the service of our Church is carried on in Latin; and though I could not think it was right, yet as your paper says very little about it, I thought there was no harm in it in your opinion, or I thought that as the rich men and good scholars could, perhaps, make out the meaning of the Mass, it would do very well, and that it made little difference to poor creatures like us what language it was said in, if we only prayed as well as we could, and behaved ourselves till Mass would be over.

Yet, because I couldn't help thinking that it would be plainer in English or Irish, I often asked people who knew more than myself about it; and one man—a middling scholar too—told me that our Saviour said the first Mass in Latin, at his Last Supper, and that the Church doesn't wish to change it, and that if I got the Douay Testament I could find it myself. But though I got one since, I could never find out about the first Mass, though I found out about the Eucharist, and a good deal among us think—though I don't give in to it—that it is the holiest language, and that the devil, though he knows all other languages, can make no hand of the Latin, and for that reason don't choose to be losing his time in the chapel.

Mr. Editor, I found, by reading your paper, that no proof could be given from the Fathers of the first 300 years, for purgatory, and I thought there may be might be as little proof got from them in support of the Mass being said in Latin. I often wonder to hear the priest saying that many of us don't hear Mass as we ought, and that it will be so much the worse for our souls in the other world; but sure I don't think God will be hard on us, for not listening carefully to what we can't make out the meaning of. I know 'tis very little Latin the priest uses when he is asking for his dues, or telling us who is the man we should vote for at an election, and yet he don't speak so plain to us at Mass, though he threatens our poor souls if we don't hear it right.

What I want to know, Mr. Editor, is if our Saviour ever said a Mass, and in what part of the Douay Testament I could find it, and if he ordered every Mass to be said in Latin, or to be said at all. I hope to see something about it in your paper shortly, and as you are so kind as to print anything a priest may have to say, I hope some of them will give me an answer, and perhaps you will be kind enough to give me a small bit of information if the priest does not; but 'tis more to reason that he should explain it. I think an honest man ought to give a fair reason for what he does—so I hope in some short time to see an answer in your paper from a priest.—Your humble servant at command, MICHAEL O'MARA, of Waterford.

We agree with Mr. O'Mara that it would be very desirable if some priest would take on him to answer his questions, and if any such explanation be sent to us, we shall gladly insert it. If not, we shall do the best we can to satisfy him ourselves.

PURGATORY—WHAT IS IT?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—There is a point connected with the subject of Purgatory that I do not remember to have seen brought forward in your pages, which yet appears to me to be of moment in the controversy. It is this, the Church of Rome has not decided what Purgatory is. She says "there is a Purgatory," but as to what it is, not one word. She has not ventured to decide whether it be a place or a state: accordingly her writers differ from each other, and even at times from themselves in their definitions. A few specimens will suffice. Doyle's Catechism.—"Q. What is Purgatory? A. A PLACE OR STATE of punishment." The matter here left in doubt by the doctor ("a place OR state") is positively settled by him in his Abridgment of Christian Doctrine, p. 115. "Q. How prove you there is a Purgatory, or a PLACE of punishment." And, again, "therefore there is A PLACE of purging and pardoning sins after this life."

Butler's Small Catechism (R. and D. Read, Belfast). "Q. What is Purgatory? A. A PLACE of punishment in the other life." This doctor's third-size catechism gives the answer, "A PLACE OR STATE of punishment." The Touchstone, 45—"Protestants will have it that there is no middle PLACE or STATE of souls after this life." This doubt disappears at the close of the paragraph—"therefore it must be a middle place." And in 46—"Hence follows a middle PLACE, which we call Purgatory."

Keenan's Catechism, p. 146.—"How do you prove that there is a Purgatory, or middle STATE between hell and heaven?" The same writer, in his answer to the question, "How do you reason on this?" says, "therefore, he must allude to souls in some other PLACE, which is not heaven, or earth, or the hell of the damned; therefore, that PLACE exists, and it is that which Catholics call Purgatory."

The Grounds of the Catholic Doctrine.—"Q. What do you mean by Purgatory? A. A middle STATE of souls. .....But as to the particular PLACE where these souls suffer, or the quality of the torments which they suffer, THE CHURCH HAS DECIDED NOTHING." Remembering, no doubt, this declaration, the author (Bishop Challoner) says in the course of his attempted proofs, "now this would not be true if there was no such THING as Purgatory." He was unwilling to use the word PLACE, the only one applicable, and he compromised between place and state, by the word thing. But he is forced to use place farther on. "Besides, a middle PLACE is also implied (1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, 20), where Christ is said by his Spirit to have gone and preached to the spirits in prison.....which prison could be no other than Purgatory." A prison being a place, he is forced to employ the term here, although "the Church has decided nothing about the particular place, or the quality of the torments."

This distinction between place and state is important; for if it be not decided whether Purgatory be a place or state, what right have Roman Catholics to quote passages of Scripture which imply or plainly speak of place, and to apply them to Purgatory? And if any Roman Catholic does decide that Purgatory is a place, is he not using his private judgment to settle a point which his Church, with all her boasted infallibility, has been compelled to leave undecided?

Other contradictions may be pointed out in the writings referred to:—Thus, 1 Peter iii. 19, 20, is quoted by Keenan, by the author of The Touchstone, and by the author of The Grounds, &c., to prove the existence of Purgatory, and of Christ's descent there to preach; while it is appealed to by Butler and Doyle (in their catechisms) to prove Christ's descent into Limbo. I must quote from Doyle's Catechism a few questions and their answers.

"Q. Did Christ's soul descend into the hell of the damned? A. No; but to a place or state of rest, called Limbo. Acts ii. 24, 27; Ps. xv. 10. Q. Who were in Limbo? A. The souls of the saints who died before Christ. Q. Why did Christ go down into Limbo? A. St. Peter says to preach to those spirits that were in prison; that is, to make known to them, in person, the joyful tidings of their redemption. 1 Pet. iii. 19."

Now, this same Dr. Doyle, in his Abridgment of Christian Doctrine refers to this identical passage to establish the dogma that Christ went into Purgatory; at the same time distinguishing between Purgatory and Limbo. A few questions, with their answers, from this work also, will be necessary. "Q. What means, he descended into hell? A. It means that as soon as Christ was dead, his blessed soul descended into Limbo, to free the holy fathers who were there. Q. How prove you that? A. Out of Acts ii. 24, 27; Ps. xv. 10. Q. What other proof have you? A. Ephesians, iv. 8, 9. Q. Did he not descend to Purgatory to free such as were there? A. It is most probable he did, according to the first of St. Peter, iii. 19, 20."

Here, then, we have writer against writer, and the same man against himself, and all against their Church, which was unable to decide WHAT Purgatory is.

THETA.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR DECEMBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Wheat.—From the very wet and inclement weather which has prevailed during the period of wheat sowing, a vast breadth still remains to be sown; let every opportunity be, therefore, taken advantage of in depositing the seed, for which a good season still remains; wheat being likely to rate much higher for some time than for the past few years, and as a sufficient breadth of bread corn is and must be a paramount object, every exertion should now be made to increase it. Land already and for some time past under tillage must, of a necessity, be waited for till sufficiently dry for working under the harrows, as any attempt to plough or harrow, while saturated with wet, would be highly injurious; but lea land, when breaking up, may be sown in breadths as fast as turned up. It will much improve it to use the land-presser, to close and consolidate the soils, if it can be had; but in the event of that important implement being wanting, we would rather sow immediately after the land is turned up, than lose valuable time and fine weather for getting in the seed, waiting for the natural closing of the soils at so late a period in the season. In such cases we strongly recommend harrowing roughly, lengthways, before sowing, to close the deep fissures; then sow, and harrow sufficiently to cover the seed. Should a drilling-machine be available, harrow the land well lengthways, to avoid turning up the sods, and drill in the seed across the furrows. In either cases the free use of the roller, when the land will permit, will effect the necessary consolidation of the soil, and in the mean time the seed will be vegetating, and so much time gained.

Winter Vetches may also be sown; but henceforth must be cultivated on the ridge and furrow system.

Root Crops.—Proceed as the weather suits with the storage of root crops; get them in before heavy frost sets in, otherwise their keeping qualities will be greatly injured. Parsnips for table use are much better lifted fresh and fresh, as required; and carrots are greatly improved for horse consumption by storage in dry, airy places, and exposure to evaporation.

Early Potatoes.—Continue planting early potatoes in dry weather. At this season the ridge and furrow system is to be preferred to the drill, from the superior dry bed afforded during the winter; a liberal dressing of stable-dung and a six-inch cover of earth are requisite to ensure success and afford protection from frost.

Ploughing should be proceeded with vigorously when the weather and land are dry enough, so that all stubble and lea land may be turned up before the commencement of the new year.

Water Meadows.—Remove obstructions from dead leaves, deposits of silt, or other matters from the feeding and discharging drains as often as they occur, so that the water may flow regularly and evenly, and correct the levels wherever faulty, which are easily discovered when the water has been running for a few days and the land becomes in some degree saturated. If severe frost comes on, the water must be still kept running, to protect the springing grass from its destructive effects; but when the weather continues mild and open, the course of the water may be changed twice a week, if the supply is not sufficient to cover the whole breadth at once; but if the supply be sufficient, it may remain on till a scum arises, which indicates that the land is sufficiently saturated, when the water should be drawn off, and returned again when sufficiently drained off.

Fences.—This is a suitable time to form and plant new fences, and repair and lay old ones. Dig and clean about young hedges, removing the roots of docks, couch, and all perennial weeds. The application of manure will well repay the cost in the increased vigour and early efficacy of the fences.

Ewes and Lambs should be changed to fresh pastures, as often as necessary, to maintain them well, after which they should have a very moderate supply of roots, and free access to good hay, with a dry lair and shelter.

Stall-feeding.—The animals in the stalls should now be so accustomed to their quarters as to be on full keep; particular attention to cleanliness, ventilation, and regularity in feeding hours, with free and undisturbed rest, will bring them on rapidly.

Milch Cows should henceforth be kept in, except about an hour in the middle of the day, but not more, when the weather is fine and dry, for exercise. To enable them to secrete milk in anything like remunerative quantity, their food should be cooked, and given with the chill off it (but not up to blood heat), and good hay. Those far advanced in calf should be permitted to go dry.

Young and Store Stock should be henceforth well attended to; a moderate supply of roots, with a little oil-cake and sweet hay, and fresh straw, will keep them progressing, provided they have good shelter from frost and rain.

Pigs.—As those formerly put up to fatten get matured, they should be sold off, and their ranks filled up from the best of the stores, and such breeding sows as have reared their third litter. This will be a good time to send sows to the brawn.

Farm Horses, when not at the plough, may be profitably kept at carting lime from the kiln and marl from the pits to the field, where requisite, manure to the fields, and grain, as it is ready, to the market, lime, bog-stuff, sea or pit sand, &c., to the compost heaps, and in the repair of roads.

Odds and ends.—Keep the main drains and water courses free of obstruction, turn over composts, and collect materials for new ones, incorporate manures, repair roads and gates, cleanse, repair, and paint all implements not in general use, and store them under cover; thrash corn regularly to keep up a fresh supply of straw for the cattle; repair the roofs of offices, that the interior may be kept dry and warm, and make constant war with vermin.

* None has yet reached us up to the very moment of going to press.—ED.

New, Recent, and Illustrated Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Any Book or number of Books together, within a pound weight, can be sent by post for 6d., and at the rate of 6d. for every pound weight additional.

THE COURT ALBUM; or Book of Beauty for 1854. A Series of Portraits of the Female Aristocracy. In an Elegant Binding. 21s.

HEATH'S KEEPSAKE FOR 1854. Edited by Miss Power, with Illustrations on Steel. Elegantly Bound. 21s.

TUPPER'S PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY. Illustrated Edition, in small 4to. The Designs by Birket Foster, Cope, Tenniel, Pickersgill and others. Cloth, Gilt. 31s. 6d. Morocco. £2 5s.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT, Printed on Silver, and Illuminated in the Missal Style in Gold and Colours, by M. Lepelle Du Bois Gallais. Square, 18mo. Ornamental boards, 21s.

THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD: Being a selection of the most striking Parables, enriched with gorgeous Illuminated Borders. Bound in imitative carved ebony binding. 21s.

FEATHERED FAVOURITES: Twelve exquisitely coloured Pictures of British Birds, from Drawings by Joseph Wolf. 4to. Elegantly bound. 18s.

POETRY OF THE YEAR: Passages from the Poets, descriptive of the Seasons. With Twenty-two beautifully coloured Illustrations. Imperial 8vo. Elegantly bound. £2 2s. Morocco extra, £2 12s. 6d.

WINGED THOUGHTS. By Mary Anne Bacon. With Illustrations of Birds in illuminated printing, by Owen Jones. Royal 8vo. Richly bound. 31s. 6d.

FLOWERS, AND THEIR KINDRED THOUGHTS: Illustrated by fourteen Subjects, designed and printed in Oil Colours, by Owen Jones. Royal 8vo. Elegantly bound. 31s. 6d.

FRUITS FROM THE GARDEN AND FIELD: By Mary Anne Bacon. With beautiful Illustrations of Fruit, designed and executed in colours, by Owen Jones. Royal 8vo. Elegantly bound. 31s. 6d.

GARDEN BEAUTIES; a Series of Exquisitely Coloured Floral Designs in Oil. With Sonnets printed in Gold. Imp. 8vo. Elegantly bound. 31s. 6d.

GATHERINGS FROM THE ORCHARD. With Illustrations of Fruit in highly finished Oil-coloured Printing. 4to. Handsomly bound. 31s. 6d.

TRAVELS IN SOUTHERN RUSSIA AND THE CRIMEA; through Hungary, Wallachia, and Moldavia. By Prince Anatole De Demidoff. 2 vols. Roy. 8vo. With numerous Illustrations. £2 2s.

LAYARD'S DISCOVERIES IN THE RUINS OF NINEVEH AND BABYLON: being the Results of his Second Expedition. 8vo. With 400 Illustrations. 21s.

LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL. By Sir Walter Scott. Beautifully printed on tinted paper, with 100 Illustrations from Designs by Birket Foster and John Gilbert. Elegantly bound in blue indented cover, uniform with "Longfellow's Poems." 18s. Morocco, 25s.

LONGFELLOW'S POETICAL WORKS. 8vo. With Illustrations by Birket Foster and J. Gilbert. Elegantly bound in blue. 21s.

LONGFELLOW'S GOLDEN LEGEND. 8vo. Beautifully Illustrated. Uniform with "Hyperion," and "Poetical Works." Bound in blue. 12s.

CASTILE AND ANDALUSIA. By Lady Louisa Tennison. With numerous highly-finished Engravings and Illustrations on Wood. Imp. 8vo. £2 12s. 6d.

GREECE: Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical. By Christopher Wordsworth, D.D. With numerous Engravings on Wood and Steel. Imp. 8vo. Elegantly bound. 31s. 6d.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS; or, the Founders of New England in the Reign of James the First. By W. H. Bartlett. With 28 Steel Engravings and 31 Illustrations on Wood. Super. Royal 8vo. 12s.

A SKETCHER'S TOUR ROUND THE WORLD. By Robert Elwes, Esq. Roy. 8vo. With 21 Coloured Illustrations from Original Drawings. Elegantly bound. 21s.

NORWAY AND ITS GLACIERS VISITED IN 1851. Followed by Journals of Excursions in the High Alps of Dauphine, Berne, and Savoy. By James D. Forbes, F.R.S.E. Roy. 8vo. With 10 Coloured Lithographic views. 21s.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA in the Autumn of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. With Illustrations. 14s.

GROTIUS ON THE RIGHTS OF WAR AND PEACE; an Abridged Translation. By Wm. Whewell, D.D. 8vo. 14s.

VICTORIA; LATE AUSTRALIA FELIX, OR PORT PHILIP DISTRICT OF NEW SOUTH WALES; being a Historical and Descriptive Account of the Colony and its Gold Mines. By William Westgrath. 8vo. 12s.

THE LEISURE HOUR, 1853. Imp. 8vo. With numerous Wood Engravings. 6s. Extra Crimson Cloth, Gilt Edges, 7s. 6d.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE; from the downfall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852. 2 Vols. 8vo. 15s. each.

BURKE'S PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE; corrected to the present time. Royal 8vo. 38s.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL ASSEMBLY, (1789). By Alphonse De Lamartine. Vol. 1. 6s.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY; A Narrative for the Young, on Occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. 4s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. Vol. 5. Library Edition. 8vo., Cloth. 12s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. Vol. 5. Post 8vo., Cloth. (Oliver and Boyd's Edition.) 6s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. Vol. 5. (Collins's Edition). 12mo. Sewed, 2s. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

BENEDICTIONS; or, The Blessed Life. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. Fcap. 8vo. 7s.

CHRIST OUR PASSOVER; or, Thoughts on the Atonement. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOUR, Illustrative of His Divine Character and Mission. By Rev. A. L. R. Foote. 6s.

THE CHRISTIAN WREATH OF PROSE, POETRY, AND ART; with 8 highly finished Oil Coloured Engravings. 5s.

THE WOOD CUTTER OF LEBANON; a Story Illustrative of a Jewish Institution. By the Author of "The Faithful Promiser." 2s. 6d.

SYMPATHY; or, the Mourner Advised and Consoled. By the Rev. John Bruce. 12mo. 5s.

A CYPRESS WREATH FOR AN INFANT'S GRAVE; with an Introduction and Essay on Infant Salvation. By Rev. John Bruce. 3s. 6d.

THE BYEWAYS OF THE BIBLE. By Rev. Richard Brown. 2s. 6d.

BLUE JACKETS; or, Chips of the Old Block. A Narrative of the Gallant Exploits of British Seamen, &c., during the present Reign. By W. H. G. Kingston. 7s. 6d.

OCEAN AND HER RULERS; A Narrative of the Nations who have from the earliest Ages held Dominion over the Sea. By Alfred Elwes. 5s.

THE BOYHOOD OF GREAT MEN. Intended as an Example to Youth. By John G. Edgar. 3s. 6d.

FOOT-PRINTS OF FAMOUS MEN; designed as Incitements to Intellectual Industry. By John G. Edgar. 3s. 6d.

THE BOY HUNTERS; or, Adventures in the Search of a White Buffalo. By Captain Mayne Reid. With Illustrations. 7s.

THE DESERT HOME; or, The Adventures of a Lost Family in the Wilderness. By Captain Mayne Reid. Illustrated. 7s.

THE YOUNG VOYAGEURS; or, The Boy Hunters in the North. By Captain Mayne Reid. With Illustrations. 7s.

PETER THE WHALER; His early Life and Adventures in the Arctic Regions. By W. H. G. Kingston. 5s.

THE CHARM: A Book for Boys and Girls. Illustrated with upwards of Sixty Engravings. 5s.

MEMOIR OF REV. W. H. KRAUSE. By the Rev. Charles S. Stanford. Crown 12mo. 5s. (In a few days.)

PETER PARLEY'S ANNUAL FOR 1854. With coloured Engravings and numerous Illustrations in Wood. 5s.

WOODLEIGH HOUSE; or, The Happy Holidays. With Steel Engravings. 7s. 6d.

ELLEN MONTGOMERY'S BOOKCASE — MR. RUTHERFORD'S CHILDREN. By the Author of "The Wide, Wide World." Fcap. 8vo. 2s.

CHAMBERS'S LIBRARY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE. 18mo. 20 different Sorts. Each containing an engraved Frontispiece. Handsomely bound. 1s. each.

MARY HOWITT'S JUVENILE BOOKS. 18mo. Thirteen different Sorts. Handsomely bound in blue. Gilt Edges. 1s. 6d. each.

THE FAVOURITE PICTURE BOOK, designed to amuse and instruct the Young. With several Hundred Illustrations. Royal 4to. With elegant Cover. 3s. 6d.

FLOWERS FROM THE GARDEN OF KNOWLEDGE. Prince Arthur's Alphabet. With many Illustrations. 1s.

 W. C. & Co. have in Stock an extensive Assortment of Bagster's Polyglot Bibles; Church Services, &c., in plain and elegant bindings, richly mounted; together with a varied Selection of Books suited for Christmas Presents, and Premiums for Young People.

Just Published, Fcap. 8vo, neat cover, 1s.; in cloth, 1s. 6d.; in cloth, gilt edges, 2s. (Postage 6d. extra).

THE TALK OF THE ROAD:

Reprinted from the Catholic Layman.

Showing how the Irish People talk about Irish Doings, when they get a quiet Place at the back of a Ditch, or under a Hedge.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND CO., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH, Paternoster-row.

The Catholic Layman,

VOL. II.

WITH INDEX COMPLETE.

Neatly Bound in Cloth, Lettered, price 5s. 6d.

NEW WORKS IN THE PRESS.

I.

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, Catechetically Explained, Compared with Scripture, and Briefly Commented on, &c.; for the Use of Families and Sunday Schools. By the Rev. Charles Miller, A.B. With Recommendatory Preface by the Bishop of Meath. Fcap. 8vo.

[Immediately.]

II.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ELOCUTION;

Extracted from

"The Elements of Rhetoric."

By Archbishop Whately.

With some additions and alterations.

The present compilation from that known and justly celebrated work, "The Elements of Rhetoric," by Archbishop Whately, has been made with the kind permission of the author.

New matter has been introduced by the Archbishop, and the whole arranged, revised, and corrected under the personal inspection of his Grace.

That this little work may be of use in exhibiting and impressing some principles of elocution, and so aiding the student to express his thoughts "clearly, forcibly, and agreeably," after a simple and "natural" manner, has been the sincere desire and aim of the compiler, who also trusts the reader may be induced to gain a deeper insight into this important branch of Rhetoric, by a careful study of Archbishop Whately's entire work.

[Shortly.]

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.
December, 1853.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN,

VOL. III.

JANUARY TO DECEMBER,

1854.

DUBLIN:
PUBLISHED BY WILLIAM CURRY & CO.,
9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET.
LONDON: WERTHEIM AND MACINTOSH,
24, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

INDEX TO VOLUME III.

Page.

Absolution, three different views as to the conditions of its efficacy 139 if its efficacy depends on the amount of contrition in the receiver, can the priest ever tell whether it is effectual? 139 the form at present counted essential by the Church of Rome, was unknown for the first thousand years .. 140
Agreement of nations, is it a good note of the Church? .. 112
America, what becomes of the Roman Catholics who go there? 37, 146
Apocrypha, ancient testimonies about the 1 the Jews never blamed by our Lord or his Apostles for rejecting it 2 never quoted by our Lord or his Apostles 2 the Fathers of the first three centuries clear against it 2, 8, 29
Apocalypse foretells the prevalence of heresy in the Church .. 31
Apostles who survived Peter, were they subject to the Bishop of Rome? 135
Armagh, how the See was held by one family for over two hundred years 33, 45 list of the succession of legitimate bishops in that See .. 118
Assumption, Feast of the, its history 108
Athanasius, St., a work falsely ascribed to him, unscrupulously quoted by Bellarmine, Wiseman, &c. 84
Augustine, St., his opinion as to the Rock on which the Church is built 36, 52 thought that "perhaps" there was such a place as Purgatory 72 resists the claims of Papal supremacy 111 his notes of the Church examined 112
Authority, method of teaching by, used by Protestants .. 152

Baillie, his book on Theology, once a text book in Roman Catholic seminaries, but now put in the Index Prohibitorius 151
Ballintobber, landlord's letter to 106
Ballymanus, heir of 4, 19, 58
Baronius, Cardinal, his account of the frightful state of the Church in the middle ages 58
Bellarmine, Cardinal, his testimony to the degraded state of the Roman Catholic Church before the Reformation .. 57 his monstrous paradox that the Church is bound to believe vice to be virtue, should the Pope so ordain .. 62 his reason why so few cardinals are saints 68 uses in controversy as Athanasius's, a writing which he elsewhere proves to be spurious 84 his opinion as to the imprudence of putting confidence in indulgences 82 in treatises of Purgatory uses modern revelations as a head of proof 79
Benedictines of St. Maur, an account of their labours .. 91
Berengarius, discussion as to his orthodoxy 10
Bernard, St., was not up to the scientific way of settling a dispute 115 his opposition to the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, into the support of which he is, nevertheless, pressed by Roman Catholic divines 96, 97 his disgust at hearing how the Irish bishops of his time handed down their Sees from father to son .. 45, 146 contrasted with the praises given by the Irish annalists to the same people 146
Bengnot, a French Roman Catholic, traces the doctrines and practices of his Church to a Pagan origin 115
Bible, no perfect one for 300 years, according to Roman Catholic authorities 2 how it was expurgated by the Roman Index 48 is the difficulty of understanding it an argument against reading it? 106 not given to Roman Catholics because too easy to understand 107 Protestant, the accuracy of its translations discussed 12, 124 one of its alleged mis-translations was taken from Pope Sixtus V. 124 Binius, his opinion about the decretal epistles 3 about the orthodoxy of Liberius 10
Bishops, according to Pope Nicholas, not to be accused of anything except there were one dozen judges and six dozen witnesses 3 and that not even if they confessed their guilt themselves 18 are the people who have to stay longest in Purgatory .. 70
Roman Catholic, how far they are able to control their clergy 25, 73 serious gap in their succession in Ireland, according to Roman Catholic testimony 94
Bobola, St. Andrew, his beatification 67
Bonald, Cardinal, his condemnation of the imposture of La Salette 120
Boulogne controversy between Dr. Moeran and two Roman Catholics 122, 133, 150
Breviary, its origin 144 forgeries which it adopts 33
fables which it contains 118, 144

Cahill, Dr., accuses the Protestant Bible of mistranslation .. 12 how his charge recoils on the Douay Bible 12 would rather see his friends reading obscene books than the Protestant Bible 25 his arguments repudiated by the "Rambler," and other English Roman Catholic authorities 25, 73 Candles, the art of kissing one explained 6 what a blessed candle is good for 7 blessed candles not heard of in the Church for nine hundred years 7 tallow candles do not spoil a Mass 6, 19 what kind of light is better than candles 7
Canon of Scripture, by what authority it was fixed 29 that given by the Fathers of the first three centuries agrees with the canon of the Church of England 2
Canonization of saints, when first exercised by the Popes .. 67 on what kind of evidence it is performed 67
Card playing, how punished in Purgatory 70 is it a fit accomplishment for a saint? 70
Catholic, who has a right to the title 86 argument from the use of the name answered 112
Church, what is meant by it 99, 100, 109
Catholic Layman, extent of its circulation 133
Celibacy of the clergy, the rule inconsistent with Scripture .. 141 not the rule of the ancient Irish Church 28 nor of the primitive Church universal 41 the direct opposite to the rule of the Jewish Church .. 141 why the attempts to repeal this rule failed 44 the rule first introduced by heretics 141 at what age a vow of celibacy may be made 104 attempts made by Roman Catholic priests to remove the restriction of 140 practically mischievous effects of the rule 140 what are the reasons why the See of Rome insists on it .. 141 physical sufferings caused by the rule 141
Chess playing punished by the Inquisition 20
Church, in what its unity consists 109
Clement of Rome, doctrine of his genuine epistles as to the state of the dead 53
the epistle falsely ascribed to him contains statements which prove that even then Purgatory was not the belief of the Church 52
Clergy, old Irish, married, and handed down their benefices to their children 33, 144
Colgan, his puzzle to reconcile St. Bernard's horror at the Irish married clergy with the praises given to the same people by the Irish annalists 147
Collette, Mr., his letters on Tertullian and prayers for the dead 87, 151 on the Roman Catholic Rule of Faith 53 on the Protestant Bible 124 his controversy with the Abbé Miel 120
Communion in one kind, what was the practice of the ancient Church 55
Contrition, is it necessary in order to obtain forgiveness of sin, and is it sufficient? 139
Converts to Romanism, what troubles they have 80
Cooking of documents, specimens of the 62, 68, 85
Council of Nice, neither called by, nor presided over, nor confirmed by a Pope 2 this defect attempted to be supplied by forgery .. 2 attempt to pass off forged canons as Nicene .. 111, 133 Council of Trent, how they appointed a committee to revise Gratian's "Decretum," which left in all the forgeries .. 33 how they first approved of the Vulgate, and then proceeded to correct it 44
if their divines had been better acquainted with Greek and Hebrew, would they have adopted the Vulgate as the authentic Word of God? 43 how it was proposed there that the priests should not take money for the sacraments; but the majority of the council would not part with the "siller" 35
Creed, novelty of the Roman Catholic 145
Crucifix, ancient and well beloved at Rome, worship paid to it .. 15
Crusades, Bull of the, what privileges it gives 20
Cullen, Dr., his pastoral respecting the Immaculate Conception, and the Assumption 97 what language he permits himself to use respecting the Blessed Virgin 1, 97 his courageous assertion that the Immaculate Conception was always the belief of the Church .. 97, 130
Cyprian, St., refuses to submit to the authority of Pope Stephen on the subject of heretical baptism 110

Death-beds, Protestant and Roman Catholic contrasted 22, 59
what is directed to be done for a dying Roman Catholic's soul is best, a well-managed death-bed, or a well-spent life? 62
Decretal Epistles, articles on 2, 16, 32, 68
what is meant by one? 3
by whom were they forged? 3 were the Popes a party to the impostures? 3 they were the law of the Church for 630 years .. 32 are even quoted in the Decretals of Pope Gregory IX. .. 33 what doctrines they were intended to support .. 3
De Dominis, his reasons for resigning his archbishopric .. 94
Development, the doctrine opposed to the theory of tradition 70, 73 and to the claim of immutability 73
why the theory became necessary to the defence of the Church of Rome 103
Devoti, his opinion about the Decretal Epistles 3
Discipline, how exercised in the Churches of England and Rome 64 is its exercise essential to the being of a Church? .. 64
Duffy, Mr., his publication, "The Young Christian's Library," reviewed 56, 104
Mr. John, his letter on the Eucharist 60
" " on Purgatory 52

Enquirer's letter on "Our Lord God the Pope" 100
Epiphanius, St., condemns the worship of the Virgin Mary 71, 83 condemns the use of pictures in Churches 83 notices the silence of Scripture as to the death of the Virgin Mary 104 Error, when it will disappear from the Church 32 is the chance of it less in the Roman Catholic Church than in the Protestant? 88 Eucharist, opinion of Fathers respecting the 31 is it a sacrifice 142
what change takes place in it 143
Excommunication, how, in early times, worldly and ill-tempered bishops excommunicated each other, the Bishop of Rome not excepted 89

Faber, Mr., his book, "All for Jesus," reviewed .. 70, 72, 79
Faith, Dr. Newman's account of Roman Catholic faith, and what kind of fruit it bears 21
Fathers, did they believe in transubstantiation 61 what is meant by their unanimous consent 51 bear witness to the plainness of Scripture 73
Flowers for the months .. 12, 29, 41, 53, 65, 76, 89, 100, 112, 125, 137, 156
Fisher, Cardinal, his testimony as to the novelty of the doctrines of Purgatory and indulgences .. 56, 72
Forgeries used in controversy by Roman Catholic divines .. 84
Formosus, Pope, what became of his fingers 117
Frauds, pious, why practised, and with what success .. 143

Gallows, is it the surest road to heaven? 61
Gates of hell, what meant by the promise that they shall not prevail against the Church 126
Gelasius, Pope, denied transubstantiation 55 condemned communion in one kind 55
Gizzard, the story of the woman with the 49
God, what is the character ascribed to him in Roman Catholic religious books 106
Gratian, his quotations from the forged Papal Epistles .. 32 his "Decretum" received by the Council of Trent as the law of the Church, and yet the forgeries retained 33
Gratitude to God, what is the best way of shewing it, is it by making ourselves miserable? 145
Greek Church, the acknowledgment of their orders by the Church of Rome proves that the clergy are not always infallible guides 42
Gregory the Great, Pope, condemns solitary masses 54 disapproves of the worship of images 56 what he thought of one bishop setting himself up as universal bishop 56 the great authority for Purgatory, specimens of the stories he tells 72 confesses the novelty of his doctrines 72
Gregory Nazianzen, was one of the first who addressed dead saints, but only rhetorically, and without any faith that they could hear him 116
Grenoble, exposure there of the imposture of La Salette .. 121
Gunpowder, its use in religious worship 67

Heli Enoch, his letter on an alleged mistranslation in the Protestant Bible 12
Heresies of early times which have been adopted by the Church of Rome 83
Hierens, the name never applied to the Christian priesthood .. 142
Hindoos, resemblance between the practices of their saints and those of the Roman Catholics 105
Holy water, its original institution 17 history of the rite 119
Hypothetical prayer, a 65

Images, how the Church of Rome expurgated those verses in the Bible which forbid the making of them 48 what sect of heretics set the example which the Church of Rome has followed 83 Immaculate Conception, articles on history of the doctrine 97, 130, 147 long hesitation of the Church of Rome on this subject 73, 79 no foundation for it in Scripture 130 contradicted by Scripture and by the Fathers .. 130 not always the doctrine of the Church of Rome .. 147 not heard of for the first thousand years 147
Immutability, can the Church of Rome lay claim to it 93, 103
Index Expurgatorius and Prohibitorius 48
Indulgences, their late origin and abuse 56
what is meant by one 81
what is the best use to make of one 80
Bellarmine's opinion as to whether it is prudent to trust to one 81 for what length of time they are given 61
Infallibility not essential to the Church, else the Jewish Church would have had it 28, 73 the analogy of nature gives us no reason to suppose the Church would possess it 73 how the theory works in practice 10, 85 the Church of Rome does not act as if she believed her own claims to it 79 can it be proved without arguing in a circle .. 8, 122, 151 no security against heresy 31 did it prevent Pope Liberius and the Council of Rimini from making a heretical decision? 80 the claim based on forgery 16 there is no infallible decision where it is to be found .. 133 can the infallible guide distinguish between true and false revelations? 70 of the Pope, in matters of fact and of faith distinguished 148 if the Church is infallible, why did St. Paul predict an apostasy, and also warn the Church of Rome to fear lest she should be cut off? 100 from the nature of the case, cannot possibly be proved by Scripture 123
if conveyed to Peter, by the words "Thou art Peter," how was it that he afterwards denied our Lord? .. 134
Infidelity, the necessary result of the line of argument pursued by Roman Catholics 6, 7, 9 free discussion the best safeguard against it 7 in France, how originated 8
Intercessory prayer, how discouraged in the Church of Rome .. 80
Intolerance, how far is it the attribute of the Church of Rome .. 73 in France, its results 47
Investigator, his letter about Cardinal Bellarmine 62
Invocation of saints and angels, articles on .. 71, 84, 115 inconsistent with real devotion to God 68 condemned by early fathers and councils 71 first introduced as a rhetorical flourish 116 in what sense it is to be understood, according to the Council of Trent 73 whether this distinction is observed in practice .. 74 forgeries appealed to, in order to justify the practice .. 84

Page.

Jansenist controversy, some account of it 128
Jesuits, toleration practised towards them by the See of Rome.. 73
Jewish Church was God's Church and yet was fallible 28, 75, 88, 122, 152
John, Pope, his way of gaining a horse 144
Johnson, Mr., his opinions as to prayers for the dead .. 76
Joseph, glories of 49
when the worship to him was invented 49
Justin Martyr, discussion as to the correct translation of a passage cited from him in defence of the invocation of saints 84

Keenan, Mr., his attack on the character of the Reformers, how it can be retorted on himself 58 his controversial catechism 58, 71
Kildare Churchman, his letters on the Jewish Church 28, 88
Knowledge or ignorance, which is the safest? 23

Labbe and Cossart, on the decretal epistles 2 their account of Popes Stephen and Formosus, and of other popes of the tenth century 116
Landlord's letter to Ballintubber 106
Leo X., Pope, his dispute with Dioscorus, by whom he was excommunicated 69
Lepers, cure of the ten, compared by the Council of Trent with the effects of priestly absolution 139
Liberius, Pope, was he a heretic? 9, 27, 50
Lies, which side deals most in them? 57
the charge of falsehood brought against this paper, how to be met 85
Lord God, was this title given to the Pope? .. 82, 99

Mabillon, a sketch of his life 91
Manufactures of England, how they obtained a superiority over those of France 47
Marcellinus, Pope, fable of his trial before Council of Sinuessa .. 3 was he an apostate? 3, 57
if he was not, what was Pope Nicholas I.? 57
Marriage commanded to priests in the old dispensation—forbidden to priests in the Church of Rome 141
Mass, what will spoil one, and what will not .. 6, 11, 38
what is better than masses 37
Mediator, what mediators are there between God and man? .. 68
Miel, Abbé, his conversion and letters 119 his letter about the sincerity of the priests 151
Milner, his shamefully dishonest misrepresentation of the opinions of Bellarmine 62 his ignorant or dishonest use of spurious writings in controversy 84 his garbled mistranslation of Justin Martyr 85 his attempt to palliate the misconduct of the Popes of the tenth century 130 thought a bad man might make a very good Pope .. 130
Mission, what the priest's mission is like 96
Moeran, Dr., his controversy at Boulogne .. 122, 133, 150
Murray, Dr., of Maynooth, his lamentation on the "new theology" introduced into the Church of Rome by the Anglican converts 70

Nantes, consequence of revocation of edict of 46
Newman, Dr., his description of Romanism on the Continent .. 21 his account of capital executions in Roman Catholic countries 61 his statement that the death of a criminal is the happiest and the safest 61 his views received in Ireland as orthodox, but condemned by Roman Catholics in America 73 his theory of development considered .. 73, 103
Nice, Council of, neither called by, nor presided over, nor confirmed by a Pope 2 this defect attempted to be removed by forgery .. 2
Nicholas I., Pope, exerts his authority in procuring the reception of the forged decretal epistles 3
Nicholas II., Pope, his decision condemning Berengarius, can anybody say whether it was right or wrong? 10, 27
Nuns, how little girls are tempted to become 104 how nuns are tempted to become saints 105 of Port Royal, their history 127

O'Brennan, Mr., tempted to knock a man down for offering him a tract 24
O'Callaghan, Mr., sentences a tract distributer to fourteen days' imprisonment—how his decision was reversed .. 24
Orders, is it sacrilege to repeat them? If so, how is Pope Stephen VI. to be justified? 117

Pagan origin of many Roman Catholic doctrines and practices.. 115
Parents, obedience to, Romish teaching on this subject contrasted with our Lord's 105
Pasce oves 95
Patrick, St., his successors 118 were formerly not necessarily bishops of Armagh .. 149
Paul, St., his letters to Timothy and Titus gives no directions about sacrificing 142
Peter, St., the "unlearned and unstable" had the Scriptures in their hands in his time 63 had he jurisdiction over the other apostles 95 why is his wife the only holy person mentioned in the New Testament whom the Church of Rome has not made a saint of? 141 how his chains miraculously joined themselves together.. 144
Peter of Alcantara, St., his phosphoric powers 144
Philalethes, controversy with him about Berengarius .. 10
on the visible Church 26
Philip Neri, St., how his love to God broke his ribs... .. 144 how he could ascertain a person's chastity by the smell .. 144
Philomena, St., her life 56
Pius II., how he altered his opinions after he became Pope .. 44
Pius IX., worship offered by him to the ancient and well-beloved crucifix 15
Polycarp, St., refuses to submit to the authority of Pope Anicetus as to the celebration of Easter 110
Popes, supremacy of the, the claim founded on forgery .. 16 have been apostates and heretics, according to Roman Catholic historians 58 how they treated kings.. 17

Page.

Popes, two instances of the Pope's want of good nature .. 35 blasphemous titles and honours given him 82 what Pope Marcellus thought of a Pope's chance of getting to heaven.. 68 two thousand differences between two infallible Popes, Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. 44 of the tenth century, to what kind of interest many owed their election 129 can the Church get on with a madman for Pope? .. 117 can anybody give a list of the right Popes? 130
Port Royal, history of the nuns of 127
Power, Mr., his letters on Purgatory, &c. .. 63, 75, 135
Prayers offered in the Church of Rome (according to their own authorities) to persons who never existed 68 and even to damned spirits 68 for the dead do not imply a belief in Purgatory 76, 137 having no reference to Purgatory, are used, even now, in the Church of Rome 137 according to Tertullian, have no warrant in Scripture .. 86
the Church of England justified for abandoning the custom of 76 Priests, Roman Catholic, why they do not reply to our arguments 7 life of one 118, 130, 145 are they sincere? 151 conversion of one 119
in what sense can he forgive sins 139 only one true priest in the Christian dispensation .. 141
Priesthood, Christ's incommunicable 142
Processions, religious, in Spain 19
Purgatory does not rest on the evidence of Scripture .. 71 nor on that of tradition 72 but on that of asserted modern revelations 73 testimony of high Roman Catholic authorities to the novelty of the doctrine 56 a doctrine invented for the purpose of raising money .. 60
if the Pope can let souls out, why does he not do it without money being paid? 35
Roman Catholic priests have showed they did not believe in it 62 what is the average time souls have to stay there? .. 70 modern Romish additions to the Tridentine doctrine .. 79 can the souls there help themselves? 79 is it the blood of Christ or the fire which cleanses them? 118 which is it souls or bodies that go there? 118 what arrangement is made for the purgation of those who may be alive at the last day? 152 what kind of sufferings are endured there 152
a new discovery in Pope Gregory's time .. 72, 152

Rambler, The, its castigation of Dr. Cahill .. 25, 73
Reformers, were they bad men? 45
even if they were, would that prove the Reformation to be a bad thing? 45 Relics, true and false, how to discriminate 92 some account of some false ones 112, 141 how duplicates may be accounted for 141
Revelations, modern, received as governing belief by recent converts to Romanism 70 rejected by the old school of Roman Catholics .. 70 are the authority on which the belief in Purgatory has been established 72
Rich, what advantages they have over the poor in the next world, if Romanism be true 35, 60
Rivers, how saints cross them.. 141
Rock of the Church, what is it? 35
what did the Fathers think it was? 36, 52
Rockets, their use in making conversions 49
Rome, is she the mother and mistress of all Churches 110, 124, 145 effects of a residence there on a sincere Roman Catholic 120 modern worship in 15, 67, 81
Church of, has altered her faith in our own day 67, 79, 119, 147
Romanism, a compromise between Christianity and Paganism 116
Roman Catholic, letters from a 10, 100, 135 what subjects our Roman Catholic correspondents shrink from discussing 38
Rose of Lima, her life 104
Rourke, Mr., his letters on Infallibility 39, 63, 74, 87, 98, 111, 124, 152
Rule of faith, no certainty on this subject in the Church of Rome 79, 104 the new rule maintained by the Oxford converts to Romanism quite inconsistent with that of the Council of Trent 70

Sacrament, what necessary to the making of a true one, according to the Missal 10 when the number seven was first assigned to them .. 56 what sacrament confers grace, and destroys personal holiness? 143
Sacrifice, what is the only, in the Christian dispensation 143, 145
Safe way, the 113
Saints, on what kind of evidence one is made 67 who was the first Pope who canonized one 67 rough estimate of their numbers 67 how they hear the prayers offered to them 68 the Church in the fourth century had no belief that they could hear our prayers 116 how easy it was to get the title formerly, compared with the present time 104 ought everybody to be a saint 105 what the world would be like if every one were .. 106
Salette, the apparition of 120 its general reception by Roman Catholics 120
Schism, can the Church of England and Ireland be charged with it? 135
Scripture, does the Church of Rome encourage the reading of it? 11 practical proof how the reading of is encouraged at Rome 21 rule of the Index on this subject 11
Sebastian, St., remarkable for having four bodies 141
Self-torture, in what cases is it a virtue? 105
Sin, how is it to be got rid of? 59 do Roman Catholics believe themselves in their own method of getting rid of it? 59
Sinuessa, Council of, its forged decree that the Pope should be judged by nobody 3
Spain, how the Church property there was seized on by Roman Catholics 20
Spalatro, Archbishop of, his reasons for resigning his See .. 94
Stanislaus, St., how he could produce a dead man as a witness.. 144 how his body miraculously joined itself together .. 144

Page.

Stephen I., Pope, how his attempt to excommunicate Cyprian was received by the Church 110
Stephen VI., Pope, his infamous character 116 yet he was acknowledged as a legitimate Pope .. 117
Sucession, what constitutes it in a Church 26 failure in the succession of Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland 94 is it a sure note of the Church? 112 history of the, in the See of Armagh 118
Supremacy of the Pope, how it may be proved 151
Sure title, the 132

Talk of the Road 6, 22, 37, 49, 95, 118, 146
Tertullian calls the Eucharist a figure of the Lord's Body .. 51 his testimony as to prayers for the dead discussed .. 87 is he a good witness for Purgatory? 135 from whom he learned his notions about Purgatory .. 52
Tetzel, specimen of the indulgences sold by him, and of the language in which he described their virtues 82
Theodosia, St., her history 92
Thorndike cited by Roman Catholics as a witness for Purgatory 64, 76
Toleration, the duty of Christians 50
Tradition, does the Church of Rome believe on its authority any doctrine not contained in Scripture? 53 from what sect of heretics has the Church of Rome borrowed her doctrines on this subject? 83 the Tridentine theory of tradition irreconcileable with the doctrine of development 93
Transubstantiation considered 145
Trinity on earth 49
Truth, indifference to it among recent converts to Romanism .. 80

Unction, Extreme, not given to criminals about to be executed 61 therefore not considered necessary for immediate admission to heaven 61
Unity, true and false 49
how true unity is to be effected 50
Universality of the Church explained 112
Ursula, St., and the 11,000 virgins 112

Variations of Romanism 67, 79, 119
Vatablus, how his Bible was expurgated by the Index .. 48
Vergil, Polydore, his testimony to the novelty of the doctrine of Purgatory 56
Viator, his letter about the 11,000 virgins 112
Victor, Pope, excommunicated the Asiatic bishops who differed with him as to the time of the celebration of Easter, but his conduct was disapproved by the Church .. 110
Vincent de Paul, St., his success at card-playing 70
Vincent Ferrar, St., how he helped the lying-in lady .. 20
Virgin Mary, added as a fourth person to the Trinity by high Roman Catholic authorities 1, 20
Divine attributes ascribed to her by Dr. Cullen .. 1, 97 what sect of heretics introduced the worship of her into Christianity 83 her worship adopted by Christians in the fifth century, with the view of attracting Pagans to Christianity .. 116 is she Queen of Purgatory? 79 the reproof given her by our Lord 124 history of the feast of her assumption 108 where and how did she die 108
Virginity, vows of, at what age they are considered valid in the Church of Rome 57, 104
Visibility of the Church does not necessarily imply absolute purity 31
Vulgate, its history 43 reasons why it was recognised as infallible by the Council of Trent 43

Wicked men sometimes employed as instruments by God .. 58
Wimar, did he murder his three sons? 50
if he did not, who invented the lie? 50
Wine, can it be made from unripe grapes? 38
Wiseman, Cardinal, his opinion as to the propriety of using infidel arguments against Protestants 6 on reading the Scriptures 11 his visit to Rome, and what he brought back .. 81 endeavours to justify prayers to the Virgin by a passage ascribed to Athanasius, which is universally admitted to be spurious 84 his sermon about St. Theudosia.. 92 his proof of Purgatory 152
Wise old man, who he was 115
Worship paid to wooden crucifix at Rome 15 divine, offered in Church of Rome to what they cannot be sure is God 39 modern, in Rome 15, 67, 81

INDEX TO PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE

THE MEANING OF WHICH IS DISCUSSED IN CATHOLIC LAYMAN, VOL. III.

Isaiah liv. 10 ..	26, 87	Rom. xvi. 17 ..	27
Matthew vii. 13, 14 ..	112	1 Cor. iii 13 ..	72, 76
xvi. 18 ..	35, 52, 125	xi. 27 ..	124
xxvi. 26 ..	12	xii. 28 ..	135
xxviii. 19, 20 ..	27	Gal. i. 8 ..	88
John ii. 4. ..	124	iii. 22 ..	130
vi. 54 ..	75	Ephes. iv. 2 ..	63
xiv. 16 ..	27	v. 29 ..	89
xv. 26 ..	39	v. 32 ..	124
xvi. 13 ..	27	2 Thess. ii. 4 ..	82
Acts ii. 47 ..	63	1 Tim. iii. 15 ..	20
viii. 14 ..	134	Titus iii. 10 ..	27
xv. 28 ..	39	Heb. xi. 6 ..	75
xx. 26 ..	134	xiii. 17 ..	27, 41
Rom. v. 12 ..	130	Apoc. iii. 14 ..	100

ERRATA.

Page 22, column 1, line 43, for "never" read "really."

Page 125, column 2, line 2, for "reach" read "crush."

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Glaip do Dhia añ ṁa háṫoṁh, agur ṁíoṁéain air an dtalaṁ deagḋoil do na dáoiṁh.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 25. JANUARY, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 2s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The Immaculate Conception—Dr. Cullen's Pastoral	1
Ancient Testimonies about the Apocrypha	1
The Forged Decretal Epistles No. II.	2
The Heir of Lally manus—No. I.	4
Talk of the Road—No. XX.	6
Free Discussion the best safeguard against Infidelity	7
CORRESPONDENCE—
Was Pope Liberius a Heretic?—by a Roman Catholic—Postscript to Philalethes	9
On defects in the Mass—by A Catholic	10
Does the Church of Rome encourage the Holy Scriptures?	11
Dr. Cahill's attack on the Protestant Bible—by Enoch Hell	11
The Garden—Flowers for January	12
Farming Operations for January	13

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION—DOCTOR CULLEN'S PASTORAL.

THE above long agitated question is not yet settled. But everything seems to indicate that it will be decided in the affirmative, and possibly soon.* Till then Roman Catholics are at liberty to discuss it.† But when once affirmed by the decree of the infallible judge, then, according to their doctrine, they can no longer deny, or even doubt it, without incurring the guilt of mortal sin. We sincerely believe that many pious and enlightened lay members of their communion intuitively shrink from the affirmative view.

We have already invited them to examine it in its full extent, and to declare their sentiments before it be too late—before their lips be closed for ever—before they be doomed, either to stifle the suggestions of conscience, or to be decried as heretics.

We again earnestly direct their attention to the same inquiry. And we now propose to set before them some of the inevitable consequences of an affirmative decision. For this purpose we shall quote the language lately used by two of their own prelates.

Dr. Cullen, in his late pastoral, ordering "A Novena," in preparation for the festival of the "Immaculate Conception," publishes the following as his view on the subject:—

"As we are about to solemnize that which, among the Festivals of the Virgin, is the first in order, and which presents her to us, in a special manner, as the immaculate and spotless spouse of the MOST HIGH, with whose perfection sin is incompatible, it becomes her clients to remove from their hearts every trace of guilt, every affection to sin." . . . "This tender mother, destined to co-operate in the great work of our redemption, will listen to the cry which her children send forth from this valley of tears. She is waiting to be intrusted with their petitions. Let us, then, fly to her with confidence, reminding her, with St. Bernard, that it has never yet been heard, that any one who had recourse to her protection, invoked her aid, implored her intercession, was left by her unpitied and forsaken. The refuge of sinners, and the comfort of the afflicted, will have compassion on her children, will plead powerfully for their pardon, and infallibly procure for them, if they be faithful to her, the rich treasures of Divine grace."

In the foregoing there is imputed to a mortal woman "a perfection with which sin is incompatible," a perfection befitting "the immaculate and spotless spouse of the MOST HIGH"—that is, nothing less than perfect holiness.

Perfect holiness cannot be ascribed to any created being. For "He putteth no trust in his saints, yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight." . . "He putteth no trust in his servants, and his angels he chargeth with folly."‡

According to the Scriptures, perfect holiness belongs only to the Sacred Trinity.

I. The Father is the "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty."§ He is "the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy."† "Holy and reverend is his name."‡ "There is none holy as God."§ "Thou only art holy."‖ This is assigned as a reason why all should worship him. "Exalt the Lord our God, and worship at his holy hill, for the Lord our God is holy."¶ "Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy (μόνος ὅσιος) for all nations shall come and worship before thee."

II. The Son is styled "The Holy One and the Just,"†† and of him it is said—"He that is holy, He that is true."‡‡

III. Of the Spirit it is only necessary to remark, that his especial title is "The Holy Ghost."

Hence, it is manifest, that to represent the Virgin Mary as possessed of "sinless perfection," as "immaculate and spotless," is to raise her to a level with the Trinity, and to entitle her to share their worship and glory.

Thus, in the passages quoted above, she is represented as "co-operating in the great work of our redemption;" as "listening to the cry which her children send forth from this valley of tears," and waiting to be intrusted with their petitions.

Nor is this propounded as a mere theory. Its practical consequences are enforced. We "are to fly to her, since it has never yet been heard that any one who had recourse to her protection was left by her unpitied and forsaken." She, "the refuge of sinners and the comfort of the afflicted, will have compassion on her children, will plead powerfully for their pardon, and infallibly procure for them, if they be faithful to her, the rich treasures of Divine grace."

And as the Apostle forewarns those who draw nigh unto God that, "it is written, be ye holy, for I am holy," so Dr. Cullen tells the "clients" of the immaculate and spotless spouse of the Most High," that in solemnizing her festival it becomes them "to remove from their hearts every trace of guilt, every affection to sin."

Lastly, Dr. Cullen tells us, that she "infallibly procures" for those that are faithful to her "the rich treasures of Divine grace."

The Archbishop of Freiburg has lately taken up the cause of the Pope against his Sovereign, and thus embroiled himself and his hierarchy in political difficulties and sufferings. He calls on both clergy and laity to join in prayers for succour in his distress.

"Unite yourselves, then, to us in prayer—in an incessant prayer for the Church, which suffers among us—in prayer to Almighty God, to the Father, who directs the hearts of the mighty like rivers of water—in prayer to the Eternal Son, who acts victoriously as the invisible chief of his Church—in prayer to the Holy Ghost, who is given as the consoler to the Church unto the end of ages—in prayer to the Holy Virgin, the good mother of Divine graces, who rejects none of those who implore her intercession in this valley of tears."

Here the faithful are ordered to pray to the Father, the Son, the Spirit, and the Virgin; nor is the slightest difference suggested as to the manner of praying to the different persons of this new Quaternity. The objects of supplication are, indeed, different; as they might be also, when the different persons of the Trinity are separately addressed. But the mode of addressing them, or, in other words, the worship offered, is the same to all.

Lastly, the Archbishop, as well as Dr. Cullen, ascribes to the Virgin an important office of the Holy Ghost, when he styles her "the good mother of Divine graces."

Taking the announcements of both prelates as a sample of what is to be expected, when the doctrine of the "Immaculate Conception" shall be added to the creed of the Romish communion, the Virgin will be constituted the spotless spouse of the First Person of the Trinity, the Immaculate Mother of the Second, and the Infallible Dispenser of the Graces of the Third. What is this but to incorporate her with the Sacred Trinity—to identify her with Deity?!!! But can the decree of a poor mortal accomplish this? Or rather, must it not bring down vengeance on those who, in this age of Scriptural knowledge, shall dare thus to tamper with the attributes of Deity?

Will enlightened Roman Catholics, then, remain passive, while priests and prelates are actively preparing the uneducated masses to acquiesce in the perpetration of this fatal crime? Will they wait till they must either break communion with their Church, or share in her guilt and condemnation? Would it not be wiser to save both themselves and her, or, at least, to endeavour to do so, by raising a manly and Christian protest against the affirmation of this long disputed doctrine?

ANCIENT TESTIMONIES ABOUT THE APOCRYPHA.

WE promised in our number, for November 1852, p. 126, column 2, to produce the evidence which all ages of the Church have left us, as to whether the six Apocryphal Books are really Scripture inspired by God. It was our first intention to give, on the one side the evidence against those books being Scripture, and on the other side what is produced as the evidence in favour of them; but, on consideration, we have resolved not to do so: for this reason; the evidence produced to prove that those books are really given by inspiration of God is so trifling, so utterly weak, that if we were to put it alongside of the evidence against those books, our readers might be tempted to think that we were not acting fairly; that we were purposely stating one side as strong as we could, and the other side as weak as we could. We, therefore, think it much better that the evidence in favour of those books should be stated by some Roman Catholic priest or layman, in our pages. Our readers will then be sure that each side is stated as strongly as it can be stated, and will be able to judge between them. We shall, therefore, give the evidence against those books being inspired, and we offer our pages to any Roman Catholic priest or layman, to state whatever evidence they can produce from the early ages of the Church in favour of the inspiration of those books.

I. The age of the Jews.

For this there is no witness equal to Josephus, himself a learned Jewish historian. And his testimony is this:—"We have only twenty-two books, containing the history of all time, which are deservedly believed in as divine: of these, five are the books of Moses, which contain both the laws and the account of the creation of man, up to his own death.....From the death of Moses to the time of Artaxerxes, who was king of the Persians after Xerxes, the prophets after Moses wrote the things done in their time, in thirteen books. The remaining four contain hymns to God, and precepts for the life of man. But from the time of Artaxerxes to our own time several have been written; but they were not worthy of like faith with those that went before, because there was not A certain succession of prophets. It is manifest, in fact, how we reverence our writings; for, such an age having already passed, neither any one has dared to add, nor to take away, nor to change. It is, as it were, implanted in all Jews from their birth to believe in these as the oracles of God....." (quoted in Eusebius Eccl. Hist., Book III., ch. 10).

It is clear from this that the twenty-two books ONLY were the object of faith; that these only were esteemed by the Jews as the oracles of God; that the other books written after the time of Artaxerxes were not counted by the Jews as inspired.

These twenty-two books were the Old Testament, as it is in the Protestant Bible. The six apocryphal books in the Roman Catholic Bible were among those books written after the time of Artaxerxes. We need not dwell on this, as it is confessed on all sides. But we point attention to the real question, which is this—Those six books which were not counted inspired Scripture or the oracles of God by the Jews, up to the time of our Lord's coming—were those same books declared to be inspired Scripture by Christ and his Apostles?

II. The times of Christ and his Apostles.

We have some plain facts here.

1. Neither Christ nor his Apostles ever reproved the Jews for rejecting the apocryphal books out of their canon of Scripture; which they surely would have done, if those books had been given by divine inspiration.

---

* The Head of the Roman Catholic Church has already declared himself in favour of the doctrine. See the letter of Pius IX. to all the bishops in communion with the See of Rome, given at Cajeta, Feb. 2, 1849.—CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. I., p. 5.

† Ibid. See also page 20. ‡ Job xv. 15—iv. 18.

§ Isaiah vi. 3—Revs. iv. 8. † Isaiah lvii. 15. ‡ Ps. cxi. 9.
‖ 1 Sam. ii. 2. ¶ Revs. xv. 4. ¶ Ps. xcix. 9.  Revs. xv. 4.
†† Acts iii. 14. ‡‡ Revs. iii. 7.

2. Neither Christ nor his Apostles ever quoted those books for Scripture, as they have done the other Scriptures of the Jews.

3. Christ himself, speaking to his Apostles, did expressly confirm and approve of the Jewish canon of Scripture, as the full and complete testimony of inspiration to himself. For after his resurrection he spoke thus to his Apostles—"These are the words which I spoke unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me."—Luke, ch. xxiv., v. 44, Douay Bible.

In these words it is evident that our Saviour referred to the Jewish Scriptures, as divided into the three parts mentioned by Josephus—1st, the Books of Moses; 2nd, the Prophets; 3rd, the Book of Psalms; which was the popular name among the Jews for the third division, though containing four books, because the Book of Psalms stood at the head of it, and so gave name to the four that were joined in that part.

It is confessed, on all sides, that the six apocryphal books were not among the Scriptures which our Lord thus spoke of.

The words of our Lord in that place are thus expounded by St. Augustine himself; when speaking of the Book of Maccabees, he says—"This writing, which is called Maccabees, the Jews do not hold, as they hold the Law, and the Prophets and the Psalms. to which the Lord gives testimony as being his witnesses."—August. lib. 2 contra Gaud. c. 23. And, again—"They demonstrate their Church in the precepts of the law, in the predictions of the Prophets, in the songs of the Psalms, that is, in all the canonical authorities of the sacred books."—Augnst. de unitate eccl. c. 16.

So we have the testimony of our Saviour himself to the completeness of the Jewish canon of Scripture, and, therefore, of the Protestant Bible.

III.—The times of the Futhers.

Century II.—St. John, the last of the Apostles, died about the year 96. He is said by some to have left a complete canon of Scripture to the Church before he died, but that list is not recorded by those who have said so.

The first information we have on the subject is from Melito, Bishop of Sardis, about the year 160. Sardis was one of those seven Churches over which St. John presided, and to which he wrote the Epistles given in the second and third chapters of Apocalypse, or Revelation.

Eusebius, in his history, has inserted a letter from this Melito to one Onesimus, which is as follows—"Since you have desired accurately to know the books of the Old Testament, how many, and in what order they were written, I have laboured with all diligence to fulfil that . . . . therefore when I was in the East, and came to the place itself in which these things were formerly preached and done, I learned diligently the books of the Old Testament, and I send you a list of them subjoined beneath: these are the names—five books of Moses, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy; Joshua, son of Nun; Judges; Ruth; four books of Kings;* two of Paralipomena;† the Psalms of David; the Proverbs of Solomon, which is also called Wisdom; Ecclesiastes: the Song of Songs; Job; the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah; the twelve prophets in one Book; Daniel, Ezekiel, Ezra."—Eusebius Ecc. Hist., lib. iv., c. 26. In this last Book of Ezra, the Fathers commonly included the Book of Nehemiah, as the two are on the same subject; as Lamentations was added to Jeremiah. So here, in the earliest list left us by the Fathers, we have precisely the list of the Protestant Bible now; and we find in it none of the six apocryphal books which the Church of Rome has added to the Bible.

Justin Martyr wrote about the same time, or a little later—viz., about the year 164. He has left us no list of Canonical Books; but we have something from him, inasmuch as he never quotes any of the apocryphal books, nor makes any mention of them; and while accusing the Jews, against whom he wrote, of many other things, and even of altering or leaving out some verses of Scripture, he never accuses them of rejecting any whole books of Scripture.

Century III.

Origen held some errors which we do not follow; but, of the early Christians he was the most learned in the Scriptures; and he is a good witness as to the fact what books were counted Scripture in his day; for of all the charges brought against him, none was of mutilating the Bible. He says—"It should be known that the books of the Old Testament are twenty-two, as the Hebrews (the Jews) have delivered;" and then follows the exact list of books in the Protestant Bible. He makes no mention of Judith, Tobit, Ecclesiasticus, or Wisdom; but he says—"the Maccabees are outside of these."—Quoted in Eusebius, book vi. ch 25. Melchior Canus, a learned Roman Catholic bishop, confesses—"Origen, with the Hebrews, rejects these six books from the canon—Loc. com. lib. 2, c. 10 & 11.

Julius Africanus lived about the same time. We have nothing written by him except a letter to Origen,‡ all his other works having been lost. In that letter he undertakes to prove that the story of Susannah is a fable. In that we think he went too far; but it is clear proof that he did not consider it to be the inspired Word of God. But this story (besides the six books) is now in the Roman Catholic Bible, being added to the Book of Daniel.

Tertullian lived about the beginning of this century. He says, alluding to Apocalypse or Revelations, c. iv, v. 8, "The number of the wings signifies that the ancient books were those well-known four-and-twenty." (Cont. Marcion, book 4, c. 7). Where we should note that St. Jerome has explained that those Fathers who counted twenty-four books, have not really made the Scripture greater, but only counted Ruth and Lamentations as separate books, instead of joining them on to Judges and Jeremiah—(Jerome in Prologo Galeato).

These are the testimonies that we have found on this subject in the first three centuries of the Church. In all those centuries we find no trace of any Christian having ever dreamed of reckoning the six Apocryphal Books, now in the Roman Catholic Bibles, a part of God's inspired Word to man. If any proof in favour of those books can be found in those three centuries, we call on all Roman Catholic priests and laymen, who may know of it, to produce it in our pages. If none such should be produced, it will be clear to our readers that no such proof exists.

Now, we ask our readers to consider, is it likely that our Lord and his Apostles should have left the Church in such gross ignorance, that no bishop, priest, or layman in it, for 300 years, should seem to have had any notion of a complete list of the books of Scripture; but, that all who have left us lists should have given us incomplete and imperfect lists?

And, if there was no perfect Bible in those 300 years, how did the Church of Rome come by it in later times?

We will continue this evidence, century by century, until, we trust, our readers will be satisfied on the subject.

* Two of them are called the Books of Samuel in the Protestant Bible.

† Called Chronicles in the Protestant Bible.

‡ In the works of Origen, vol. ii.

DECRETAL EPISTLES.

No. II.

SHOWING HOW THEY CAME TO BE BELIEVED, AND HOW THEY WERE USED.

We proceed now to show how it was brought to pass that the Church was imposed upon by the forged epistles, pretended to have been written by the early Popes; and to what extent the Church was really imposed on by them.

We must first say a little more of the extent to which this system of forgery was carried. In our last number, we gave the list of forged and genuine Epistles, down to the year 400.* We cannot continue the list further in the same form, because the documents, both genuine and forged, get too numerous to be so dealt with in our pages. Those who examine the Bibliotheca Floriacensis, and other such collections, may have some idea of the vast extent of this system of forgery. Almost every collection that we examine brings to light new instances, and leads to the conclusion that almost every abbey and monastery adopted the system, and forged for itself whatever charters, or privileges, or confirmations it desired to possess. Along with this was a system, perhaps not less extensive, of altering and "cooking" genuine documents, to make them support whatever the forgers wished; but of this we shall treat separately hereafter.

With respect to these forgeries, it is impossible to deal with all of them together. We take for our present subject the collection published in the 9th century, under the name of "Isidore Mercator," noticing others only when produced by Popes of the 9th century.

This collection contained nearly all the forged Epistles which are given in the list in our last number. It contains, also, some forged Epistles of Popes who lived after the year 400, up to the time of Pope Gregory the Great, about the year 700: and also many councils, mostly genuine, but some doubtful, or forged.

Accounts vary a little about the publication of this collection. Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, in the middle of the 9th century, states that they were first published by Rieulphus, Bishop of Metz, who got them out of Spain, in the beginning of that century. Benedict, a Deacon of the Church of Metz, appears to have published them about the year 836, by order of Autgarius, who succeeded Riculphus as bishop. The name of "Isidore" seems to have been given to the collection in hopes that it might pass for the work of Isidore, a famous Bishop of Seville, in Spain, in the 7th century; but it is now confessed by all that the collection is none of his.†

* We fell into an error in that table in setting down no Epistles to Pope Sylvester, who stands No. 34 in the list. We were led into this error by Labbe and Cossart not having placed this Pope's Epistle under his name, as he does with all the others. But there is among the records of the Council of Nice, as given by them, a letter from that council asking the Pope to confirm their proceedings, and a letter from Pope Sylvester agreeing to do so.—Labbe and Cossart, vol. ii., p. 58. There is also a Roman Council under Sylvester (111rd), in which he confirms what was done at Nice (page 410). These three documents are all forgeries. The forgers evidently felt that it was a fatal defect in their system, that the Pope should neither have called, nor presided in, nor confirmed, the first and greatest of the General Councils; and they thus tried to supply that defect.

That the letters are forged, see Labbe and Cossart, marginal note.

That the Council is a forgery, see the learned Benedictine monk, Coustant, "Epistolæ Rom. Pontif.," appendix, p. 55.

Coustant also pronounces the letters forged, page 51; and he gives another forged letter of Sylvester (page 37) from the Bibliotheca Floriacensis.

† For this account see Du Pin, Eccl. Writers, vol. I., p. 583. Ed. Dublin, 1723. See also Labbe and Cossart, vol. I., p. 79 and 80.

Now for the use that was made of this collection, and the countenance that was given to it.

On this subject we find two opposite statements by Roman Catholic writers.

1st. That of Devoti, Archbishop of Carthage, and secretary to Pope Pius VII., who complains, "There is no one who does not know what triumphs the heretics make about these Decretals, and what a crop and material is thence taken for crafty and malicious calumny against the Apostolic See, as if she herself (Rome) had some part in the fraud of Isidore, and studied to overthrow the ancient discipline, and enlarge her own authority by his inventions."* He then states that all Catholic writers, except a few, had, of their own accord, and willingly, confessed that all that rested on the authority of Isidore alone were forged, and he goes on to say, that these Catholic writers also "show that no authority was interposed, no zeal shown, no care nor solicitude by the Roman Pontiffs, in publishing them; but that the whole thing was done, they being ignorant of it, and not thinking about it."†

The other account we take from the learned Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, who made the famous collection of the councils; which statement they profess to adopt from the work "De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii," written by Peter De Marca, the Archbishop of Paris, whom they justly pronounce "the most learned of all the students of the Papal law;" and this account is as follows:—

"To the ancient law, confirmed by the consent of the universal Church, there succeeded a new law, which began to be published from the year 836: and Nicolas I. and the other Roman pontiffs, earnestly exerting themselves, by degrees it prevailed by use through the provinces of the west. That law is comprehended in the collection of Isidore."‡

Here it will be seen that an Archbishop of Paris, and two distinguished Jesuits, have made that very statement, which Devoti is angry with "the heretics" for making; they expressly affirm what Devoti denies, that the Popes did make use of the forgeries, and that it amounted to thrusting out the ancient law of the Church, and introducing a new one.

It may surprise some that the Jesuits, who have ever been the greatest supporters of Rome, should have made such an avowal; it does not surprise us. The Jesuits are wise master-builders: when the house is built, they take down the scaffolding, lest it should rot, and grow unsightly, and perhaps even involve the house itself in its own decay. In the same page to which we have referred, the Jesuits express their astonishment that Archbishop Binius, of Cologne, and Turrianus (another Jesuit), and other most learned men, "could have approved of those Decretal Epistles, in such a light of ecclesiastical learning." They do not express any wonder that those very learned men should have approved of what they must have known to be forgeries; but, that they should have done it when the world could see through it, was to them astonishing. In such a light of knowledge, Jesuitical wisdom itself suggested the candid avowal of the forgery.

Had those, who thus fully avowed the forgery, gone on to renounce all doctrines and practices which were established by those forgeries, and which had no other foundation, we should have no more to wish for, and these papers would never have been written; but, while the house stands, we must show with what scaffolding it was built, and on what foundation it rests. We shall have to show hereafter how many of the things, about which Roman Catholics and Protestants are now disputing, have their origin and foundation in the forged epistles. But our present business is with the question, which statement is the true one, that of Devoti, or that of Labbe and Cossart.

When Roman Catholics see what opposite statements are made by their own greatest writers, some saying that the Popes and the Church of Rome had nothing to do with establishing these forgeries; others saying expressly that it was the Popes themselves that accomplished it by their own efforts; and when they see even archbishops of their own Church ranged on opposite sides of this question, which so deeply affects the very foundation of the Roman system, and the laws of the Roman Church, they must needs be anxious to know which is right: is the Roman system really founded on the Word of God that cannot lie? or was it introduced in ages of ignorance by the help of forgeries, only worthy of the father of lies?

This seems to us to be the real import of the question, which of those statements is true.

We have no hesitation in saying that the statement of

* Nemo ignorat, quot de his decretalibus hæretici triumphos agant, quanta exiode seges, ac materia sumatur callidæ et malitiosæ calumniæ contra Sedem Apostolicam, quasi ipsa in fraude Isidori partes aliquas habuerit, ejusque inventis antiquam disciplinam evertere, suamque auctoritatem amplificare studuerit.—Jus Canonicum, preface, p. iv. and v., first published at Rome, 1804, and republished at Rome, 1837. We quote from the latter.

† Nullam a Romanis Pontificibus in iis evulgandis interpositam fuisse auctoritatem, nullum adhibitum studium, nullam curam, et solicitudinem, imo rem totam gestam fuisse, iis ignaris, nec opinantibus. . . p. v.

‡ Antiquo juri universalis ecclesiæ assensu roborato, successit jus novum, quod ab anno 836, publicari cœpit: et adnitente Nicolao I. et cæteris Romanis pontificibus paulatim usu invalnit per occidentis provincias. Jus illud comprehensum est collectione Isidori. . . . . ." Labbe and Coss., Con. Gen. vol. i. col. 78, ed. Paris, 1672. The italics are their own.

the Archbishop of Paris, and the Jesuits Labbe and Cossart is strictly true; that as soon as those forged epistles were published, the Popes of the ninth century set to work with their utmost efforts to have those forgeries believed and accepted as genuine laws of the Church, and that they succeeded in imposing them as law on the Western or European Church; and that this was the origin, this THE CHARTER OF THE PAPACY.

It is in no careless or reckless spirit that we make this assertion. With great labour and pains we have carefully read through and noted all the papal epistles, true and false, of the first nine centuries, about 2,000 in number. We were sincerely prepared to learn the truth on this great question, on which ever side it might lie; and we are now prepared to prove the truth to our readers.

Before we submit to them that proof, we must ask them to understand what is meant by a "Decretal Epistle." It means more than an "Epistle." It means an epistle which is also a "decree." The great principle which the forgeries relied upon establishing was this; that every bishop in the Church of God should act according to the Pope's decisions; that whenever a question arose not already decided by the Pope, the bishop who had to decide it should write to the Pope for his decision; and that every other bishop should act on that decision. Hence, every such letter of the Pope was to be a law or decree to the Universal Church, whence it was called a "Decretal Epistle."

We have now to show what use the Popes of the 9th century made of the forged decretal epistles.

Let us first call to our readers' recollection the contents of the forgeries, as stated by their last great advocate, Severinus Binius, Archbishop of Cologne.*

1. The primacy of Peter (and his successors).
2. The dominion of the Roman Church.
3. The ordination of bishops.
4. That priests (or bishops) are not to be accused.
5. About appeals to the apostolic see.

The question now is, did the Popes of the ninth century make use of the forgeries of Isidore to establish these things?

In answering this question we shall observe this order:—

1st. To give the places in which the Popes of the 9th century appealed by name to these forgeries to establish their claims.

2nd. The places in which they insist on the forgeries being received as a whole.

3rd. The places in which they adopt the doctrines and objects of the forgeries without naming them.

4th. How these forged letters were kept up as the law of the Church in after times.

The first two only can be considered in this paper.

We take now the 8th Epistle of Pope Nicolas I., written about the year 865, to the Greek Emperor Michael.

The case it was written about was this: Ignatius, Archbishop of Constantinople, had been accused of crimes, and had been tried and deposed by a Council at Constantinople. This method of proceeding was according to the ancient law of the Church.

Pope Nicolas then wrote this letter to the Emperor, to say that an archbishop could only be tried and judged by the Pope; that was the new law, as laid down by the forgeries of Isidore. Here, then, we find the Pope thrusting out the old law of the Church to bring in the new one.

Let us see now what his proofs were.

"If it further please you to know anything of this, which may allure you, order that the words of the ancient father and venerable doctor, Dionysius the Areopagite, to Demophilus, should be recited to you; who decreed that it was a wicked thing that a priest, offending even in a matter of religion, should be judged by those who were less than him, or inferior to him, lest anything out of order should be done in the Church of God, and its state should be confounded in anything. But hitherto we have shortly proved that our brother and co-minister, Ignatius, ought not to be judged by his suffragans and subjects, nor, moreover, to be easily reproved. But, now, it will not be irksome to us, nor will it be impossible to us, to show you, BY DIVINE INSPIRATION (if, however, you be willing to hear), that none can be rightly subject to judicial decisions by those who are of inferior degree or order. Since in the time of Diocletian and Maximinian the Emperors, Marcellinus, Bishop of the city of Rome, who afterwards became a distinguished martyr, was so far compelled by the Pagans that, having gone into their temples, he placed incense on the fire,† on account of which thing, a council of many bishops having been collected, and inquiry made, the Pontiff confessed that he had done this thing. None of them, however, dared to give sentence against him, since they all very often said to him 'Judge your cause with your own mouth, not at our judgment;' and, again, 'Do not be heard in our judgment, but conclude your cause in your own bosom;' and, again, they say, 'Since you shall be justified by yourself, or you shall be condemned out of your own mouth;' and, again, they say, 'The first see shall not be judged by any one.' Hence, also, the above mentioned confessor of Christ (Pope) Sylvester, made degrees in the bosom of a synod, 'that no presbyter should make any accusation against a bishop, nor any deacon against a presbyter, nor any subdeacon against a deacon, nor an acolyte against a subdeacon, nor an exorcist against an acolyte, nor a reader against an exorcist, nor a doorkeeper against a reader. Nor shall the highest prelate be judged by anyone, since it is written, the disciple is not above his master.'"‡

Our readers will see how many of the things which Binius says the forged Epistles are chiefly about, are supported by that one quotation in that passage of Pope Nicolas' letter.

The documents quoted in it are three:—

1st. The letter of Dionysius the Areopagite, to Demophilus.

2. The Council of Sinuessa, about Pope Marcellinus.

3. The II. Council under Pope Sylvester.

Those three documents are all forgeries.†

The letter of Dionysius the Areopagite is not one of the collection of Isidore; but is acknowledged by all Roman Catholics to be a forgery.

Neither is the Council of Sinuessa in Isidore's collection; but the decrees of Sylvester's Council are in Isidore's bundle. These two councils are, perhaps, the most outrageous forgeries to be met with.

There is a difference in the way in which Pope Nicolas quotes the two last, as compared with the first. He says nothing about "inspiration" when quoting the letter of Dionysius; but before he goes to the other two, he expressly states that he is going to prove his point by "Divine inspiration." The reason of this difference will become plain hereafter, when we shall have to show that one great object of these forgeries, and of the Popes who made use of them, was to have it believed that the "Decretal Epistles," forgeries and all, were written by Divine inspiration. Dionysius was not a pope, and therefore inspiration is not claimed for the forgery in his name; Marcellinus and Sylvester were popes, and, therefore, inspiration is claimed for the forgeries put upon them.

Roman Catholics, think of this! Pope Nicolas I. not only quotes these forgeries, but he vouches for them that they are given by "Divine inspiration." Are we not justified in having said, that we had STRANGE AND STARTLING THINGS to say about these forgeries? Who would expect to find a pope quoting them, and vouching that they were given by Divine inspiration!

If those forgeries were really inspired (which we do not deny), were they inspired by the God of Truth? Or were they given by the inspiration of the Father of lies? Is forgery his work, or God's?

Let us return to Pope Nicolas; before we leave this letter, we give one more instance from it. Pope Nicolas quotes Sylvester, saying: "Neither by the emperor, neither by all the clergy, neither by kings, neither by the people shall the judge be judged."‡ By "the judge" is here meant the Pope. So when Pope Liberius became an Arian (as we showed in our last number, vol. II., p. 142, col. 3, and also infra p. 10) it was beyond the power of the whole clergy to judge of that. They had nothing for it but to submit to the decision of an Arian Pope! But this quotation, too, is taken from the forged Council of Isidore, which we mentioned above.§

Again, in his 30th Epistle to the Bishops in the kingdom of Lotharius, in France,* Pope Nicolas quotes a long passage from that forged epistle of St. Clement to St. James, of which we gave a full account in our last paper. This, too, is one of the forgeries in the collection of Isidore, and this passage he gives as the words of St. Peter himself, related by Clement in his epistle.

Again, our readers will remember that one of the things that Binius says these forged epistles are about is this, "that priests are not to be injured nor accused." And we showed in our last number that it was the object of those forgeries to prevent all accusations of bishops or priests, or, at least, to make such accusations very difficult. Let us see how Pope Nicolas carries out this object, and how he proves it.

First, for preventing such accusations, Pope Nicolas says—"Sixtus, the Chief-priest of the Apostolic See, is described to have condemned Euphemius, a Bishop, laying nothing else to his charge for deposing him, but only that he had made an accusation against his own prelate (or Metropolitan), Polychronius, of Jerusalem."† This was enough certainly to stop accusations altogether; but the document which Pope Nicolas here referred to (de Expurgat. Sixti Papæ III., c. 8¶) is a gross and utter forgery.

Second, if accusations cannot be prevented, they must be made very difficult; and so Pope Nicolas says, in his 22nd Epistle, to Salomon, King of the Britons:—

"We appoint that there should never be any condemnation of bishops, unless either before the legitimate number of bishops, which consists of twelve, or the sentence certainly proved by SEVENTY-TWO fit witnesses, who may be such as are competent to accuse, and who first take an oath on the four sacred gospels of Christ, that they will depose nothing falsely, as our blessed Sylvester and the Holy Roman Church is seen to hold."§

Our readers will see how well calculated this law was to make accusations of bishops very difficult. What chance could there be of proving any charge against a bishop when six dozen witnesses were required! We will show, again, how greatly this and such other things tended to have these forgeries believed and established. But our business now is with the use actually made of the forged epistles by the Popes. How did Pope Nicolas I. prove the necessity of seventy-two witnesses? He refers to Pope Sylvester for it. And we find it word for word in the 2nd Council under Sylvester, c. 3.,‖ which is also in the forgeries of Isidore.

Nor is Pope Nicolas I. the only Pope who has expressly quoted, by name, these forged documents in the collection of Isidore. His predecessor, next but one, Pope Leo IV., has also quoted that last passage, which Pope Nicolas quoted from Sylvester. We have but two letters of that Pope Leo IV., and in the second of these we find that passage given as Sylvester's¶ (Labbe & Coss., Vol. VIII., p. 31).

And the successor of Nicolas I., Pope Hadrian II., quoted them also; for when he was consulted about a bishop being translated from one diocese to another, he thus answers, in his 32nd Epistle:—"Since Pope Anterus says in his Epistle, when some consulted him about a bishop being removed from one state to another....." And then follows a long passage about St. Peter being translated from Rome to Antioch, &c., &c., taken word for word from the Epistle of Pope Anterus,†† which is also one of the forgeries in the collection of Isidore.

When we come to show how the Popes adopted and used these Epistles without expressly naming them; and, still further, when we come to speak of Epistles which are most probably forgeries, though not yet acknowledged by Roman Catholics as such, it will be seen how greatly this list may yet be increased. In the meantime we think our readers will consider it proved that the Popes of the 9th century did quote these forgeries, and did appeal to them as genuine, in support of their claims.

But it was not merely by quoting them now and then that the Popes tried to have those forged documents believed and received in the Church. Pope Nicolas expressly insisted that ALL of them should be received and obeyed as laws of the Church.

After those forged decretals had been published, and

---

* See our last number, Vol. II. p. 137, col. 3.

† This was the great trial of the early Christians in times of Pagan persecution: they were required to cast incense on the fire on the altar in the Pagan temples, as a proof that they were worshippers of idols. In spite of Pope Nicolas, we do not believe that Pope Marcellinus really did this. St. Augustine, in his book against Petilian the Donatist, c. 16, disproves the story. How came Pope Nicholas I. to propagate such a calumny against his predecessor? We shall see a little farther on.

* "Sed si adhuc placet aliquid de hoc nosse, quod delectet, antiqui Patris et venerabilis doctoris Areopagitæ Dionysii ad Demophilum verba vobis recitari præcipite: qui etiam in causa pietatis delinquentem sacerdotem nefas sancit a minoribus, vel ab inferioribus judicari, ne fiat in ecclesia Dei aliquid inordinatum, et status ejus in aliquo confundatur. Verum hucusque quod a suis suffraganeis, atque subditis frater et comminister noster Ignatius non debuerit judicari, sed nec facile reprehendi, breviter comprobavimus. Nunc autem divina inspiratione non nos pigebit, nec nobis impossibile erit, ostendere vobis (si tamen audire velitis) non posse quemquam rite ab his, qui inferioris dignitatis, vel ordinis sunt, judicialibus submitti diminutionibus. Siquidem tempore Diocletiani et Maximiniani Augustorum, Marcellinus Episcopus urbis Romæ, qui postea insignis martyr effectus est, adeo compulsus est a Paganis, ut in templum eorum ingressus, grana thuris super prunas poneret. Cujus rei gratia collecta numerosorum concilio episcoporum, et inquisitione facta, hoc ab eodem Pontifice egisse confessus est. Nullus tamen eorum proferre in eum sententiam ausus est, cum et sæpissime omnes perhiberent, tuo ore judica causam tuam; non nostro judicio. Et iterum: noli, aiunt, audiri in nostro judicio, sed collige in sinu tuo causam tuam. Et rursus; quoniam ex te, inquiunt, justificaberis, aut ex ore tuo condemnaberis. Et iterum dicunt; prima sedes non judicabitur a quoquam. Hinc etiam superius memoratus confessor Christi Sylvester, fecit gradus in gremio synodi ut non presbyter adversus episcopum, non diaconus adversus presbyterum, non subdiaconus adversus diaconum, non acolytus adversus subdiaconum, non exorcista adversus acolytum, non lector adversus exorcistam, non ostiarius adversus lectorem, aut accusationem aliquam: neque Præsul Summus a quoquam judicabitur; quoniam scriptum est, non est discipulus supra magistrum.

Labbe and Coss. vol VIII., col. 306 and 307.

† That all the works that go under the name of Dionysius the Areopagita (the same mentioned in Acts xvii. 34), and this letter to Demophilus among them, are forgeries, see Du Pin, History of Eccl. Writers, vol. I., p. 52-54. Edition 1723. Dublin.

That the Counc l of Sinuessa is forged, see Du Pin, vol. I. p. 591. See also Constant Appendix, p. 27.

Pope Nicolas' last quotation is taken from the Second Roman Council, under Sylvester, can. 3 That this Council is a forgery see Labbe and Cossart, vol I., col. 1514, marginal note.

Our readers will, of course, understand that we do not give here all the proofs of forgery; but only such references as are sufficient to judge by.

‡ Neque ab Augusto, neque ab omni clero, neque a regibus, neque a populo, judex judicabitur.—Labbe and Cossart, vol. VIII., p. 305 and 306.

§ Labbe and Cossart, vol. I., p. 1555.

* Labbe and Cossart, vol. VIII., p. 433.

† Sixtus Apostolicæ sedis antistes Euphemium episcopum damnasse describitur, nihil aliud in depositione illius objicions, nisi quod Polychronium Hierosolymitanum episcopum pontificem suum accusaverit.—Nicolas ep. 8, Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 305.

‡ This document is in Labbe and Cossart, vol II., p. 1275. That this is a forgery, see the Benedictine monk Constant, Epistolæ Rom. Pontif., appendix, p. 111.

§ Nullam damnationem episcoporum esse unquam censemus, nisi aut ante legitimarum numerum episcoporum, qui si per XII episcopos, aut certe probata sententia per LXXII. testes, qui tales sint, qui et accusare possint, et prius ad sacra Christi quatuor evangelia sacramenta præstent, quod nil falsum deponant, sicut nobis beatus Silvester et sancta Romana tenere videtur ecclesia.

Labbe & Coss. Vol. VIII., p. 509.

‖ Labbe & Coss. Vol. I., p. 1549. By this same decree, 44 witnesses were required against a priest, and 36 against a deacon! The ancient law of the Church was thus laid down by St. Paul himself: "Against a priest receive not an accusation but under two or three witnesses"—1 Tim. ch. 5, verse 19. Douay Bible.

¶ Du Pin says it is not certain that these two letters were written by Pope Leo IV., neither is he certain that they were not written by him. Eccl. Writers. Vol. II., p. 141.

 Labbe and Coss. Vol. VIII., p. 933.

†† Labbe and Coss. Vol. I., p. 630.

after he himself had quoted them (as we showed above), Pope Nicolas wrote his 42nd Epistle to all the bishops of France. It appears from that letter that the French bishops were refusing to admit the Decretal Epistles as laws; for Nicolas accuses them of having said "that those decretals of the ancient pontiffs were not contained in the whole body of the code of canons."* Nicolas goes on to argue that this is no reason why those decretals are not to be kept, "since among the canons themselves it appears that one decree of blessed Leo is inserted, in which all the constituted decretals of the Apostolic See (by which he means Rome) are so commanded to be kept, that if any-one shall have offended against them he may know that pardon is to be denied to him."†

We shall have to show hereafter what is the real application of such decrees as this of Pope Leo I., and how dishonestly they are used: it is enough to observe now that Pope Leo I. wrote it only to the bishops of Campania, in Italy, who, being within his patriarchate, were lawfully subject to his authority. And Leo I. wrote it 400 years before the forgeries of Isidore were heard of in the world. Yet Pope Nicolas brings it forward as if it applied to France and to all the Christian world; and he produces it as if Leo I. had intended to apply it to those forgeries which were not written until so long after.

That Pope Nicolas did produce it in support of the forgeries of Isidore is what we have now to prove.

After quoting that decree of Leo I., Pope Nicolas goes on thus: "But in saying ALL appointed decretals, he passed by NO ONE of the decretals that are appointed, which he did not command to be kept; and, again, in asserting of ALL our predecessors, he exempted NO ONE of the Roman Pontiffs who was before himself, whose appointed decretals he did not so command to be kept by all."‡

Now, considering that this universal confirmation of all decretals of all Pontiffs was made by Nicolas after the forgeries were published, and after he himself had quoted them as true and INSPIRED, is it not clear that what he here said was intended to establish the forged decretals as well as the true ones?

But we have further proof still that it really was the forged decretals that Pope Nicolas was labouring to establish, for he goes on thus: "The holy and most eloquent Pope Gelasius agrees to this most blessed Pope Leo, thus saying, 'We decree that the Decretal Epistles, which the most blessed Popes of the city of Rome, in different times, gave on the consultation of different fathers, are to be received with veneration' In which, it is to be observed (so Pope Nicolas goes on) that he did not say the Decretal Epistles which are reckoned among the canons, nor only which the modern Popes gave out, but which the most blessed Popes, in different times, gave from the city of Rome. But, different times being mentioned, the holy man comprehended even those times which, by the multiplying persecutions OF THE PAGANS, with great difficulty permitted the causes of bishops to be brought to the Apostolic See."§

Let it be observed that it is the professed object of Pope Nicolas here to establish the Decretal Epistles written by Popes in the times of Pagan persecution. Now, the Pagan persecutions ceased at the accession of the Emperor Constantine, in the year 306. It was, therefore, the Decretal Epistles written by Popes before that year that he was endeavouring to establish as the laws of the Church. And now we recall the fact that there are not now, and were not then, any Decretal Epistles of Popes who lived before that year, except the forged ones. We refer our readers to the table of Popes' Epistles, given in our last number, in which they will see that there are only five genuine Epistles of Popes who lived before the year 306—viz., two of Clement, and three of Cornelius: none of these are Decretal Epistles—that is, none of them profess to lay down laws. All Decretal Epistles previous to that year are forgeries. And if any one should say—"Perhaps, in the time of Nicolas there were some genuine Decretals, written in the time of Pagan persecution, which are since lost, and it might have been of them Pope Nicolas was speaking," we have witnesses to disprove this. We have a collection of Decretal Epistles made by Dionysius Exiguus, about the year 530, in which he professes to "have collected the constitutions of the former Prelates of the Apostolic See with what care and diligence he could."* And he could find none older than the year 385. To this collection was added, by some other person, about the year 730, the Decretals of the Popes who lived after Dionysius Exiguus;† and that collector, too, found none of earlier date. Another collection was made at Rome by Cresconius about the year 700,‡ and he, too, found none of an earlier date. In the letters of Pope Nicolas I., and the other Popes of the ninth century, we find no trace of their having had any Decretal Epistles older than 306, except the forged ones; we know that they had the forged ones, for they have actually quoted them. When, therefore, Pope Nicolas insisted that the Decretal Epistles of Popes, who lived in the time of the Pagan persecutions (that is, before the year 306), were all to be received, it is clear that it was of the forged Decretal Epistles he was speaking; and that those were the decretals which Pope Nicolas I. was labouring to establish as the laws of the Church. We ask our readers to consider now if we have proved these three things—

1st. That Pope Nicolas, and the Popes who preceded and followed him in the ninth century, did actually quote the forgeries, actually referring by name to epistles and councils which are now universally acknowledged to be forgeries?

2nd. That Pope Nicolas professed to produce these forgeries by Divine Inspiration!

3rd. That Pope Nicolas laboured to impose those forged Decretals and councils upon the Church as its law!

We might now leave it to our readers to judge whether the statement of Archbishop Devoti, on the one hand, that the Popes were no way involved in the guilt of these forgeries; or the statement of the Archbishop of Paris and the Jesuits Labbe and Cossart, on the other, that it was by the exertions of Pope Nicolas, and the other Popes of the ninth century, that the forgeries were established, be the true one.

But we have further proof still. The multitude of places in which the Popes of the ninth century have laboured to support the doctrines and objects of the forged Epistles, without expressly naming or quoting them; and further, still, the manner in which these forgeries were continued for ages as the laws of the Roman Church.

This will be the subject of our next paper; and we hope it will be found as deeply and as generally interesting, to those who seek for truth, as anything we have yet said on the subject.

THE HEIR OF BALLYMANUS.—No. I.

In the beginning of this century there did not live, perhaps, a better specimen of the fine old Irish gentleman than Denis Macmanus, of Ballymanus. Descended as he was from an ancient race of Irish kings, and professing the same religion as his numerous tenantry, he was almost worshipped by the people whom he governed with patriarchal sway. When he issued his commands, few of them troubled their heads to inquire whether they were in conformity with the law of the land, or with God's law either. Ill-betide the unfortunate messenger who should venture to execute the king's writ on the Ballymanus domains. But if you entered those territories without any legal or hostile intent, you were sure of meeting with unbounded hospitality. Little question was made who you were or why you came; whether your taste was for hunting, or shooting, or fishing, ample provision was made for your amusement; and in the evening you assembled, with a score of others, round his hospitable board, where the claret flowed like water, and where all was profuse abundance. It is true that if, in the simplicity of your taste, you preferred whiskey punch, you might not find it so easy to gratify your predilection; and some were ill-natured enough to say that this was because claret was got on credit, while whiskey and sugar had to be paid for with ready money. But you were little disposed for any captious fault-finding in the presense of one so jovial as your host. No man told a better story or sang a better song; and he had the art of making all about him thoroughly comfortable. His enemies said nothing worse of him than that his temper was a little warm, and it is certainly true that he had, in conformity with the habit of his days, been out seven times.

It may be imagined that such a character as we have described was not the most prudent manager of his affairs. Having found his estates but very moderately dipped when he succeeded to the possession of them, he had no difficulty in raising, by mortgage, such sums as he needed; and parsimony and self-denial not being among his virtues, this was an expedient to which he often had recourse When, therefore, contrary to what might have been expected, this hard-living, hard-riding fire-eater died quietly in his bed, in the fulness of a good old age, his son, O'Brien Macmanus, found the income yielded him by the estates which he inherited very disproportionate to the amount of his nominal rent-roll. He could ride for miles round without going off the property which called him master, yet, now that war prices were no longer to be had, it was only by unremitting attention that he could make both ends of the year meet, and, as he complained, he scarcely got agent's fees for the management of his own estates. O'Brien Macmanus was, indeed, a man of another school and another generation from his father. An active man of business, strictly just in all his dealings, and not apt to be liberal with money that did not belong to him, he was very far from being as popular as his recklessly improvident predecessor. It is to be hoped that he found in the bosom of his family some consolation for his inferior popularity among strangers. He was fortunate in the possession of a wife who idolized him, and four as fine children as ever man was blessed with—three daughters and one son, Frank, the hero of the present narrative.

Frank was universally declared to resemble his grandfather much more than his father. He was of an ardent, impulsive temperament; one who threw his whole soul into everything he undertook; an enthusiastic sportsman, and so adventurous a rider that his mother often trembled with apprehension for her only son, the sole surviving hope of the family; but his father declared that he would not have the lad checked; and the tenantry exclaimed that it did their hearts good to see fine old Denis come to life again. Frank was more than seventeen before he was called to more serious pursuits by a conversation which his father held with him.

"Frank," said he, "as long as you were a boy I have given you full fling, and allowed you to amuse yourself as you pleased. It is time now you should think of something else. With the blessing of God, I may live still for a good many years, and I should be sorry that you were dangling on here, living a life of mere amusement. You know how I have been crippled by the state in which your grandfather handed the property over to me; and now, were I to die, I must either leave your mother and sisters without provision, or else give the estates over to you more encumbered than I found them myself. It would break my heart if these lands, which Cromwell did not succeed in wresting out of the hands of the Macmanuses, were now scattered from us through our own improvidence. I have been fighting a hard battle to clear off some of our incumbrances, yet, I have made no progress, and the times are getting worse; so it is plain you must do something else to restore the fortunes of our house. I had been thinking of the army for you, which I know you would like best; but it is, really, too expensive a profession. Since I should find it hard to get the ready money to push you on, it is not a profession in which you would make your fortune in a hurry. So, I see nothing for it but the bar: and, really, considering what good abilities you possess, and how well our family is known, and how many there are who would be delighted to serve one of your name, I don't think you can fail to succeed. I don't despair to see you making a handsome income of your own, and that before you come into the property you will have gold enough to ballast these dirty acres from flying away, as they now seem likely to do.

Frank warmly assented to his father's proposal, and from this time a great change took place in him, and he became as ardent a student as he had before been a sportsman. In his natural disposition he had more genius for poetry than law; but the boy's imagination was fired with the thought of building up the fortunes of an ancient house, and he pursued the project with all the vehemence of his impetuous character. He was duly sent up to the University, not without many misgivings and warnings on the part of his mother, lest the purity of his faith should be sullied in that heretic institution. There, however, he found no one to trouble him with controversy, and the only way in which his early opinions were shaken was, that he found heretics, in close contact, not such repulsive animals as he had imagined from a distance. He found there, among Protestants, many honourable competitors and some warm friends, and several of the prejudices he had conceived to their disadvantage were unconsciously dissipated. He left College after a career of much distinction, and, with what he valued perhaps more than University honors, the reputation of being the most brilliant orator of the Historical Society. He was, indeed, in danger of being led to depend too much on his ready command of language, and on the glowing images with which his fancy embellished every case in which he took a lively interest (and that, in truth, was every case he undertook to defend); but he had fortunately some judicious advisers, who warned him that real eminence at the bar could only be obtained by hard study, and must have for its foundation a thorough knowledge of law. Accordingly, when he went over to London to eat his dinners, he entered a conveyancer's office, and, after some months of vigorous study, began to love, for their own sake, those intricacies of the law which he had at first regarded merely as the ladder by which he was to climb his way to fortune. He required, indeed, some little self-denial to apply himself to study as diligently as he did; for his father being a well-known member of parliament (the representation of his native county had been hereditary in his family since long before the Union), Frank received many invitations from old friends or political connections of his father. He went, however, but little into society, determined not to allow the seductive gaieties of a London season to encroach upon the time which he had rigidly set apart for study. His most intimate companion was an Englishman, named Cornwall, some ten or fifteen years older than himself,

---

* Quæcunque quidam vestrum scripserint, haud ita decretalia prisorum Pontificum in toto codicis canonum corpore contineri descripta.....—Labbe and Coss. Vol. VIII., p. 799.

† Quoniam inter ipsas canones unum B. Leonis capitulum constat esse permixtum, quo ita omnia decretalia constituta sedis apostolicæ custodiri mandantur, ut si quis in illa commiserit, noverit sibi veniam negari. Pp. 799, 800.

‡ Dicendo vero omnia decretalia constituta, nullum de decretalibus constitutis prætermisit, quod non mandaverit esse custodiendum. Et rursus asserendo omnium decessorum nostrorum, nullum Pontificum Romanorum, qui ante se fuerit, excepit, cujus ita non præceperit decretalia constituta ab omnibus custodiri. Labbe and Coss. vol. VIII. p. 800.

§ Consonat autem huic beatissimo Papæ Leoni sanctus et facundissimus in decretis suis Papa Gelasius, ita inquiens: Decretales epistolas, quas Beatissimi Papæ diversis temporibus de urbe Roma, pro diversorum patrum consultatione dederunt, venerabiliter suscipiendas decernimus. In quo notandum, quia non dixit decretales epistolas quæ inter canones habentur, nec tantum, quas moderni pontifices ediderunt; sed quas beatissimi Papæ diversis temporibus ab urbe Roma dederunt. Dictis autem diversis temporibus, etiam illa tempora vir sanctus comprehendit, quæ crebrescentibus paganarum persecutionibus ad sedem apostolicam deferri causas episcoporum difficillime permittebant. Labbe and Coss. vol. VIII. p. 800.

* Præteritorum sedis apostolicæ præsulum constituta, qua valui cura diligentiaque collegi.—Bibliotheca Veteli et Justelli. Ed. Paris, 1661, vol. I., p. 183.

† The same, p. 249. ‡ The same, p. 456.

with whom he became acquainted from occupying the same chambers with one of his fellow-pupils, at the conveyancer's just mentioned. Except on the principle that love is greatest between persons of opposite dispositions, it was not easy to account for the friendship between the two; for Cornwall was silent and reserved, cold and cynical. He was interested, however, by the young man's freshness and simplicity, and honest enthusiasm; while Frank looked up with unfeigned admiration to his friend's experience and knowledge of the world and literary reputation, Cornwall being well known as one of the most effective writers for a leading newspaper.

In this manner the months of Frank's first residence in London passed rapidly away, and the close of the season found him a little fatigued by severe study, and by no means indisposed for relaxation. Under these circumstances, he gladly accepted an invitation (which he possibly might at no time have had virtue to resist) from Lord Robert Blair, the son of an old friend of his father's, and who had himself twice enjoyed the celebrated salmon fishing at Ballymannus, to spend some time at Glenarvon Castle, in the Highlands, and thence to join him in some deer stalking expeditions. Having paid a short visit to Ballymannus, he rejoined his friend in Scotland, where one of his romantic character found abundant enjoyment both in the noble Highland scenery—then seen for the first time—and in the unusually exciting nature of the sport which he was partaking. There was something peculiarly captivating to his fancy in the scenery of those deer forests (forests, indeed, by courtesy), in those hills whose huge masses bounded his landscape, in those vast solitudes where the cry of the moor fowl was the only sound of life; so devoid of human habitation, that he could scarcely imagine himself still in the United Kingdom, and not in some untrodden prairie of America. Nor was he inaccessible to the lower pleasures of proving his skill in the use of the rifle, and of showing that in speed and endurance he was not surpassed by his more practised companions.

But our business now is not with the success of his sport, but with an incident which occurred to him after his return to Glenarvon, and not many days before his purposed return to the south. He was returning one day from a solitary ride when he was startled by the rush of a red deer, at no great distance from him, and at the same time by hearing cries of distress. The cause, as he afterwards learned, was as follows:—A gentleman and lady were driving in a little carriage through a part of Glenarvon grounds, accessible to strangers, when, on a turn of the road, they came full on the monarch of the forest, apparently prepared to dispute their further progress. Aware that it was a season at which it was imprudent to irritate him, they drew up, when he retired into a little hollow, on one side of the road; on their venturing, however, to proceed slowly forward, the deer, as if insulted by their nearer approach, charged full down on them, and plunged his antlers into the breast of one of the horses of their carriage. The wounded animal gave two violent kicks, and then both horses rushed furiously on, and, after a course of a few hundred yards, ended by overturning the carriage, fortunately before they reached a precipitous part of the road, where a fall might have been attended with more dangerous consequences. Frank, who had not been in time to be more than a helpless spectator of the catastrophe, hastened to render his assistance to the sufferers. He found the postillion severely bruised, both by the fall and by the struggles of the now nearly expiring animal; the gentleman, who was advanced in life, was also considerably shaken; the lady had escaped unhurt. Having given all the help in his power, Frank hastened to the Castle for further assistance, and soon returned, accompanied by Lord Robert, who expressed to the strangers his concern for the misfortune they had met with, and, in his father's name, pressed them to take refuge in the Castle for the present. Circumstanced as they were, they had scarce any alternative. The gentleman proved to be a Mr. Hartwell, a merchant, of London, well known for his wealth and princely munificence, who, accompanied by his only daughter, had been taking a tour in the Highlands.

When it was found that, beyond the loss of the horse, the accident would not be attended by any dangerous consequences, it afforded to the young people at the Castle no unwelcome addition to their topics of conversation. It was discussed whether the deer had come down to avenge the death of his slaughtered cousins on the hills, or whether he was merely enjoying his customary amusement of man stalking; but, above all, the singular beauty of the young lady, introduced into the Castle in so romantic a way, made Frank an object of good-humoured raillery. They were sure his modesty must have suppressed some part of the story; it was impossible that he had been a mere spectator of the fair lady's peril; he had surely engaged in single combat with her brute assailant, and, like the Master of Ravenswood, delivered father and daughter by a shot from his trusty rifle. And, to say the truth, before the few days of their stay at Glenarvon were over, Frank himself was strongly tempted to wish that he had made his entry on the scene in some more striking manner, calculated to give him stronger claims on the gratitude of his new acquaintance. Edith Hartwell was a person who, even encountered under more commonplace circumstances, was likely to fascinate a less ardent imagination than Frank's, and though much of her time was occupied in attendance on her father, who was more bruised than they had at first imagined, her filial solicitude did not lower her in Frank's eyes, and if he saw less of her on this account, perhaps he thought the more. He had no reason, however, to complain that the little services he had been able to render were unappreciated, and he received at parting a warm invitation to renew his acquaintance next winter at London.

Our readers will be surprised to learn that, although Frank was as anxious to increase his legal knowledge next year as he had been before, and although there could be no doubt that needless visiting would unduly encroach upon his time, still he did not neglect to avail himself of this invitation—nay, nor of others which succeeded it—that he found, as much time for prosecuting his acquaintance with the Hartwells, as if he had been the merest lounger about town; that he discovered that his health had suffered last year from too much confinement; that he, in consequence, made numberless journeys on the Norwood road, which, as he encountered no friend by the way, could, of course, only have been undertaken for the sake of exercise; that when over his law books fits of dreaming and castle-building used to seize upon him; even the singularly interesting Fearne could no longer enthral his attention, nor save his margin from being pencilled with occasional E's. In short, the honest youth was smitten with a disease from which many of his betters before him have suffered, and was, in plain English, desperately in love. Some, however, take the disease in a milder, some in a more virulent form. Frank was not one of those who can linger on for years in a slow fever, and before the summer days had come round again, his affairs had come to a crisis. We have no space to bestow on the details of his suit, but hasten on to the result.

And first, with regard to the most important person, Edith herself, Frank had in her heart a powerful advocate in his favour. By his first appearance he had relieved her from a moment of as torturing suspense as she had ever undergone in her life. When she extricated herself from the ruins of her shattered vehicle only to find her two companions insensible—uncertain of the extent of their hurts, unable to give them effectual assistance, and apprehensive of a fresh assault from the animal who had caused all their trouble—it seemed to her that the prayer which she murmured to heaven for aid was almost instantaneously answered by the timely coming up of Frank to her assistance. And it may be imagined that, with Frank's prepossessing exterior, pleasing manners, ardent feelings, and eloquent words to clothe them in, the impression first made was not effaced by a closer acquaintance. Frank's father, again, who was at the time in London, gave the match his hearty approval. He was sorry for the difference of the religion; he supposed the girls must follow their mother, but of course the boys would be brought up Catholics, and an heiress would suit the Ballymannus estate remarkably well. But other of the parties concerned were not disposed to look so lightly on the question of religion. Mr. Hartwell, although Frank had always been a prime favourite, and though his approbation had been given to the straightforward manner in which, before breaking the matter to Edith, Frank had communicated to him the exact circumstances of his father's estate, yet groaned with horror at the thought of his daughter marrying a Roman Catholic. Probably had his daughter pleaded earnestly with him, he might have found it hard to refuse her anything. But whatever Edith's heart might suggest, her reason was on the side of her father. Sincerely pious, and warmly attached to her own religion, she felt that a marriage with one who could not sympathize with her in the feelings which she held most sacred, could never be a happy one. The difference of opinion on points of vital moment must be a lasting cause of misery, and it was better to suffer a little at the time by struggling with her feelings now than to suffer all her life long. Accordingly she acquiesced in the decision which her father communicated to Frank, that though, in other respects, he had never seen any one whom he would prefer for his son-in-law, yet that difference of religion was an insuperable obstacle. This view of the case, bitterly unacceptable as it was to Frank, he found was shared by his own mother. "My dearest child," she wrote, "it grieves me to write what I know will give you pain, and I fear you will think me unreasonable to raise any objections to a match which has your father's approval, only that you must know I have nothing so much as your real happiness at heart. It would delight me to see you married to such a woman as you describe Miss Hartwell to be, if she were of the true religion, but I fear marriage with a Protestant can bring you no happiness, either in this world or the next. Only consider, dearest Frank, if you loved your wife (and I am sure you would never marry any one whom you did not love tenderly), how could you ever enjoy a moment's happiness when you must know that if death were to separate her from you it would separate you to all eternity. It seems to me a frightful thing to centre your affections on one living outside the pale of the true Church, out of which there can be no salvation. And believe me, Frank, you can have no perfect union with one who despises all we hold in reverence. Think what occasions for future discord you are creating. How can you ever agree, for instance, in the education of your children? She will not like to see her children brought up in what she will think idolatry, and you, I know, will never consent to anything so sinful as to allow a child of yours to be trained to despise the saints, and blaspheme the Mother of God, and be brought up to be lost for ever. It would be better for you, Frank, to suffer many a pang now, than to have such an one as this to answer for at the last day. But, dearest child, I would gladly think that there may be a hope of your obtaining your happiness in a way in which your conscience will find nothing to condemn. If she loves you as you say she does (if she does not she is not worthy of you) she must surely be willing to listen to the arguments for the truth of the religion you believe. Could she not be persuaded to see our friend Mr. Oldham? Surely some of the evidence which he found irresistible ought to have weight with her. If I could see your Edith thus brought into the bosom of the Catholic Church, there is no greater happiness than your union with her would give to your own fond mother."

This letter of his mother's, brought Frank to a pause and comfort. Up to that time, he had never thought seriously on the subject of religion, and had conformed carefully with all the observances of that in which he had been brought up, rather as a matter of course than from any strong feelings of his own on the subject. It pained him, therefore, to find, that in his mother's feelings as well as Edith's, the difference of religion was not so easily to be so lightly got over as he had imagined. But the idea suggested by his mother, of Edith's possible conversion, gave infinite consolation to one of his sanguine temperament. He founded on it many delightful dreams; and already enjoyed, in imagination, the triumph of bringing home, as his wife, such a woman as Edith, and one who had been reconciled to the Church by himself. So, having obtained a promise of assistance from Mr. Oldham, he wrote next day to Mr. Hartwell, entreating to change his determination; trying to convince him that the prejudices which he and his daughter entertained against his religion arose only from ignorance as to what he really believed; and imploring that they would not condemn him unheard, but would give an interview to himself and his friend, Mr. Oldham, and hear from them their own lips what their faith really was. This letter drew an indignant exclamation from Mr. Hartwell. "Why, Edith, he actually wants to make a Papist of you!" and vehement expressions of surprise at its being thought possible that he would ever consent to such an interview. Mr. Hartwell, however, was one of those persons who expend all their obstinacy in the vehemence of their first loud and indignant refusal, and who are not proof against subsequent continued entreaty. Edith, in particular, was never known to plead with him in vain; and when she gently urged on him the unreasonableness of allowing it to appear that they were proof against all argument, and determined to condemn Romanism without knowing why or wherefore; and the bad effects which such conduct would have in confirming Frank in his own opinions; when she represented to him how candid and fair-minded he was; and how likely it was, that if he could be brought in this manner to have a few conversations with good Mr. Peterson, the interview might have a very different result from what Frank anticipated; Mr. Hartwell at last gave way.

"But only on condition that Mr. Peterson is present," said he, "otherwise it would be too much to expose an inexperienced girl like you to the wiles of so practised a disputant as Mr. Oldham."

Even with this help, however, the combatants were far too unequally matched. Mr. Oldham was a man of considerable learning, of great ingenuity, of unsurpassed intellectual courage (no man could occupy with more hardihood a paradox which ordinary men would pronounce untenable, and defend it with greater ability); and having been a clergyman of the Church of England, it is to be supposed he was in full possession of all the arguments that could be urged on both sides of the question. Mr. Peterson, on the other hand, was a very sincere, zealous, but unlearned, little man, earnest and impressive in his pulpit expositions, indefatigable in visiting the sick and infirm; but he was not a learned divine. He was well acquainted with the Bible, but not with many books of theology. He had, it is to be supposed, read something on the Romish controversy, before being admitted to holy orders, but he had never come in contact with a Romanist since; nor did he at all understand how any one, who acknowledged the authority of Scripture, could find anything to say in defence of such a system.

The conference which took place was shorter and less satisfactory than the persons who had brought it about expected. Mr. Oldham manifested some disagreeable surprise on being introduced to a Protestant clergyman, and seemed little inclined to speak until Mr. Peterson, in a manner, challenged him to the combat.

"I rejoice, sir," said he, "to have an opportunity of hearing from your own lips your reasons for a change which, to me, seems inexplicable. I cannot understand how any one who has had, from his youth, the privilege of reading the Word of God, could embrace the doctrines of the Church of Rome. You must have known God's command, not to make any graven image or bow down to it; and yet, you have joined a Church which encourages the worship of idols, and throws God's command to that contrary into the back ground. You know the declaration of Scripture, that there is but one Mediator between God and man; and yet, you have joined a Church which has a thousand mediators between God and man. You exalt the Virgin Mary (of whom the New Testament says so little) to the rank of almost a fourth person in the Blessed Trinity. You were taught in the Bible, that our Lord offered but one sacrifice for sin, and by one offering perfected for ever them that are sanctified; and now you teach that his sacrifice is repeated a hundred times a day. You were taught in the Bible, that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin, and now you teach that it is only a part of sin which the blood of Christ removes; and you have a dozen other inventions for cleansing from sin—masses, and penances, and indulgences, and purgatory; and, in fine, while our Lord commanded all men to search the Scriptures, you hide them from your people, and tell them they can be saved as well without them, and you only give them to them when you cannot help it."

Mr. Oldham somewhat coloured at this harangue; but he answered calmly—

"I do not know, sir, whether you expect that I should discuss with you in detail each of the passages of Scripture which, in your private judgment, seem opposed to the teaching of the Church. I content myself with replying, that the Church interprets these texts differently from you, and that, therefore, you must be wrong. Before I could consent to allow you to plead the authority of the Bible, on your behalf, I must learn from you what you know about the Bible, or where did you get the book you call by that name, and how you know it is inspired, and what right you have to interpret it?"

"Sir," said Mr. Peterson, alarmed at having the whole ground on which he was standing, thus summarily cut from under his feet, "I hope I have not to do with an infidel. I consider that the inspiration of Scripture is common ground, on which we both agree, and which I never expected to hear called in question by any one who had any right to the name of Christian. As for my right to interpret it, I imagine, that when God sent a message to mankind, he was able to express that message in intelligible words; and that he intended those to whom it was sent, should take the trouble to know it and understand it."

"Do not suppose," said Mr. Oldham," that I deny or doubt the inspiration of Scripture. I believe it on the firmest of all grounds, indeed, on the only possible solid ground, namely, the authority of an infallible Church. In the golden words of St. Augustine:—'Evangelio non crederem nisi auctoritas ecclesiæ me commoveret.' But then I receive all else that comes to me on the same authority, and I hold that she who gave me the Scriptures, has a right to interpret them for me as she pleases."

"Do you mean," interrupted Mr. Peterson, "that she has a right to interpret 'one Mediator between God and man,' 'a hundred mediators between God and man?' or 'the sacrifice of Christ once offered,' 'the sacrifice offered every day?' or 'the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin,' 'cleanseth from a small part of our sins?' Because, if this be the case, the interpretation supersedes the text, and the sooner the Bible is got rid of the better. I might make a shift to believe on the Church's authority, that there is such a place as Purgatory; but as for believing that it is in the Bible, or that the writers of the New Testament knew any thing about it, this, as long as I have the use of my eyes and my reason, is a feat altogether beyond me."

"I have already said," replied Mr. Oldham, "that I will not be seduced off my vantage ground, to discuss with you the meaning of particular texts, nor shall I consider whether if it be true that the New Testament writers do not mention a doctrine, this is any reason why the Church is not afterwards to teach it; what I assert is, that I have solid grounds for receiving the Bible, and that you, who reject the Church's authority, have no ground by which you can believe, with the certainty of faith, that the Bible is inspired. You give your people the Bible, and tell them that it is the Word of God without offering them any evidence for it. Tell them, however, what you please, and, at best, they have the word of fallible man for it. This can give no certainty, and vague and slight must be the belief in inspiration which has no better foundation. The infidelity of the present day searches and tries all your so-called evidences, and finds them wanting. In short, no infallible Church, no Bible. If you abandon her guiding, doubt and disbelief are the necessary consequence."

"This is the first time," said Mr. Peterson, "I have been accused of neglecting to offer evidences for my belief. I should have thought that the proofs from miracles and prophecy for our religion, with which you must be well acquainted, are too strong to be shaken."

"Such arguments as those," replied Mr. Oldham, "are at the mercy of every new scientific discovery. Electricity and mesmerism are every day furnishing new implements for uprooting what you make the foundation of your faith.* Men can now explain by natural causes what was once deemed miraculous, and, outside the Church, reluctance to admit a miracle is the characteristic of the age. You yourself, though you profess to believe the Scripture miracles, reject other miracles, the evidence for which is as convincing."

"What miracles," cried Mr. Peterson.

"Why, for example," said Mr. Oldham, "to speak of miracles of our own day, the melting of the blood of St. Januarius at Naples, the supernatural motions of the picture of our Lady of Rimini, the miraculous appearance of our Lady of La Salette."

* Thus far Mr. Oldham appears to have borrowed all his arguments, and many of his words, from Dr. Wiseman's Essay on the Catholic Doctrine of the use of the Bible.

"The evidence for these impostures as decisive as the evidence for the Scripture miracles!" cried Mr. Peterson, his hair standing on end with amazement.

"Mind, I don't say there is the same evidence exactly for both," said Mr. Oldham. "I find the evidence for both conclusive; you reject the one set of miracles without any examination into evidence at all. Now, infidels, who do the same with regard to the Scripture miracles, are far more reasonable than you. There may be an a priori difficulty in conceiving of the existence of a supernatural power; but that such a power, once proved to exist, should go on exerting itself, is no difficulty at all. The Scripture miracles have broken the ice for all that follow."

"The evidence for the winking picture at Rimini as decisive as that for the Scripture miracles!" repeated Mr. Peterson, walking about the room, and not yet recovered from his horror; "unhappy man, if you are really sincere in what you say, God has surely sent you 'strong delusion that you should believe a lie.'"

Mr. Oldham rose with dignity; "I have been always averse to controversy," he said. "I only came here to-day at the earnest request of my young friend, in the hope of satisfying the doubts of a lady, in whose salvation he was strongly interested. I have been most unwillingly drawn into a controversy, from a continuance of which, in the spirit into which it has now fallen, you will allow me to say, I can anticipate no beneficial effects. I shall, therefore, crave your permission to retire."

He bowed and left the room, and Frank felt himself constrained to follow. They walked for some time in silence. At last Frank said, "I am sorry, father, that there has not been a better result of a controversy into which I fear I have been the means of entrapping you unpleasantly. And I fear I can scarcely ask you to come again; and yet I am most anxious to learn what impressions your arguments have made, and most desirous to follow them up, only that I doubt my own competence to do so."

"I see no objection to your continuing the controversy, if you have the opportunity, with the young lady herself; only, have nothing to do with that poor creature, Peterson. And the course you must take is very simple: do not be led off into discussing particular doctrines. Press her with the simple point of the necessity of submission to the authority of the Church. Show her that without an infallible Church there can be no certainty and no unity. Show her the infinite variety of opinions, some of them absurd, some wicked, into which those who reject the Church inevitably fall—and their total want of evidence for the authority of the book which they profess to take as their guide."

"But," said Frank, "this line of argument appears to me like sapping the foundation of the Bible, and like a cruel attempt to throw Protestants into infidelity."

"It may seem cruel and unfeeling," replied Mr. Oldham; "but it is infinitely more charitable than to leave Protestants to the repeated sin of blaspheming God's Spouse, and trying to undermine the faith of our poor Catholics.* No, the only way to force them to embrace the Church is to leave them no alternative but despair. It was this course," added he, "which made me what I am."

(Continued in page 8.)

* Here Mr. Oldham is stealing from Dr. Wiseman again.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XX.

"Sore weather, Pat, for the creatures that hasn't the turf," said Jem, when they met in the snow.

"And mighty hard on some poor old-fashioned creatures that hasn't any little praties they had out of the ground yet," said Pat.

"Well, there's not many that lazy now, Pat," said Jem.

"'Deed," said Pat, "the old song is nearly out now, and time for it; you mind that, Jem:

> First there was three weeks of frost,
> And then there was three weeks of snow;
> And the praties was like to be lost,
> For want of a moderate thow."

"Ay, Pat," said Jem, "I mind having to sing that myself in old times. But the people is getting to look after things better, since trouble came on them. And not one thing alone; for aren't we learning to look after the Bread of life too?"

"But what will we do at all, Jem, about that man behind the doore?" said Pat.

"Why, then, I'm thinking, Pat," said Jem, "why wouldn't we just go to the Rev. Mr. Burke, and tell him out what the man behind the doore said?"

So off they went to the Rev. Mr. Burke (for the snow had stopped the work), and when they asked to see him, they got into his room; and he asked them what they wanted. So Pat spoke—

"Your reverence, we were in a house, and we were talking over what your reverence said about the candles, and there being no sacrament made at all when the candles wasn't made of wax; and that it was only bread and wine the people was worshipping when the candles wasn't wax. And there was a man behind the doore, listening to us; and he just come out on us, and said your reverence was wrong entirely; and that would only be a sin and a shame for the priest, not to look better to the candles, and it wouldn't spoil the mass at all; and so your reverence was out entirely; and then we just allowed we would come and ask your reverence about it."

"Well, of course, I might be wrong," said Mr. Burke: "I don't set up to be infallible: what I say is for people to examine and enquire about; not for them to swallow, right or wrong; and we ask Roman Catholics to come and examine it, and set us right whenever they can; but I will look again," said Mr. Burke.

So he took down the mass-book, and read it very carefully, and he allowed the man behind the door was right, and that if ever the bread and wine were turned into the Body and Blood of Christ at all, it will do with tallow candles as well as with wax, and that it is only a shame and a sin to the priest if he does not take care about the candles.

"So then," said Pat, "your reverence allows now, that if we could only be sure that if the bread and wine could be turned into the body and blood of Christ at all, then we might be sure that it would be done at every mass, no matter what was wrong."

"No," said Mr. Burke, "I did not say that. I only admitted that a mistake about the candles would not stop it; but there are other mistakes that would stop it; and that would prevent any man ever being able to know whether the change was really made at any mass, even supposing the change could be made at all."

"As what, your reverence?" said Pat.

"If the grapes that the wine were made of were not ripe," said Mr. Burke, "then, the mass-book itself allows there would be no sacrament made at all, and the people would be worshipping only plain bread and wine."

"And how would we know if the grapes were ripe?" said Pat.

"Well, now, that's worse again," said Jem; "why, if it was only the candles, sure we could see that for ourselves, if they were made of the right thing. But how will we ever know at all whether the wine was made of ripe grapes? Sure we can't taste it, and if we did itself, its hard for the like of us to be judges of that."

"And maybe the priest might be a bad judge of wine himself, too," said Mr. Burke, "and then only think what might happen, even if the mass-book is right."

"But how will we know if your reverence is right this time," said Pat, scratching his head; "sure you were wrong about the mass-book last time, and how will we know if you be right now?"

"Oh, Pat," said Jem, "havn't we the right way to know about it now? Sure won't we just take it to the man behind the doore, and see what he can say again it?"

"Quite right," said the Rev. Mr. Burke, "that's just what we want; that everything we say should be examined: and have we not asked the priests to come and hear what we say, and to correct as much as they can of it. And you may be sure they would do it if they could. I would rather you went to the priest and asked him about what I say of the wine; but if you cannot do that, just ask the man behind the door."

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "it's better and better; for sure we durstn't go to ask the priest; but sure enough, the man behind the door can ask the priest; and won't the priest put him up to all he can? So now we are just in the right way to get satisfaction about everything."

So they were going away to look for the man behind the door; but Mr. Burke stopped them for a little more talk about candles.

"And," said Mr. Burke, "what about kissing the candles, boys?"

"Anan, your reverence," said Pat.

"What about kissing the candles?" said Mr. Burke.

"And what about that, your reverence?" said Pat.

"Did you never kiss a candle?" said Mr. Burke.

"No, your reverence," said Pat.

"Did you never get a candle, on Candlemass-day?" said Mr. Burke.

"Well, there mightn't be too many candles, and it didn't come to my turn," said Pat.

"And did you never see any one kiss them?" said Mr. Burke.

"Well, I did see the old creatures kissing their candles," said Pat; "but sure the mass-book would not tell them to do that?"

So, Mr. Bourke took down the mass-book, and opened it at the mass for Candlemass-day, and he read out the directions how the candles were to be sprinkled with holy water three times, and incensed three times, and how the celebrant was to distribute them "to the clergy, one by one, and then to the laity, all bending their knees, and kissing the candle, and the hand of the priest."*

"And it seems to be of more importance than you think," said Mr. Burke; "for here is a book to teach us how to kiss the candles right, and it is approved by Cardinal Wiseman, in England; so it ought to be right."

So he took down a book off the shelf, called "CEREMONIAL ACCORDING TO THE ROMAN RITE,† and he showed them this in the first page:—

* . . . Et aliis clericis singulatim per ordinem, ultimo laicis, omnibus genuflectentibus, candelam et manum celebrantis osculantibus. . . . Missal, p. 406, Ed. Coyne, Dublin, 1845. Oct. cum. approbatione ordinarii.

† Translated by Hilarius Dale, from the work of Baldeschi, "Master of Ceremonies of the Basalica of St. Peter at Rome." Published by Dolman, London, 1853.

"APPROBATION.

"We hereby approve of this translation of Baldeschi's work on the ecclesiastical ceremonies.

N. CARD. WISEMAN.

"Westminster, Aug. 2, 1853."

So, then, Mr. Burke read to them, out of page 159—"Before the celebrant turns towards the people, the second master of ceremonies should give notice to the highest dignitary of the choir, in order that, vested in the usual habit of the choir, without stole, according to a decree of the sacred congregation of rites, of Feb. 14, 1705, he may stand in readiness on the highest step, to give the candle to the celebrant. This candle is given to him by the deacon, who kisses it, but not the hand of the priest. The celebrant also kisses it on receiving it, and afterwards presents it to the subdeacon, who receives it with the ordinary kisses, and deposits it on the altar. The celebrant, having afterwards taken another candle," &c.; and so the kissing goes on.

"And, your reverence, was that always done in the Church?" said Pat.

"Well, I suppose," said Mr. Burke, "it could not be older than the blessing of candles on Candlemass-day."

"And how old is that?" said Pat.

"Here is a book, written by a very learned Roman Catholic, who searched for that," said Mr. Burke; "and he says he could find nothing about it in any of the service-books of any Church, for 900 years after Christ. But stay," said Mr. Burke, "the man behind the door might say I was wrong, so I will write it out for you to give him;" so he wrote them a paper, which we will print at the end of this.

"And will your reverence tell us what are blessed candles good for?" said Jem.

"I cannot tell you much about that," said Mr. Burke. "This book* says, indeed, (p. 233) that in lesser churches the priest 'sits upon a seat prepared on the gospel side (of the altar), covers, and gives an instruction to the people upon the institution of this solemnity, upon the mystic significations, and the advantages of blessed candles;' but the book does not give the discourse, so I cannot tell what is in it. All I know about it is, from a form of blessing candles, printed at the end of the mass-book (p. xcvii.) where the priest prays over them thus:—". . . Let them (the candles) receive such a benediction by the sign of the holy cross, that in whatever places they are lighted or placed, the princes of darkness may depart, and tremble, and fly in consternation, with all their ministers, from those habitations; nor presume any more to disquiet or molest those who serve thee, the Omnipotent God."

"And what does your reverence think of that prayer?" said Jem.

"I think," said Mr. Burke, "that God hears the prayer of faith; and the prayer of faith must be founded on the Word or promise of God. St. James says (ch. iv. 7, Douay Bible), 'Resist the devil, and he will fly from you;' and St. Peter himself says of the devil, 'whom resist ye, strong in faith' (1 Peter, v. 9). These are God's promises about driving away the devil; but no apostle says, 'light candles to drive away the devil;' if we resist him and pray to God to accomplish his own promise, that is the prayer of faith that God will hear; but if we light candles, and pray that candles may drive away the devil, that prayer rests on human inventions; it has no promise from God; it cannot be the prayer of faith."

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "I think that's right; and if blessed candles was the thing to keep away the enemy of souls, would Christ and his apostles have left his Church without them for NINE HUNDRED YEARS?"

So Pat and Jem were going away, when Mr. Burke called out to them—"Will you go and buy blessed candles now?" And Pat answered him—"Your reverence, I would rather put the money in a Douay Bible: doesn't Christ himself say, 'I am the light of the world; he that followeth me walketh not in darkness, but shall have the light of life?' and wasn't that said before there was any blessed candles at all? And isn't that better nor candles?"—John viii. 12.

So as they were going out of the door, Mr. Burke said, "Now be sure you show the paper to the man behind the door, and tell him every word I said."

"Never fear, your reverence," said Pat; "we will surely."

So we think the man behind the door has it by this time; and whatever he sends us to print, we will print it, without even asking his name; and we hope he will get the priest to help him.

The paper given by Mr. Burke to Pat, to show to "the man behind the door."

"De benedictione cereorum nulla fit mentio apud Amalarium, Valfridum, et vulgatum Alcuinum, qui cereos tantum a Pontifice dari asserit. Sed neque in Gelasiano, Gregoriano, Gellonensi, aliisque supra nongentos annos scriptis sacramentariis aliquid ea de re extat. In antiquo missali ecclesiæ Taronensis ante annos 800 scripto unica ad luminaria benedicenda reperitur" . . .—(Tractatus de antiqua ecclesiæ Disciplina se," by Edmund Martene, a Benedictine monk. Edit Lugdun, 1706; p. 117.)

Which we thus translate, for the convenience of our readers:—

"Concerning the blessing of wax candles, no mention is made in Amalarius, Walfrid, or the Vulgate copy of Alcuin, who only states that wax candles were given by the Pope; neither in the Gelasian, or Gregorian Sacramentaries, or in that at Gello, or in others, written above 900 years ago, is there any mention made about that matter. In an ancient missal of the Church of Tours, written about 800 years ago (i.e., about 906), one only mention is found about blessing candles."

* "The Ceremonial," mentioned above.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The great mass of communications with which we are favoured renders it impossible for us to insert everything we could desire as promptly as we could wish. At this moment several articles, actually in type, are necessarily omitted for want of room, though we have incurred considerable expense in giving some extra pages in our present number.

A letter from Mr. Rourke reached us too late for present number but will be inserted in our next. To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

We have to thank several obliging friends for assisting us with copies of Nos. 2, 8, and 11, to complete sets of Vol. I. which is in great demand. Nos. 3 and 4 have already been reprinted. If any of our friends could oblige us with additional copies of Nos. 2, 8, or 11, they would be very acceptable, and might save us the heavy expense of reprinting them, which, however, we purpose doing, if necessary.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1854.

IN commencing the third volume of our periodical we feel that it is unnecessary to detain our readers with any lengthened statement of our plans and intentions for the coming year. Our course for the last two years lies before them; and the reception we have met with gives us every encouragement to pursue steadily the path we have hitherto trod. The principal object for which our paper was established was the discussion, in a candid and Christian spirit, of the momentous points of difference between Protestants and Roman Catholics. In the conduct of this controversy we have studied to exclude from our pages all intemperate and abusive language, and (as far as human frailty would permit) we have endeavoured to contend, not for victory, but for truth. We have ever felt that the errors of those who mistake on questions which concern their eternal salvation, are a subject for pity and not for anger; and we know that it would be a miserable victory on such subjects as these, to make the worse appear the better reason, and to gain a momentary triumph, which must be followed by bitter remorse hereafter. Accordingly, it has been our constant care to deal fairly with those who differ from us. We have cheerfully printed and given our best consideration to every letter which has been addressed to us by Roman Catholic correspondents, requiring only that such letters shall contain arguments, and not mere vulgar declamation or personal scurrility. In the articles which have emanated from ourselves we have always desired to consider the strongest arguments that could be advanced on the Roman Catholic side of the question; and we have sought such arguments in the authorized statements of that Church, and in the works of her best writers. Should our Roman Catholic friends find that we omit to notice any strong argument on their side of the question, bearing on a subject of which we treat, they may be assured the omission is not intentional; and they will do us a service (even when they may not feel competent to write on the subject themselves) by referring us to the places in the works of their divines containing the arguments which they may think we ought to have attempted to answer.

Our reason for the course we have followed is simple enough. It is because truth is our only object, and because we are persuaded that the more thoroughly truth is searched and examined into, the more clearly will its evidence appear. It is only falsehood which shrinks from the light and dreads to face inquiry.

We feel, however, that we have some reason to complain that we have got no assistance in our inquiries from those who claim the office of guides to truth for the people. We have addressed repeated invitations to the Roman Catholic clergy, offering to open to them our pages for a temperate statement of their arguments in defence of their faith. Since every number of our journal meets with many thousand readers, it might be supposed that such an offer as this would be acceptable to any of them who desired the extension of their religion, and who supposed that that extension could be effected by the use of reason and argument. But as yet, no Roman Catholic clergyman has accepted our offer, and we are forced to add, that the means which that body employ to secure the allegiance of their flocks is, generally, not the use of reason and argument, but the inculcation of blind submission to authority, and too often the suppression of free discussion by personal abuse, and, when practicable, by physical force. They surely must have some account to give for conduct so likely to raise a prejudice against them in all impartial minds—conduct not like that of men who knew they had truth on their side, which would bear to be searched and looked into, but like that of people who, for personal ends of their own, desired, at all hazards, to detain men in one particular set of opinions.

Some of them have endeavoured to explain the course which, as a body, they have followed, by drawing an alarming picture of the errors into which some, not members of their Church, have fallen; and by thence inferring that submission to authority is the only mode of preserving men in the truth, but that free discussion must lead to unbridled scepticism and infidelity. The fear of infidelity is one of the principal instruments they employ to detain wavering minds in their communion. To those who are inclined to doubt, they say—believe all we tell you, or you shall believe nothing. In their arguments with Protestants, several of their divines borrow their weapons from the hands of infidels, and in the recklessness with which they defend their peculiar tenets, at the expense of our common Christianity, remind us of the conduct of pirates, who would rather blow up the vessel of which they have unlawfully taken possession, than yield it back to its rightful owners.

We should never have undertaken the labour and pains which the conduct of this journal, for the past two years, has involved, if we had not some better prospect to look forward to than the fearful gulf of hopeless unbelief. It is precisely because we believe that we are ourselves in possession of truths which will make men "wise unto salvation," and which can be proved by the clearest evidence, that we invite others to a full examination of the grounds of our conviction. We are assured that the course we adopt is the only effectual safeguard against infidelity—the only way to give men a firm hold of the truth.

If a system is presented for a man's acceptance which contains truth, mixed up with error, how is he to separate the latter from the former, if he has always been in the habit of yielding a blind submission to authority? And when he discerns, as he is always in danger of doing, the falsity of parts of the system which he believes, will he not run the risk of rejecting the whole system together, and thus of sacrificing, perhaps, several important and fundamental truths?

The danger to which we have just adverted is by no means an imaginary one: it was fatally verified in France at the close of the last century. In the reign of Louis XIV. there was a large body of Protestants in France, and considerable freedom of opinion existed in that country. This was a state of things which found no favour in the eyes of the spiritual advisers of the French King. They never ceased importuning him to banish all the Protestants from his kingdom, and thus to put down freedom of discussion by physical force. Their efforts were but too successful. By the revocation of the edict of Nantes several hundred thousand Protestants were driven from France, and many of those who remained were forced, by the terror of death, to abandon the religion of their fathers, and become members of the Church of Rome. For a time, therefore, the system of enforcing a compulsory silence with regard to religion, seemed to have succeeded, and the priests and ministers of Romanism appeared to have every thing their own way. But what was the result? The human mind will not long brook the shackles by which authority would seek to restrain it; men must and will think for themselves. The intelligent part of the French population soon began to have a vivid perception of the errors of the Romish system; and having no practical acquaintance with any other form of Christianity, rejected all the truths of the Bible, and plunged into open infidelity. No amount of unbelief which has ever existed in a Protestant country can compare for a moment with the fearful spectacle which France presented in the closing years of the eighteenth century, when every feeling of respect for Christianity was obliterated, and when death was publicly proclaimed to be an "eternal sleep." It is absurd to suppose that this giant monster of unbelief could have sprung up in a moment: it was only the removal of the restraints imposed by the iron hand of authority, which then unveiled the doubts that had long lurked in the minds of thinking men, and having never been encountered by reason, at length hurried them to the most extravagant absurdities.

We now think that we have shown that by our readiness to "give a reason of the hope that is in us," we are not only no friends to unbelief, but give the most convincing proof of the strength of our faith in the truths which we profess. A man who believes that the piece of gold in his purse is genuine metal and of full weight, will be ready, when called on, to allow it to be weighed, and have its purity tested; and by doing so, he evinces his faith that the coin is what it professes to be; but the man who will neither make the trial himself, nor suffer others to do so, inevitably gives rise to a suspicion that he does not himself believe that his coin is pure, unadulterated gold. And so it is with the doctrines of religion. St. Paul admonished his hearers to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good;" and those persons are no true friends to Christianity, but rather the reverse, who would deter others from following this precept of the apostle. We have shown above how Roman Catholic teachers lead their hearers to infidelity, by inculcating a blind submission to authority; and on a future occasion we will show how they do so more directly by the nature of the arguments which they employ.

THE HEIR OF BALLYMANUS.

Continued from page 6

When, however, Frank next saw Edith, he did not find it easy to carry on the line of argument which his friend had suggested. He found her pained and shocked rather than perplexed by the course of reasoning which Mr. Oldham had followed on the previous day. He found her belief that the Bible was the Word of God rooted too strongly for him to shake. She said that independently of all external testimony, the force with which its words had been brought home by the Holy Spirit to her heart, gave her assurance that it came from God; and Frank, though he did not think this satisfactory, did not like to distress her by questioning it. Again, he could make no impression on her by arguments drawn from the difficulty of understanding the Bible. No doubt, said she, there is much in the Bible that I do not understand: but is that any reason why I should not make use of what I can?—I can find my Saviour in it, I can learn from it the way of salvation; it tells me that it was written to make me wise unto salvation; every time I study it I draw from it fresh lessons in heavenly wisdom, and shall I be justified in rejecting them, only because my curiosity cannot be gratified on some points on which I might desire information?

As Frank found himself fail in making an impression on Edith, his own faith began to waver in one dogma which it had hitherto never occurred to him to question, the impossibility of salvation out of the Church of Rome. The more he thought of Edith, so pure, so gentle, so wholly free from thought of self, whose whole happiness seemed to consist in giving happiness to those about her, the more shocking he felt the idea that she must be lost for ever. Hitherto he had imagined that outside his own Church there might be morality, but could be no real piety; and yet it seemed to him now that the piety of Edith was as real and as sincere, her devotion as fervent as —— yes, he could not deny it—as even that of his own mother.

He ventured to ask Mr. Oldham whether it was certain that none without the Church could be saved. There can be no doubt of it, said Mr. Oldham, whose merciless logic never feared to look a consequence in the face. It is true that all our doctors make an exception for the case of invincible ignorance; and some of them, who seem afraid to follow out their principles, would fain represent all ignorance as invincible which has not been actually conquered. But in my opinion those in this country who have been called on to submit to the Church, and who have had full opportunity for learning her claims on their obedience, and yet refuse to submit, are absolutely without excuse. It may be very dreadful, but I fear it is true.

Frank's reason was without reply, but his heart refused to assent. He redoubled his endeavours, however to convince Edith, and finding that Mr. Oldham's plan of bringing her into the Church by the use of infidel arguments was eminently distasteful to her, he prepared to meet her on her own ground. For surely, said he to himself, since the Church has in each case decided rightly, it cannot be difficult to show that her decisions are agreeable to Scripture and reason, and history. And accordingly he laboured for several weeks at the study of the whole controversy with all his characteristic energy; but he was sadly disappointed in the result of his inquiries.

And when next he came to Mr. Oldham it was with the complaint. Father, said he, I find that whatever be the arguments to prove that the Church cannot err, it is more and more forcing itself on my mind that she actually has erred. I shall only mention two points which I have lately studied particularly. First, as to the canon. It seems to me as certain as any fact in history, that our Lord and his Apostles used the same books of the Old Testament Scripture which were admitted by the Jews with whom they argued; and that the canon of the Jews did not include the books which are called apocryphal, and does not to this day. I find that all the earliest catalogues of canonical books given by Christian writers do not include these books. The early Eastern Church is unanimous against them. In the west, the learned St. Jerome declares that the Church reads those books, but does not receive them into the number of the canonical Scriptures. Even those who do call them canonical regard them as inferior to the rest. In the Council of Trent itself the divines acknowledged their inferiority, so that it seems to me that the final decree of the Council on this subject is glaringly at variance with historic truth. Again, with regard to the religious use of images, it seems to me that if we are to take the words of Scripture in their plain natural sense, it is absolutely forbidden. The early Christians certainly understood it so; they would not tolerate from the heathen apologies for the use of images, precisely the same as those we are forced to employ ourselves; and many of them superstitiously believed the very trade of the statuary to be absolutely unlawful. I find images at first only introduced into churches for ornament, and for the historical information of the unlearned; and yet that even this innocent use of them was violently opposed by eminent bishops of the Church. I find the veneration of images only established, after the most violent opposition, at the second Council of Nice, and that by arguments the most absurd and unfair that can be imagined. And when I see the extravagant superstition to which image worship has given rise among the unlearned, it is forcing itself on my mind, that on this point also the Protestants are right, and the Church wrong.

Mr. Oldham listened in speechless horror, and then replied—

"I am deeply grieved, Frank, but scarcely surprised at the result of the course you have taken. The only question you, or any other layman, have to consider is, that of the authority of the Church. It is not for you to re-open questions which have been long since tried and decided by higher authority than yours. The only result of such a course would be to land you in hopeless infidelity."

"But," urged Frank, "these are all questions of mere historical fact, which I have studied with great care, and on which I think my education as a lawyer renders me peculiarly qualified to form an opinion."

"My dear Frank," returned Mr. Oldham, "suppose, now, that I were to qualify myself by several weeks' hard study to pass a judgment upon the Lord Chancellor's last decision, I have no doubt I could find plenty of ingenious arguments to prove that his judgment was quite erroneous: nay, I have no doubt that I could make out a plausible case to show that the whole law is a gigantic system of fraud, got up solely for the profit of the lawyers. No doubt, in my proof, I should fall into abundance of errors, which you or any other practised lawyer would detect at once; but, notwithstanding, my arguments would seem to the unlearned very plausible and convincing. But, however, do you not think it better that we should each stick to his own profession? I shall be content to take my law from you, when I want it, and, in the meantime, you may be content to take the doctrines of religion from those who are authorized to teach them."

Frank went away silenced for that time, but he returned some days after—

"Father," said he, "since our last interview I have been endeavouring to submit to the authority of the Church my own judgment as to the meaning of Scripture, and as to the facts of history; but, you will allow that the authority of the Church, to which so great a sacrifice must be made, ought itself to rest on a strong foundation. Now, I want you to assist in strengthening my faith in this great truth; for it seems to me useless to think of proving it from Scripture, since I know that Scripture depends altogether for its authority on the infallibility of the Church. I suppose it must rest ultimately on the evidence for the first miracles of our religion, and yet, you hinted the other day that infidels could explain these away by the help of electricity and mesmerism."

Mr. Oldham replied—"I know that some of our divines do appeal to Scripture in order to prove the infallibility of the Church, but I shall not be so inconsistent as to suppose that Scripture can have any authority without the foundation of the Church; nor shall I treat the texts which speak of the Church as if they were the only ones, plain, and evident, and easy to be interpreted by private judgment. Nor again shall I bewilder you by an appeal to miracles or prophecy: such a course, I know, must inevitably end in incurable scepticism. No, Frank, your doubts are not to be removed by reasoning; they are to be got rid of by penances, by believing, and praying. Surrender your mind to the truth: throw yourself into the system, and you will find the act bring its own evidence with it. A simple-minded woman, like your mother, to whom it never occurred to doubt the truth of our religion, has greater certainty of its truth than those who are able to answer the subtlest arguments heretics or infidels have invented—than Bellarmine, or Wiseman, or Perrone. The authority of the Church is not a thing to be proved by sorites, and enthymemes, and syllogisms; it is a doctrine which comes wafted to us in full tradition on the western breeze; and holy fathers re-echo it in intellectual expressions, and it is poured to and fro in broken harmonies, in closets and on the house-tops: and sacred virgins repeat it to us in their calm, sweet voices, and monks, spare with fasting, resound it in their deep rich tones; and it pervades us like an atmosphere, and fills every corner of each Catholic heart. And can heretics find evidence like this in all the works of Paley, or Grotius, or Chalmers, or Sumner!"

Frank was awed by his friend's eloquence, the general drift of which he understood, though, perhaps, he did not understand the exact meaning of each particular phrase; and Mr. Oldham went on to say—

"Frank, I fear that it is your heart, not your head, which suggests these difficulties to you."

"Nay, father," cried Frank, "there you do me injustice; the Catholic religion is twined round every fibre of my heart. I could not abandon it without doing violence to my earliest impressions and my heart's best affections. I should break the heart of my mother; I should wound to the quick my sisters and my other relatives, who look up to me as the representative of an ancient family, whose allegiance to the Catholic faith has never wavered. No, father, I can almost say that, be her doctrines true or be they false, the dearest wish of my heart is, that Edith could be prevailed on to embrace them."

"Then," replied Mr. Oldham, "my advice to you is, to withdraw your mind wholly from controversy; to content yourself with prayers to the Blessed Virgin for Miss Hartwell's conversion, and for the satisfying of your own doubts; and to practise the penances which, at your next confession, I shall impose on you."

To a certain extent Frank followed this advice: he was diligent in prayers and in the practice of austerities, some recommended by his confessor and many added by himself; but, except on condition of c[illegible] to see Edith, he could not withdraw his mind from controversy; and the more he thought on the subject the more his doubts increased.

His friend Cornwall, of whom we have before spoken, and whose ch[illegible]nders he now shared, had been the confidant of Frank's love for Edith, and had given his full measure of sympathy to his sufferings from the obstacles which had interfered between him and his happiness. He had also been made acquainted with his religious struggles; but on this subject he was scrupulously reserved, and cautiously abstained from saying anything. At last, one day, Frank broke out—

"I wish to heaven, Cornwall, you would lay before me some of the evidence on which you believe your religion; for I long to believe something; and yet it seems to me that an infallible Church is the necessary foundation for all religion; and since it is forcing itself on my conviction that the Church has erred, I find my whole Christianity slipping from me like a dream."

"Nay," returned Cornwall, drily, "I can only repeat to you Oldham's advice—believe, and do not examine."

"What," cried Frank; "this advice from you!"

"It is the only advice for your happiness, however," replied Cornwall. "If you once examine into evidences, you will surely end in infidelity. Oldham is an old College friend of mine, and we both came to that conclusion many years ago."

"Then, good heavens!" cried Frank, "if so, why are you not a Catholic?"

"I said, Mac, that the advice was necessary for your happiness. I did not say it was necessary for mine; or, perhaps, for I shall not pretend that my creed is a happy one, there may be other things I value more. However, I believe that a certain belief is necessary for the happiness of almost all women, and of many men, among whom I have always reckoned you one. And the only method I know of maintaining such a belief, is not to pry too curiously into its foundations. 'Where ignorance is bliss,' you know," added he, smiling.

"I can have no happiness on these terms," returned Frank, indignantly. "My happiness can never be the bliss of ignorance; it must have truth for its foundation. Yes! I agree with you," said he; "though I value happiness, there are things I value more. I value honour more; I value truth more."

"Well, Frank, my poor fellow," said Cornwall, "I pity you for what you are undergoing: I went through it myself once. I am not fond of talking of my history; but since you have forced it from me, you shall have it. It will not keep you long. You have heard a great deal of the converts that have been made to your Church, at the University to which I belong, but you do not hear anything of those who have been spoiled in the process. Grape-juice, when the fermentation is carried on a little too long, makes not good wine, but sour vinegar. The manufacturers then, I believe, throw the vinegar away, and say nothing about it. Oldham and I were of the same standing, and were great friends. We both sought for some deeper and more solid foundation for our religion than is afforded by the Anglican Church. We both came to the conclusion, that all examination into the evidences of Christianity must have anbelief for its result. But there we parted. The same medicine, you remember, which wrought a miraculous cure on Don Quixotte proved nearly fatal to his unhappy squire. I had an unlucky share of mathematics in my education, which Oldham had not; and this has given me the habit of asking for evidence, and not believing without proof. I cannot mesmerize my mind into faith, as Oldham does, nor browbeat my understanding into believing. My belief must be founded on reason and argument. It would be no recommendation to me to be told, such a person is a most worthy and excellent man, but pray do not inquire into his character, for as sure as you do, you will arrive at the opinion that he is a scoundrel. So, of the two alternatives, Popery and infidelity, Oldham has chosen one, and I the other. It is ridiculous to believe, that if the evidence for the Bible fails, any evidence for an infallible Church can be found. But I am wiser than some of my friends, and keep my doubts to myself; and, perhaps, if the truth were known, Oldham and I do not much disagree; and he does not believe more than myself."

"Oh! monstrous," cried Frank; "I cannot with patience hear you impute insincerity to a man so holy as Mr. Oldham."

"Holiness in your Church," said Cornwall, "is a quality attributed to those who can master the grosser bodily appetites; but you think too little of the virtues of the mind, such as truth and charity. That I am not unjust to Mr. Oldham, only consider the principles he has avowed during his whole life. Long before he left the Church of England, he expressed his approbation of the system of 'Double Doctrine,' avowed by some of the Fathers; of their στρατηγία and οἰκονομία: of their rule for speaking the truth only to those who are fit recipients, but when consideration is necessary, then being false or uttering a falsehood. And he acted on his principles. You know how, for three or four years, he professed himself a member of the Church of England, when he, in reality, held the doctrines of your Church; how he justified himself for speaking, not the language which he believed to be true, but the language which a consensus of great divines had made him safe in speaking, or the language which was necessary to his position. Now, when he professed his belief in the melting of the Blood of [illegible]narius, and to the winking picture at Rimini (things which I have heard you say your own father laughs at), what certainty have you that he is sincere? He may be only trying to 'throw himself more fully into your system,' or speaking the language which a consensus of your divines has made safe for him, or which is necessary for his position. How can you know that you are in possession of the esoteric meaning of his statements? Some time since he represented that our choice lay between Anglicanism and Romanism; that, if Rome could be resisted, it could be by no other means; and simple men who rejected, with[illegible] horror, the idea of his being a Romanist in disguise, thought such passages as these decisive proof of his faithful adherence to Anglicanism; and yet, now we know that his real meaning was, that Romanism was true, and Anglicanism only the least weak of all the attempts which had been made to resist it. In like manner, when he tells us now, that our choice lies between Romanism and scepticism, that if infidelity can be resisted, it can be by no other means, how do you know but that his meaning is, that Infidelity cannot be resisted at all; and that Romanism only supplies the strongest of those cordials, which weak minds find necessary to their happiness?"

By such insidious assaults as these, Frank's confidence in his former instructor was weakened; and the doubts which he had battled off before poured in again. His religious belief had hitherto altogether rested on submission to authority, and now that his faith in that authority had been disturbed, the whole fabric tottered from its foundation. When Cornwall told him that Christianity was not founded on reason and argument—that its evidences would not bear looking into—that it was a mere development of religious sentiment, but that its facts could only be received by those who would blindly swallow whatever their instructors were pleased to teach them; Frank seemed to hear over again, in a new form, the very lessons which Oldham had taught him before. Is it any wonder that, as Frank had before believed without reason, so now, pushed by Oldham and pulled by Cornwall, he began to disbelieve without reason, and was preparing to reject Christianity, without ever once having looked into the evidences on which it rested? He seemed to himself, too, to have been admitted to a kind of freemasonry, and to have suddenly become aware of the hollowness of the professions of many of his Roman Catholic friends, whose sincerity he had never questioned before. A few even confessed their scepticism, but said, that as long as they kept their doubts to themselves, and outwardly adhered to the Church, they caused their friends no unhappiness, and their priests were satisfied with them. And now, as Frank was settling fast into unbelief, the temptation came upon him—why should he be debarred from happiness by his profession of a religion which he did not believe? Perhaps had Edith been penniless, the temptation might have been a strong one; but he shrunk with loathing from the idea of appearing to barter his religion for gold. He knew, likewise, that a change in his outward profession would break his mother's heart, while Edith, herself, if she knew his real sentiments, would be rendered more unhappy by a union with him, than even if he remained a Roman Catholic. And he could not think of living in a life-long hypocrisy to her.

So his visits to Norwood became less frequent; and his spirits failed, gloom seemed settling over him, and he shrank from the subject of religion; for he could not bear to wound Edith's gentle heart by a profession of his true sentiments. And Edith marked the change, and hoped that it arose from a gradual change in his religious convictions, and her prayers for his enlightenment became daily more fervent. But all the time the cloud was settling deeper and blacker on Frank's mind.

At last he felt that the end could be no longer delayed. He wrote, in few and simple terms, that having given long and earnest thought to the subject of religion, he found it impossible to arrive at that unity of religious opinion with her, without which he could not hope to make her happy; and that, therefore, he was constrained to acquiesce in her decision that all must be at an end between them.

He had to write his letter twice, for his first copy was blistered by his tears; and then he threw himself on his bed, and writhed in agony. The blackness of darkness was upon his soul. He had been forced to abandon all those hopes of a brighter eternity, which once had afforded him glorious visions of bliss. And having lost his faith of happiness in the next world, he had now given up all his prospects of happiness in this; and his conscience seemed to tell him, that in both he had only followed the dictates of truth and honour. But he found in his heart an unutterable void.

(To be continued.)

Correspondence.

WAS POPE LIBERIUS A HERETIC?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Carlow, Jan. 2, 1854.

SIR—You have driven the infallibility of the Church to be tried and sentenced by historical facts, as you call them, and God only knows in what garb they have come to us. Are these human records infallible? Are they to be now placed above the immutable Word of God? Or are we to arraign the Holy Scriptures before an historical tribunal? Or are we again to make [illegible] a criterion? And if his veracity is found wanting by the cold tribunal, what is to follow? I have honestly and fairly challenged you to fight the infallibility of the Church of God with weapons from the armoury of God—the Scriptures. But these, as you have them, you have chosen for your arms of defence, and you think I will be mortally defeated if I meet you so equipped. The facts you have put forward are two—the creed, of course, from the written acts of the Church, from the first year of our Lord to the sixteenth century—and, if these said facts are proved no facts at all, may we then go back to Scripture. The last paragraph in your answer to my last letter, seems to be the point at issue. This position you have chosen, is dangerous ground; dangerous indeed as those you have made. It would be all very well and legitimate, no doubt, if you were treating on electricity or feeling with some abstruse theory on geology, a priori, then would be your proper course; by-and-bye we will be proving religion by the galvanic battery, as it is being tested by geology, but with what result is useless to enquire. Well, here we meet on your own historical domain. The first Council of Jerusalem, A.D. 351, contained no heresy. Constantius banished Liberius from his popedom because he would not confirm the Milan assembly, A.D. 356, he [illegible] now nearly three years confined at Berea, the Bishop of Aquileia induced him to sign the first formulary of Sirmium, and the condemnation of Athanasius (which was of a legal nature) without violating the Catholic faith. He came to Rome amidst the acclamations of the Roman populace, who cried out, "One God, one fold, one head:" the Arian Pope was driven therefrom. Now, being at liberty, and in his see, he condemns the Arian heresy, writes a letter of reconciliation to Athanasius—see Theodoret. In the year 359, the Arminum Council assembled to the number of four hundred; of those, eighty were Arians. The profession of faith that the Arians brought with them, the terms there concerning Christ, were Scriptural, though it could be construed into an Arian or a Catholic sense. The word consubstantial not being found in Scripture, the Arians artfully omitted; three hundred and twenty of the bishops rejected the formula, and anathematized Arius, his doctrines, and adherents; but Constantius ordered Valens, his faithful abettor, to direct his powers to gain the bishops, and Taurus, his wily prefect, to detain them in durance, vile at Ariminum, till they had signed the Arian formulary. Valens assured them, that he differed not with them in belief, only in the word "consubstantial," not being found in Scripture; he added, on their signing the aforesaid formulary, depended the peace and union of Christ's Church. After subscribing, they dispersed to their different sees; but finding the Arians had published a creed, in the Arian sense of the word, they immediately wrote against it, denying that they had agreed to it, or signed it, as published by Valens, &c., but thought that the divinity of Christ was fully borne out in the body of the creed, without the word consubstantial. It is not my intention to gloss over the weak actions of those bishops, for I find them fully condemned by Pope Liberius, and the bishops of Italy, Britain, Gaul, Dalmatia, Greece, Africa, the Islands, and nearly all the Oriental Churches. Now, here were four hundred bishops at this Council of Ariminum, without the Pope—a body without a head! At this time there were upwards of two thousand bishops in the Christian Church, scattered as they were in the above countries; deducting the Arminum Council from the full number of bishops, leaves upwards of one thousand six hundred, with their lawful head, Pope Liberius, condemning the actions of the said Council of Ariminum (see Athanasius's letter to the Emperor Jovinian). Can it be said now of the saint, with any truth, that he stood alone? I maintain there is no analogy between him and Luther; he (Luther) left the body of the Church, Athanasius stood with it. I defy any man to prove that Liberius sinned against faith; he was somewhat temporising in his actions, as seen above. The Church flourished during his pontificate, as you will find. —Fact number one disposed of.

The case of Berengarius, placed in your columns, for the last three months, as a difficulty to Roman Catholics, as regards the infallibility of their Church, surprises me very much, and the silence of "Philalethes" may seem to you a confirmation of it. I make bold to say it is no difficulty at all to "Philalethes," whoever he may be. The word "consubstantial," placed in italics, is set forward as the touchstone of infallibility. You contend that this word can mean nothing else than this—In a way that our senses can judge as I perceive; but can you contend that the bishops meant nothing else? Berengarius is well known in ecclesiastical history by his falling into this pestiferous heresy, which brings his name before us now, and was (his heresy) unknown to the Christian Church up to his time? This heresiarch was of a vacillating disposition; for, when cited to appear before a council, was sure to recant, and consume his writings on the subject, showing all the demonstrations of repentance. The Bishops at Rome [illegible] this formula (your second fact); it was put in this stringent form, that the wily man could not get out of it, and when subject to the Catholic sense, is purely orthodox. An isolated word or passage, without the aid of the context, or spirit of the treatise that it is taken from, stands very awkward in the hands of an unfriendly critic. The word sensualiter is there set down in opposition to Berengarius's spiritual presence, not in the Caphanite* sense of the word; for we have proof positive it could not, as the good bishops then had. One of our senses hears the word, "this is my body," and we believe it sensibly [aye, burns into the very soul]. This sense hears, the word was made flesh, and we believe it true, and so of all the great dogmas of Christian belief; and I may ask by what other channel does religion come to us but by this sense of hearing? What has the feeling of touch to do with it, the sense of smell to do with it, or sight, or taste? We hear and believe—and this is said to be Protestant doctrine.—Fact number two disposed of.

I am, dear sir, yours respectfully,

A ROMAN CATHOLIC.

We ask our correspondent to consider the purpose for which we called on Roman Catholic controversialists "to deal with infallibility as a matter of fact; has the Church of Rome, in fact, been always infallible?" Putting the question thus does not imply that men can be infallible judges of the truth or falsehood of what God reveals. It does not "make Christ a criminal."

But all men do and must form some judgment, one way or the other, whether the Church of Rome be really infallible or not. And we think that every man who undertakes to support either side of the question, may fairly be required to say whether he does actually believe in the practical truth of that which he tries to support in argument. "Philalethes" brought forward the decision of Pope Nicolas II., and his 113 bishops, about Berengarius, as an infallible decision. We put it to "Philalethes" to say, "did he really believe that decision of Pope Nicolas II. and his council to be true and infallible?" and "Philalethes" has never ventured to say that he does believe it to be infallible. We call that dealing with infallibility as a question of fact; and we cannot see how it "arraigns the Holy Scriptures before an historical tribunal," or "makes Christ a criminal."

Our correspondent, however, undertakes to answer on two matters of fact; and his doing so does seem to us to prove, that he does not really feel that method of argument to be so very impious and wicked as he states it to be.

First, He enters, in a long argument, to prove that Pope Liberius did not give in to Arianism. But in that argument he never once alludes to the main document, which we produced—namely, Pope Liberius's own letter, in which he condemns Athanasius, and professes communion with the Arian bishops. We give that quotation here again:—

"I do not defend Athanasius . . . . when I knew that you had justly condemned him, since it was pleasing to God, I afterwards supplied my consent to your sentence; and, in addition, I gave letters to be brought to the Emperor Constantius, by our brother Fortunatianus, concerning him (Athanasius) by name—that is, concerning his condemnation. Therefore, Athanasius being removed, all your decrees concerning whom will be reverenced by me, together with the Apostolic See, I say that I have peace and unity with all of you, and with all the Eastern bishops, and through all the provinces."†

Our correspondent undertakes to prove that Pope Liberius did not give in to Arianism: but he does not venture to notice this letter.

To make this matter plain to him, we call his attention to the fact that the Emperor Constantius, to whom Pope Liberius wrote to say that he had condemned Athanasius, was himself an Arian, bent on establishing Arianism in the Church. Was that the man to whom a Pope should write, "That he had condemned Athanasius?" And the Eastern bishops, to whom the Pope wrote that letter, and with whom he professes to be now in peace and unity, were also Arians! Was this not becoming an Arian?

But to help our correspondent a little more to understand that letter of Pope Liberius, we give him here the opinion of Severinus Binius, Archbishop of Cologne, upon that letter. Our readers will remember that this Binius was the man who tried to defend the forged epistles when all others were giving them up; and they may be sure he would not give up the case about Liberius, if there was any chance of being able to deny it. And here is what he says on that letter:—

"This is that true and genuine epistle of Liberius, which, being basely and shamefully overcome by the tediousness of exile, and the fear of death (after two years of exile, and Felix being substituted for him in the pontifical see), he wrote to the Easterns, signifying that he approved the sentence given against Athanasius by their suffrages—that he admitted the Arians to his communion, and approved as Catholic the confession of faith published at Sirmium."‡

In that same place, Binius quotes (among other ancient testimonies) St. Jerome, speaking of the matter thus:—

"Liberius being conquered by the tediousness of exile, subscribing to HERETICAL pravity, entered Rome as a victor."§

Where, note, that St. Jerome says nothing of the fear of death; for which, indeed, there was no ground: it was exile that made Liberius subscribe to heresy; and, subscribing to heresy, enabled him to triumph as Pope, over his rival.

It was but natural that our correspondent should avoid noticing a letter which even Binius could only notice with such a confession; but our correspondent must try his hand again, if he would prove that Liberius never fell into Arianism. And we beg of our correspondent not again to overlook that letter of Pope Liberius, which tells us about it.

2nd. Our correspondent undertakes to answer for "Philalethes" (which "Philalethes" has not attempted to do for himself), about the confession which Pope Nicolas II. and the Roman Council compelled Berengarius to sign. We stated, that the Pope and Council compelled Berengarius to say—that the true body and blood of Christ was "in a sensible manner (sensualiter) handled by the hands of the priest, broken and ground by the teeth of the faithful." Our correspondent does not deny that they said this, and made Berengarius say it; but he asks, "Can you contend that the bishops meant nothing else?" Well, in our simplicity, we thought an infallible tribunal must mean what it said. Just consider the position of a Church, with an infallible tribunal, liable to say something quite different from what it meant! In that case, every man must judge of the truth for himself before he can venture to hear the infallible tribunal; and when he hears it, he must be prepared to say, "This infallible tribunal has said what was wrong; it must have meant something else." Surely, such a tribunal would be a snare, and not a help.

Just take this instance. The tribunal said, that the body of Christ is, "in a sensible manner, handled by the hands of the priest, broken and ground by the teeth of the faithful." Oh, no! says our correspondent, the tribunal meant to say, "that it is the sense of hearing which hears the word, 'this is my body!'" So, if you change every other word in the sentence, then the great word sensualiter may safely and properly stand in the sentence, but not otherwise. For our part, we would rather seek for the meaning of the Word of God, than have to make such wild guesses at the meaning of an infallible tribunal which cannot even say what it means.

Our correspondent concludes thus:—"I may ask, by what other channel does religion come to us, but by this sense of hearing? What has the feeling of touch to do with it?

We answer this from the Douay Bible (Luke xxiv. 39), where our Saviour said to his disciples who doubted about the truth of his resurrection, "HANDLE and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see me to have."

We hold this up to our Roman Catholic readers, as a solemn warning, that they who undertake to maintain the evidence of transubstantiation, are driven to deny the proof on which our Saviour himself placed the fundamental doctrine of his religion—even his own resurrection!

POSTSCRIPT TO "PHILALETHES."

It was our correspondent "Philalethes" who first brought forward in our pages the case of Berengarius and the infallible decision of Pope Nicolas and his council. Four letters of "Philalethes," on this subject, were received and inserted by us in the past year:—1st, in January, page 9; 2nd, in July, page 81; 3rd, in September, page 104; 4th, in November, page 129. In our observations on the last two, page 105, and page 130, we called on "Philalethes," in the plainest terms, to answer this question:—"Does he think that the Pope and council were right, or does he think that they were wrong?" He has not answered this; and both our December and January numbers have now appeared, since we last called on him to answer, without our getting any reply to this question.

It does strike us as very strange that "Philalethes" should produce the judgment of a Pope and Council, as a decision that must be true, and yet that, when we ask him "does he really himself believe it to be true," he should not have one word to answer.

We now beg, in a friendly manner, to represent to "Philalethes" the appearance which his correspondence must present to ourselves and others, if he allows it to come to an end in so unsatisfactory a way.

What can we or our correspondents think but this—that while "Philalethes" was actually arguing for the infallibility of Pope and Council, he had in his own mind a secret consciousness that both Pope and Council together were fallible and wrong?

What can we think of his last letter, but that he was striving to throw dust in other people's eyes, to prevent their seeing what he himself did feel—that Pope and Council together are fallible and liable to err?

Sorry should we be to think this of any of our correspondents. We do not think it yet; we know what allowance is to be made for men; we know how far theories may impose on us, till we come to test them by facts. But we do, in a friendly and earnest manner, represent to "Philalethes," that the only way he can now free himself from this appearance of insincerity, is to come forward and state in our pages, whether he think Pope Nicolas II. and his Council were right or wrong in the confession which they compelled Berengarius to sign. Our pages are open to him still, to set himself right.

ON DEFECTS IN THE MASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I do not know whether I should attribute to ignorance or intention the numerous errors concerning the celebration of mass which are to be found in "Talk of the Road," No. XIX., which appears in your December number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN. It will be generally allowed, that among the members of the Catholic Church no doubt or hesitation is felt as to the efficacy of that holy sacrament as it is presented to their faithful view. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that those who wish to turn them from their religion use their best endeavours to inject doubts and scruples into the minds of the ignorant and unwary, as to the sublime truth contained in this capital doctrine of the Catholic faith—the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the mass, as they see it daily administered. But, to the point. In the latter part of this "Talk of the Road" Mr. Burke ("missioner"), is represented as drawing out of his pocket a Roman Missal, at a controversial class meeting, and handing it to a certain Mickey Reilly, a "very learned man," as the story tells; but, surely, a very ignorant man, as the sequel will show, with the request that he would read out for the meeting, into English, that passage of the rubric concerning defects in the celebration of mass, which states that wax candles should be present. The words are—"Si non adsint luminaria cerea." It is contained in article X. of the rubric, the title of which is, "De defectibus in ministerio ipso occurrentibus." This passage produced a great effect on Mickey, and still greater on the meeting; for we find, according to the report, that one Barney Daly stated that, often as he had heard mass in the poorhouse he could not be certain whether it was a mere wafer or the true sacrament he worshipped; nay, rather, he might be sure of the contrary; for the opinion of the meeting, and of the learned Mickey Reilly, sanctioned by the missioner, was, that if wax candles were not present, "the sacrament is'nt made at all." Now, this missioner had either read the rubric, or he had not. If the latter, he was guilty of great presumption in taking the Missal out of his pocket at all. If the former, I will show that he was guilty of great dishonesty in leaving his poor hearers under a great delusion. I shall have to trouble you, sir, and your readers, to attend to a somewhat lengthy quotation from the rubric. It is, in fact, the preface at length. "Sacerdos celebraturus, omnem adhibeat diligentiam, ne desit aliquid ex requisitis ad sacramentum Eucharistiæ conficiendum. Potest autem defectus contingere ex parte materiæ consecrandæ, et ex parte formæ adhibendæ, et ex parte ministri conficientis. Quidquid enim horum deficit, scilicet materia debita, forma cum intentione, et ordo sacerdotalis in conficiente, non conficitur sacramentum. Et his existentibus quibuscumque aliis deficientibus, veritas adest sacramenti. Alii vero sunt defectus qui in missæ celebratione occurrentes etsi veritatem sacramenti non impediant, possunt tamen aut cum peccato aut cum scandalo contingere." Of which the following is a literal translation:—

"Let the priest about to celebrate use all diligence, that nothing be wanting of those things which are required to make the sacrament of the Eucharist. A defect can occur in respect of the matter to be consecrated, in respect of the form to be used, and in respect of the minister who performs; for, whatever of these be wanting, to wit, the proper matter, the form with intention, and priestly order in him who performs, no sacrament is made. Yet these (viz., three conditions) existing, although certain other things be wanting, the true sacrament is present. There are other defects which may occur in the celebration of mass, although they do not hinder a true sacrament; when they do happen, they must be called a sin or a scandal."

From this, then, it appears, that the conditions essential to a true sacrament are—1st. "Materia debita;" 2nd. "Forma cum intentione;" 3rd. "Ordo sacerdotalis in conficiente." In the tenth article of the rubric, there occurs the mention of a great number of defects, in the lower sense of the word, which cannot occur in the celebration, without great offence or culpable negligence on the part of the priest. Among these occur wax candles. "Si non sint luminaria cerea." I have no doubt, nor can any sensible Catholic have a doubt, that tallow candles, or "dips," as they are contemptuously called, would, under the exigency of the case in question, here answer as well as wax, for the service of the mass to the faithful poor.

Having stated the case, and its refutation, without touching on other topics in No. XIX., on which much could be said,

I remain, sir, your obedient Servant,

A CATHOLIC.

We think our correspondent quite right upon the point of the candles. We think that the word "defect," is used in the rubric of the mass, for things that do prevent transubstantiation taking place, and also for things that do not prevent transubstantiation taking place. And this double use of the word in that rubric has led other Protestants into an error, as well as Mr. Burke, the missioner.*

We have often invited Roman Catholics to correct any erroneous statement about their religion that may appear in our pages; and we thankfully accept at their hands any such correction. We are sure that it will give confidence and satisfaction to our readers to see, that what we publish

---

* Sic. in MS. Query Capharnaite?

† Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., p. 751. Ed. Paris, 1672. The Latin was given in our number for December, p. 142, col 3, note.

‡ Hæc est vera illa et germana epistola Liberii, quam tædio exilii mortisque metu turpiter et ignominiose superatus, post exactum biennium Exilii, Felicemque in sede pontificia subrogatum, scripsit ad orientales, significans se latam contra Athanasium sententiam suo suffragio comprobare, Arianos ad communionem admittere, editamque Sirmii professionem fidei, veint Catholicam approbare.—Given by Labbe and Cossart, in the place referred to above.

§ Liberius tædio victus exilii, in hæreticam pravitatem subscribens, Romam quasi victor intravit. Same reference.

* See supra, page 6.

is thus carefully watched, and corrected, when we do publish anything requiring correction. They will then know that what stands uncorrected and unquestioned may be relied on.

We think the notion among Protestants, of the necessity of wax candles at the mass has arisen latterly from the general demand made for them from the Boards of Guardians of workhouses, since Protestants called attention to the necessity for them.* And hence it was too hastily assumed, that the object of their anxiety was to remedy a "defect" that was fatal to the mass, and not merely a "defect" which only involved (to use our correspondent's own words) a "great offence or culpable negligence on the part of the priest." And sufficient care has not always been given to ascertain the precise value of the "defect" from "the rubric of the mass," which certainly is not the simplest document in the world.

Having now frankly admitted the error which appeared in our pages (as we shall always be ready to do), we ask our correspondent to consider as frankly the real effect of the correction of such an error; we ask him to do so, because he seems inclined to build more on it than it can carry. He seems to take for granted, that he has now proved "that among the members of the (Roman) Catholic Church, no doubt or hesitation is felt (or need be) as to the efficacy of that holy sacrament, as it is presented to their faith." Now, we frankly admit, that (IF transubstantiation be really true, and if the rubrics of the mass may be relied on with DIVINE FAITH) no Roman Catholic need have any doubt or hesitation, so far as the candles are concerned. But is it still a question, whether they ought not reasonably to feel some doubt and hesitation upon other points, as to what it really is to which they give divine worship?

Our correspondent is evidently a perfect master of this rubric, and we beg to ask his opinion on the following case. Suppose that the wine used was not really made of grapes (de vite), or suppose the wine had been made from sour or unripe grapes (de uvis acerbis, seu non maturis expressum), is the sacrament "made" in that case? We expect our correspondent will admit, that in such a case the bread is NOT changed into the body of Christ, and the wine is NOT changed into the blood of Christ. In that case, then, the people give to mere bread and wine "the worship of Latria, which is due TO THE TRUE GOD.† Now, what knowledge have the people whether the wine was made from grapes that were ripe, or from grapes that were not ripe? or whether the wine was made from grapes at at all? They cannot judge of that for themselves, for they are never allowed to taste the wine. They must trust to the priest for that. Can they be sure of his judgment? They do not see the priest taste it until after he has consecrated it. Can they be sure that the priests, who have committed "great offence or culpable negligence" about the candles, did always taste the wine? And if the priest did taste the wine, is every priest an infallible judge of the fact, whether the grapes, from which that wine was made, were really ripe or not? We believe it to be a fact (and we mention it only as a fact, and not as an offence), that the usual beverage of an Irish priest is whisky-punch; and that many of them seldom taste wine in their lives. How can they be judges of whether the grapes were ripe or not? It is also notorious, that most of the wine sold in country towns in Ireland was never made of grapes at all, but concocted in this country. And this manufacture is brought to such perfection, that even a good judge of wine cannot tell, with certainty, whether it is made of grapes or not.

How is the wine provided for mass in the workhouses? We believe it is generally paid for out of the rates, and purchased by the master's boy in the next shop in a country town; a shop in which, perhaps, no wine really made of grapes was ever sold.

Yet, our correspondent must confess, that if that wine be not really made of grapes, and of ripe grapes, too, the people at mass in the workhouse are giving divine worship to a mere piece of bread and wine.

And now, we ask, what degree or kind of certainty is necessary, that the bread and wine are really turned into the body and blood of Christ, before we may worship it? Will any certainty less than DIVINE FAITH be enough? And if it be necessary to have divine faith that this change has really taken place, then is it not necessary to have the certainty of divine faith, that the wine was really made of ripe grapes? And how can any one have "divine faith" that the wine bought in a country shop was really made of "ripe grapes?" And if he cannot have this, how can he have "divine faith" that that wine is really turned into the blood of Christ? And if he have not this, how can he have "divine faith" that it is really "the body, and blood, and soul, and divinity of Christ" that he is worshipping? And if he have not this faith, how can his worship be an "act of faith?"

Let it be remembered, what Roman Catholic controversialists say to Protestants: "You can never make an act of faith (they say) because you have not divine faith that the Bible is the Word of God; and when you have not divine faith for the first step, you cannot have it for any after." Now, we ask Roman Catholics to consider, can any Roman Catholic have as much faith or certainty, that the wine, sold in a country shop, was made of RIPE grapes, as a Protestant has, that the Bible is the Word of God? If not, what certainty can a Roman Catholic have, that that wine is really turned into the blood of Christ? We invite our correspondent to answer this question, and to set us right, if we are wrong.

Our readers will, of course, understand, that we do not say this as if we believed transubstantiation to be true. Our object is to inquire, what certainty Roman Catholics have, even if transubstantiation were true, that the change has really taken place at that particular mass at which they worship?

This is only one particular, out of many, out of which doubt may arise; but one is enough at a time, and we ask our correspondent to solve it.

* We are ourselves acquainted with several members of Boards of Guardians who were present when the Roman Catholic chaplains made the demand for wax candles. And all these demands were made much about the same time.

† Latriæ cultum, qui vero Deo debetur.—Council of Trent, Sess. XII. chap. 3.

DOES THE CHURCH OF ROME ENCOURAGE THE HOLY SCRIPTURE?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I take the liberty of troubling you for a few moments respecting a subject which you have again and again stated in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and supported by proofs (or asserted proofs), derived from (professedly) the authorized edicts of the Church of Rome, and the statements made by her ecclesiastics—among the rest, by Cardinal Wiseman, in his tract, which was analyzed in your columns in June and July last, the subject being the circulation of the Holy Scriptures in Roman Catholic countries, which you have said (sustained, as stated), is forbidden, and, as much as possible, prevented. I am led to these observations by the perusal of the Weekly Telegraph for November 17, 1853, in which the subjoined assertions are made, and which are impossible to be reconciled with yours, so contradictory do they appear:—

The Weekly Telegraph says—"In no Catholic (Roman?) country is there a law against the circulation of the Scriptures. In every Catholic (Roman?) country the circulation of the Scriptures is encouraged. It is a gross, &c., invention to assert the contrary. D'Aubigne asserts that there was no version of the Bible in the German language previous to the time of Luther. There was an Italian version made by Nicolai Malerie in 1471, another by A. Buccioli in 1523, and that is promoted by all means within the command of the Church, of Popes, Cardinals, &c., &c, an Italian version by Anthony Martini, a version which received the sanction of Pius VI., and that has been printed times innumerable!! (?)" The editor certainly qualifies his statements by the following:—"The circulation of the Scriptures, however, is a very different thing from a circulation of a perversion of the Scriptures." Diodati's version is, according to the Rev. Dr. Dixon such a one. He says, 'Calmet observes, that in the same way as in his French Bible, Diodati's has rather given a paraphrase, than a version in the strict sense." As I, by all means, desire to elicit truth, will you be pleased, if possible, to refute this, and give clearly the proofs, on which it can be based—your former statements of the withholding of the Bible from the people in their own language, in Roman Catholic countries, and a contradiction of the editor of the Weekly Telegraph's assertions, as quoted above. Or, if you have already made the subject clear, by referring to the places.

I am sir, yours respectfully,

WILLIAM MURPHY.

Our correspondent's desire to be furnished with proofs of the anxiety of the Roman Catholic Church to withhold the Scriptures from the people in their own language may be very easily gratified. We begin with the rule laid down by the order of the Council of Trent, which may be regarded as the most authoritative standard of the Church of Rome, in this as well as other matters.

The Fathers of the Synod ordered that an index of the prohibited books should be laid before the then Pope, Pius IV., who approved of it, and it was published with the rules placed at the head of it, as by the orders of the Council itself. The fourth rule was as follows:—

"Whereas, it is manifest by experience, that, if the Holy Bible, translated into the vulgar tongue, be allowed indifferently to any body, there will, on account of men's rashness, arise from hence a greater detriment than advantage . . . . if any one, without a license, presume to read or keep by him the Bible, he shall be disqualified to receive the absolution of his sins, till he deliver it up to the ordinary." —Regulæ Indicis S.S. Synodi Tridentinæ jussu editæ, De libr. prohib. reg. 4.

This does not look very like an "encouragement of the circulation of the Scriptures," which the Editor of the Weekly Telegraph asserts to prevail in all Roman Catholic countries. But, let us hear Pope Clement VIII's annotations on this rule of Pius IV.:—

"This law is not to be so understood as if by it the bishops, inquisitors, or heads of convents were invested with power to grant licenses to read, buy, or keep the Bible translated into vulgar language, seeing hitherto, by the order and practice of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, the power had been taken away from them, to grant licenses to read, or keep the whole Bible in the vulgar tongue, or any other part of the Holy Scriptures, of the old or new Testaments, published in any vulgar language, even not so much as the summaries or compendiums of the said Bibles, or books of the holy Scriptures, translated into any vulgar language; all which is to be inviolably observed."

By the fourth rule of the Index, a bishop or inquisitor had power, in certain cases, to give a written license to read the Bible; but here we see, that by this interpretation of Clement VIII., a bishop has in reality no such power, and that if a Roman Catholic wants permission to read the Scriptures, or even a summary or compendium of the Scriptures, in his own native tongue, the bishop cannot give him leave, but he must seek it from the "Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition." After this decision of Clement VIII., we need not wonder to find a prohibition in the Index of "all Bibles penned in any vulgar language whatsoever" (biblia vulgari quocunque idiomate conscripta); and yet, according to the editor of the Weekly Telegraph, it is a gross invention to assert that the Church of Rome does not encourage the circulation of the Scriptures!

That the Council of Trent really intended to prohibit the promiscuous reading of the Holy Scriptures appears further from the most authentic writers. Alphonsus a Castro, who had been one of the members of that assembly, says expressly (Lib. I. contr. Hær. c. 13.) that "one of the parents and springs of heresies was the translation of the holy Scriptures into the vulgar language, and, therefore, bestows great praises on the edict of Ferdinand and Elizabeth, king and queen of Spain, by which they had forbidden, under the severest penalties, either to translate the holy Scriptures into the vulgar languages, or to keep any translation made of them, under any pretence whatever." Sixtus Senonsis says plainly, that "to allow shoemakers, fullers, &c., to read the Scriptures, is to give that which is holy unto the dogs, and to cast pearls before swine." Cardinal Bellarmine, the great oracle of the Roman Catholic Church, writes as plainly as he well can to the same effect. "We maintain," says he (speaking, apparently, the settled doctrine and opinion of his Church on this point) "that the Scriptures ought NOT to be read publicly in the vulgar tongue, nor allowed to be read indifferently by everybody." (Quod contendimus est, non debere publice legi lingua vulgari, nec passim omnibus permitti legendas Scripturas lingua vulgari. De controv., tom. I., p. 70. Prag. 1721).

We are well aware that the Gallican Church has held that the rules of the Index, which place a restriction on the circulation of the Bible, were never received in France by public authority, and are not generally binding. But, upon this point, it will be sufficient to quote the opinion of Dens, who was for a long time, and is still, for aught we know, the standard authority at Maynooth. "According to Steyaeret," says he, "the law (i.e. the fourth rule of the Index) was received and observed (with some variety, according to the peculiar genius of nations) in by far the greatest portion of the Catholic world, nay in the whole of that part of the world which is completely Catholic. It was more dispensed with only where Catholics lived among heretics." (Solum ubi inter hæreticos degendum fuit, plus in dultum est. Dens vol. ii., p. 103).

We believe that in this passage Dens has, unwittingly, told the true state of the case, or, to use the vulgar phrase, "has let the cat out of the bag." As long as the Church of Rome had all the power in her own hands she placed restrictions and prohibitions on the reading of the Scriptures; and these restrictions are only relaxed where heretical Protestants will not let her have altogether her own way.

The last authority which we shall quote, is one which we think even the editor of the Weekly Telegraph will find it hard to disavow. Cardinal Wiseman, in his "Catholic Doctrine of the use of the Bible," a book published only last year, writes as follows (page 20):—

"If, therefore, we be asked why we do not give the Bible indifferently to all, and the shutting up of God's Word be disdainfully thrown in our face, we will not seek to elude the question, or meet the taunt by denial, or by attempts to prove that our principles on the subject are not antagonistic to those of Protestants. They are antagonistic, and we glory in avowing it." This passage, we think, needs no comment.

We think we have said enough for the present to enable our correspondent to satisfy himself of the truth or falsehood of the assertion of the editor of the Weekly Telegraph, that "the circulation of the Scriptures is encouraged in every Roman Catholic country." We hope to take another opportunity of adverting to some other parts of his letter.

ON DR. CAHILL'S ATTACK ON THE PROTESTANT BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Your Roman Catholic readers may have seen a letter signed D. W. Cahill, D.D., in the Tablet of the 17th ultimo, which charges the Protestant Church with the shameless crime of "mistranslating, subtracting" from "and adding to the most important passages of both the Old and New Testament." Happily the writer descends from generalities, and selects, as a proof, one text—viz., Matt. xxvi. 26, from the authorised or Protestant version of the Holy Scriptures, by which he hopes to establish his sweeping charge. A failure, then, in his proof in this text which he has selected, would naturally throw suspicion on the rest of his assertions.

The Protestant translation—viz., "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples," is thus given by the writer, and his proof is as follows:—"Here you introduce the pronoun 'it' three times, in order to carry the antecedent—'bread'—as it were, through the whole text, and, therefore, show that it was this said bread the Apostles eat. Now, the pronoun 'it' is not found in the original; and thus the Protestant Church, with a palpable and shameful interpolation, corrupted the Greek text, in order to make out a lie to meet their absurd doctrine on this vital point." Would, then, the pronoun "it," if there by expression, establish a truth? and why should not its existence by sense and implication in the text (if this can be proved) equally establish that Jesus brake and gave, and the Apostles ate bread. Now, in answer to this grievous charge of interpolation brought against the Protestant Church, I would remark that the Douay translation, as well as the authorized version of the Holy Scriptures, frequently introduces pronouns after verbs, which introduction the genius of the English language requires; and I must call attention to the marked contrast between the Protestant Catholic and Roman Catholic Churches in introducing them: the authorized version habitually expresses them in a different type, in order to advertise the reader of the introduction of these pronouns; but the Douay translation habitually expresses such pronouns in the same type as the rest of the text; so that the reader, in the latter case, is unaware of the addition, while the reader of the Protestant translation, called by the Rev. Dr. Cahill, a "forgery of the Bible," receives intimation of the fact. Now, if the mere introduction of the pronoun 'it' after verbs is sufficient to establish Protestant corruption of the Bible, what will Roman Catholics say, if it is true, that the Roman Catholic Church is guilty of similar corruption. Refer, then, Roman Catholic readers, to the original Greek of Acts xxvii. 35; compare it with your Douay Bible—viz., "taking bread, he gave thanks to God in the sight of them all, and when he had broken IT he began to eat,"* and you find the Roman Catholic Church guilty of that very crime (if it be one) charged by the reverend writer against the Protestant Church, for the pronoun "it" in the translation is not found in the original Greek, nor yet in the Latin Vulgate,† authorized by the Church of Rome; and, therefore, the Rev. Dr. Cahill, in accusing us, brings the charge of shameful interpolation equally against the Douay Bible; and I expect the reverend writer, in his next letter (if he be impartial), will arraign his Church as guilty of putting forth (to use his own words) "a forgery on the Holy Ghost," "a slander on Christ," "a libel" on "God."

Again, I refer your Roman Catholic readers to the eighteenth chapter of Genesis, 28-32 verses, inclusive, Septuagint (Tig. Helv.,) 1730, Vulgate (Paris ed., 1851); Compare the Septuagint and your so-called authentic Vulgate with the Douay translation, and in these five verses the Septuagint and the text authorized by Pope Clement VIII., is corrupted by the Douay translators, if the introduction of the pronoun "it" be a corruption; for after the verbs "destroy" and "do," the fatal prononn "it" is introduced (shamefully interpolated, will Dr. Cahill say), five times, in these five consecutive verses; and, therefore, if the charge be well founded, both Churches are guilty, and especially that Church which professes ability to give an infallible interpretation of Holy Scripture, and an authentic translation, and yet gives expletives as part of the original.

But I hope now to show, to the satisfaction of your unbiassed readers, and the Roman Catholic laity among them, that Holy Scripture shows us that the object of the verbs "blessed," "brake," and "gave," in 26th Matthew, 26th verse is bread, and that our Blessed Lord gave the said bread which he took (whatever it represented) to his disciples, bidding them to eat it. Turn to Luke xxiv. 30, and compare with 35th verse of same chapter; the former tells us Jesus took bread, blessed, and brake, and gave; the latter informs us how the two disciples "knew him in the breaking of" [what he blessed and gave] "bread." And now I call in the valuable aid of the note on this text in Macnamara's Roman Catholic Bible, and in the Rhemish Testament, part of which I transcribe, for in recent editions of the Douay Bible it is prudently omitted. "'Took bread,' the Fathers, in divers places, take this to be meant of the Sacrament.' 'And that it should be meant of the Holy Sacrament the form of solemn taking the bread into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, and reaching it to his disciples (exceeding proper to the consecration, and common to none other vulgar benediction, nor anywhere used but in Christ's miraculous multiplying the loaves), and the singular effect in notifying Christ unto them, do prove." Here, then, Roman Catholics have the 30th verse explained, and the pronoun "IT," which is not expressed in the text in this administration of the Lord's Supper, as recorded by St. Luke, they are taught should be supplied to complete the sense, and convey the true signification; for if the text is, "He took bread, and blessed, and brake, and did reach to them," the comment of the Roman Catholic Church, where the pronoun "it" is three times inserted after the participles of the three verbs used in the text ("blessing it, breaking it, reaching it"), is that this terrible and corrupting pronoun "it," must be virtually or in signification in the passage, and that, therefore, it does carry the antecedent 'bread,' as it were, through the whole text; and, therefore, shows that it was this said bread the disciples "eat." If, then, the Protestant Church has inserted the pronoun "it" in Mat. xxvi. 26, she is taught by the Rhemish Testament, note on Luke xxiv. 30, that if she does express "it" in her authorized translation, she gives only the true sense—viz., that which the Roman Catholic version says is implied; and that the reverend accuser of our Church, when he asserts that she, "with a palpable and shameful interpolation corrupted the Greek text," is convicted, by the note of his own Church, of making a charge which he ought to know is untrue.

Has, then, the Roman Catholic Church corrupted with a palpable and shameful interpolation the Greek text in Acts xxvii. 35? No; every tyro in Greek, who is not utterly blind, is aware that, while ancient language omit generally the pronoun after the verb, the modern require its insertion. The authorized version, then, of the Protestant Church, by the testimony of the Rhemish note, is correct in teaching that our Lord, in the Sacrament, took bread, "blessing it, breaking it, reaching it," and so administered bread to his disciples—viz., the said bread which he took; and I should wish that the reverend doctor would tell his spectators, when next he takes bread, what is the thing which he takes, blesses, breaks, and reaches to them; whether it is nothing or something; and, if the latter (before consecration), what that something is. What it was our Saviour broke and they ate, is distinctly stated by his two disciples on their return from Emmaus, for they inform the twelve how he was known of them "in the breaking of bread."*

ENOCH HELI.

* In the Greek, και κλασας, ηρξαρο εσθιειν.

† In the Vulgate, Et cum fregisset, cæpit manducare.

* εν τη κλασει τα αρτου.

FLOWERS FOR JANUARY.

THE GARDEN.

IN our monthly articles on farming operations it has been our custom to give our readers something useful as regards the worldly affairs in which many of them are occupied. The flowers that periodically visit our earth, and with which Ireland is so richly decked, present a subject certainly of some interest to every one of us, and though it is not quite so practical a one, in a temporal sense, as farming, it may, perhaps, be made more permanently instructive, by opening out some of the varied associations with which it is linked. The plan of our paper, as announced in our earliest number (17th January, 1852), forbids us to undertake anything "merely to amuse the listless portion of the public, or to while away an idle hour;" but we greatly deceive ourselves if the simple flowers of the field and garden cannot suggest suitable topics of inquiry, reaching beyond the sphere of our earthly existence, which it has been our effort to prosecute in a spirit of fairness and friendliness, and in selecting for our subjects the "stars of the earth"—the purest, happiest remembrancers of our first estate—

> "Least changed of all > That of the passed immortal tells"

we are hoisting ensigns of peace upon which we trust the rude blasts of discord may never blow.

It was a thought worthy of a poet, that in paradise each flower was a spirit's home, and that when all else had departed after the fall, the spirits lingered still among the flowers. Something like this idea, with more or less of the colouring of fancy and imagination, has pervaded every nation of the east and west, and has attributed to the flower-spirit a language expressive alike of the liveliest and deepest sentiments of the soul. But no writers have drawn more largely than the inspired penmen of the Sacred Volume on the flowers of the field and its verdant vesture to preach short sermons on practical subjects. Thus the transitory condition and uncertain tenure of human life and happiness is set forth in many a passage, such as that of Job—"Man cometh forth like a flower, and is destroyed."—Job, xiv. 2 (Douay version); or of King David—"Man's days are as grass, as the flowers of the field, so shall he flourish, but the mercy of the Lord is from eternity to eternity upon them that fear him."—Psalm cii. 15, 16. In the same strain the Prophet Isaias contrasts the passing glory of man with the enduring Word of God—"All flesh is grass, and the glory thereof as the flower of the field. The grass is withered and the flower is fallen, because the Spirit of the Lord hath blown upon it. Indeed, the people is grass, the grass is withered, and the flower is fallen, but the Word of our Lord endureth for ever."—Isaias xl. 6, 7 8. And, not to multiply instances, how beautifully has our Blessed Lord himself taught the lesson of the watchful providence of God, and the folly of human carefulness and worldly anxiety, when he said—"Consider the lilies of the field how they grow, they labour not, neither do they spin. But I say, that not even Solomon, in all his glory, was arrayed as one of these. And if the grass of the field which is to-day, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, God doth so clothe, how much more you, O ye of little faith."—Math. vi. 28, 29, 30. And Solomon, whose surpassing glory was instanced by our Lord, surrounded, as he was, with all the glories of nature and of art, when he thought to pourtray a coming Saviour, selected "the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley," while, under the emblem of a garden enclosed, he describes the Church of Christ—i. e., the believing people of God collectively—"My sister, my spouse, is a garden enclosed, a fountain sealed up. Thy plants are a paradise of pomegranates with the fruits of the orchard." We have, therefore, sufficient warrant to lay hold on the flowers of the field and garden, and extract from them morals of practical wisdom if we can.

A very distinguished philosopher quaintly said, it was God Almighty himself who planted the first garden. No doubt the same Almighty power planted the everlasting hills, reared the stately forests, and spread the glittering firmament above, and the enamelled meadows beneath. But the sacred narrative, while it details the creation of the heavens, and the earth, and the moon, and the stars, and the living creatures of the earth, and, last of all, man, in God's own image, and proceeds to describe how God had endowed him with the dominion over all, winds up the wondrous history with this simple announcement:—"And the Lord God had planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he planted the man whom he had formed," as if to say, that though God had given man the wide world for his inheritance, he fixed his habitation in a garden of his own planting, a peculiar spot, where he might walk and hold converse with his Creator. In another verse of the Book of Genesis it is called "the Garden of the Lord. In the Douay version of the Bible it is called a "paradise of pleasure." In the poet's lofty song it is described thus:—

> "In this pleasant spot
> A far more pleasant garden God ordained.
> Out of the fertile ground he caused to grow
> All trees of noblest kind, for sight, smell, taste;
> And all amid them, stood the tree of life,
> High, eminent, blooming, ambrosial fruit
> Of vegetable gold.
> From the sapphire fount the crisped brook
> Rolling o'er orient pearl and sands of gold,
> With mazy error, under peodant shade,
> Ran nectar, visiting each plant, and fed
> Flowers worthy of paradise."

Such is the description given of the garden of God in which man was placed, "that he might dress it and keep it." Here no noxious weeds or poisonous plants could mix with the wholesome herbs and flowers of God's own planting; and though man's eye might expatiate on the scenes of endless fertility, and wander towards the forest glades that lay beyond and outside, his home and habitation were to be in the garden which God had given him.

As truly as God had planted for the use of man, a garden in the world of nature, so has he, in the world of grace, provided him with a hallowed spot, "which his own wisdom planted, his own Spirit watereth, and in which God's own Son is continually walking, and where he meeteth those that seek him, and revealeth the glories of his power, and the riches of his goodness." Where, the reader may ask, is this garden?

It is in the Holy Scriptures, the "lively oracles" of God, which the Douay Bible declares to be "the words of life," from which the simplest, plainest man can learn all the concerns of eternity, the love of God, and his righteousness and justice, the lost state and condition of man, and how he has polluted his soul by sin, and forfeited his innocency and glorious patrimony by his rebellion against his Maker, and the redemption of both purchased by the blood of God's co-equal Son, for all those who come unto him by faith.

What a blessed privilege, then, to have access to this "Garden of the Lord," to be enabled to consult "the words of life" themselves, to hear God Almighty speaking, as he spoke to our first parents, and to Abraham, Moses, and the prophets—to read the words of him who spoke as man never spoke before, and in language addressed to sinners as humble and as ignorant as any one of us; to read the history of his life, miracles, death, and glorious resurrection—to pause over the annals of the early Church, and the sowing of its seed in the blood of the martyrs; to read the triumphant testimony of a dying Stephen, the zealous earnestness of a repentant Peter, the commanding eloquence of a fearless Paul.

> Here mines of knowledge, love, and joy
> Are opened to our sight;
> The purest gold without alloy,
> And gems divinely bright.

One of our most distinguished oriental and classical, scholars, who was versed in the literature of every language, said of it, "The volume of the sacred Scriptures, independently of its Divine origin, contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence than can be collected from all the books, in whatever language they may have been written."* The great philosopher of the human mind describes it in few words—"It hath God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any admixture of error, for its matter."† The Douay Bible itself speaks of it in these glowing terms:—"The law of the Lord is unspotted—converting souls—faithful—giving wisdom to little ones—rejoicing the heart—enlightening the eyes."—Psalm, xviii. 8, (Psalm, xix. 7, Protestant Bible). "Thy word is a lamp to my feet—a light to my paths—it giveth light—it giveth understanding to little ones."—Psalm, cxvii. 105, 130. "The holy Scriptures, which can instruct thee to salvation. All Scripture inspired of God—profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice, that the man of God may be perfect, furnished to every good work."—2 Tim. iii. 15, 16, 17. Now, if this be the testimony of the Roman Catholic Bible itself, as to its own value, what right have the priesthood of the Church of Rome to prevent her people reading what God, in their own Bible, declares to be so instructive, so profitable, so pure, so faithful, so enlightening, so enlivening? Why forbid them entering upon the holy paths of inspiration, tasting those streams of grace and mercy, those living waters which she herself calls "the words of life?" Why must they not enter this garden of the Lord? Is it because some enemy might have entered and sowed poisonous seed, and planted noxious herbs therein? On this pretext she forbids her people to read the Protestant Bible, and warns her bishops to turn away their flocks by all means from these *poisonous pastures? But why does she not invite them to enter into the sweet and wholesome pastures of her own Bible? In Italy and Spain, where she has it all her own way, why is the Roman Catholic Bible never seen, if it be so instructive, so enlightening, so cheering as their own Douay Bible says it is? Why is the reading of the Bible proscribed and prohibited? Why is it that the vast majority of her people throughout the world have never read nor heard one chapter of it, but what they hear read from the altar in an unknown tongue? Is it because unlearned and unstable men may (as St. Peter says) wrest them to their own destruction? St. Peter said, what every man of common sense must know, that unteachable and unstable, wavering men might, and would, and will, wrest St. Paul's Epistles, as well as other Scriptures, to their own destruction; but, does St. Peter say the Bible, or any one of St. Paul's epistles, is a dangerous book to any reader, however humble? If he had said so, he would have been at variance with St. Paul, who, at the conclusion of one of these very epistles which St. Peter designated as containing things hard to be understood (e. g. about the second coming of our Lord, but not certainly harder than the Trinity, the incarnation of Christ, the origin and permission of sin), says, "I charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read to ALL the holy brethren."—1 Thess. v. 27. One of the earliest bishops of Rome, Clement, (as we noticed in our last number, p. 138), said, "Look into the Holy Scriptures, which are the true words of the Holy Ghost; ye know that there is nothing wicked or forged written in them." What security is there in reading a book of such a character as this, when we find that of the one hundred and seven current decrees and letters, palmed off as the genuine decrees and letters of the early popes, but twenty-three are genuine, and at least eighty-three of them are confessed forgeries, and admitted by every learned Roman Catholic to be audacious fabrications, by which the Church of Rome was imposed upon for several enturies!!

* Sir William Jones. † John Locke.

We, therefore, ask again and again why has the Church of Rome excluded her people from the Garden of the Lord and branded its hallowed enclosures with the epithet of poisonous pastures? Is it because the Scriptures are against her, that she must be against the Scriptures? It is hard to conceive why she discredits its authority as an unsafe and dangerous guide, and will not suffer it to speak for itself, but obscured with glosses and interpretations, while the Protestants appear to have no fear of any honest-minded man, however simple or unlearned, being poisoned by the words of life, or led into error by the words of truth. We know very well that dishonest and double-minded men will wrest the Scriptures, the plainest words that ever God spoke, as they will everything else, to their own destruction. Judas perverted the personal teaching of our blessed Lord to his own greater damnation. Our daily food, our liberty, the fire that burns on our hearth, may be abused and perverted by perverse and wicked men, and become instruments of evil and confusion. The Apostle tells us, that science, falsely so called, has done so, which some professing have erred concerning the faith."—1 Tim. vi. 20. We know that wine, which maketh glad the heart of man, may become an element of evil. David and Solomon commend its virtues, and direct its use. Isaias and St. Paul speak of its excess. The Bible thus prescribes the use of it; it recognises its capability of abuse, but yet St. Paul says no more than "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess." Would it not, then, be a very absurd inference to draw from all this, that because wicked and ungodly men abused the gifts of God, and because the Scriptures cautioned them against such an abuse, they were therefore to abjure them altogether, or only to touch them when prescribed by a physician?

But the most curious fact connected with this prohibition of the free circulation and reading of the Scriptures is this, that the only matter in respect of which the Church of Rome it apprehensive of the unlearned and unstable going astray is in respect of reading the Bible. Now, Protestants are very fearful lest unlearned and unstable people should mistake the sanction which the Church of Rome gives to the worship of images for a sanction of idolatry. They also think that nothing is more to be apprehended than that an ignorant, unlearned man may confound the supreme worship due to God alone (latria) with the secondary and inferior worship said to be due to the Blessed Virgin Mary (hyperdulia), or, that again, with the still lower worship said to be due to St. Joseph and the canonized saints of the Church (dulia). The Church of Rome admits that any mistake about these important and puzzling distinctions would involve the mortal sin of idolatry. And yet it appears to have no apprehension or concern about these matters, though so wonderfully alarmed when the people read the Scriptures, as they are commanded by the Scriptures to do. Is there not more danger to the unlearned in image-worship, or in giving to the Blessed Virgin the honor which God claims exclusively for himself? The use of indulgences, many people think, is apt to be wrested by the unlearned and unstable to their own destruction, because they may be perverted to a license to sin; yet the Church of Rome has no alarm as to these. It appears to be suspicious of nothing doing harm but the Bible.

But can it be that God, the source of all wisdom and knowledge, so far failed in his high purpose that he has inspired chosen men to write and to publish a revelation so exceedingly unsafe and unfit to be read by the mass of mankind, the very people for whom it was intended, and to whom it is addressed, that if men obey God's express commandment to search it and to read it, "more evil than advantage will arise thence?" We submit this plain question to every man of common sense in the country, and we leave the answer with himself.

But our readers may justly say, we have broken faith with them, and said very little about flowers. True it is; but, dear reader, remember that the flowers of January are "few and far between;" and that even the very grass itself is stationary; and well it is so, if the old saw be true—

> "If the grass grows in Janiver,
> It grows the worse for it all the year"

The snow is still upon the ground while we write, and the few flowers that have ventured to appear are almost all frozen and dead. Not so, however, one hardy, venturesome flower, fitly called the Gem of January, the winter Aconite (Eranthus hyemalis),

> "With buttercup-like flower that shut at night,
> Its green leaf furling round its cup of gold,
> Like tender maiden muffled from the cold."

This beautiful flower, with its glossy yellow petals resting on its fresh leaves of clearest green, starts into life, in the very depth of winter, as if—

> "Nature her pencil dipt in gold, > Bedecked it in a night."

Its bright blossoms are doubly welcome as they greet our steps, just as the old year has passed away, and the new one opened. It is the earliest harbinger of spring, the herald of reviving nature, sent before the Snowdrop and Crocus have yet appeared, sweetly assures us that flowers of brighter hue are at hand—

> "Ere thy sisters fair are waking,
> Deep on earth's dark bosom sleeping;
> Ere the chains of winter breaking,
> Loose the streams their might is keeping,
>
> "With a smile that well had greeted,
> Light, and song, and summer bower,
> On the sheltering calyx seated,
> Shines the yellow petalled flower."

Its popular name of Aconite is derived from a Greek term (ακονιτον) applied to it, as the poet, Ovid, tells us, because its flowers grow close to the earth and the rocks. The old writers called it Yellow Wolfsbane, because, like all flowers belonging to the ranunculus tribe, it is acrimonious and poisonous. The ancients considered the Aconite the deadliest of all poisons known to them; and Ovid describes its first invention by Hecate in a scene that might parallel that of Shakspeare's cauldron of the witches in Macbeth. However, the skill of science has enabled the physician to apply this poisonous herb to the relief of human maladies in different ways. Under the name Wolfsbane and deadly Aconite, it was known as a poison acting on the nervous system, especially the brain, producing frenzy; under its modern name of Monkshood, it is a valuable cure for the most excruciating disorder of the nervous system called neuralgia. So it is with the natural heart of man, out of which proceeds nothing but what is poisonous and wicked, according to our Saviour—"For from the heart come evil thoughts, murders, thefts, false testimonies."—St. Matt. xv. 19, until the Great Physician comes, and says—"I will give you a new heart, and put a new spirit within you."—Ezechiel xxxvi. 26. "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, unless it abide in the vine, so neither can you, unless you abide in me. I am the vine, you the branches, he that abideth in me and I in him, the same beareth much fruit, for without me ye can do nothing."—St. John xv. 4, 5. This is what is meant by the scriptural doctrine that good works are the fruit of acceptance before God, and justification through faith in Jesus Christ; and that good works cannot precede this acceptance or justification, much less can they conduce or co-operate to procure it. In this sense a man, before he stands justified in the sight of God, can do no work good or acceptable to him—a man, after he is justified by faith will inevitably produce the fruits of holiness.

> "And now is man, a seed that breeds,
> Or sweetest flowers or rankest weeds
> Flowers, lovely as the morning light
> Weeds, deadly as the Aconite."

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JANUARY.

(From the Irish Farmer's Gazette.)

We cannot too frequently advocate the great utility and necessity of early ploughing or digging stubble or other lands, for the reception of the spring crops. We would, therefore, remind our readers, that wherever this important operation remains undone, it should be no longer delayed. In warm climates the soil is greatly ameliorated, disintegrated, and broken down by the sun; and in cold climates the same process results from the alternate action of the frosts and thaws. A deep furrow is desirable; the action of frost on heavy clay lands renders it loose and friable, and the more roughly it is thrown up the greater will be the surface exposed to the action of the atmosphere; but such lands should not be ploughed up when wet, as that would render them still more tenacious and adhesive. They should be ploughed up early, when in a moderately dry state, and, if possible, before December closes; besides, the horses should now be employed in carting out manure, from the farm-yards to the headlands of such fields as are intended for green crops, and the manure securely banked up, bottomed, and covered over with rich, dry earth, or bog-mould. This would be also a good time, if frost sets in, or the land be not very likely to rut, to cart out marl and other dressings for grass lands.

Old grass lands, which are intended for lea oats or other crops, should now be ploughed up, and finished without delay, so as to afford time for the sods rotting, and the perfect closing and consolidation of the furrow-slices.

Spade Husbandry—It is evident that the foregoing directions for winter ploughing are only applicable to those who have a sufficient number of stout horses to do the work properly. This the small farmer does not possess; and, indeed, in the case of small farmers generally, the possession of a horse is a great evil. It induces him to scratch over his land, rather than to give it the necessary deep ploughing, because he has not the means of working it properly; and besides this, as the horse must be maintained some way or other, it is too often the case that this is done out of what ought to be used by the family. From inability to keep them in working order, we always find horses belonging to the smaller classes of farmers to be most wretched animals, unable to drag themselves along, much less to assist in cultivating the land in a proper manner. If a beast be required by a small farmer, we would prefer using a bullock; for he can be more easily kept than a horse, will do his work as efficiently, and, when not required, can be fattened and sold, whereas the old, worn-out horse is totally worthless. For the small farmer, however, the most efficient mode of culture is by the spade. This simple instrument can be used under all circumstances, costs nothing for its keep, and, when properly used, is much more efficient in the culture of the soil than the best-appointed plough. The great importance of spade husbandry, and its complete adaption to the case of the small farmers of Ireland, are only now beginning to be fully recognised. In allotting the size of farms we think that they ought to be either of such a size as can be conveniently cultivated under a proper rotation of crops, by means of the spade—say, five Irish acres—or that they shall be sufficiently large to give at least one pair of stout horses ample employment. There should not be any medium; for such would only cause the occupier to keep one, or, perhaps, two worthless animals, and the cultivation of those farms can never be so perfect as when cultivated entirely by spade labour, or by proper draught horses.

Wheat.—Where there is a considerable breadth of wheat still unsown we would urge some extra exertion in committing it to the earth without delay; it is still a good time, but will require an additional quantity of seed as the season advances, so as to prevent the plant tillering at a later period, and thereby retard the ripening of the crop.

Bere may be sown in rich, dry, and early soils, for either a grain or soiling crop.

Rye may be sown on cold, backward, or mountain soils, for grain or soiling crops, provided the soil be dry, or rendered so by water furrowing.

Vetches.—By the end of this month vetches may be sown, in warm, rich, and dry soils, if the weather be dry and open.

Peas may be sown any time this month, in dry and open weather, without manure, if the land be in tolerable condition; but if otherwise a moderate dressing of manure will improve the crop materially.

Beans may be sown by the middle or end of the month, on strong land, if not wet; if the land has not been well manured for a previous crop, it should get a liberal dressing. Although peas and beans may be sown this month, with every chance of success, we would prefer the next month, particularly if the present one should not turn out dry.

Ewes in lamb require careful treatment. This being the coldest month in the year, dry lying, shelter, and wholesome, nutritious food, are absolutely necessary to keep the flock in health; avoid giving frozen turnips, and in their stead give abundance of hay.

---

* See encyclical letter of of Pope Pius XII., published in 1824; and see the Roman Catholic Bishop Kenrick's candid testimony to the excellence of the authorized Protestant version, vol. I, CATHOLIC LAYMAN, p. 42. We have carefully compared the Douay and Authorized Version of the Bible in several numbers of the 2nd volume of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, from which the reader will see that the difference is so unimportant, that we are quite satisfied to take our quotations from the Douay version on most vital points of controversy.

New, Recent, and Illustrated Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Any Book or number of Books together, within a pound weight, can be sent by post for 6d., and at the rate of 6d. for every pound weight additional.

BURKE'S PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE; corrected to the present time. Royal 8vo. 38s.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

THE PRIVATE JOURNAL OF SIR GEORGE LARPENT, Judge-Advocate-General to the British Forces under the Duke of Wellington, during the Peninsular Campaign in 1812-14. 8vo. 15s.

DISCOVERY OF THE SITE OF THE DESTROYED CITIES OF THE PLAIN, SODOM AND GOMORRAH; Narrative of a Journey in Syria, and round the Dead Sea, now for the first time accomplished. By F. De Saulcey. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.

THE TURK AND THE HEBREW; OR, THE RULE OF THE CRESCENT. A Story of Real Events and Living Persons. Post 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF THE ANCIENT EGYPTIANS. Revised and abridged from his larger work. By Sir J. Gardner Wilkinson, D.C.L., F.R.S., &c. 2 vols. 8vo. with 500 Wood Engravings. 12s.

NORWAY AND ITS GLACIERS VISITED IN 1851. Followed by Journals of Excursions in the High Alps of Dauphine, Berne, and Savoy. By James D. Forbes, FR.S.E. Roy. 8vo. With 10 Coloured Lithographic, views. 21s.

SCANDINAVIAN ADVENTURES during a Residence of upwards of Twenty Years, with an Account of the Northern Fauna. By L. Lloyd, Esq. With upwards of 100 Illustrations. 2 vols. Royal 8vo. 42s.

LIFE IN ABYSSINIA: being the Personal Narrative of Three Year's Residence and Travel in that Country. By Mansfield Parkyns. With Map and Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.

HISTORY OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS, with an Account of their Struggles and Martyrdom, and the Final Triumph of Christianity. By Samuel Elliot. 2 vols. 8vo. 25s.

A HISTORY OF THE INSURRECTION IN CHINA; with Notices of the Christianity, Creed, and Proclamations of the Insurgents. By Dr. Yvan and M. Callery. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE CROSS AND THE DRAGON; or, the Fortunes of Christianity in China, with Notices of the Secret Societies of the Chinese. By J. Kesson. Post 8vo. 6s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION. Vol. V.—"The Reformation in England." 8vo. 12s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. Five vols. in One. 8vo. cloth, 8s. Gilt Edges, 9s.

HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN HUNGARY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REFORMATION TO 1850. With reference also to Transylvania. With an Introduction by Dr. D'Aubigne, 8vo. 10s. 6d.

JAEQUELINE PASCAL; OR, CONVENT LIFE IN PORT ROYAL. Compiled from the French of Victor Cousin, &c. By H. N. 5s.

THE PSALMS RESTORED TO THE MESSIAH. A COMMENTARY ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS. By Rev. R. H. Ryland. With a Commendatory Notice, by the Bishop of Cashel. 6s.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE REV. EDWARD BICKERSTETH. By the Rev. T. R. Birks. Cheaper Edition. 2 vols., fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF THE LIVES OF ROBERT AND JAMES A. HALDANE. By Alexander Haldane, Esq. 8vo. 12s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. W. H. KRAUSE, A.M., Bethesda Chapel, Dublin, with selections from his Correspondence. By Rev. C. S. Stanford. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOUR, Illustrative of his Divine Character and Mission. By Rev. A. L. R. Foote. 6s.

CHRIST OUR PASSOVER; or, Thoughts on the Atonement. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

THE LAND OF THE FORUM AND THE VATICAN; or, Thoughts and Sketches during an Easter Pilgrimage to Rome. By Newman Hall, B.A. Fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE ART OF QUESTIONING; or a Short Analysis of the Interrogatory Methods of Instruction, designed for the use of Teachers, Pupil Teachers, and Monitors. By W. T. Young, T. C. D. 1s. By post, 1s. 4d.

"Mr. Young brings a clear brain and evident experience to the analysis of his subject."—The Advocate.

"The author belongs to the more advanced school of educational reformers, and his production is replete with enlightened sentiments of a truly practical character."—Sunday School Teacher's Magazine.

"The author's plan is a clear and simple one, in which the mind as well as the memory of the pupil is exercised, while the necessity of a clearly-defined and easily-understood question is enforced by appropriate examples, as the true source of a ready and intelligent answer."—Christian Family Advocate.

WORK; or Plenty to Do, and how to Do it. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 12mo. 4s.

THE TENT AND ALTAR—SKETCHES OF PATRIARCHAL DAYS. By Rev. Dr. Cumming. 9s.

DAILY BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS—THE APOSTLES AND EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By Dr. Kitto. 6s.

THE ROYAL PREACHER—AN EXPOSITION OF ECCLESIASTICS. By the Rev. James Hamilton, D.D. 2s. 6d.

A DEFENCE OF "THE ECLIPSE OF FAITH." By its Author. Being a rejoinder to Professor Newman's Reply. 5s. 6d.

WORD PICTURES from the BIBLE; or, Scenes from Scripture History Depicted, and their Practical and Doctrinal Teaching Asserted and Enforced. By G. H. Taylor. 4s. 6d.

CHURCH PARTIES. An Essay. Reprinted from the Edinburgh Review. 1s.

EPISCOPAL COUNSEL upon MINISTERIAL DUTIES. By the Bishop of Ossory. 1s. 6d.

THE ETERNAL DAY. By the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D. 2s.

WHY WEEPEST THOU? or, the Cry from Ramah Hushed by the Voice from Heaven. By the Rev. Dr. Macfarlan. 2s. 6d.

THE WORDS OF JESUS. By the Author of the "Faithful Promiser." In Cover 8d.; Cloth, 1s.

RELIGION IN HEART AND LIFE; or, the Fruits of the SPIRIT. By Rev. Frederick George Barton. 3s.

THE SUCCESSFUL MERCHANT; Sketches of the Life of Mr. Samuel Budgett. By William Arthur, A.M. 2s. 6d.

FAR OFF; or, AFRICA AND AMERICA DESCRIBED. Part II. By the Author of "Peep of Day." 5s.

LILLY GORDON—THE YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER. By Cousin Kate. 4s. 6d.

MEMORABLE WOMEN—The Story of their Lives. By Mrs. Newton Crosland. 6s.

THE CHRISTMAS STOCKING. By the Author of "The Wide, Wide World." 2s.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND. By Miss Strickland. New and Revised Edition. With numerous Portraits. Vol. 1, post 8vo, 7s. 6d. (To be completed in 8 monthly volumes.)

THE HEIR OF REDCLYFFE. By the Author of "Henrietta's Wish." Two vols. fcap. 8vo. 10s.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS; or, the Founders of New England in the Reign of James the First. By W. H. Bartlett. With 28 Steel Engravings and 31 Illustrations on Wood. Super. Royal 8vo. 12s.

THE PRIEST AND THE HUGUENOT; or, Persecution in the Reign of Louis XV. Translated from the French of L. F. Bungener. Two vols. post 8vo. 12s.

SPEECHES OF THE RIGHT HON. THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY, M.P. Revised and corrected by himself. 8vo, 12s.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE; from the downfall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852. 2. Vols. 8vo. 15s. each.

Just Published. Price 6s. No. 1.—New Series,

OF

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND QUARTERLY REVIEW.

A Quarterly Journal of Theology, Art, Science, and Literature, for the United Church of England and Ireland.

This long-established Periodical has become the property of a body of Clergymen and gentlemen who are resolved to spare neither labour nor expense to make it an able, powerful, and decided organ for the Evangelical portion of the Church.

All questions of Theology will be discussed in a fair and Scriptural spirit, bearing in mind the full meaning of that article of the Church which declares Holy Scripture to be the sole authority for matters of faith.

Special attention will be paid to the circumstances and necessities of Ireland, and to the History and Progress of the Episcopal Church in America.

American and Continental Literature will receive due attention; and it will be the object of the conductors that no important work published abroad, and especially in Germany, shall escape notice.

CONTENTS:

I. Missions in India.
II. The Condition of the Poor.
III. Ferguson's Discourses.
IV. Recent French Novels.
V. Syria, its Creeds and Prospects.
VI. The Irish Difficulty.
VII. Beecher's Conflict of Ages.
VIII. Professor Maurice and King's College.
IX. Quarterly Report of Facts and Progress.
X. Literature of the Quarter Reviewed and Classified.

Agents for Ireland—William Curry and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Just Published, Part I. Price 1s.

POPULAR CHRISTIAN COMPANION TO THE BIBLE.—THE CHRISTIAN CYCLOPÆDIA. By the Rev. James Gardiner, M.D & A.M., Author of "A Commentary on Christ's Sermon on the Mount." "Memoirs of Christian Females," "Memoirs of Eminent Missionaries," &c.

☞ The Volume will contain 900 pages, Imperial 8vo, double columns, and will be issued in Fifteen Monthly Parts, at One Shilling Each.

Subscribers names entered by William Curry and Company, 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Just Published, Fcap. 8vo, neat cover, 1s.; in cloth, 1s. 6d.; in cloth, gilt edges, 2s. (Postage 6d. extra).

I.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD:

Reprinted from the Catholic Layman.

Showing how the Irish People talk about Irish Doings, when they get a quiet Place at the back of a Ditch, or under a Hedge.

II.

The Catholic Layman,

VOL. II.

WITH INDEX COMPLETE.

Neatly Bound in Cloth, Lettered, price 5s. 6d.

"We most heartily rejoice in the extensive circulation of such a paper—a paper, be it remarked, whose pages are open to free inquiry from Roman Catholics as well as from Protestants; an arrangement as wise as it is liberal. This expansive spirit, on the part of the Editors of 'THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN' has been fully appreciated by many well-educated Roman Catholics, and has tended greatly to its success; and, we are free to confess, that the correspondence from this class of readers, not only enhances the usefulness of the paper, but the interest of it also, while the very circumstance that it is largely taken advantage of, points to a brighter future for poor, misguided, misgoverned Ireland."—Rugby Paper.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND CO., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH, Paternoster-row.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.
January, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Gloir do Dhia an na hárduibh, agus síodcáin air an talamh deaghoil do na daoinibh.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 26. FEBRUARY, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 2s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Modern Worship in Rome	13
The Forged Decretal Epistles—No. III.	16
The Heir of Ballymanus—No. II.	19
Talk of the Road—No. XXI.	22
Freedom of Discussion, and the Court of Queen's Bench	23
The "Rambler" versus Dr. Cahill	24
CORRESPONDENCE—
On the Visible Church, by "Philalethes"	25
On Pope Liberius, by "A Truth seeker"—Postscript to a Roman Catholic	27
Was the Jewish Church the Church of God in its day, by "A Kildare Churchman"	28
Cardinal Wiseman and the Apocrypha	28
Flowers for February	29
Farming Operations for February	29

MODERN WORSHIP IN ROME.

We have hitherto found some difficulty in adverting as we could have wished to the ritual of the Church of Rome. We were desirous, for many reasons, to direct the attention of our readers to those parts of the ceremonies of that Church which we consider justly liable to censure, and to state the grounds on which our opinions were formed. The pressure of other topics, however, of equal or greater importance, has hitherto engrossed all the available space at our command; and, besides, a sincere feeling of anxiety to deal fairly and impartially with the religious usages of our Roman Catholic readers, imposed some peculiar restrictions on us, arising out of the nature of the subject which we wished to discuss.

Notwithstanding the boasted unity and immutability of the Church of Rome, it is not an easy matter to find out those parts of her ceremonial which are of general obligation, and for which she may be held fully responsible. There are so many rites and usages proper to particular countries, so many peculiar observances, such a multitude of local ceremonies, that we could not feel sure that, however well-grounded our censures might appear to ourselves, the ingenuity of our opponents might not, nevertheless, discover some shift or excuse by which these censures could be evaded. If we cited some objectionable practice, recommended by St. Bonaventura, or some other equally venerable divine, we might be told that the practice in question never was universal, and that it had now become nearly obsolete. If we described any superstitious custom of recent origin, another line of defence would probably be resorted to. "No Church," it might be said, "can be fairly held responsible for the religious practices of all its members. Some indulgence must be allowed to the infirmities of human nature. The Church does not always sanction what she is occasionally obliged to permit." And thus, while professing to be unchangeable, the Church of Rome is able, with dexterous versatility, to accommodate herself to the wants and wishes of each succeeding age, while she has never wanted ingenious defenders to justify every new phase which she may think proper to assume.

It was, therefore, with considerable interest that we read, in the Tablet of the 26th of November last, an account of a ceremony which had recently taken place at Rome, in which Pope Pius IX. was the principal performer—namely, the translation of the holy crucifix of Campo Vaccino. The account originally appeared in the French newspaper, l'Univers, from which it was translated in the Tablet; so that we were here presented, by two unexceptionable Roman Catholic authorities, with a picture of modern Romanist worship, fresh from the Eternal City, and sanctioned by the presence and authority of the Pope himself. But before proceeding further, we must endeavour to give some account of the ceremony, and of the circumstances which occasioned it.

It appears that, over the door of the Mamertine prison in Rome, there has been, for many years, a very ancient wooden crucifix, which has long been held in great veneration by the inhabitants of that city. The writer in the Univers states that a constant tradition attributes to Pope Sylvester I. the first establishment of a crucifix in this spot. He does not venture, however, to claim for the present crucifix such a remote antiquity, probably for the very sufficient reason that its form and artistic character prove it to have been made at a comparatively recent date. The writer then proceeds as follows:—

"But whatever may be its origin and antiquity, the worship yielded to the holy crucifix of Campo Vaccino is universal at Rome, and is transmitted from generation to generation. The fathers teach it to the children, and, in all the misfortunes and all the trials of life, the first idea is almost always to have recourse to the holy crucifix, the object of such general veneration, and the source of so many favours. It is, above all, in sickness that the succour of the holy image is invoked with more confidence and more eagerness. It is not uncommon, during the fine season, half an hour after the Ave Maria—that is to say, after the coming on of night—to meet in the streets little bands of the faithful, going devoutly bare-footed, and reciting the chaplet in a loud voice. These are the workmen and artisans who, after the labour of the day, repair in pilgrimage to the holy crucifix, to beg the cure of a parent, of a friend, of a neighbour, dangerously ill."

We beg the attention of our readers to the foregoing extract, which we have copied verbatim from the Tablet, and in which we have merely underlined one or two sentences. We have here a faithful representation, fresh from Rome, of the state of religion in that city at the present day, supplied to us by an unprejudiced Roman Catholic witness; and how sad and melancholy is the picture! We will not now enter upon the question of the unlawfulness of image worship, further than to repeat our solemn and deliberate conviction, which we have expressed at length in a former number of this journal,* that any use of images in religious worship is forbidden by God himself in the Second Commandment, and that those who use them incur the risk of great and deadly sin. But we cannot forbear from one or two remarks, in connection with our present subject.

Some of our Roman Catholic correspondents† have endeavoured to excuse the practice of image worship in their Church by the plea that the images are only used as helps to devotion, and that the worship always terminates on the object represented by the image. This excuse passes over altogether in silence the Scriptural prohibition of image worship; and, further, we do not believe that one Roman Catholic in a hundred ever makes the metaphysical distinction between the image and the Being represented by it, which the excuse presupposes. We need no better proof of this fact, than the passage from the Tablet which we have quoted above. The "ancient wooden crucifix" is throughout spoken of as the object of the people's prayers; but no hint is given that the thoughts of the worshippers ever ascended to God the Father, or the Lord Jesus Christ. No idolater of ancient Rome ever bowed down before his wooden idol with more earnestness than the modern Roman seems to bend his knees before the wooden crucifix which has taken its place.

Again, it is instructive to notice the wide-spread influence of this melancholy perversion of true spiritual religion. The "worship yielded to the holy crucifix" is said to be "universal" at Rome. Parents and children, young and old, come before it to present their homage. In the trials and misfortunes of life their "first idea" is to have recourse to the holy crucifix as the "source of the favours" which they hope to receive. Can it be possible that the people of Rome are taught to believe that God will only hear the prayers which are offered up before one particular piece of senseless wood? Do they imagine that the crucifix itself can hear their prayers, or be a "source of favour" to any of its worshippers? If not, why do they make it their "first idea" to "invoke the succour" of this holy image, as if the piece of wood could help them in sickness or any other emergency? But if, as we would fain hope and believe, they are not so utterly besotted as to imagine this, whence arises the earnestness of their devotion to this particular image? Is not the ear of the Almighty open to receive the prayers of sincere Christians, in whatever place they are offered up? When our Blessed Lord was giving his disciples a command how they should pray, did he tell them to set up a wooden crucifix and pray before it or to it? No! but his command was this—"Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly."—(Matt. vi. 6.)

But we must return to the crucifix of the Campo Vaccino. The sanctuary in which it was placed was, it seems, too small to receive the numerous faithful who came every hour to venerate it, and a more suitable and spacious place must be found. Rome has, we are told, three hundred and sixty-five Churches—one for every day of the year; but these were not enough; they wanted a new one for the relic which happens just now to be in fashion. Here, however, a sad dilemma arose. The wooden crucifix belonged, as was natural, to the guild of joiners, carpenters and other workers in wood, who considered it their most precious treasure. They felt the need of a new sanctuary for the object which they so much prized; and yet they could not be persuaded to remove it from a place which it had occupied for centuries, over the Mamertine prison, where, according to tradition, St. Peter and St. Paul were confined. At length, the difficulty was solved, by what the writer in the Univers calls "a happy inspiration," which was neither more nor less than the simple expedient of breaking down a wall, and thus making an opening into a pretty crypt under the Church of St. Joseph. Here, therefore, a marble altar was erected, at the back of which, in a circular niche, the holy crucifix was to be placed.

When the new locality was ready, the obvious course would have been, to transfer the sacred relic at once from its old to its new abode, which were only a few yards apart. But the guild of carpenters were averse to this summary method of procedure. They desired the translation of the crucifix to be made with all due solemnity, "and with a proof, which will remain in the history of the pious image" (we quote verbatim from the Tablet) "as one of the most glorious testimonies of the gratitude of the people of Rome." Accordingly, they would be content with nothing less, than that the crucifix should first be carried across the entire city, in solemn procession, to the Church of St. Charles, where it abode fifteen days. The time, however, was not idly spent. "One may well say" writes the editor of the Univers, "that the holy crucifix, during the fifteen days that it passed in the Church of St. Charles, has fulfilled the office of an eloquent preacher." The writer's veneration, it would seem, is so intense, that he unconsciously personifies the object which is so dear to his heart. The crucifix is a holy crucifix, a pious crucifix, it fulfils the office of an eloquent preacher, it is the source of health to the sick, of succour to the afflicted, of aid to the distressed. Could more be said of St. Peter or St. Paul, if they were alive?

At length Sunday, November 6, arrived, on which the crucifix was to be borne back in procession to its new sanctuary. And now the laudable exertions of the guild of carpenters were rewarded with the presence and co-operation of an eminent personage, whose aid they had not ventured to expect. "A few days before Sunday, November 6, it began to be whispered in Rome that the Holy Father, Pope Pius IX., would assist at the procession. On Sunday morning people went even farther, and said that the Holy Father would preach to the people on the arrival of the holy image. One may judge of the joy and astonishment of the population on receiving this good news." The Popes, it seems, have been so little in the habit of addressing the people from the pulpit, that it was no wonder that the good citizens of Rome were rather astonished on the present occasion. Public rumour, however, for once proved a true prophet. The Pope did actually preach and take part in the procession, which is thus described by the writer in the Univers:—

"The sacred pageant was opened by a detachment of firemen, and closed by a platoon of Capitoline guards. All the streets were canopied. An immense multitude filled them, giving the most expressive signs of veneration, respect, and love. All the city of Rome followed, or beheld as it it passed the ancient and well-beloved crucifix, the worship and devotion of which their ancestors had bequeathed to them, and which they will transmit to their children of the most distant generations. When the shrine had arrived at the base of the stairs of the Church of San Luca, at some paces from the flight of steps on which the Holy Father stood, in rochet, stole, and pallium of red velvet, he bowed before the holy crucifix, and venerated it devoutly."

* See CATHOLIC LAYMAN for November, 1852 vol. i, pp. 122, 123.

† Vide especially the letters of "Sidrach" in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN for February and April, 1853, vol. ii., pp. 21, 45.

Here we must pause. If our readers do not feel that the whole scene which has been just narrated is utterly opposed to the nature of true spiritual religion, as it is described in the New Testament, any attempt of ours to convince them of the fact must, we fear, prove unavailing. We can scarcely wonder at the intense devotion displayed by the people of Rome towards their favourite crucifix, when we see the Pope himself, their supreme, infallible guide in all matters of religion, as earnest in his devout veneration as the most ignorant member of his flock. But what we do wonder at, is, how any persons, with the Word of God in their hands, can believe for one moment that the religion of Rome in the present day, such as it has been just described, is the religion of the Bible. We have seen how the whole population of the city, headed by their chief spiritual guide, assembled together for a solemn act of devotion. And to what are their prayers addressed? To the Most High God, who declares himself to be a hearer of prayer? No! but to "an ancient and well-beloved wooden crucifix!"

We earnestly request our Roman Catholic readers to read over their Douay Testaments, and if they can there find any mention of St. Peter or St. Paul acting as the Pope is above represented to have done—if they can find any one instance of religious worship offered to an image, or the name of a crucifix so much as mentioned—we will freely acknowledge ourselves to be in error. We say nothing, for the present, of the prohibition of image worship in the Second Commandment; we will simply ask our readers one qnestion:—if the worship of a crucifix be indeed an essential part of Christianity—nay, if, as we have seen, it be considered the most essential part of religion in Rome—how came it to pass that there is not one word about it in the Bible? Does not this one fact prove how widely the modern Church of Rome has departed from the simplicity of the Scriptural and Apostolic worship? And if this be so, another question arises, are her members safe in remaining in a church which has corrupted the pure faith and practice which she received, and which has gone so widely astray from God's ordinances? That worship only is pleasing in God's sight which is rendered according to his own revealed will; and what that will is our Blessed Lord has plainly declared to us (John iv. 24). "GOD IS A SPIRIT, AND THEY THAT WORSHIP HIM, MUST WORSHIP HIM IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH."

DECRETAL EPISTLES.—No. III.

WE showed in our last number that the Popes of the ninth century did adopt the forgeries which were put upon the early Popes; did quote them; and did appeal to them as being inspired by God for the government of his Church.

Our object is now to show how those Popes of the ninth century, even where they did not expressly mention the forgeries, did carry out and support the various novelties which the forgeries were designed and contrived to introduce. And here we shall choose for our examples those things which are most important in themselves, and which Protestants and Roman Catholics are equally concerned to understand.

INFALLIBILITY.

The keystone of the Roman system is infallibility. Had the forgeries anything to do with that?

In the third letter forged for Pope Felix I. he is made to say—"This holy and apostolic Church of Christ, mother of all Churches, which is proved by the grace of Almighty God never to have erred from the path of apostolic tradition, nor has succumbed, depraved by heretical novelties, but, as in the beginning she received the rule of Christian faith from her authors, the chiefs of the apostles of Christ, she remains unhurt for ever, according to the divine promise of the Lord himself, the Saviour," (1) (quoting Luke, xxii. 31, 32).

This same passage is repeated over again in the letter forged for Pope Marcus, where it is thus introduced:—"The holy Roman Church, which has always remained, and the Lord providing for it, and the blessed apostle Peter bringing aid, will remain for the future immaculate," (2) &c. And in consequence, these forged letters lay it down in various places, that all are to follow the faith of Rome.

Here is certainly a fair statement of the claim of Roman infallibility. Some Roman Catholics may think it a pity that it is only a forgery of the ninth century.

They may also think it a pity that none of the Popes of the first eight centuries made any such claim. But this we undertake to affirm, having read all their letters.

We have often shown in our paper the weakness of the arguments in support of the infallibility of Rome. Now, we go farther—we ask Roman Catholics to consider whether the claim itself be not wholly based on forgery and fraud?

(1) Hæc sancta et apostolica mater omnium Ecclesiarum Christi Ecclesia, quæ per Dei Omnipotentis gratiam, a tramite apostolicæ traditionis nunquam errasse probatur, nec ab hæreticis novitatibus depravanda succubuit, sed ut in exordio normam fidei Christianæ percepit ab auctoribus suis, apostolorum Christi principibus, illibata fine tenus manet, secundum ipsius Domini salvatoris divinam pollicitationem," &c.—Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 911.

(2) Sancta Romana Ecclesia, quæ semper immaculata mansit, et Domino providente, et B. Petro Apostolo opem ferente, in futuro manebit.—Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., p. 471.

But if it will satisfy Roman Catholics to learn, that, as soon as the forgery appeared, the following Popes did take it up, and carry it out with all their might, we can, at least, give this much satisfaction to any one who will be satisfied with it:—

Pope Nicolas I., in his eleventh epistle to Photius, says of Popes—"For the Holy Spirit, whose vessels they were, could not give forth any but sweet things by those whom it had filled." (3)

In his 70th epistle (to "Hincmar and the other bishops in the kingdom of Carolus," in France), Pope Nicolas says—"She herself (Rome) from the time that the Christian religion began to be spread, has preserved unmutilated the things which she once received in Peter, her patron and founder, and has taught them uncorrupt through the other climates of the world: nor was any found, in so many revolutions of ages, who detracted from her traditions, or presumed to oppose them." (4)

Those who can believe this latter statement, may believe the forgeries themselves.

Pope Nicolas goes on (p. 473)—"Whether were we ever found inventors of any novelty? Whether have we ever transmitted any other things than those which pertained to their salvation, and to the common state of the Church? Whether were we ever heretics? For although, indeed, we do not deny that we are sinners, thanks to God, we by no means recognise ourselves as polluted by the dregs of any error." (5)

Was Pope Nicolas guilty of no novelty in imposing these forged epistles on the Church? Was Pope Liberius polluted with no dregs of error, when he condemned Athanasius, and became an Arian? (See our answer to a "Truth-seeker" in this number, p. 28.)

Of course, Pope Nicolas does not fail to draw the practical conclusion from all this. "The entire number of all believers seeks for doctrine, demands the integrity of faith, the loosing of crimes, from this holy Roman Church, which is the head of all Churches." (6)

INSPIRATION OF THE POPE.

Here we may fitly introduce the claims which Pope Nicolas makes, to speak by divine inspiration and revelation. For it is only by God putting thoughts into the heart, and words into the mouth, that man can be infallible.

In his eighth epistle to the Greek Emperor Michael, Pope Nicolas says—"We are going to write to your potency, the Lord inspiring us." (7)

Again, in his forty-seventh epistle to Carolus Calvus, giving directions to a council what inquiries they were to make about some priests, he tells them, "To act in such a way that the thing may be laid before us (the Pope), by the relation of all the bishops who assemble; and thus, then, without doubt, wait for what the Lord shall have revealed, to be defined by us." (9)

But his successor, Pope Hadrian II., brought this doctrine to perfection in his thirteenth epistle to Lotharius, King of Lorraine in France. "With unwearied exertions, opening our apostleship's mouth, full of the grace of the seven-fold Spirit. . . . O renowned King Lotharius, we admonish your excellency with paternal affection." (10)

And when Pope Hadrian II. took on himself to give away the kingdom of Lotharius, when Lotharius was dead, writing to the great men of that kingdom, he professes to anticipate the devil with his directions—"which precepts humbly obeying, like all who from the beginning pleased God, you may be able to be saved, the Lord saying in the Gospel, 'If any one love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make one abode with him.'" (11) Where observe that the Pope requires for his own commands in temporal matters, that obedience which Christ requires for his own word; and the Pope says this was the way of salvation from the beginning!

In the same way Pope Nicolas I., in his ninth epistle to Michael the emperor, applies to those who receives the Pope's commands, the words of our Saviour, Luke xi. 28.—"Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it." (12)

Our readers may have some notion, from this instance, of what the religion of Rome was in the middle ages, and how it was established.

They may see why Pope Nicolas was so anxious to have it thought that the forgeries put on the early Popes were divinely inspired; it was that his own words, in their turn, should pass for inspired too. Here we have the origin and the extent of the Roman claims to infallibility.

SUPREMACY BY DIVINE RIGHT.

The primacy and supremacy of Rome over all Churches is another fundamental point of the papacy.

The Forgers made Anacletus say, in the third epistle—"This holy and apostolic Roman Church obtained the primacy and pre-eminence of power over all Churches, not from the apostles, but from the Lord and Saviour himself." (13)

Again, they make Pope Julius II. say (in his second epistle), of Rome—"In which the Lord placed the principality of the whole Church." (14)

We might quote more, but space prevents us; let us see, with equal brevity, how Pope Nicolas applies it. In his 70th epistle (to Hincmar, and other bishops), Pope Nicolas says—"On account of the primacy of the Roman Church, conferred on Peter by the gift of Christ." (15)

And in his eighth epistle to Michael the Emperor—"Therefore, those privileges were given to this holy Church by Christ; they were not given by synods." (16)

When we come to examine how genuine documents have been altered and "cooked," it will be seen how probable it is, that this doctrine also owes its origin to the forgeries.

A POPE'S PRAYER.

But we cannot leave this eighth epistle of Nicolas without showing a specimen of a Pope's prayer, which occurs in it. We ask our readers to consider first this prayer of St. Paul for those whom he taught, taken from the Douay Bible, Ephesians, i. 18, &c.—"The eyes of your heart (being) enlightened, that you may know what the hope is of his calling (Christ's), and what are the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards us, who believe." . . . Consider now and compare the Pope's prayer:—"We beseech Almighty God, that he who has disclosed to you the mystery of the knowledge of himself, would grant you also to know fully his own dispositions, by which the holy Church manages her secret, and what, and how great, and what sort the privileges of the Roman Church are, and from whom they took their beginning." (17).

In these two prayers, reader, you may see the whole difference between the times of Apostles and the times of Popes.

Neither may we leave out the threat which helps out the Pope's prayer—"If you set up your efforts against the privileges of the Roman Church, beware lest they be turned against you; it is hard for thee to kick against the goad." (18) Our readers will recognise these last words as those which our Saviour himself spoke to Paul; and these words the Pope takes to himself. (Acts ix. 5, Douay Bible.)

Neither can we omit Pope Nicolas's assertion, that the General Council of Nice acknowledged that all things were conferred on her (the Roman Church) by the word of the Lord;" (19) which every one, who ever read the Council of Nice, knows to be false. Pope Nicolas quotes this from a letter of Pope Boniface, which, we shall show hereafter, lies under strong suspicion of being forged.

POPES' POWER OF CONDEMNING TO HELL.

But to proceed:—A consequence of primacy given by God, and directed by divine inspiration, is spiritual power—not the power of excommunication exercised in the early Church, but something more, as we shall see.

Our readers will remember the passage which we quoted in our first number from the forged epistle of St. Clement. "In the judgment of God, he shall suffer the torments of eternal fire, who shall have neglected the decrees of the Church." (20) It would be strange if the Popes who estab-

(3) Spiritus enim Sanctus, quorum vasa isti fuerunt, non potest nisi dulcia per hos, quos repleverit, eructare.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 373.

(4) Cum ipsa, ex quo cœpit Christiana religio dilatari, quæ semel in Petro patrono ac institutore sue suscepit, immutilata tenuerit, et incorrupta per alia climata muudi docuerit: nec apparuerit quisquam per tot saltem seculorum curricula, quia ejus traditionibus derogavit, aut obviare præsumpserit.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 472.

(5) Nunquid nos alicujus novitatis inventores extitimus? Numquid alia nisi quæ ad salutem ipsorum, et ad communem Ecclesiæ statum pertinebant, transmisimus? Numquid nos hæretici aliquando fuimus? Nam licet nos peccatores quidem esse non denegemus, quotumlibet tamen errorum fœce pollutos, Deo gratias, minime recognoscimus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., 473.

(6) Universitas credentium ab hac sancta Romana ecclesia, quæ caput omnium est Ecclesiarum, doctrinam exquirit, integritatem fidei deposcit, criminum solutionem. . . . Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 283., Ep. 6, to Photius.

(7) Ad potentiam vestram, inspirante Domino, scripturi.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 293.

(9) Agite quo nobis omnium episcoporum qui convenient relatu pandantur; et ita dein quod Dominus revelaverit a nobis definiendum procul dubio præstolamini.—Labbe and Coss., in Con. Suess., vol. VIII., p. 814.

(10) Os Apostolatus nostri, septiformis Spiritus gratia plenum . . . O inclyta rex Lothari, vicibus indefessis aperientes, excellentiam tuam paterno monemus affectu.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 911.

(11) Quibus humiliter obedientes, sicut omnes qui ab initio Deo placuerunt, salvi esse possitis, dicente Domino in Evangelio, si quis diliget me, &c., from John 14, 23.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 917.

(12) "Magis beati sint qui audiunt verbum Dei, et custodiunt," Itaque audite serenissime Imperator voces Legatorum nostrorum, vel voces literarum nostrarum audite patienter, audite tranquille. . . . —Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., 327.

(13) Hæc vero sacrosancta Romana et Apostolica Ecclesia, non ab Apostolis, sed ab ipso Domino Salvatore nostro primatum obtinuit, et eminentiam potestatis super universas Ecclesias.—Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 528.

(14) Ubi Dominus Ecclesiæ totius posuit principatum.—Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., p. 480.

(15) Christi munere propter primatum Ecclesiæ Romanæ in beato Petro concessum . . .—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 473.

(16) Ista igitur privilegia hujus sanctæ Ecclesiæ a Christo donata; a synodis non donata.—Labbe and Coss., vol. VIII., p. 314.

(17) Sed Rogamus Omnipotentem Deum, ut qui suæ cognitionis vobis reservavit mysterium, tribuat quoque nobis ad plenum suas dispositiones, quibus sancta Ecclesia moderatur arcanum, et quæ sint, vel quanta, et qualia privilegia Ecclesiæ Romanæ, et ex quo cœperint exordium. —Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 314.

(18) Si . . . contra privilegia Ecclesiæ Romanæ nisus vestros erigitis, cavete ne super vos convertantur. Durum quippe est vobis contra stimulum calcitrare.—Vol. viii., p. 314.

(19) Omnia denique novarat hujc, Domini sermone, concessa.—Labbe and Coss. vol. viii., p. 803, Ep. 42, to all bishops of Gaul.

(20) In Judicio Dei, iguis eterni tormenta sustinebit, qui Ecclesiastica decreta neglexerit.—Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 97.

lished the forgeries had not attended to so important a point. Consequently we find Pope Nicolas thus concluding a letter in which he confirms the privileges of the Archbishopric of Rhemes—"If any one, by a daring attempt, be the person great or small, shall have presumed to act contrary to this our apostolical decree, let him know that he is bound by the chain of anathema, a stranger from the kingdom of God, and condemned with all impious persons to the punishment of eternal fire."(21)

Now hear Pope Hadrian II., who succeeded Nicolas. In his 22nd epistle (to Hincmar), written about the Popes undertaking to give away the kingdom of Lotharius, he pronounces this sentence on any one who resists—"Bound with the chain of anathema, deprived of the name of Christianity, he shall be altogether placed with the devil, whom he imitates in this."(22) Hear Pope Hadrian again—"not only he shall be tied with the bonds of excommunication, BUT ALSO bound with the chain of anathema, he shall be destined to hell with the devil."(23) Mark, in this last passage, that this power of casting into hell is not the same as excommunication, but something additional to it. Where did these Popes get this power? What CHARTER could they show for it? Not the Scriptures, certainly; for it is of God alone that the Scripture says—"Fear Him that can destroy both body and soul into hell."—(Matthew x. 28, Douay Bible.) It was in the forged letter of Clement, and in that alone, that they found this power conferred on them; and having once persuaded people to believe that that forged letter was given by divine inspiration, they, of course, set about to condemn to hell themselves.

We trust our having traced this claim to its origin in the forgeries of the ninth century, may be some relief to those who are now subject to the threat of being turned into hell by priestly domination.

THE POPE SUPREME JUDGE.

Another invention which had a main share in establishing the Papacy, was the claim of the Pope, that he was appointed by God himself to be the only judge of bishops, and that God had given him the power of hearing appeals from the judgments of all other bishops, and of reversing their decisions. The gaining of this was the great practical victory of the Papacy over the Church.

We have partly shown already (in our second number) how the Popes established this by means of the forged epistles, and space does not permit us to go into it again. The claim to have this power by divine right, and from God himself, appears to have originated from those forgeries. Any previous claim of this sort was of more modest dimensions, as resting on the decrees of the Church, not on the gift of God—that lesser claim rested wholly on a canon of the Council of Sardica, which canon was most probably itself a forgery, as we shall show hereafter. That whole claim, therefore, from first to last, was based wholly on forgery; yet it is one of the main pillars of the Papacy.

We might say and prove the same of the Pope's claim to having always possessed and exercised the rights of calling and confirming councils. But it is impossible to use all our materials now; we must treat of this claim separately some other time.

But in the multiplicity of materials we may diversify our subject. Suppose we try "Holy Water."

ORIGINAL INSTITUTION OF HOLY WATER.

We must first ask our readers to consider the following passage of Scripture (Hebrews ix., 13 and 14, Douay Bible), where St. Paul argues thus from the Jewish sacrifices—"For if . . . . the ashes of an heifer being sprinkled, sanctify such as are defiled, to the cleansing of the flesh; (24) how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, by the Holy Ghost, offered himself unspotted unto God, cleanse our conscience from dead works to serve the living God?"

After considering this passage, our readers will be able to appreciate the following passage from the forged letter of Pope Alexander I., which is THE ORIGINAL INSTITUTION OF HOLY WATER:—"We bless water, mixed with salt, sprinkled on the people; that all sprinkled with it may be sanctified and purified; which also we command to be done by all priests. For if the ashes of an heifer, sprinkled with blood, sanctified and purified the people, MUCH MORE water, mixed with salt, and consecrated with divine prayers, sanctifies and purifies the people." (25) Our readers will see in this, that HOLY WATER is here put into the very place, and established by the very proofs, which St. Paul assigns to the BLOOD OF CHRIST!

If our readers will now look back to the "Talk of the Road," chapter 16, (26) they will see what teaching the poor Irish woman, Mary Gormly, was following when she maintained that holy water was the best thing in the Church of Rome to trust to for salvation. Here is what poor Mary Gormly said, "Sure when I have plenty of that by me, I don't care for charms, nor fairies, nor the devil himself; and what need I want anything else, when I don't care for the devil itself, with the holy water on me." Let us see what authority poor Mary Gormly had for that, in the forged decretal which instituted holy water; "It turns away the plots of the devil, and defends men from the wiles of the evil spirit."(27)

How many poor Irish people are ignorantly following a religion invented by the wicked forgers, and established by the Popes of the ninth century! and what need there is that these things should be exposed!

For, we repeat, this is THE ORIGINAL INSTITUTION of "holy water."

Our witness for this is Martene, a monk of the order of St. Benedict, and one of the most learned writers of the Church of Rome on rites and ceremonies. We have before us his book "On the ancient Discipline of the Church in Celebrating Divine Offices, exhibiting the various rites and uses of different churches of Italy, Germany, Spain, England, and chiefly of France, gathered out of various pontifical books of the more distinguished churches; out of sacramentaries, missals, breviaries, rituals, ordinaries, or consuetudinaries as well manuscript as printed; from various decrees of councils, statutes of bishops, sayings of holy fathers, and very many other approved authors."(28)

Now, hear the testimony of this very learned Roman Catholic, who had searched so deeply and laboriously into every source from which information on this subject could be derived:—"Concerning the solemn benediction of salt and water to be made on every Lord's day, I do not remember that I have read anything before THE NINTH CENTURY, in which Pope Leo IV. has these few words in his homily of the pastoral care (29).

In Goar's "Rituale Græcorum," a collection of the oldest Greek liturgies, made by a missionary of the Pope, there is a service for consecrating holy water. Martene rightly judged this to be later than the ninth century. We allude to it here only for the sake of the note which Goar gives on it. Speaking of the institution of holy water, he says—"It acknowledges as its author, Pope Alexander, who presided over the Church in the time of Trajan, writing in the epistle ascribed to him, ch. 5. . ." (30). And then follow the words, which we have given above, from the forged epistle. This is the testimony of one employed by the Pope on an important mission.

Having thus found the origin of holy water in the forged decretals, we have to show how it was established in the ninth century.

After those forged decretals were published, Pope Leo IV. published his "Homily of Pastoral Care," which is, in fact, the Pope's order to the whole clergy how to perform their functions. And in it we find—"On every Lord's day, bless the water before mass, with which let the people be sprinkled; and for this have a proper vessel." (31).

This is the first genuine authority in the Church of Rome, that Martene could find, for blessing holy water for general use; and it appeared just after the forged decretals had been published.

And after Hincmar, Archbishop of Rhemes, had been drilled by Pope Nicolas I., in the ninth century, we find the following in his directions to his clergy:—"That on every Lord's day each presbyter, in his own church, before the solemnization of mass, should make blessed water, in a neat vessel, and fit for so great a ministry; with which let the people entering the church be sprinkled; and let those who wish receive it in neat little vessels of their own, and sprinkle it through their houses, and their farms, and their vineyards; also over their cattle and upon their fodder, and, moreover, upon their own food and drink." (32)

We now leave it to our readers to decide on what authority this use of holy water rests—whether it be a part of the religion of Christ, or a part of the religion invented and imposed by forgery and fraud in the ninth century. (33)

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

The modern doctrine of transubstantiation, too, may probably owe its establishment to the same source.

In the forged epistle of Pope Damasus we find him speaking thus, when forbidding accusations of priests:—"Who are nearer to God, and who make the body of Christ with their own mouths." (34) We find no such words in any genuine letter of any Pope before the ninth century. But after these forgeries were published in the ninth century, then, and not before, the controversy about transubstantiation immediately arose. This, certainly, is very remarkable; but this subject is too large to be fully entered on here.

Our readers may be amused to see how Pope Nicolas made use of "the keys" with the Empress Eudoxia, when he had failed with the Emperor; he writes to her—"As she hoped that the blessed apostle Peter, the key-bearer of the kingdom of heaven, should always be propitious to her house," that she would strive for him with the Emperor, "like a brave virago." (35) One knows not which her faith in the key-bearer, or the delicate compliment to her female vanity, would have the greater effect.

But space compels us to put aside a mass of materials which we have prepared; which, however, may be of use on future occasions. Still, we cannot pass over the Pope's method of dealing with kings, after the forged decretals had come to be believed.

POPES' DEALINGS WITH KINGS.

Here, too, the foundation was laid in the forgeries. The second forged epistle of Pope Marcellinus has the following:—"It shall not be lawful for the Emperor, or any one observing piety, to presume anything contrary to the divine commands, nor to do anything which is opposed to the evangelic, prophetic, and apostolic rules. . . . Nor shall anything stand which may have been done contrary to the constitution of evangelical, prophetical, or apostolical doctrine, or to their SUCCESSOR, or of the holy fathers. (36)

There is a similar passage in the VIth Roman Council, under Pope Symmachus, in the year 504 (37), with this difference, that nothing is said there about the successor of the apostles. And our business is chiefly with the doctrine laid down in the forged epistle of Marcellinus, that nothing done by the Emperor against the successor of the apostles, that is, the Popes, shall stand.

Observe here another principle laid down in the forged epistle of Pope Damasus; speaking of persons who act contrary to the canons, he is made to say—"Such presumption is manifestly one kind of those who blaspheme the Holy Ghost, since it acts against him by whose impulse and grace those same holy canons were given." (38)

We can now understand why Pope Nicolas, writing to the Greek Emperor Michael, spoke of a letter in which that Emperor had resisted the Pope's orders, as being "full of all wickedness and blasphemy, and contrary to the disposition of God, in which he preferred the privileges of the Church and See of Rome, to the privileges of all Churches, by his own ineffable providence." (39) And when the Emperor said, in his own defence, that none of his predecessors had thought it necessary to apply to Rome for directions, the Pope replies—"the more shame for them!" (40)

---

(21) Si quis autem temerario ausu, magna parvave persona, contra hoc nostrum apostolicum decretum agere presumpserit, sciat se anathematis vinculo esse innodatum, et a regno Dei alienum, et cum omnibus impiis æterni incendii supplicio condemnatum.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 490, Ep. 6, Appendix I.

(22) Vinculis anathematis obligatus, nomine Christianitatis privatus, cum diabolo, quem super hoc imitatur, omnino locabitur.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 921.

(23) Non solum excommunicationis nexibus innodabitur, verum etiam vinculis anathematis obligatus in gehenna cum diabolo deputabitur.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 921.

(24) In Numbers, xix., 2 & 17, our readers may see the account of the Jewish institution here referred to by St. Paul.

(25) Aquam enim sale conspersam populis benedicimus, ut ea cuncti aspersi, sanctificentur ac purificentur; quod et omnibus sacerdotibus faciendum esse mandamus. Nam si cinis vitulæ asperso sanguine populum sanctificabat atque mundabat, multo magis aqua sale aspersa, divinisque precibus sacrata, populum sanctificat atque mundat.—Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 546, Ep. 1., cap. 5.

(26) CATHOLIC LAYMAN, Number for September, 1853, page 102, column 3. Also, page 133 of the "Talk of the Road," published separately.

(27) Insidias diaboli avertit, et a phantasmatis versutiis homines defendit.—Last reference.

(28) TRACTATUS DE ANTIQUA ECCLESIÆ DISCIPLINA in divinis celebrandis officiis, variosque diversarum Ecclesiarum ritus et usus exhibens, Italiæ, Germaniæ, Hispaniæ, Angliæ et maximè Galliæ, collectus ex variis insignium Ecclesiarum libris Pontificalibus, Sacramentariis, Missalibus, Breviariis, Ritualibus, Ordinariis, seu Consuetudinariis, cum MS. tum editis; ex diversis conciliorum decretis, episcoporum statutis, sanctorum patrum dictis, aliisque probatis auctoribus permultis.—Studio et opera Domni Edmundi Martene, Presbyteri et Monachi Benedictini e Congregatione S. Mauri. Lugduni, 1706.

(29) De solemni salis et aquæ benedictione singulis diebus Dominicis faciendâ, non memini me legisse aliquid ante seculum IX., quo Leo Papa IV. in homilia de cura Pastorali pauca hæc habet.—Page 58.

Martene goes on to say, like a good Roman Catholic, that of course he does not doubt that the use of holy water is more ancient; but his proofs for this are too trifling to need notice.

His testimony that no trace can be found of a service for blessing the water, before the ninth century, is all we want. The water for baptism was blessed, and it is probable that a superstitious use was made by some of that water. But this was a private superstition, not an institution of the Church. It was probably the object of the forger to turn that unauthorized superstition into a Church institution.

(30) Ille authorem agnovit Alexandrum Pontificem Trajani temporibus Ecclesiæ præsidentem, epistola ipsi ascripta, cap. v., scribentem, &c.—Goar Rituale Græcorum, p. 451, Paris, 1647.

(31) Omni die dominica ante missam aquam benedictam, unde populus aspergatur; et ad hoc proprium vas habeto.—Labbe and Coss, vol. viii., p. 31.

(32) Ut omni Dominico die quisque presbyter in sua Ecclesia ante missarum solemnia aquam benedictam faciat in vase mundo et huic ministerio convenienti, de qua populus intrans Ecclesiam aspergatur, et qui voluerint in vasculis sua mundis ex illa accipiant, et per mansiones, et agros, et vicos, super pecora quoque sua, atque super pabula eorum, nec non et super cibos et potum suum conspergant.

Hincmari Archiep. Rhemen. Capitula ad Presbyteros parochiæ suæ. A.D. 852.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 569.

(33) It may be right to mention that, in what is called "the Apostolical Constitutions," there is what professes to be an institution of holy water by St. Matthew the apostle, himself.—Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 495. This is notoriously a forgery of the middle ages. These "Apostolical Constitutions" are, in fact, a very ancient liturgy of the Church, with many such forgeries stuffed into it, probably in the ninth century.

(34) Qui proximiores sunt Deo, et qui proprie ore corpus Christi conficiunt.—Ep. 4 to Stephen and the Council of Africa.—Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., p. 874.

(35) Tanquam fortis virago.—Ep. 15 to Eudoxia the Empress.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 886.

(36) Non licet ergo imperatori, vel cuiquam potestatem custodienti, aliquid contra mandata divina presumere: nec quidquam quod Evangelicis propheticisque et Apostolicis regulis obviat, agere . . . . nec quidquam quod contra evangelica, vel prophetica, aut apostolica doctrinæ constitutionem, successorumve eorum, sive sanctorum patrum, actum fuerit, stabit.—Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 936.

(37) Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 1373.

(38) Talis enim presumptio manifeste unum genus est blasphemandum Spiritum Sanctum; quoniam contra eum agit, cujus impulsu et gratia iidem Sancti editi sunt canones.—Ep. 1 to Aurelius.—Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., 863.

(39) Plena erant omni pravitate, atque blasphemia et contra ipsam dispositionem Dei, in qua Ecclesiæ sedisque Romanæ privilegia, cunctarum ecclesiarum privilegiis sua ineffabili providentia præmisit.—Ep. 5 to Michael.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 813.

(40) Et hoc dictum quasi nostrum fuerit opprobrium, eo quod eadem apostolicam in nullo quærere antecessores vestri dignati fuerint, cum magis eorum fuerit decorum.—Ep. 8, to Michael.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 296.

But tho Greek Emperor was a long way off, and the Pope could do nothing but abuse him; not so in France. The great empire which Charlemagne had founded in France and Germany was now broken up, and divided among three weak and worthless men. It was a grand opportunity for bringing forged decretals into play; and the Popes did play off those weak fools against each other with matchless skill, taking part in turn with each against the rest, until he had weakened and broken them all. Let us follow, as one instance, the ups and downs of poor King Carolus.

He has given some offence; and the Pope "writes, specially chiding and admonishing, and, at the same time, ordering him." (41) This seems to have a good effect, for in the next letter to Carolus himself the Pope praises his humility highly. (42)

Times were changed; for, before forged decretals came out, it was kings of France that praised the humility of Popes. Thus, about the year 795, just before the forged epistles came out, Charlemagne, the Emperor, writes to Pope Leo. III.—"The letters of your excellency being read, and the decretal document heard, we greatly rejoiced, as I confess, whether in the unanimity of your election, or in the obedience of your humility. . . ." (43)

But let us follow poor King Carolus; he has been setting up for himself, and the Pope has brought him to his knees; and King Carolus writes—"We would not by any means set that man over the aforesaid Church (which French kings always did, till the forged decretals came out), before we had consulted you, to whom we commit all our counsels, our wife, our children, our kingdom, and all our property. . . ." (44)

A Christian bishop might say to such a king, "I want your soul for God, and I want neither your kingdom nor your property." But Pope Nicolas had not so learned the forged decretals; and so he answers, "Anew we discover evidently the marks of the faith with which you burn (not to Christ but) towards the Holy Roman Church; reading the letters of your excellency, which distil honey instead of words!"(45) Aye; is that the Pope's honey!

But King Carolus loved honey too; and when King Lotharius was dead, Carolus claimed that kingdom also, which the Pope wished to give to another. Then followed the threats of hell-fire and the devil, of which we have spoken already.

Carolus is in more trouble: his son Caroloman has rebelled against him, and Carolus has banished him. Caroloman flies to Rome, and will be ever obedient to the Pope; so we have a letter from Pope Hadrian II., to Carolus, pronouncing him "worse than a wild beast," (46) and ordering him to restore his son to all his honours, and to his paternal affection, until the Pope shall send legates to enquire into the merits of the quarrel! So the king must not even be angry, till the Pope knows why.

King Carolus is on his bended knees again, but in a very grumbling humour. So the Pope writes to him, after a little flattery about the "praise-worthy love and modest wisdom" of King Carolus—"You have sent to us a tumultuous clamour, nor do we find that you have heard with patience the admonitions and corrections of our pontificateship; truly it appears that you are as yet somewhat wanting in perfect love."(47) The Pope, of course, wishes to have him perfect, and thus states the treatment he intends to adopt—"Therefore, since we desire to have you a perfect man, and pleasing to God in all things, like a wise father, who does not cease to whip with a severe scourge his most dear son, even when not offending, lest when feeling secure, he might boldly mix himself up with unlawful crimes."(48)

Who would not be the son of so loving a father? But unreasonable Carolus murmurs still, and writes a murmuring letter to the Pope; to which the Pope replies again—"no murmurer (against the Pope) receives the kingdom of God." (49) Of course not, if the Pope have the key. But the Pope is very civil now, for he has heard this good report of King Carolus, "that you fervently wish and desire to exalt this first see of Peter the prince of apostles; to honour and to enrich with many gifts his vicar, and the clergy entrusted to him." (50) And the Pope adds, in all sincerity, "I so love such virtues in you, as I do my own soul!" (51)

But should such virtues in a weak and worthless king go unrewarded? Not so; the Pope gives his promise now to make King Carolus emperor! (52) a fair height for Popes to have risen to by the judicious use of forged epistles!

POLICY OF THE FORGERS.

But our readers may wonder how it was possible that forgeries so gross and blundering as these appear to be, could ever have been successfully imposed on the world, and on the Church as its laws; to say nothing of the fact, that the deceived were then as ignorant as the deceivers; it must be acknowledged that while the blunders of these forgeries are gross in the extreme in everything that required the smallest knowledge or learning, they are yet constructed with consummate skill for making their way in such an age of crime and lawless violence. To the few who mourned over the general corruption and depravity, those forged laws held out the hope of restoring peace and virtue, by the Pope's authority; at the same time to the wicked and lawless, who were the great majority, it covertly offered complete impunity for all their crimes.

The first are thus appealed to, in the forged letter of Pope Zephyrinus—"We have received such boldness from the Lord the founder of this holy see and apostolic Church, and from the blessed Peter, prince of apostles, that we labour with diligent affection for the universal Church, redeemed with the blood of Christ; and that we succour all the servants of the Lord, and by our apostolic authority bring help to all who are living piously." (53)

It were no great wonder if some pious persons should think these promises worth trying, when all else appeared to fail them. And this was not forgotten by Pope Nicolas, who says (not forgetting also some other things)—"For the privileges of the Roman Church are, that I should so speak, the remedies of the whole Catholic Church of Christ; the privileges, I say, are the arms of Peter against all attacks of wickedness, and the bulwarks and documents of the priests of the Lord, and of all, in short, who stand in high place, yea, of all who are afflicted with various evils by those same powers."(54)

But for one appeal made in the forged Decretals to the lovers of peace and virtue, we find twenty to those whose reliance was on the high hand of crime and violence. Among such appeals there is nothing that the forged Decretals labour at more earnestly, than in offering complete impunity for crime to priests and bishops. Our readers will remember the great object of making accusations of priests and bishops impossible, or at least, very difficult;(55) but they do not yet, perhaps, know what an object it was in that age to priests and bishops to be secured from the consequences of their own crimes and violence. The following law may let them a little into the state of things. We take it from the Capitula of the Emperor Charlemagne. First we have (Title II., cap 1) "The supplication of the people to Charlemagne, for the sake of the priests, that they shall not go against the enemy or to battle."(56) In which they state, "We have seen some of them wounded among the enemy, and in battle, and we have known some of them to be killed;"(57) and they very properly add, "The Lord knows when we see them in such places, terror seizes us;"(58) and they entreat him to stop this for the future.

We have, then, the decree of Charlemagne (cap. 3) granting what they ask; "We altogether, and in all things, prohibit the servants of God to carry armour, or to fight, or to go in the army, or against the enemy."59

The law may have been effectual during the reign of that great emperor; but in the confusion that followed the breaking up of his empire, matters became still worse; and impunity to bishops and priests, for crimes of violence, still more valuable.

Neither do our readers yet know how complete was the impunity offered to them. We have spoken of the six dozen witnesses; (60) but suppose a bishop should be surprised into confessing a crime, would he not be liable to punishment? This, too, was provided for by Pope Nicolas in his letter to Salomon, King of the Brittons, where, after laying down the law that seventy fit witnesses were necessary, he goes on to consider the case of those who had confessed the crimes of which they were accused; "who, although they are said to have confessed some crimes, it may be believed that they acknowledged only, through force or fear, and did not confess what they did not do, what they had not even heard, because they saw lay men and all seculars, together with the king, conspiring against them. Since he who pronounces what he says with his mouth only, and not with his heart, does only speak, and not confess; although that does not appear a just confession, which is not called forth by a legal examination."(61) So, although the bishop had confessed his crime, he could not be punished unless the seventy witnesses could be got! It may be imagined what an inducement such a law was to bishops to support the forged decretals, in an age in which laws were required to keep bishops from carrying arms; and in which arms were carried more often for expeditions of private plunder and revenge, than for public warfare. But it was not this only that was an inducement to bishops, there was also the law that for all crimes whatsoever bishops could be tried by the Pope only, or could appeal to him; (62) and the practice of the Pope to deal very gently with all criminals who appealed to him; which, for brevity sake, we shall treat under the head of laymen.

For laymen, too, were invited to appeal to Rome for gentle treatment for the crimes they had committed. One or two instances is all that we have room for.

One Wimar had murdered his three sons; and he fled to Rome for refuge, and told what he had done. Pope Nicolas sends him back with a letter to his bishop Rivoladrus, stating, that he had a great number of people coming to him about such things, which, of course, made him more sad than he could tell (but no great wonder when he had opened a shop for them): but, however, he goes on: "of whom we moderate some things, because he has devoutly hastened to entreat the favour of the prince of apostles, our nourisher."63 The Pope, accordingly, goes on to to say what his penance should be; part of it is, that he may wear his shoes on his journey home; but that he must not wear shoes for three years after—say, a year for each murdered son!

Again, one Eriarth had fled to Rome for refuge, of whom Pope Nicolas says: "He related to us, indeed, that he had killed a priest and monk in no way worthy of death."(64) The Pope goes on to say how severe his penance ought to be according to the canons; but he adds—"But, considering the devotion of his faith, or because he has hastened to the favour of the apostles, we have acted more mildly with him."(65) Thus it was always with the greater criminals who fled to Rome for sanctuary. But if any, accused of lesser crimes, refused to submit to the jurisdiction of the Pope, or to plead their cause before him, their condemnation was ready, and the devil and hell-fire their portion. No crime, however great, was serious in those who acknowledged the privileges of Rome. No crime unpardonable but resistance to Rome. Nothing indifferent but moral crimes, in which the interests of Rome were not concerned. We often find those Popes hinting to their legates not to trouble them too much; and when a poor legate, perplexed with all the crimes he saw around, applied to the Pope with a list of them, and the murder of wives among them, to know how he was to deal with them, Pope Nicolas replies—"Slayers of their wives, since you do not add of adulteresses, or any thing of that kind, what else are they to be reckoned but homicides (in an age when homicide was little thought of), and to be brought to penance for that."(67) And even here Pope Nicolas has mercy, for, in saying that marrying again is prohibited to such, he adds, "excepting to young men"!(68) It would be a pity not to let them marry, when they had got rid of their old wives!

None but those who know the fearful state of those lawless times can estimate the effect of every criminal, both

---

(41) Specaliter rescripsimus increpantes et admonentes pariter et jubentes.—Ep. 34, to Rothadns.—Labbe and Coss. vol. viii., p. 420

(42) Cum vos tantæ humilitatis, tantæque devotionis incurvatione, sub potenti manu Dei ad reverentiam præcipuorum ipsius apostolorum flecti conspicimus.—Ep. 35, to Carolus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 421.

(43) Perlectis excellentiæ vestræ literis, et audita decretali chartula, valde, ut fateor, gavisi sumus, sea in electionis unanimitate, seu in humilitatis vestræ obedientia.—Labbe and Coss., vol. vii., p.1128.

(44) Nolnimus anteqnam vos consnleremus, cui omnia nostra consilia, uxorem, prolemque nostram, regnum, universaque nostra committimus . . . ullo modo filium prædictæ ecclesiæ præponere.—Epistle of King Carolus to Nicolas I.—Labbe and Coss, vol. viii., p. 812.

(45) Excellentiæ vestræ literas, quæ pro verbis mella stillabant, perlegentes, denuo fidei, qua circa sanctam Romanam flagratis Ecclesiam, comperimus patenter insignia.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 813.

(46) Etiam bestiarum feritatem excedens.—Ep. 29 to Carolus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 929.

(47) Tumultuosum nobis clamorem misistis, nec sane patienter pontificii nostri monita et correptiones audisse comperimus; liquido patet vos adhuc perfectæ aliquid caritatis minus duntaxat habere.—Ep. 33, to Carolus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 934.

(48) Unde quoniam te virum perfectum, et per omnia Deo placentem habere cupimus, ceu prudens pater, qui carissimam filium suum, etiam non delinquentem, ac quando securus existens, flagitiis se audacter commisceat illicitis, flagello severo affligere non desistit . . . —Ep. 33—Labbe and Cass., vol. viii., p. 935.

(49) Regnum Dei nullus murmurans accipit.—Ep. 34, to Carolus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 937.

(50) Optaresque ferventer et desiderares hanc principis apostolorum Petri primam sedem exaltare, honorare, multisque muneribus vicarium ejus, et clerum sibi commissum, ditare.—Ep. 34.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 937.

(51) Talea virtutes sic diligo in vobis, sicnt animam meam.—Same page.

(52) Nunquam acquiescemus, exposcemus, aut sponte susciplemus alium in regnum et Imperium Romanum nisi telpsum.—P. 938.

(53) Tantam a Domino, hujus sanctæ sedis et Apostolicæ Ecclesiæ fundatore, et B. Petro principe apostolorum, accepimus fiduciam, ut pro universali Christi sanguine redempta Ecclesia, impigro laboremus affectu, et omnibus Domino famulantibus succurramus, et cunctis pie viventibus apostulica auctoritate opem feramus.—Ep. 2.—Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 605.

(54) Privilegia namqua Romanæ Ecclesiæ totius sunt Chrlati, ut ita dicamus, remedia Ecclesiæ Catholicæ. Privilegia, inquam, Patri arma sunt contra omnes impetus pravitatis, et munimenta atque documenta Domini sacerdotum, et omnium prorsus qui in sublimitate consistunt, imo cunctorum qni ab iis in potestatibus diversis afficiuntur incommodis.—Ep. 31, to King Carolus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 411.

(55) Number for January, 1854, p, 3, col. 3.

(56) Supplicatio populi apud Carolum Magnum, pro sacerdotum causa, ne in hostem aut pugnam pergerent.—Labbe and Coss., vol. vii., p. 1162.

(57) Quosdam enim ex eis in hostibus et prœliis vulneratos vidimus, et quosdam perisse cognovimus.—Same reference.

(58) Novit Dominus, quando eos in talibus videmus, terror apprehendit nos . . .—Same reference.

(59) Servis Dei per omnia omnibus armaturam portare, vel pugnare, aut in exercitum at in hostem pergere, omnino prohibemus . . . —Labbe and Coss., vol. vii., p. 1165.

(60) Number for January, 1854, p. 3. col. 3.

(61) Qui etsi crimen aliquod confessi esse dicuntur, potest credi quod vi vel formidine fassi tantum, et non confessi fuerint quod non fecerant, quia videbant laicos et seculares quosque una cum rege contra se conspirantes, quod nec saltem audierant. Siquidem qui ora tantum, et non corde profert quod dicit, non confitetur, sed loquitur: quamvis non videatur justa confessio, quæ non legitimo provocatur examine.—Nicolas Ep. 22, Appendix I., Labbe and Cossart, vol. viii., p. 510.

(62) We have noticed this briefly in the quotation from the 2nd forged letter of Pope Julius, in our number for December, 1853, p. 137, col. 3.

(63) Quorum quædam temperavimus, eo quod suffragia apostolorum principis nutritoris nostri postulare devoto festinavit.—Ep. 17, to Rivoladrus, Appendix 1, Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 503.

(64) Ferebat ac utique quendam presbyterum atque monachum nihil eum morte dignum occidisse.—Ep. 24, to Hincmar, Appendix 1.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 513.

(65) Sed devotionem ejus fidei considerantes, sive quia ad suffragia apostolorum festinaverit, humanius cum illo peregimus.—Same page.

(67) Interfectores suarum conjugum, cum non addis adulterarum, vel aliquid hujusmodi, quid aliud nisi homicidæ habendi sunt, ac per hoc ad pœnitentiam redigendi?—Ep. 19, to Rodulphus, Appendix 1., can. 5.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 505.

(68) Quibus conjugium penitus denegatur, excoptis adolescentibus. —Same page, can. 5.

lay and clerical, being thus engaged by his worst interests and passions to support "the privileges of Rome." It was enough, in such an age, to account for the reception of the forgeries.

And well Pope Nicolas knew how to drive home this argument to such men, when they resisted him. "What has happened to Rothadus to-day, how do you know that it may not happen to any of you to-morrow? So the apostle admonishes, saying, 'let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.' But if it should happen that I speak prophetically, to whose help, I ask, would you fly?" (69)

Nor can we overlook the exaltation of their order, held up as a powerful motive to such bishops and priests. Hear the forged decretal of Pope Stephen, speaking of bishops:—"They are called the THRONES OF GOD, therefore, they ought not to be moved, nor afflicted, nor disturbed. Therefore, of them the prophet says—'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth the work of his hands.'" (70)

The prospect of such impunity and such exaltation, was too great a temptation for such bishops and priests; and no wonder that the majority of them came in by degrees to support such convenient forgeries.

RESISTANCE.

But, after all, if the establishment of these forged epistles was, indeed, the introduction of a new law thrusting out the old, as Labbe and Cossart, and De Marca have said, it would be strange, even in an age of such ignorance and lawlessness, if no signs of resistance appeared. The Popes of the ninth century would not exaggerate such resistance, and, therefore, from them we take the account of it.

In many places, at first, the Pope's letters would not even be read in the councils of the bishops. Pope Nicolas complains grievously of this in his letter to the clergy of Constantinople (72); and again, speaking of Hincmar of Rhemes, and other bishops (73); so in east and west, he found this difficulty even to get his letters read.

Often, too, the Pope laments like this:—"We have seen the injury of holy Peter, and the diminution of the privileges of the apostolic see." (74)

His expostulations to the bishops of the chief countries of Europe, would be touching in a better cause; he describes the "bishops of France as inflamed by the brands of the zeal and envy of the devil." (75) He thus addresses the Bishop of Germany:—"Neither after we arisen, had begun to cast, far and wide, the arrows of the divine quiver against wickedness of this kind, have you diligently cared to labour with us. When did your labour appear in this? Where was your assembly, or where did your sacerdotal zeal shine forth? . . . When did you give a bark for these things? . . . When did you stand with us like the marshalled lines of cumps? When did you praise the Lord with us in the choir? . . When have we sung together? &c." (76)

And when Pope Nicolas first tried to assume to himself the power of calling councils for France, and wrote to ask each of the three kings to send two bishops to attend his council, they unswered, rather whimsically—"That the greater part of all the bishops were on guard, night and day, against the sea-pirates, and, therefore, could not come." (77) But they do pluck up courage, too, to say, that no necessity requires that they should send them. (78)

Forgery and fraud did not gain the battle without opposition. But forgery and fraud did triumph, and the victory was complete; and, under the effects of that victory, the Church has groaned to this day.

CONCLUSION.

We shall show, in our next number, how those forgeries of the ninth century were maintained and perpetuated as the law of the Church in after ages.

(69) Nam quod Rothadus hodie contigit, unde scitis quod eras cuilibet non eveniat vestrum? Sic apostolus admonet dicens: qui putat se stare videat ne cadat, quod si contigerit ut verbis utamur prophetiis, ad cujus rogo confugietis auxilium?—Nicolas to the bishops of the Synod of Sylvanectis, Ep. 32.—Labbe and Cost., vol. viii., p. 417.

(70) Throni enim Dei vocantur: ideo non debent moveri, aut affligi, vel perturbari. De ipsis ergo ait propheta; cœli enarrant gloriam Dei, et opera manuum ejus annuntiat firmamentum.—Stephen, Ep. 1., Labbe and Coss., vol. i., p. 735.

(72) Spretis monitis nostris, ac epistolis sibi a nobis coram tota ecclesia nostra datis.—Ep. 10.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 354.

(73) Diversis aliis pro hac eadem causa nostris epistolis per nonnullos directis crebro contemptis.—Ep 40, to Carolus.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 792. See also the letter of Rothadus, p. 788.

(74) Injuriam Sancti Petri, sedis apostolicæ privilegiorum imminutionem. . . . perspeximus.—Nicolas to Synod of Sylvanect.—Labbe and Cost., vol. viii., p. 416.

(75) Gallorum Episcopi, zeli et invidiæ diaboli facibus accensi.—Nicolas.—Ep 39, to clergy and people of Rome.—Vol. viii., p. 791.

(76) Nec postquam nos erecti sagittas divinæ pharetræ jaculare adversus hujus modi pronefas longe lateque cœpimus, nobis collaborare sollicite procurastis. Deinque ubi super hoc labor vester apparuit? Ubi concursus, vel ubi sacerdotale studium claruit? . . . quando pro ea latratus dedistis? . . . . . vel quando nobiscum ut castrorum acies ordinati stetistis? quando nobiscum Dominum in choro laudastis? . . . quando cantavimus simul?—Nicolas, Ep. 88, to the bishops in the kingdom of Louis.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 416.

(77) Majorem partem episcoporum omnium die noctuque, cum aliis fidelibus tuis, contra piratas maritimos, invigilare, ob idque Episcopi impediantur ventre.—Ep. 27, to Louis and Carolus.—Vol. viii., p. 403.

(78) Ut episcopos de regnis vestris ad synodum Romam mittendi necessitas non postulet.—P. 401.

One word now to our readers. We have often had occasion to entreat our Roman Catholic correspondents not to grope for the religion of the Gospel in the ages we have been speaking of, and those that followed. Will they give us credit now for having had good grounds and reason for the earnest advice we gave?

After the insight we have given them now into the religion, the policy, the craft, and the villainy of those ages, will they now give greater heed to our earnest and affectionate warning, founded on the labour we have gone through for their sakes, to seek for no gospel of their salvation in the inventions and the wickedness of those ages; but rather to seek for it where it may be surely found—in the words of our Blessed Lord himself, and the writings of his truly inspired ministers.

ERRATUM—In Decretal Epistles, No. II. (Vol. II., No. 24, January 1854), page 2, col. 2, a clerical error occurred in giving 700 for the date of Pope Gregory the Great; it ought to have been 600. In the line next but one above that, after the words "forged Epistles," the words "besides many genuine ones," were accidentally omitted.

THE HEIR OF BALLYMANUS.—No. II.

AFTER the events narrated in our last chapter, Frank had but little inclination to remain in London; and in as short a time, therefore, as he could contrive it, was again at Ballymanus. He seemed to himself to have grown several years older since he had last been there. It was not so long since he had left home a light-hearted, thoughtless boy, and now he returned distracted by the profoundest doubts, disappointed of his dearest hopes, and convinced that life had no more happiness in store for him. His sisters, too, he felt that he had suddenly outgrown. When he was last at home their affection had been every thing to him; and, though they were younger than himself, they had been his constant companions, and their society was all he then deemed necessary for his happiness. Now he found himself introduced into a new world, into which they could not enter, and their love appeared too cold to his exalted feelings. It was from his mother alone that he sought for sympathy and consolation, and it is needless to say he sought it not in vain. To his mother he returned dearer than ever; the sacrifice he had made for her and for his faith was one which she thought could not be repaid by too much love and gratitude: she had been always proud of him, but now she believed that no hero of monkish romance had exhibited more stubborn virtue, or stood proof against more seductive temptations; and Frank could not find courage enough to open his whole heart to her, but silently winced under praises which he knew he did not deserve. But this concealment of his doubts, dictated though it was by a reluctance to give pain to those he loved, was deeply painful to himself, reserve being alien to his natural disposition, which was communicative and eager for sympathy. He thought of taking counsel with the priest of his parish; but quickly shrunk from the idea. Mr. O'Driscoll was, indeed, a perfect contrast to Mr. Oldham, to whose spiritual guidance Frank had been now for some time accustomed. Oldham was a scholar and a gentleman, of much delicacy of feeling, and one who could enter into Frank's state of mind, and appreciate the difficulties that perplexed him. Mr. O'Driscoll was a rough, vulgar man, much more skilled in cursing a heretic than in confuting one; not destitute of coarse humour; a pleasant companion over a tumbler of whiskey punch, and one who, when he addressed his flock from the altar on the subject of the Soupers, could stir them to mirth as well as indignation, and make them feel that the pelting the readers out of the parish was not only a very pious act, but good fun besides. Frank looked with a lenient eye on these proceedings, for, though he had lost much of his faith in his old religion, his sympathies were with it still; but yet, he felt that this foul-mouthed alumnus of Maynooth was not a man to whom he could open his heart, or of whom he could take counsel in his perplexities. He tried, but with ill success, to disclose the state of his mind to his father. But Mr. Mac Manus was a practical worldly man, who had small inclination to listen to his son's speculative doubts. He did himself abuse the priests and priestcraft most heartily; Mr. O'Driscoll, just then, was in especial disfavour, for he had taken Mr. Mac Manus to task on one of his recent votes, and it was rumoured that he and his brethren meant to throw him overboard at the next election, and bring in an English lawyer, who had lately come over to Romanism; but, when Frank touched on the doctrines of his religion, his father promptly advised him not to trouble his head about such matters. If he had supposed that his son meant to abandon the outward communion of the church, he would have been seriously alarmed at a step so disgraceful to the family; but he was amused, and vexed, and impatient at the notion of his troubling himself to inquire into the evidence for the claims of his church, or for her doctrines. In fact, he considered the safety of his soul to be his priest's concern and not his; and he would be quite content if the priests were but half as scrupulous, not to interfere with him in worldly matters, as he was not to intrude on their department.

And thus Frank's doubts, repelled from external manifestations, preyed only the more upon his mind, and he was obliged to own to himself that he had not found in home the peace and comfort he had anticipated. The image of Edith, too, he found it impossible to banish from his heart; it was in vain that he told himself that it was foolish and unwise to think any more of her; still to her his thoughts reverted, and never had her image seemed to his fancy more dazzlingly fair; never had she seemed to him more worthy of his affection than now that she was lost to him for ever. His spirits, consequently, continued to be dejected, and his bodily frame, though naturally strong, began to show traces of the violent mental agitation to which he had, for some time, been subjected; until the alteration became so manifest as to excite the affectionate alarm of his mother, who insisted on calling in medical advice. The physician, an old friend of the family, and who was acquainted with the fact of Frank's matrimonial disappointment, pronounced the case one not to be treated by medicine, and recommended change of air and scene as the best restoratives. A continental tour was proposed, and the plan met Frank's ready concurrence. It had been among the earliest of his boyish wishes to travel over some of those foreign places, the description or the history of which had most kindled his imagination; and now he had an additional motive for travel. He said to himself that he was probably doing his religion an injustice by judging of it as it appeared in these kingdoms, where it was in the midst of heresy, and where it had been so long in a position of civil inferiority; and he was anxious to compare English and Irish Romanism with the same religion abroad, where it had freer opportunities for its developement. Spain was the country to which he first directed his steps, some members of his family having emigrated thither in the preceding generation, and their descendants being still settled at Seville. We shall not attempt to describe the view of Cadiz from the sea, though its beauty was one of Frank's first impressions of Spain; we must refer to other travellers for descriptions of scenery, and content ourselves with mentioning a few of the religious peculiarities which attracted Frank's attention.

He had not, indeed, been half an hour landed at Cadiz before he became aware that he was in a Roman Catholic country. He was on his way from the water-side to his hotel, accompanied by the Gallician who had been the victor in a fierce scuffle with his brother porters for his modest baggage, when, on the tinkling of a hand-bell being heard, his guide arrested his steps, dropping on his knees, and exclaiming, "It's his Majesty." Frank, who did not at first think of the bell indicating anything more dignified than the approach, perhaps, of a postman, asked if the king was coming, not himself seeing any necessity for expressing his respect in so abject a manner; but, on his guide repeating indignantly, "God, God," Frank recollected enough to guess (a conjecture which was afterwards confirmed), that the bell denoted the passage of a priest with the consecrated wafer to some dying man; he, therefore, joined his companion in the kneeling posture, and both of them, with all others in sight, continued kneeling and beating their breasts until the tinkling of the bell died away in the distance. Frank soon became familiar with this custom, which he thought very edifying, as a proof of the general piety and faith of the people.

Another scene which he encountered a few days afterwards did not give him equally favourable impressions of the devotion (at least, as far as its outward signs were concerned), of this Catholic people. It was a grand religious procession, to the sight of which Frank had looked forward with interest; such solemnities not being possible to be publicly celebrated in England or Ireland. But he was not at all prepared for so much irreverence and indecorum as were exhibited. There were, indeed, a few in the front of the procession who did seem to remember what they were engaged in; but the majority appeared all alive for amusement, and (what shocked Frank most) some of the younger members of the procession were whistling merry tunes, in chorus, while their pious leaders were chanting the sorrows of the Blessed Virgin—

> Cujus animam dolentem,
> Contristatam et gementem,
> Pertransivit gladius.

Indeed, anything more discordant than the musical part o the performance could hardly be conceived, and the want of harmony did not escape the criticism of some of the natives; for a forward youngster planted himself right in front of the procession, and twirled his hat on the point of his stick, exclaiming contemptuously—"Aquella grande musica." The general appearance of the procession was far from imposing. Those in front carried large wax candles, and as there was a moderate breeze, their hands and clothes were all covered, in somewhat a ludicrous manner, with the melted wax. The image of the Virgin which was borne with them had rather a rickety and unsteady motion, and the propriety of images being one of the points on which Frank's doubts had been earliest excited, he could not help thinking of some of the descriptions that the prophets gave of heathen images—"They bear them upon the shoulder, they carry them and set them in their place and they stand; from their place shall they not remove—they must needs be borne because they cannot go."—Is. xlvi. 7; Jer. x. 5. The ceremony concluded with a kind of catastrophe—one of the tapers, being awkwardly carried, set fire to the splendidly-embroidered silk canopy which was carried in procession. The priest made his escape, precipitately, from under it, and for an instant there was some consternation among the beholders; yet in a few moments their natural levity gained the ascendancy; shouts of laughter were heard, and a number of jokes were made on the occasion, some of them, to Frank's ears, bordering on profanity. He retired interested in the show he had seen, but not able to look on it as a religious or an edifying ceremony.

About this time he heard that the relation to whom he was commended did not happen to be just then at Seville, so he allowed himself to be prevailed on by a young Spaniard, whose acquaintance he had made, to join him in taking the steamer to Malaga, where he further accompanied him to the boarding-house in which he took up his quarters, Frank's object being to perfect himself in the use of the language. He met daily at dinner there five or six lay Spaniards, together with one or two priests. Frank's prejudices were somewhat shocked, the very first day of his dining there, which chanced to be Friday. Now, in spite of all his free thinking he had always been a strict observer of the regulations of his Church, and whatever might be his secret opinion as to her claims, it would have cost him some uneasy sensations to eat meat on a forbidden day. What was his surprise to see those about him actuated by no similar scruples, but consuming flesh heartily, with perfect disregard of the obligations of the day. Frank first thought, he must have miscounted the day of the week; but learned, with surprise, that it really was Friday, and that the regulations of the Church there permitted the indulgence.

"But how can this be," inquired Frank, "for, with us there can be no greater sin than to eat meat on a Friday; and, even a man starving with famine would not be allowed to take, on that day, soup which had been made from meat."

"Nay," replied Frank's friend, Don Luis B., "why did not your ancestors render as good service to Holy Church as ours did. Here you have only to purchase a 'Boll of the Crusades,' getting your name duly inserted, at the small charge of two reales (about sixpence), and you are free for a twelvemonth from a great many inconvenient obligations. Small as the charge is, the Church must make a good thing of it, since every one buys one, and you must have a new one every year. Between ourselves," added he, "I take the benefit of the bull, although I have not got mine renewed this year; for it cannot be any very great sin when a matter of two reales would set it all right."

"But," inquired Frank, "how can you get absolution if you neglect a regulation so very easy to be complied with as this?"

"It will be time enough to think of that," replied Don Luis, "when I ask for absolution: I never go to confession."

"Never go to confession!" exclaimed Frank, somewhat startled.

"No,' said Don Luis. "Who does? Until lately, indeed, you could not be admitted to any post under government without producing a certificate that you had been at confession. However, even then, such certificates could easily be bought at the low price of a peseta (about 10d.); and now we have a liberal government, nothing at all of the kind is required."

"And do you mean to say," insisted Frank, "that nobody now goes to confession?"

"When I say nobody," replied his friend, "I speak of the majority of the men; the women are regular enough: it must be owned they have more piety than we; but, besides, no girl can be married without producing certificates of her regular performance of this duty; and, as girls usually like to get married, this is one motive which prevents their being as remiss as we are."

As the conversation became general Frank was more and more astonished at the want of respect for religion exhibited by the company. They all seemed to take pleasure in badgering the poor priests, who ate their dinner nearly in silence, and took the assaults made on them with great good temper. The compulsory confessions, the purchaseable certificates of confession, the celibacy of the clergy, the immoral lives of many of them, were touched on. They went on to scoff at some of the doctrines of religion, and Frank, who, in all his doubts, had always felt a distaste for scoffing and profanity, found himself taking part with the priests against the others. He expressed surprise at the freedom of their language.

"Why," said Don Luis, "you must not wonder if we take a little amends now for the time our tongues were tied. There was a time when we were obliged to be more cautious. There is a friend of mine in Seville, whose uncle, in the days of the Inquisition, had four months imprisonment, and was once put to the question, for playing chess." "Is playing chess a sin?" asked Frank; "If so, I fear I may run some little danger myself." "The gentleman of whom I speak," replied Don Luis, "used to play chess with his daughter every evening; but, unfortunately, got a servant girl from the country, who accused her master of sorcery, stating that they were very irreligious; never had prayers, and used to spend every evening in mysterious incantations, using figures of devils and horses to conjure with. At the dead of night the family were surprised by a visit from the familiars of the Inquisition, who examined every member of the household in separate rooms; they found the box, but not the men, for the servant girl had intimated her suspicions to a fellow-servant, who had told the daughter, and she, very unwisely, threw the men away. The master of the house was taken away, and only obtained his liberty, four or five months afterwards, in a popular outbreak."

Frank expressed his suspicion that his friend was playing tricks upon travellers, in passing off such a romance for true history; but Don Luis asseverated that it had all really occurred; and was, he added, a much truer story than many a legend which the priest would tell them.

Frank, who had earned the priest's good opinion by the vigour with which he had taken his part in the discussion, had some further conversation with him in private, and learned some things which surprised him not a little. He learned that there had been a general confiscation of church property two or three years before; that all that he had been accustomed to hear spoken of, as the worst deeds of Henry VIII. and Protestantism, had been perpetrated in his own days in this Catholic country; that monasteries and convents had been seized on, and monks and nuns turned out into the world, being allowed a small pittance for their subsistence, and that pittance not even punctually paid; and finally, that there were several bishops in exile on account of their opposition to the government measures. Frank expressed his astonishment that Catholics should be guilty of such sacrilege. "They are not Catholics," replied the priest, "but infidels." And yet this only altered the grounds of Frank's astonishment; he had always been accustomed to hear of infidelity as the growth of Protestantism; but here, if the priest was to be believed, had infidelity grown in such luxuriance, in the most Catholic country in Europe, that the infidel party had become the dominant one, and had been able to dispose of the church revenues as they pleased. It should be added, that when Frank talked the matter over afterwards with Don Luis, the latter maintained that the necessities of the country fully justified the government in the measures they had adopted; while he asserted that the immoral lives of many of the monks had made them fall unpitied. "There were several," he said, "in Malaga who notoriously had families. They took vows of chastity, and they were not chaste; they took vows of poverty, and they were avaricious; they took vows of humility, and they were proud; they have deeply injured the faith of a religious people."

To return to the priest's conversation:—He went on to complain of one frightful consequence of the present state of things. There was, he said, a great part of Spain where the bishops were in exile, and where, in his private opinion, valid sacraments could not now be had, and in which the minds of the faithful were, at any rate, disturbed by serious doubts as to the validity of them, which, in the case of such sacraments as penance and matrimony, must give rise to cruel anxiety. Many, in consequence, abstain from confession altogether.

"But," asked Frank, "have not the dean and chapter power to appoint a vicar-capitular in the absence of the bishop?"

"Certainly;" replied his clerical friend, "but there are many conditions attached to this power, a want of compliance with which renders the appointment, and consequently the jurisdiction, null or doubtful, and communicates the same defect to all acts and minor authorities that have emanated from it. Now, when we see a man administrating the see whom we do not consider fit for the office, how can we tell but the consent of the chapter may have been extorted by force, or whether their choice may not be ipso facto null by common law."

"Really," said Frank, "I fear we are very thoughtless and careless in Ireland; we never dream of those numerous conditions which you say must be fulfilled; nor do we reflect how a single defect in the appointment of a bishop would vitiate all acts emanating from his authority. We are apt to take for granted that all our priests' acts are valid, without inquiring at all into the matter."

As the priest, who was a simple minded man, became more communicative, he fulfilled Don Luis's prediction as to the number of legends he would tell. He was very eloquent on the virtues of a miraculous image in his church, and on the history of some favourite saints—of which a certain St. Rita was the most conspicuous. Frank thought he could divide his Spanish friends into two classes—those who believed every thing and those who believed nothing. The mistress of the house in which he boarded belonged to the first of these two classes. A single sample of the stories narrated by her will suffice. The good lady was just then in a certain interesting condition, and placed her chief confidence, on her approaching perils, in the succour of St. Vincent Ferrer. On Frank's asking why this saint should be supposed more likely than another to assist on such an occasion, he learned the following history:—"Being applied to on a certain occasion, by a young married lady, whom the idea of approaching maternity kept in a state of constant terror, the good natured saint desired her to dismiss her fears, as he was determined to take upon himself whatever inconvenience or trouble there might be in the case. Some weeks had elapsed when the good monk, who had forgotten his engagement, was heard in the dead of night roaring and screaming in a manner so unusual, and so little becoming a professional saint, that he drew the whole community to his cell. Nothing, for a time, could relieve the mysterious sufferings, and though he passed the rest of the night as well as could be expected, the fear of a relapse would have kept his afflicted brethren in painful suspense, had not the grateful husband of the timid lady, who was the cause of the uproar, taken an early opportunity to return thanks for the unconscious delivery of his consort." It is very natural, then, that so experienced a saint should be the one generally applied to by Spanish ladies when about to encounter the perils of childbirth.

We have devoted so much space to the account of Frank's stay at Malaga, that we must touch but lightly on his sojourn at Seville. The kindness and hospitality he met with from his friends there were all that he could have desired, and he soon felt himself almost at home. Religion, too, presented itself to him in a more favourable aspect than at Malaga; the moral character of the clergy stood higher, and the noble cathedral appeared to him to be in itself sufficient to inspire feelings of devotion. The first day he visited it he thought he had never seen a cathedral crowded before; such a multitude in London he thought could not have been kept in order without the presence of policemen; yet he withdrew the comparison on missing, as he soon did, his pocket-handkerchief. He was somewhat scandalized, too, by the amount of laughing and talking which, despite of notices posted in the church, prevailed in the sacred edifice; and the ladies had a habit of closing their fans with a loud report, producing a succession of pops, which did not at all assist his devotion. He heard an eloquent sermon, the only part which struck him as unusual being the doxology, with which the preacher concluded—"Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, and to the Most Sacred Virgin. Amen." The next time he visited the church when a crowd was expected he took the precaution of placing his handkerchief in a breast pocket; and certainly he did feel a pull at his skirts, but on turning round saw no one but a man on his knees, absorbed in devotion; it was some time after, and in a different part of the building he felt a second pull, and on turning, beheld the same man. On this occurring a third time, he said, very gravely, "good man, there is nothing;" at which the thief himself kept his countenance steadily; but another, who seemed to be a confederate, was much amused.

We should fill the whole paper were we to put down every thing which Frank saw different from English and Irish customs, and therefore hasten to tell briefly, that after a considerable stay in Spain, which, by the new turn it had given his thoughts, had been of great service to his health and spirits, Frank passed into France. His stay in that country was not nearly so long as it had been in Spain, nor had he equal facility for becoming intimate with the people; yet, the general characteristics were the same—gross superstition and credulity among the uneducated, heartless scepticism among the more enlightened; only that as far as he could observe, the proportion of the latter class to the former was larger in France than in Spain. Indeed, it was almost always from French literature that his Spanish friends had derived their infidelity.

Switzerland was the country to which Frank next bent his steps, and it was amid her beautiful scenery that he derived the benefit of complete restoration to health, being induced by it to exert his mind somewhat less, and his body a great deal more than he had done for some time. He made there, too, the acquaintance of Mr. Graham, an English clergyman, who had afterwards considerable influence on his mind. Their acquaintance began from sitting next each other at a table d'hôte, when both being good walkers, fond of adventure, and ardent admirers of the glacier scenery, they agreed to join each other in an expedition over a difficult pass, not very commonly crossed. Their first communication with each other on religious subjects arose out of their being on a Sunday at the Hospice of the Grimsel, when Mr. Graham proposed to read prayers for the English who were in the house, and Frank, whose religion was not known, was invited with the others. At home he would not have liked to enter a Protestant place of worship, but here he was not sorry for the opportunity of learning somewhat more of a religion which, because it was Edith's, he never could think very harshly of. Frank could not help contrasting the humble apartment, the scanty congregation, the absence of ceremony, with the imposing ritual of his own Church, such as he had seen it when one of the crowded assembly who worshipped in the magnificent cathedral of Seville; yet it occurred to him to ask himself whether he were not now joining in a more reasonable service, as well as whether the quiet good sense of Mr. Graham's own brief remarks were not to be preferred to the impassioned appeal which had been made to his feelings by the friar who preached at Seville. Frank did not afterwards conceal from Mr. Graham his religious sentiments, and he defended the cause of Romanism against him in more discussions than one; the chief temptation to which he was now exposed being, that he was in danger of losing his earnestness, and arguing too much for argument's sake.

Mr. Graham and Frank travelled into Italy together, and after some stay at other cities, of which we shall here give no account, at length arrived at Rome. There they enjoyed in abundance classical antiquities and religious ceremonial; Mr. Graham seeking for more of the latter than Frank, who had become familiar with much of it in Spain. One morning that Mr. Graham had some engagement of this kind, in which Frank did not care to accompany him, the latter thought of a plan for surprising his friend, and gaining a victory over him in one of the discussions they had had together. Mr. Graham had pressed on Frank the inferences to be drawn from the dread which his Church displayed of the Holy Scriptures; her fear lest her members should study it; her consciousness that the conclusions which any unprejudiced reader would draw from the Bible would be in opposition to the sentiments of the Church; and the probability that the reason his Church was against the Bible, was because she knew the Bible was against her. Frank had met him by denying that his Church was against the Bible. He said that he had himself been freely permitted to study it, and was courageous enough to maintain that his Church had always encouraged the reading of the Scriptures. Remembering that he had heard that there was an authorised Italian translation of the Scriptures, he thought he could effectually demolish his friend's case by bringing home to him an Italian translation of the Bible purchased at Rome under the eye of the Pope himself. The first bookseller he went to, on being asked whether he had a Bible, answered stoutly in the affirmative; and Frank chuckled to himself to think how simply he had broken down Mr. Graham's case; but the book on being fetched turned out to be Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, the bookseller insisting that this was the sacred volume itself; and Frank, after many efforts, was obliged to leave his shop without being able to convince him of the contrary. In several other shops where Frank searched, when he asked for the Bible he got the answer—"Non è permesso" or "è prohibito;" but he at length succeeded in finding a copy of Martini's translation, which, however, turned out to be contained in twenty-four volumes, and for which he was asked 105 francs! Not liking to pay so much for his friend's enlightenment, he asked was there not some cheaper and more portable edition, but was assured by the bookseller that no such thing would be permitted, as it might then get into circulation among the common people, and he read by them indiscriminately. Frank felt in his mind that the next time he argued on the subject with Mr. Graham, he must change his ground; he thought of maintaining that the people had no need of the Bible since they were taught all the facts and doctrines of it in the services of the Church and the sermons of her teachers. But, on reflection, he was obliged to own that if the people did become acquainted with a great deal of truth in this way, they swallowed also a quantity of fable on the same authority. His Spanish friends, for instance (that is to say the believing part of them), were not more fully persuaded of the truth of the fact that our Lord was crucified between two thieves, than they were that the name of one of them was Demas, that he had attempted to rob the Blessed Virgin in her flight into Egypt, but, impressed by something in her appearance, had treated her courteously; had recognised her when on the cross, had implored her intercession, and solely in consequence of that intercession been forgiven by our Saviour. And Frank thought to himself Mr. Graham would ask him if this is the way in which the facts of Scripture were dressed up for the use of the people, whether it was not probable that the doctrines of the Bible were equally ornamented.

Frank's meditations on his arguments were interrupted by meeting Mr. Graham himself; and on hearing that he was on his way to visit a neighbouring Church, he agreed to accompany him. But he had there a still more unexpected meeting. He could scarcely believe his eyes when he recognized in an ecclesiastic who was present his friend Mr. Oldham, though when he thought of it he remembered that he knew of his intention to visit Rome, and that it was only the time that was uncertain. Frank followed Oldham when he left the church, and was cordially greeted by him. He presented his friend Mr. Graham to him, whom Mr. Oldham, though considerably the senior of the two, was pleased to say he remembered at Oxford. Their religious views, indeed, had at one time not been very different. When Mr. Oldham had, on the invitation of the young men, come with them to their lodgings, which were close by, Mr. Graham could not forbear saying that when he had last seen him in Oxford, he little thought it would be in Rome they were to meet again.

"Yet why should you wonder," replied Mr. Oldham, for Rome is the great centre of unity to which all true Catholics must, sooner or later, make their way. From what I remember of you, I trust you, too, have found your way here in heart, as well as in body."

"I must hasten to undeceive you," returned Mr. Graham. "If I had any dissatisfaction with my own Church before, it has been removed by the sight of Romanism abroad; many things which I had thought to be our own peculiar misfortunes, I have found to be the inevitable results of human nature. I have discovered, in short, that I might go further and fare worse."

"Strange," replied Mr. Oldham, "that the very same aspect of things has only supplied me with fuller confirmation of the Divine origin of our faith, since I see that it has developed the same religious character everywhere; in all ages—in modern Italy and Spain, and in medieval England. I should hope, therefore, that if you state your difficulties I could easily remove them."

"You need scarcely ask for my difficulties," replied Mr. Graham. "Are not the countries which have retained Romanism notoriously behind the age? they have not kept up with the march of civilization; they are ignorant, and in a measure barbarous; they have the faults of barbarians; they have no self-command; they cannot be trusted; they must be treated as slaves or they rebel; they emerge out of their superstitions in order to turn infidels. The sword, not the law, is their ruler. Wherever I travelled I became conscious of the change in a moment when I passed from a Protestant into a Roman Catholic country. The latter countries are spectacles of idleness, slovenliness, want of spirit, disorder, dirt, and dishonesty. There surely must be something in their religion to account for this; and is it not plainly that it keeps them children, and then, they being children, keep to it?"

"If this be your only difficulty," said Mr. Oldham, smiling, "it is not a very formidable one." You quite mistake the mission of the Church: she was sent into the world to save men's souls, and not to promote mere civilization; and we are not to find fault with her if she does not accomplish a work which she has never undertaken. She would infinitely rather save the soul of one single wild bandit of Calabria, or whining beggar of Palermo, than drive a hundred lines of railroad through the length of Italy, or carry out a scheme of sanitary reform in every town of Sicily, except so far as those works tended to some spiritual good beyond them. You might as well blame the State for not making saints, as find fault with the Church because she does not invent a steam engine or construct a tariff."

"I fear you misapprehend the point of my objection," replied Mr. Graham; "I certainly never imagined that the Church ought to encroach on the province of the State, and undertake the constructing of railroads and tariffs; but the fact which struck me was that your religion had a tendency to impede the State in carrying out its proper office; that the character which it developed was incapable of exertion and self-reliance. Your Church forbids freedom of thought; teaches men to be religious by proxy, and to look to their priests to save their souls for them; and is it strange if they should exhibit in worldly matters the same character which she has trained them to in religious matters? However, I would readily grant that you had given a sufficient apology, if it could be proved that your Church's neglect of men's bodily interests arose from her solicitude for the good of their souls, though indeed it might seem strange that God had so ordained matters that the two should be incompatible. But I have found your religion equally wanting if you test it by the moral character of her people; a lie, for example, is thought nothing of if it serve a convenient purpose: you must look in heretic England, if you want men who venerate truth and honour, and whose words may thoroughly be depended on."

"If you form a low estimate," said Mr. Oldham, "of the virtue which is developed by our Church, it is only because the Church has very different views of offences from the world. The world, now-a-days, sets a high value on honesty, fairness, honour, truth, and benevolence; virtues, no doubt, comprehended in the teaching of the Church; but still which are the fruit of nature as well as of grace, and do not necessarily imply grace. Now, though the Church exacts these virtues in their fulness from her saints; in the case of ordinary men she has no warrant or encouragement to enforce upon them more than those habits of virtue, the absence of which would be tantamount to their separation from God; she knows that if she attempts more she might lose all; she exhorts men, no doubt, against those sins which are disorders and disfigurements of the soul; but she directs her efforts against those which are absolutely incompatible with contrition and absolution. And, as I said, her scale of offences is very different from the world; she considers consent, though as quick as thought, to a single unchaste wish as infinitely more heinious than any lie which can possibly be fancied. Take a mere beggarwoman, lazy, ragged, filthy, and not over scrupulous of truth; if she is chaste, and sober, and cheerful, and goes to her religious duties, she will, in the eyes of the Church, have a prospect of heaven, quite closed and refused to the State's pattern man; the just, the upright, the generous, the honourable, the conscientious—if he be all this, not from a supernatural power, but from mere natural virtue. Excess of drinking is one of the world's most disgraceful offences; but if it do not proceed to the loss of reason, the Church thinks it far less sin than one deliberate act of detraction, even though the matter of it be truth. And not unfrequently does a priest hear a confession of theft which he knows would sentence the penitent to transportation if brought into a court of justice, but which he knows, too, in the judgment of the Church might be pardoned, on the man's private contrition without any confession at all.

"I have certainly no inclination," replied Mr. Graham, "to dispute with you the possibility of pardon without confession to a priest; but I am, on the whole, deeply grieved at what I have heard from you. I had observed that among the mass of your people lying, and drunkenness, and dishonesty are regarded as mere peccadilloes, quite trifling matters; and now I find that this is not in spite of the teaching of your church, but that this tone of feeling is the very one which your statements of her doctrine (guard them as you will) have a tendency to produce. However, I am quite willing to pass from the subject of mere mundane morality; and to consider not so much what your church fails to perform, as what she actually does effect. Her teaching does produce a certain very definite character on nations and individuals, and that character, instead of being too spiritual or too religious, is just the reverse. Roman Catholics, whether in the north or in the south, in the middle ages or in modern times, exhibit the combined and contrary faults of superstition and profaneness. They are rude where they should be reverent, jocose where they should be grave, and loquacious where they should be silent. Religion is made both free and easy, and yet formal. Superstitions and false miracles are at once preached, assented to, and laughed at, until one really does not know what is believed or what not; or whether anything is believed at all. The saints are lauded, yet affronted. Take mediæval England or France, or modern Belgium or Italy, it is all the same; you have your boy bishop at Salisbury, your lord of misrule at Rheims, and at Sens your feast of asses. Whether in the south now or in the north formerly, you have the excesses of your carnival. Legends, such as that of St. Dunstan's fight with the author of evil at Glastonbury, are popular in Spain, in Germany, and in Italy, while in Naples or in Seville, your populations rise in periodical fury against the celestial patrons whom they ordinarily worship.

"I readily acknowledge," said Mr. Oldham, "that there is a character of our religion so specific and peculiar as you have described, which cannot be ascribed to anything but the genius of Catholicism itself. But I turn all this into an argument for me, and I say, that this is the very phenomenon which must necessarily result from a revelation of divine truth falling upon the human mind in its existing state of ignorance and moral feebleness."

"Perhaps," said Mr. Graham, somewhat astonished, "I have not sufficiently explained what I have observed of the practical working of your religion."

"I perfectly understand you," returned Mr. Oldham; "and if you will listen to the explanation I am about to give, you may say, when I have done, whether I have not observed as well as you, and whether I am not willing to state what I have observed as broadly and distinctly as yourself. The key to the whole difficulty is, that you should clearly understand that faith is one thing and obedience another. As men may know that they ought not to steal, and yet deliberately take what is not theirs, so may they be gifted with a simple, undoubting, cloudless belief—that Christ, for instance, is in the blessed Sacrament—and yet commit the sacrilege of breaking open the tabernacle and carrying off the consecrated particles, for the sake of the precious vessel containing them. It is because Protestants know nothing of faith, that they cannot understand the state of things in a Catholic country, where, whatever other graces may be lost, faith still generally remains, and the people exhibit knowledge without love. A wicked Catholic is not so, because he disbelieves in hell, as a wicked Protestant may; this is to him an incontestable fact, brought home to him by that supernatural faith with which he assents to the Divine Word, speaking through Holy Church; his thoughts take a different turn; he looks up to our Blessed Lady; he knows, by supernatural faith, her power and goodness; he turns the truth to his own bad purpose, and makes her his patroness and protectress against the penalty of sins which he does not mean to abandon. Hence the stories, which I have no doubt you meant to repeat to me, of highwaymen and brigands devout to the Madonna. And their wishes leading to the belief, they begin to circulate stories of her much desired compassion towards impenitent offenders; and these stories, fostered by the circumstances of the day, or confused with others similar, but not impossible, for a time are in repute.* Thus, the Blessed Virgin has been reported to deliver the reprobate from hell, and transfer him to purgatory, and absolutely to secure from perdition all who are devout to her—repentance not being considered as the means. Or they have thought, by some sacred relic, to be secure from death in their perilous and guilty expeditions. In short, vice does not involve a neglect of the external duties of religion. Faith appears among us in the wicked as well as in the good. I saw you look contemptuously at the pilgrims to-day—a mixture of pilgrim and beggar, or pilgrim and robber, or half gipsey, or three-quarters boon companion, or, at least, with nothing saintly or religious about them. They will let you wash their feet and serve them at table; and the hosts have more merit for their ministry than the guests for their weariness. Yet all, saints and sinners, have faith in things invisible, which each uses in his own way.

You may object, perhaps, to the profanity of our people. Listen to the conversation, you will say, of the multitude, or of any private party. What strange oaths mingle with it! God's heart, and God's eyes, and God's wounds, and God's blood. You cry out, how profane! Doubtless; but do you not see that the special profaneness above Protestant oaths is the necessary result of that insight into the invisible world which you have not. Your people would be as varied and fertile in their adjurations as a Catholic populace, if they believed as we."

Mr. Graham did not interrupt; and Mr. Oldham went on.

"If you keep this explanation in mind, you will be able to account for many of the things which you say shock you in Catholic countries. You enter into one of the churches, perhaps, and you turn your eyes to a confessional. The penitents are crowding for admission, and they seem to have no shame or solemnity about the errand on which they are come; till at length, on a penitent's turning from the grate, one tall woman, bolder than a score of men, darts forward, from a distance, into the place he has vacated, to the disappointment of the many who have waited longer than she. You almost groan under the weight of your imagination, that a soul so selfish, so uncollected, must surely be in very ill disposition for so awful a sacrament; you look at the priest, and he has on his face a look almost of impatience, or of good-natured compassion at the voluble and superfluous matter which is the staple of her confession. The priests, you think, are no better than the people. My dear brother, do not be so uncharitable and unphilosophical. Things we thoroughly believe we treat as things which occur every day, whether they be of this world or of the next. Impatience and rudeness are faulty, no doubt; yet they do not prove the absence of faith, nor yet of love, or of contrition. Well, you turn away, half satisfied, and what do you see. There is a feeble old woman, who first genuflects before the Blessed Sacrament, and then steals her neighbour's handkerchief or prayerbook, who is intent upon his devotion. You are shocked, yet what does this prove? Faith does not force obedience. She worships, and she sins; she kneels, because she believes; she steals, because she does not love; she may be out of God's grace, but she is not altogether out of his sight.

* We observe that Mr. Oldham, desirous, it may be supposed of making the best possible defence for his cause, has, all through this conversation, copied, almost verbatim, the apology for religion on the continent, given by Dr. Newman in his 8th and 9th "Lectures, on the difficulties felt by Anglicans in submitting to the Catholic Church."

* It may be necessary to repeat that for the pictures of religion on the Continent, here given, Mr. Oldham was indebted to Dr. Newman's Lectures, before alluded to, delivered about three years after his leaving the Anglican Church, with the view of inducing others to follow his example!

"You come out again, and mix in the idle and dissipated throng, and you fall in with a man in a palmer's dress selling false relics, and a credulous circle of customers buying them as greedily as though they were the supposed French laces and India silks of a pedlar's basket; one simple soul has bought of him a cure for the rheumatism or ague, which might form a case of conscience. It is said to be a relic of St. Cuthbert, but only has virtue at sunrise, and when applied, with three crosses, to the head, arms, and feet. You pass on, and encounter a rude son of the Church, more like a showman than a religious, recounting to the gaping multitude some tale or vision of the invisible world, seen by brother Augustine of the Friar Minors, or by a holy Jesuit preacher, who died in the odour of sanctity, and sending round his bag to collect pence for the souls in purgatory; and of some appearance of our Lady (the like of which has never been before or since), but on no authority except popular report, and in no shape but that which popular caprice has given it. You go forward, and you find preparations proceeding for a great pageant or mystery; it is a high festival, and the incorporated trades have each undertaken their special religious celebration: the plumbers and glaziers are to play the Creation; the barbers the Call of Abraham; and at night is to be the grandest performance of all—the Resurrection and Last Judgment, played by the carpenters, masons, and blacksmiths: heaven and hell are represented—saints, devils, and living men; and the chef d'œuvre of the exhibition is the display of fireworks to be let off as the finale. 'How unutterably profane,' again you cry. Yes, profane to you, my dear brother—profane to a population which only half believes—not profane to those who believe wholly. They gaze, and in drinking in the exhibition with their eyes, they are making one continuous and intense act of faith.

"You turn to go home, and in going you pass through a retired quarter of the city. Look up at those sacred windows: they belong to the convent of the Perpetual Adoration, or to the poor Clares, or to the nuns of the Visitation. Seclusion, silence, watching, adoration, is their life day and night. Where will you find such a realised heaven upon earth? Yet that very sight has acted otherwise on the mind of a weak sister, and the very keenness of her faith, and wild desire of approaching the object of it, has led her to fancy, or to feign, that she has received that singular favour vouchsafed only to a few elect souls; and she points to God's wounds as imprinted on her hands, and feet, and side, though she herself has been instrumental in their fabrication.

"And now, as you have listened to me so patiently, I have only to say, in conclusion, what a merciful providence it is that faith and love are thus separable, as the Catholic creed teaches. If sin not only threw the soul out of God's favour, but at once emptied it of every supernatural principle, we should see in Catholics, what is so common in Protestants, souls brought back to a sense of guilt—frightened at their state, yet having no resource, and nothing to build upon. When the poor Protestant is overcome by sin, his doctrinal views vanish, he adds sin to sin, and his best aspirations come to nothing. But the Catholic knows just where he is, and what he is to do; no time is lost when compunction comes upon him, but while his feelings are fresh and keen he can betake himself to the appointed means of cure. Thus he may be ever failing; but yet he wipes off his guilt again and again; and even if his repentance does not endure, and if he has not strength to persevere, he is never getting worse, but ever beginning afresh.

"But, above all, let death come suddenly upon him, and let him have the preparation of one poor hour, and what is the Protestant to do? I am not speaking of the more serious part of the community, but of a man taken at random in one of our vast towns. The minutes hasten on, and, having to learn every thing (supposing him desirous of learning), he can practise nothing. His thoughts rise up in some vague desire of mercy, which he is unable to analyze. He asks for some chapter of the Bible to be read to him, but rather as the expression of his horror and bewilderment, than as the token of his faith; and then his intellect becomes clouded, and he dies. How different is it with the Catholic! He has within him almost a principle of recovery, certainly an instrument of it. He may have spoken lightly of the Almighty, but he has ever believed in him; he has sung jocose songs about the Blessed Virgin and the saints, and told good stories about the evil spirit—but in levity, not in contempt; he has been angry with his heavenly patrons when things went ill with him, but with the waywardness of a child who is cross with his parents. He has absented himself from his Easter duties, years out of number, but he never denied he was a Catholic. He has laughed at priests, and slandered them to others, but not as doubting the divinity of their function, and the virtue of their ministrations. He has attended mass carelessly and heartlessly, but he was ever aware what was there before his eyes, under the veil of material symbols. So, when the news come to him that he is to die, and he cannot get a priest, and the ray of God's grace pierces his heart, his thoughts at once take shape and order, and he knows precisely what to do. He addresses himself to his crucifix; he interests the Blessed Virgin in his behalf; he betakes himself to his patron saints; he calls his good angel to his side; he professes his desire of that sacramental absolution which, from circumstances, he cannot obtain; he exercises himself* in acts of faith, hope, charity, contrition, resignation, and other virtues suitable to his extremity. The enemy rushes on him to overthrow the faith on which he is built; but the whole tenor of his past life, his very jesting and his very oaths have been overruled to create in him a habit of faith, girding round and protecting the supernatural principle. And thus, even one who has been a bad Catholic may have hope in his death, to which the most virtuous of Protestants—nay, dear sir, the most correct and most thoughtful in your communion, however able, or learned, or sagacious, if he have lived not by faith, but by private judgment, are necessarily strangers."

There was a pause when Mr. Oldham had concluded, and then Mr. Graham replied, "I did, indeed, do you an injustice when I thought that you had not observed the working of Romanism on the continent. You have described it more graphically than I could have done—more so than, perhaps, the fear of giving offence, or of meeting denial would have permitted me to do, even had I been able; but when I have acknowledged the fidelity and liveliness of your descriptions, my praise ceases, and I must, in candour, express my utter disappointment at the ill success of the defence you have made for your system; it was, in short, no defence, but a confession and an adoption of the worst enormities that have been imputed to it."

"What was the difficulty you professed to answer? I endeavoured to apply to your Church's doctrine our Lord's test—'By their fruits you shall know them,' and I complained that the religion taught by your Church, even when practised most scrupulously, did not tend to produce holiness of life. You reply by admitting the fact most fully, and defending it. You assert that faith does not necessarily imply obedience; nay, that it ordinarily is separate from it in fact. All the glorious things that the Scripture says of faith you apply to the faith of devils, who believe and tremble; whose knowledge is accompanied by no love, and elicits no obedience. You boast of the universality of faith in these countries: I have not seen it. I have seen much credulity and much scepticism, but little faith. By faith I understand (and I use no novel language) not bare historical belief, such as may exist in the ungodly; but the habitual raising the mind above the things of sense, the habitual looking unto God, and trusting in him through Christ—a grace which differs only from obedience as the spring differs from the stream which issues from it. There is nothing of which I am more certain than that if the faith of your Church is one which has no tendency to produce works, the faith of your Church is not the faith of the Gospel.

"What was the description you gave me of the repentance taught by your Church? Which will enable a man to live in constant sin, without being injured by it—though ever falling, to wipe off his guilt again and again, and so never to get worse, but to be always beginning afresh. Is such language as this intended to remove or to confirm the prejudice I had entertained, that whatever be the theory of your penance and absolution, the practice is that the sinner is hardened by hopes of impunity, believing that he has the power, at any moment, to wipe off the old score of sin, and to be at liberty to begin a new one."

"But all you said before was brought to a climax by the contrast with which you concluded. As you spoke I shuddered to hear, as it were, a revelation of the very mystery of iniquity—a systematic plan for enabling men to secure the rewards of the service of God, while they employ their lives in the service of the devil. You complained of our Church, because she did not provide any means by which one of her members, after a life spent in wickedness and forgetfulness of God, might find a peaceful and happy death-bed, and die the death of the righteous, without having lived the life of the righteous. And you triumphed in contrasting the ease with which a 'bad Catholic' could, on his death-bed, find in his jests and his oaths his best safeguard, and by calling the Virgin, and the saints, and his good angel to his side, open to himself an assured prospect of heaven. Is this a scheme to have emanated from a God of infinite holiness and purity? Or did you think to terrify me by telling me that the prospect of heaven which may be enjoyed by such a man as you have described is denied to me and the most virtuous in my communion? I fear not your threats, for I hear from your lips not the language of the prophets of God, but the very characteristic abominations of the false prophets of old—'With lies you have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom God hath not made sad, and you have strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his evil way, by promising him life.'" (Ezek. xiii. 22.)

Mr. Oldham was about to reply, but just then the bells of the neighbouring church rung out, at which he started, and saying it was his hour of prayer, took a hasty leave. When he was gone, Mr. Graham involuntarily exclaimed—"Is it possible that he really believes in the set of opinions he professes! With what unction he described the practical working of your religion in the countries where it has had opportunity to develope itself! and what a miserable failure was his attempt to reconcile this with your Church's claim to sanctity! Is it possible that he could not know how much more mischief he was doing his cause by his vivid pictures of its difficulties, than good by his efforts to explain them. I fear you and your friends must regard him as one of the unruly elephants in the battles of old, which, in their ponderous flight, trampled down in all directions the forces they were brought up to support. And yet, perhaps, after all, he is scarcely to be blamed, for though the defence he offered is a failure, what better is to be had?"

Frank was silent, for he, too, while Mr. Oldham was speaking, could not help recalling to his mind some of the suspicions which Cornwall had formerly suggested. Nor had Mr. Oldham any immediate opportunity of explaining himself to them, for they did not meet again during the brief remaining period of Frank's stay in Rome. But the account of Frank's return to England must be reserved for another occasion.

* It may be proper to explain that by an act of faith, &c., is meant the repetition of a certain form of words.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. XXI.

WELL, Jem," said Pat, "I had a talk with a neighbour, and I want to tell it to you."

"Well, Pat, let us hear it," said Jem.

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "it was with Neddy Boylan, about the Readers and the Bible; and Neddy allowed it was just folly for the people to be listening to them at all; for sure, says he 'Aren't we better as we are?' Well, with that I asked him was the Bible the Word of God at all? And he allowed there was no saying again that. And then I asked him wouldn't the religion that agreed with the Word of God be better than the religion that was against it. Well, he allowed that, too; 'and now,' says I 'what way have you for knowing that the priest's religion is better, by the Word of God, than the parson's? Sure the priest won't let you look into the Bible to see if his religion is in it; and doesn't the parson offer to show you his in the Bible; and doesn't that itself look as if the parson had the best of it by the Bible?' 'Well,' says, he, 'Maybe it does for that matter, but I don't want to know nothing at all about it; sure ain't I better as I am?' says he. 'Arrah man,' says I, 'do you mean to tell me that it is better not to know which religion is true than to know it?' 'Well,' says he, 'if I don't know it, isn't it the priest's look out,' says he; 'and if I did know it, wouldn't it be my own look out,' says he; 'and so ain't I better as I am,' says he, 'knowing nothing about it at all?' 'And do you mean to tell me', says I, 'that if your religion is not the right way of salvation, that it's the priest will be damned instead of you, and you get salvation without being in the right way for it?' 'And do you mean to tell me,' says he, 'that God will lay all the blame on me that knows nothing at all about it myself, and only just does what the priest bids me, that ought to know better nor ever I can know? And,' says he, 'don't you mind Pat Brady that has the son that's a dummy, and innocent, and didn't Pat teach the creature to steal praties? and when them both was up afore the bench for it, didn't the magistrates say they wouldn't punish the dummy creature at all, cause he didn't know nothing at all; and they laid all the punishment on the man that taught him, and he knowing nothing himself, the creature, and do you mean to tell me,' says he, 'that the merciful God will be harder on the poor creatures that knows nothing, and only does as they are bid, than the magistrates was? Sure I won't believe that at all,' says he. 'Well,' says I, 'Neddy (when I considered a bit), it doesn't seem to me to be like that at all. Sure the dummy couldn't know the differ of what was right and wrong; and sure its you that won't know it, Neddy,' says I; 'and sure that's not the same at all; and sure, Neddy,' says I, 'if you was to go and be a dummy on purpose, and to try to make your own self a fool, the way you could steal praties, sure the magistrates wouldn't let you off for THAT, Neddy? I'm thinking it's the worse they'd give it to you, if they knew that you wouldn't know the differ of right and wrong, Neddy,' says I. 'And how would I know the differ if there's no one to teach me,' says he; 'and sure isn't it a Souper I'd be called if I would ask the priest to teach me out of the Bible?' says he. 'Well, sure enough, it was that way long enough,' says I; 'but it isn't that way now; for sure there's Mr. Owens, and there's the readers that's come, all willing and ready to show us that their religion is in the Bible; and now, if the priest will just do the same, sure then we can see for ourselves what religion is in the Word of God.' 'Well, that's just it,' says he, 'and that's just the reason why I wish the readers was hunted out of the country,' says he. 'And how would you know then,' says I, 'which religion is true?' 'And isn't that just what I don't want to know?' says he. 'Sure,' says he, 'before the readers came, weren't we just as safe as the dummy, not knowing nothing, and not having no way of knowing nothing, and weren't we quite quiet and easy; and now,' says he, 'every time the readers pass my door, don't I feel that they are just putting it on myself to know what religion is right, and just leaving me with no excuse for putting it all on the priest; and now,' says he, 'weren't we better as we were? and why would the readers be coming here to put it all on ourselves, when it wasn't on ourselves before?' 'Well, Neddy,' says I, 'by that way of reckoning, wouldn't it be the fine thing if Jesus Christ had never come into the world at all to show us the way of salvation?' 'And how's that?' says he, 'sure I didn't go for to say the like of that at all?' 'Well,' says I, 'sure we could all say then that we know nothing at all about what religion was true, and that we hadn't no way to know; and sure we could put it all on Adam, that sinned; and on God, too, that let us be born in sin, and gave us no knowledge; and sure if it's a fine thing to know nothing,' says I, 'wouldn't that be the way we would know nothing at all; and wouldn't it be the finest of all?' 'Well, I didn't mean that,' says he; 'but sure the readers is putting it on me to know for myself, and sure it wasn't put on me before?' 'And didn't Jesus Christ, when he came into the world, put it on people to know him, and to judge for themselves that it was him? and didn't he put it on them to know if his religion was true? and didn't he put it on them to search the Scriptures to find out if it was Him that was in it? and didn't he put it on them to repent, and to turn to Him, and to believe in Him? and why wouldn't the Word of God do just the same now,' says I 'when it comes to our own doors?' So I seen he was studying, and he couldn't get over that; 'so,' says I to him, 'Neddy,' says I, 'just tell me, was it worse for the people then, for Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, to come to them?' 'Well,' says he, 'I don't know what to say to it, and I would like for somebody to tell me.' 'Well,' says I, 'I think it was better for them that would hear and learn from him, for sure they found salvation,' says I; 'and I'm thinking,' says I, 'it was worse for them that wouldn't learn, for sure then they had no excuse,' says I; and with that I just got out my Bible before he could stop me, and I showed him what Jesus Christ said himself—"'This is the judgment, because the Light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than the light'" (John, iii. 19, Douay Bible). 'And is it that way with the readers?' says he. 'Well, it was that way with the apostles,' says I, 'for here is what St. Paul says of himself and the rest of them,'—"We are the good odour of Christ unto God, in them that are saved, and in them that perish; to the one indeed we are the odour of death unto death, but to the the others the odour of life unto life" (2 Cor. ii. 15 and 16). 'And is it that way with the readers?' says he. 'It's that way,' says I, 'with the word that Jesus Christ spoke, and that's in the Bible; so I'm thinking,' says I, 'it's always that way with them that offers to show us the Word of God.' 'Well that's just what was angering me against the readers,' says he. 'Take care that same wouldn't anger you against the Word of God,' says I. 'I doubt it would,' says he, 'if I gave in to it any more.' 'Well don't,' says I; 'sure it's come to your door now, and you can't put it away if you would: just turn to it,' says I, 'and see if it isn't for life and salvation to them that receives it.' 'That's what I'll have to do,' says he, 'and I knew myself it would come to that,' says he, 'cause I was so angry at it;' so there's my story, Jem."

"And a good story, too, Pat," said Jem; "you handled it well; and I believe there's a deal of people in the country that has got that notion; they feel the readers is putting it on themselves to know what religion is true, and they don't feel yet that it is the knowledge of the way of salvation that the readers is putting on them. But I suppose, Pat, it be to be that way at first; and sure its something when the people begins to feel that itself; for sure when that begins to work in them a bit, they won't be able to turn it off. But did you ask the man behind the door, Pat, about what the Rev. Mr. Burke said of the wine that wasn't made of ripe grapes? and what did you get out of him?"

"Oh, just not one word," said Pat. "I knew he was there, and I shouted it to him, and he heard it all and wouldn't say one word, good nor bad."

"Well, that's enough, Pat," said Jem; "Mr. Burke is right this time, anyway."

So they went home for that night, and, no doubt, will be talking again.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The great mass of communications with which we are favoured renders it impossible for us to insert everything we could desire as promptly as we could wish. At this moment several articles, actually in type, are necessarily omitted for want of room, though we have incurred considerable expense in giving four extra pages in our present number.

We are reluctantly obliged to postpone Mr. Rourke's letter, though already in type, on account of its great length, but hope to insert it in our next. To diminish the chances of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscribers. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS AND FRIENDS.

We have to thank several obliging friends for assisting us with copies of Nos. 2, 8, and 11, to complete sets of Vol. I., which is in great demand. Nos. 3 and 4 have already been reprinted. If any of our friends could oblige us with additional copies of Nos. 2, 8, or 11, they would be very acceptable, and might save us the heavy expense of reprinting them, which, however, we purpose doing, if necessary.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1854.

Our readers may, perhaps, recollect our noticing, in October last, a notable expedient for putting down our somewhat troublesome periodical, suggested by a provincial journal, whose editor appears to be more remarkable for irritability than ingenuity—viz., the summary one of knocking down the first man that put into his hand this "vile periodical"—as being "a deliberate insult and provocation quite sufficient to justify a man in committing a breach of the peace!"

We ventured on that occasion to express our conviction that this summary method of extinguishing our journal was rather unfair to that useful class of our fellow-subjects, the letter-carriers of her Majesty's Post-office, and was, we thought, not very likely to be brought into active operation, much less before the judicial bench at petty sessions or elsewhere—and as we have not yet learned that any of our very useful friends, the postmen, have suffered in the cause, we presume that our editorial opponent's advice has not yet been taken, even at Limerick, as far, at least, as the CATHOLIC LAYMAN is concerned.

It appears, however, that in the same month of October, a certain Mr. Martin Andrew O'Brennan, who describes himself as proprietor of the collegiate seminary, Bolton-street, in the city of Dublin (instigated probably by the advice of our Limerick cotemporary, then just published), determined to try the point of law as to what would amount to "a justification for committing a breach of the peace" in such matters; and having been handed by one Wm. Smyth, handbill distributor, in Lower Sackville-street, on the evening of the 14th of October, a certain printed paper, inviting him to attend a controversial sermon in St. Luke's Church, on Sunday evening, the 16th of October, on the subject of "The Supremacy of St. Peter," he was afforded a fitting opportunity; whereupon, quoth Mr. O'Brennan (we quote from his own affidavit made in the course of the proceedings, after mentioned), "on ascertaining the nature of the handbill, and taking into consideration what deponent regarded as the premeditated insolence of the prosecutor (said Smyth), in his manner and gesture, when thrusting said bill into his hand, defendant was very indignant, and his first impulse was (following, of course, the advice of our pugilistic friend), to have struck the prosecutor; but on a moment's consideration, he thought it more becoming to have the prosecutor given in charge for his misconduct, which evidently and manifestly tended, in defendant's opinion, to provoke a breach of the peace." Thereupon he, Mr. O'Brennan, handed over the culprit, Smyth, into the custody of a policeman, and had him carried off to the Capel-street Police-office, where he swore informations against him, before Mr. Hugh O'Callaghan, one of the metropolitan divisional police magistrates, who, without hesitation, agreeing, of course, in his view of the law with our Limerick cotemporary, bound over poor Smyth in heavy recognizances to keep the peace, or to submit to imprisonment for fourteen days!

Great was the joy, of course, of our pugilistic friend, who deemed this one step at least gained in carrying out his plan of knock-down arguments, the point of law being now satisfactorily decided, and the courage to carry it out, whether against bill-stickers, CATHOLIC LAYMEN, or letter-carriers, being all that was now required to put an end to the nuisance of free discussion upon such offensive and dangerous topics as are treated of in our pages.

Great, also, was the laudation bestowed on the legal acumen and impartiality of Mr. O'Callaghan, who was forthwith held up as an example worthy of imitation by all her Majesty's justices of the peace throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, some of whom might, perhaps, require enlightenment, as not happening to possess the experience or legal ability of the said Mr. O'Callaghan.

Having ourselves been not a little amused at the whole matter, we took the trouble to cut out a number of articles from certain public papers of that date, which joined in chorus to give Mr. O'Callaghan a regular ovation; and we now present our readers with a few extracts, out of many:—

(From the Nation.)

"Two or three days ago a tract distributor, employed by a controversial minister in St. Michan's parish, while practising his profession in Sackville-street, thrust one of his anti-Papal documents into the hands of our Catholic fellow-citizen, Mr. M. A. O'Brennan. Anxious to test the legality of such an offensive proceeding, Mr. O'Brennan had his assailant arrested forthwith, and brought before a police magistrate; and the magistrate decided that the prisoner should be bound over in heavy recognizances to preserve the peace, or submit to an imprisonment of fourteen days. A simple and effective remedy has thus been found for the entire system of modern missionary tactics, and we trust the lesson will not be lost upon our provincial friends."

(From the Dublin Evening Post.)

"We refer to a police report, in our fourth page, for an important and well-timed judgment, pronounced by Mr. O'Callaghan, the presiding magistrate in Capel-street Division, which cannot fail to give a decided check to the intolerable nuisance of tract distribution in the streets and public highways. The party charged in this instance for offensive behaviour, in the forcing of publications insulting to the Roman Catholic religion, in a way calculated to lead to a breach of the peace, was ordered to give bail, or, in default, to suffer a certain period of imprisonment.

"The parties employed in this disreputable occupation, appear to have laboured under the delusion that they enjoyed complete impunity, as if there were no means to protect the public from annoyance and interruption whilst engaged in their lawful occupations. The case to which we now refer will convince them of the contrary; and, as there is no chance for martyrdom and its gains in such shabby practices, we doubt not that the decision of the worthy and intelligent magistrate will operate as a salutary preventive in future. It would have been well, perhaps, if some such cooling process had been applied to the recent marauding crusade of the Hundred Scotch Gospellers, who caused so much excitement and some disturbance amongst a peaceable and industrious community."

(From the Tablet)

"We think Mr. O'Brennan is entitled to the thanks of the Catholic public for his spirited and successful effort to abate the disgusting nuisance of thrusting offensive, often blasphemous, tracts into the hands of persons passing through the public streets. The report of the proceedings, which we copy from the Freeman, is worthy of the attention, not only of Catholics, but of those magisterial and other officials who, in various districts of the country, have shown a disposition to support the proselytizers in their course of outrage upon the Catholic community. Mr. O'Callaghan's decision has, we observe, given mortal offence to the bigots, fanatics, and infidels; but no one doubts that it is perfectly in accordance with the law of the land, and with the duty of a justice of the peace."

(From the Telegraph.)

"A very important decision was delivered last week, by Mr. O'Callaghan, the able and impartial magistrate, who truly dispenses justice in Capel-street Police-office. In a case that was brought before him, Mr. O'Callaghan declared that the circulating, and hawking about, and putting into the hands of persons passing along the roads, placards, circulars, or handbills, containing expressions offensive to the feelings of any religious community, was a legal offence, subjecting the person convicted of it to imprisonment.

"We recommend to the country magistrates—to those who have neither the experience nor the legal ability of Mr. O'Callaghan—to study his words and to imitate his example. We hope, also, that those who have the command of the police in every district in Ireland, will learn from the dicta of Mr. O'Callaghan, as to persons circulating offensive controversial tracts, what is the course of conduct incumbent upon them to pursue as 'preservers of the peace.'

"But there is another class of persons to whom this decision of Mr. O'Callaghan should teach wisdom, for no word of man can instil into their hearts the meekness of charity—and these are the circulators and distributors of that insolent and scandalous publication, THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

"We do not know but the publisher of that insulting paper is liable to be brought before the bench for seeking to provoke Catholics to commit a breach of the peace. For the present we tell them the decision of Mr. O'Callaghan should be a warning to them. If with that warning they persist in insulting Catholics, then they may rest assured the insult will not be long tamely submitted to."

We have not, indeed, met with a single Roman Catholic paper disapproving of Mr. O'Callaghan's decision, or which did not hold up his conduct as not only legal, but worthy of being followed by all the magistrates in Ireland.

Alas! for the poor CATHOLIC LAYMAN! What hope remained left for it, or its free but friendly discussion of the points in controversy throughout our beloved country! We had done something, we thought, to soften asperity, and introduce a better tone into such matters; but now we were to be at the mercy of every irritable opponent of free discussion, who could bring himself to swear, before Mr. O'Callaghan or any other "experienced and able" magistrate, that the CATHOLIC LAYMAN "annoyed him, or was repugnant to his religious feelings"! and if we were not knocked down in person, or by proxy, we were, at least, to be subject to the cooling process of entering into recognizances or suffering fourteen days imprisonment! How happy, however, it was for us that "the experimentum in corpore vili" was not tried first upon us, but on poor W. Smith, the handbill distributor in Lower Sackville-street!

The wheel of fortune, however, goes round, and great are the vicissitudes which at times occur, even in the history of divisional metropolitan magistrates and their triumphal ovations.

Smyth, the bill distributor, though an humble man, earning (honestly, as he thought) a shilling a day in his vocation, bethought himself of trying the soundness of Mr. O'Callaghan's legal knowledge, by applying for a writ of certiorari (as it is called), whereby the proceedings might be brought in the way of appeal before the highest court of criminal judicature in this kingdom of Ireland—her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench. To that court Smyth accordingly applied, and a very learned argument took place before that court, during which two eminent Queen's Counsel, on the part of Mr. O'Callaghan, left no ingenuity or exertion untried to prevent a revision of the decision in question; but the Court unanimously decided that the certiorari must be granted, and, accordingly, ordered the adjudication and informations to be returned into the said Court of Queen's Bench without delay, which was accordingly done. We extract the following report of the ulterior proceedings from one of the daily papers:—

"Yesterday (28th January), Mr. Whiteside, Q.C., applied to quash the order and informations taken by Mr. O'Callaghan, obliging W. Smyth to enter into recognizances to keep the peace towards Mr. M. A. O'Brennan, schoolmaster, for the alleged offence of handing him a handbill, in Sackville-street, "repugnant to his religious feelings.' He said that a minute or two would put the court in possession of the facts, and they were facts important to be known. The informations sworn before the magistrate stated that Martin A. O'Brennan came before Hugh O'Callaghan, one of the divisional justices of the police of Dublin metropolis, and deposed on his oath, 'that on the 14th of October instant, at Lower Sackville-street, the prisoner W. Smyth, annoyed the complainant, by handing him a paper repugnant to his religious feelings.' That was the whole crime disclosed by the informations (laughter), and it was for the court to say if they disclosed any offence.

"Judge Crampton inquired if the return to the certiorari had been regularly set down for argument?

"Mr. Whiteside—Why, there is nothing to argue, and I understand that Mr. M'Donagh does not intend to argue that the magistrate's order could be sustained.

"Mr. M'Donagh, Q.C., on the other side, said, as he wished to save the time of the court, although he could have insisted upon the case being set down, upon a consilium, which would delay the hearing of the motion, he did not mean to put the other side to any inconvenience.

"Mr. O'Hagan, Q.C., who was with Mr. M'Donagh, said, he felt there were technical (?) difficulties in sustaining the order of the magistrate. They meant to say nothing but submit to the quashing of the proceedings.

"Mr. Napier, Q.C., on the part of the prosecutor, said, that the case was to be decided on the substantial facts, and it was perfectly clear from them that the proceedings were illegal and unwarranted.

"The Chief Justice—There is only one question before us, and having referred to the documents appearing on the face of the return, counsel felt, and very properly, that it would be a mere waste of time to argue in support of the validity of the proceedings. The order of the magistrate and other proceedings must therefore be quashed.

"Judge Crampton.—It is perfectly clear from the documents that the magistrate had no jurisdiction whatsoever to pronounce the order which he made.

"Judge Moore.—It is our duty to quash the order, and discharge the prosecutor's recognizances."

Thus ends Mr. Hugh O'Callaghan's ovation! and we fear our Limerick cotemporary must now exert his ingenuity to discover some other summary expedient for extinguishing the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, or that freedom of discussion, which has always been considered by British subjects as their inalienable birthright, notwithstanding the rash decision of a Dublin stipendiary police magistrate, and the premature applause of the Telegraph, the Dublin Evening Post, the Freeman's Journal, the Nation, and the Tablet, is likely to go on as successfully as ever!

Since, however, we should be as reluctant to countenance any abuse of the sacred privileges of free discussion, by circulating anything really insulting to any class of our fellow-countrymen, as if we were ourselves as sensitive as Mr. O'Brennan appears to be; and lest we should be thought to encourage any such publications (which our readers by this time know would be contrary to the first principles on which we ourselves act), or lest our readers should suspect her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, (the highest court of criminal judicature in the land,) of having given countenance to anything justly objectionable, we have taken the trouble to procure a copy of the handbill in question, which was literally as follows:—

"INVITATION TO ROMAN CATHOLICS.

"The Rev. J. O'Carroll, A.B., S.T.C.D., will preach (God willing) in St. Luke's Church, Coombe, on Sunday evening, October 16, 1853, at seven o'clock.

"Subject—Supremacy of Peter.

"How can St. Peter be the rock, or foundation of the Church, when he himself says, that 'Christ is the chief corner stone?"—1 Pet. ii. 6, Roman Catholic Bible.

"How can the Pope of Rome be successor to St. Peter, when Peter never was Bishop of Rome, and is never acknowledged as such in the Holy Scriptures? How can the Pope, or any human being on earth, pretend to be head of the Church, without blasphemy, when Christ is head of the Church now? 'Christ is the head of the Church.'—Eph. v. 23, Roman Catholic Bible. 'But I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ.'—1 Cor. xi. 4, Roman Catholic Bible.

"How was it that all the disciples disputed among themselves which should be the greatest, if Christ had before that time, as it is said, constituted Peter the prince of the Apostles?—Compare Matt. xvi. 13, &c., with Mark, viii. 27, &c., and ix. 33, Roman Catholic Bible.

"If Peter had been first granted supremacy, why did James and John afterwards seek the highest places in the kingdom of God?—Compare Matt. xvi. 13, &c., with Matt. xx. 20, &c., Roman Catholic Bible.

"If Peter was the Pope, why was he called to account for his conduct by certain believers at Jerusalem?—Acts, xi. 1, &c.; and why did he not preside and deliver sentence instead of James at the council?—Acts, xv. 1-19, Roman Catholic Bible.

"Roman Catholics are earnestly and affectionately invited to attend."

On the back was printed the following:—

"THIS IS THE QUESTION.

"1. Why do the Protestants take such pains to teach Roman Catholics the religion of the Roman Catholic Bible, while the Roman Catholic priests never teach the Roman Catholic people the religion of their own Roman Catholic Bible?

"2. Why do the Roman Catholic priests shrink from proving their religion out of the Roman Catholic Bible?

"3. Why are the Protestants so willing to prove their religion even out of the Roman Catholic Bible, while the priests are afraid of that same Roman Catholic Bible?

"4. How, then, can Roman Catholics believe that their religion is the Christianity which is taught in the Roman Catholic Bible?

"HOW IS A SINNER SAVED?

"This is the great question—

"'WHAT MUST I DO TO BE SAVED?'

"Why is it that no Roman Catholic priest will give to this all-important question the same answer as was given by St. Paul to the Philipplan jailor—'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved and thy house?'—Acts, xvi. 31.

"Another great question—

"WHAT IS THE TRUE WAY TO HAVE PEACE WITH GOD?

"The answer is given by St. Paul—'Being justified by faith let us have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.'—Romans v. 1, Roman Catholic Bible.

"Friends and fellow-sinners hear the Word of the Lord."

We confess we can scarcely understand (if any such questions are ever to be discussed), how they could be couched in language less insulting. That Protestants should be prohibited from asking questions at all is, no doubt, what a certain class of persons in this country would wish, if they had the power to effect it. The old mode of putting Protestants to THE QUESTION is, of course, another matter. If they could effect that too, their triumph would be complete.

THE RAMBLER versus DR. CAHILL.

WE have been called on, by several valued correspondents, to notice a letter on Transubstantiation, published by the Rev. Dr. Cahill, Roman Catholic priest, in the "Whitehaven Herald," and subsequently reprinted in full in the Tablet newspaper of 17th December last, as an authoritative document, published by an able Roman Catholic controversialist of the present day, whose influence among the lower orders, at least, has been for some time by no means inconsiderable. We have always been sincerely anxious to grapple with the writers of the Church of Rome who most truly represent her real opinions, and are able to adduce the strongest arguments in support of them; and if we could have satisfied ourselves that Dr. Cahill's arguments or mode of controversy would be recognized by the authorities of the Church of Rome as a true statement of her belief and sentiments, we should long since have singled out Dr. Cahill and his publications as fit subjects for our criticism, though engaged as we are in promoting a kindly and Christian method of conducting controversy, it has always been to us a matter of surprise and regret that such a method of controversy as Dr. Cahill delights in should have met with so much applause from any class of Irish Roman Catholics.

It appears, however, that things which are supposed to be good enough for Ireland will not go down in England, or, perhaps, a juster view of what controversy ought to be is arising in both countries, for we have just seen in the Rambler, a Roman Catholic Journal and Review, published in London, which has reached its thirteenth volume, and is said to be read by nearly every educated Roman Catholic in Great Britain and Ireland, an article repudiating Dr. Cahill and his mode of controversy in the strongest language.

That our readers may judge for themselves how Dr. Cahill's letters are thought of by the most respectable

Roman Catholics in England we re-print the following extracts from the above-named publication (the Rambler) for the present month, headed :—

"DR. CAHILL'S LETTER ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

'Letter of the Rev. Dr. Cahill to the Rev. J. Burns, Protestant Minister, Whitehaven, 7th December, 1853. Published in the 'Whitehaven Herald,' and subsequently in the 'Tablet,' of December 17, 1853.

"In our last number we offered our readers some remarks on the various means of which we can avail ourselves for the conversion of Protestants; and we specified certain instruments of conversion, which, as it appears to us, are applicable to the few, but not to the many. Dr. Cahill's letter to Mr. Burns, of Whitehaven, supplies an example of one particular mode of attempting the conversion of unbelievers, which we did not then specify, because, happily it is rare amongst us; and further, because its demerits must be patent to all but the most superficial observers. The letter before us, however, presents so striking an illustration of the perils of platform and newspaper controversy, that it is impossible altogether to pass it over without comment. In thus remarking upon Dr. Cahill's treatment of the awful doctrine which is the subject of his epistle, we shall endeavour to restrain our own language within the closest limits of moderation of which the case will allow, both from respect to Dr. Cahill's sacred office and from a sense of the deep importance of the questions involved. We must, however, candidly acknowledge, that it is with feelings of real shame and distress that we have seen the statements contained in this letter, sent by their author to the columns of a Protestant newspaper, with the professed object of expounding the consistency and rationality of the Catholic faith, in prominent contrast with the absurdities and self-contradictions of Protestant heresies. Of the general tone and style of the letter we need say but a few words. Anything more unfortunately chosen as a means of winning the ignorant or the unbelieving to the faith of the Church, we can scarcely conceive. The devout and charitable Catholic, who, for the sake of the cause defended by the writer, might be disposed to overlook defects produced by the zeal of an advocate, could feel nothing but pain and wonder at Dr. Cahill's words; what, then, must be the impression produced on the minds of those who will make no allowances; who are disposed beforehand to account us ignorant, crafty, and irreverent, and who, while blind to the follies and inconsistencies of their own opinions, would exact from Catholics an almost superhuman measure of learning, acuteness, and self-command? We can only say, that we would not for the world that this letter should be seen by any Protestant friend or acquaintance who was in any degree awakened to a sense of the delusions in which he had been educated, and was turning a wistful eye towards the Catholic religion as the one, true, and holy faith given by Almighty God to man.

"Take, for instance, the astounding assertion, that he 'would prefer that a Catholic should read the worst books of immorality' than a Protestant Bible! If any of our readers have not already seen Dr. Cahill's letter, they will lift up their hands in astonishment, and question the accuracy of our quotation; nevertheless, we assure them that we are giving the exact words. Conceive, then, the effect of such a statement on the readers of the newspaper for which this letter was specially written. What story of Catholic wickedness will they not henceforth believe? What tale of priestly licentiousness will from this time be too monstrous for their credulity? The Protestant Bible has abundance of errors, it is true, and some of them of very serious importance; but is it not a violation of all common sense and decency, to pretend that a Catholic had better read the filthy productions of obscenity than the book in which these mis-translations occur? Is there a priest in the United Kingdom who would bear out Dr. Cahill in such a notion? Would not all, with one accord, denounce it as a perfect portend in the domain of morals and casuistry? We do not believe that Dr. Cahill himself would act on what he says. We do not believe that he would see a Catholic reading an obscene publication with more equanimity than he would see him reading the Protestant Bible. He is carried away by the excitement of newspaper controversy, and is betrayed into exaggerations which, in other moments, he would be eager to condemn. This single passage alone in his letter is a proof of the perils with which newspaper and platform contests on religious subjects are surrounded. We do not say that such subjects ought never to find their way into the columns of a Protestant journal, or that controversial discussions on theological topics ought never to be undertaken in public; but universal experience bears us out in alleging that such modes of treating the most sacred and delicate of subjects are rarely useful; and that, when they are undertaken, they require a sound head, a cool judgment, a disciplined temper, a prudent tongue, a contempt for clap-trap, and a desire to convince opponents, rather than to elicit the applause of indiscriminating admirers.

"What, then, must we think of the snares which beset the 'popular' controversialist, when we turn to the paragraph of Dr. Cahill's letter, in which he asserts that the miracle of Transubstantiation is 'a very common occurrence with God, and may be called one of the most general laws of nature?' He is carried away by the unfortunate desire to bring down the infallible mysteries of faith to the level of human capacities; and which has led him into statements which, viewed merely as rhetorical illustrations, are inaccurate and worthless; but if looked upon as destructive of Catholic doctrine, are shocking to the last degree. Led on by the desire of confounding his adversary, he is like a boy playing at snowballs, who mingles dirt and stones with the pure snow, in order to hit his antagonist the harder blows. While heaping on the head of this Mr. Burns every epithet of scorn and contempt, for his stupidity, his ignorance, and his 'untheological' blunders, he proceeds to put forth the following exposition of the doctrine of transubstantiation."

After giving a long extract from Dr. Cahill's letter, the Rambler proceeds, p. 173.

"Setting aside, moreover, the theological bearings of Dr. Cahill's language, as an argumentative illustration of the mystery of the Real Presence it is worthless, and can serve only to mislead. The wonder of Transubstantiation is this, that, while the substance is changed, the visible and tangible accidents remain. How, then, does it assist faith to compare this supernatural condition of a visible object with natural changes, in which the substance remains and the accidents are changed? The difficulty, to human reason, in the Catholic doctrine, is the non-alteration in the accidents. In all chemical changes the accidents are more or less altered, and heretical unbelief asserts that no transubstantiation can take place without such alteration; and Dr. Cahill's illustrations will serve to confirm such unbelief. Protestants will reiterate their assertion that the whole doctrine is unmitigated nonsense, and that Catholics themselves do not know what they mean. Catholics, on the other hand, will reply to such illustrations, that they are in direct violation of the injunctions and declarations of the Catechism of the Council of Trent, in which we are taught that we have no example of the change wrought by Transubstantiation, either in natural changes or in the creation of things. 'Illud sæpissime a sanctis Patribus repetitum fideles admonendi sunt, ne curiosius inquirant, quo pacto ea mutatio fieri possit. Nec enim percipi á nobis potest, nec in naturalibus mutationibus, aut in ipsâ rerum creatione ejus rei exemplum aliquod habemus' (Cat. Conc. Trid. pars 2, c. iv. 9, 41.)

"Dr. Cahill, however, is not content to stop here. He actually goes on to 'illustrate' this sacred mystery by a new 'explanation' of the Incarnation itself, which is a virtual denial of the very foundation of the Christian faith.

. . . . . .

"Is it not mournful to reflect that in these days, when every one's eyes are turned towards the Church and her teaching, the columns of a Protestant newspaper should be filled with declamations on the very foundation of our faith, which, if they have any meaning at all, are a plain denial of the doctrine, which every child may read in the creed of St Athanasius, that 'our Lord Jesus Christ is man, of the substance of His mother?'—p. 174.

. . . . . .

"Of the letter of Mr. Burns, which has called forth this reply from Dr. Cahill, we know nothing more than is to be gathered from the extracts which the latter has prefixed to his rejoinder. Mr. Burns appears to be a person of the 'evangelical' school, who cannot help 'preaching,' even when writing to a Catholic priest. We dare say his whole production is foolish enough, and as 'untheological' as Dr. Cahill considers it to be; but we must say that, as far as Dr. Cahill has enabled us to judge, there appears to be nothing in it which should have provoked such contumely and violence as he has poured forth. On the contrary, there are indications of more modesty of thought than is common among persons of Mr. Burns's school; and which should naturally have called for a simple and kind-hearted explanation of Catholic doctrine, rather than for a storm of contempt. 'I think,' says Mr. Burns, 'the soul can no more feed on flesh and blood than on bread.' Surely such a statement, so expressed, required something different from a whole broadside of abuse."—p. 175.

It is not merely the Rambler, however, that judges thus of Dr. Cahill's letters. The Tablet of Saturday, February 4, contains a letter from Dr. Cahill, written in his usual style, in answer to a letter written by the Rev. Edward Walford, lately a clergyman of the Church of England, but now a convert to Romanism. We have not seen Mr. Walford's letter, for the Tablet does not publish that, though it gives Dr. Cahill's reply; but Dr. Cahill gives us the following extracts from the letter of Mr. Walford :—"Now, sir, whatever means God may bless to the advancement of the Catholic religion in England, it is quite certain that false statements are not among them, and I cannot but deplore, in common with many other converts of the Catholic faith, the recklessness and uncharitable assertions which Dr. Cahill, a priest of the Catholic Church, is not ashamed to utter against the Protestant clergy." And, again, "When we urge upon them (the Protestants) the claims of the Catholic Church, and the superior fruits of holiness to be found within her pale, we are silenced by an allusion to the last speech, or letter of Dr. Cahill, who, surely, as a Catholic priest, would be doing equal service by teaching some of the Church's children in our semi-heathen towns, as by delivering fierce controversial lectures, and writing letters of ignorant and unchristian invective."

Mr. Walford, in changing his religion, does not think that he should cease to regard truth or be a gentleman. Dr. Cahill seems to think otherwise; for he accounts for Mr. Walford's letter, by telling him that he is "only half converted"! Of course Dr. Cahill thinks that every one who is wholly converted, should prove it by using such language and arguments as Dr. Cahill's, and by speaking of Protestants as Dr. Cahill does.

We shall not trouble our readers with the unblushing self-glorification with which Dr. Cahill endeavours to console himself for the rebuke he has received. But there is another point worth mentioning. The Rambler says that we are not to suppose that Dr. Cahill's speeches and letters are approved by the Roman Catholic priests or bishops.

"We assure our non-Catholic readers that Dr. Cahill alone is responsible for the statements he puts forth, that there is no foundation whatever for the prevalent Protestant notion that he is to be taken as a chosen champion of the faith; but, on the contrary, that a very large proportion of the Catholic clergy and laity regard much of what he says as pernicious and untrue. Why, then, it will be said, is Dr. Cahill allowed thus to compromise the whole community of which he is a member?" (p. 176).

The Rambler goes on to say that the only reason that the Roman Catholic bishops do not stop Dr. Cahill is, "lest an unwilling subject should recalcitrate hopelessly;" in plain English, lest he should rebel against authority, and begin to kick like a vicious horse that nobody can stop!

After all the boasted unity of the Church of Rome, then, it appears, there is dissension enough within its pale. They have champions in one country whom they repudiate and are ashamed of in another, and can keep in subjection those priests only, however mischievous or heterodox, who are willing subjects, and not given to rebel or recalcitrate hopelessly! While, however, the Rambler excuses the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy for "permitting Dr. Cahill to write and lecture as he does," Dr. Cahill, on the other hand affirms, that his sermons have been preached, and his speeches made, on the "invitations of dozens of bishops, and hundreds of priests," to all of whom he can refer for their approval.

We trust this is but the vapouring of the man, and not the stating of a fact; and venture to hope that the time is coming when all Roman Catholic priests will see that controversial discussion, to be read or listened to, must be carried on in the method of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and not in the method of Dr. Cahill. We trust, therefore, our friends will excuse us for not selecting Dr. Cahill's publications as matters to be replied to, at least, till he is recognized by his Roman Catholic brethren as a fit representative of their views, and learns to conduct controversy in a more temperate and Christian spirit.

Correspondence.

ON THE VISIBLE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Extreme pressure of business alone has precluded the possibility of my paying earlier attention to your remarks on my letter in the November edition of your paper. I regret that my observations should be, as you say, calculated to excite prejudice. Unfortunately, early prejudices are not easily subdued. Bishop Burnet says it is a noble effort of the greatest minds to shake off the prejudices of education; notwithstanding, as I have abstained from setting myself up as an advocate of any particular Church, and have contented myself with reasoning on doctrines abstractedly, I flatter myself there are many enlightened Protestants who will examine my arguments impartially, having flung, as I do, all such feelings of prejudice to the winds.

From a retrospective view of our controversy, it appears that I have so far prevailed as to establish against you at least, that the Church of England, as at present existing, is disowned by every Church, congregation, and society of Christians in the eleventh century. After sending me, in my search of truth, from Rome to Greece, Antioch, Alexandria, and the whole round of the eastern Churches—Copts, Muscovites and all—finding your principles rejected by each, you are constrained to cower under the patronage of Lanfranc. This pious and learned man was one of the most formidable opponents of Berengarius, against whom he wrote a book, expressly, in the very beginning of which he inveighs against Berengarius as an arrogant innovator, who began to broach opinions opposed to the whole world—"Superbiæ fastu plenus, contra orbem sentire coepisti"—and that he composed a work in opposition to truth, and to the persuasion of all Churches. "Contra Catholicam veritatem, contra omnium ecclesiarum opinionem, scriptam postea condidisti." In the 22nd chapter of his book Lanfranc thus expostulates with Berengarius :—"Ask all those who have any knowledge of Latin; ask the Greeks, the Armenians, and all Christians, without exception, of whatsoever nation, they will answer you that they hold the same faith that we profess." And Guitmond, Bishop of Averse, a disciple of Lanfranc, says, in his 3rd book against Berenger, that he had not a single little town or little village favourable to his innovation, and that before Berenger had thus got mad no one had ever got mad after the same fashion—"Notissimum est hoc tempore priusquam Berengarius insaniret, hujusmodi insanias nenquam fuisse."

You say the present Church of England is identical with that presided over by Lanfranc. As few will be inclined to believe the ipse dixits of individuals, however respectable, it remains for you to show the unbroken succession of your bishops from Lanfranc, and I doubt if even this will avail you; for I have demonstrated that you have not identity of doctrine, which is the true succession. St. Augustine says—"He that holds the same doctrine is of the same chair, and he who is an enemy to the doctrine is an enemy to the chair"—Vide 22nd, Orat. pro Athanas. (Paris, 1788.)

It will then be a polemical paradox for your ingenuity to reconcile how the propagation of the opinions of Berengarius can claim a succession from Lanfranc, who stigmatized and condemned them. Conscious that this position is like the rest, untenable, you adopt the theory, "that the Church need not of necessity be pure; that she is subject to error and corruption of doctrine, more or less dangerous, more or less extensive, in different ages and in different countries." This is perfectly intelligible, now at length; but if you are an accredited organ of Protestant opinion, it is evident, from the circumspection you have used in hazarding this opinion, that, after so many centuries of invention and refinement since the Reformation, you have not agreed among yourselves to concoct a regular theory of the visibility; that you have been depending on circumstances, and the penetration and perseverance of your correspondents to develope this your theory, or rather to extort it from you, at least that you felt some timidity on the subject. Such vacillation is inconsistent with professions of undeviating straightforwardness, and with the sublime sentiments embodied in the spirit of the LAYMAN.

If you once admit the principle of the moral and doctrinal corruption of the Church, you open the door indiscriminately to all the heretics since the days of the apostles. You cannot draw a line of demarcation between the horde of heretics, and the several Churches of the eleventh century, which I have shown, upon your principles, to be corrupt, erratic, superstitious, blasphemous, and idolatrous. How will you reconcile the idea of such a chaotic amalgamation of heresy and schism, of superstition, blasphemy, and idolatry with the lofty promises made to the Church of the Messias? I humbly conceive that your ability and talents will be inadequate to the task. This is a startling picture of the true visible Church of Christ. These are the consequences which, with prophetic certainty, I foresaw from your application of the passages which you had expiscated, or episcated, from St. Augustine. It hurts me not how mercilessly you have applied the lash of your criticism to an expression coined in a more illustrious mint than that of my obscure pericranium. No one in his senses doubts "the unspeakable forcknowledge of God," whereby he foresees future possibilities and events, such as the election of St. Paul, or of any other human being; but that such persons, whilst unconverted, or perhaps indifferent to any such thing, form a portion of the true Church, is what I will not subscribe to. Your method of proving this to be a true exposition of Protestant doctrine is singular, viz.—"the 6th article adopts all that is 'read in Scripture, or may be proved thereby.' I find this point in Gal. i., 15, 16." Hence it must be Church of England doctrine. In your major proposition you have misquoted the words of the Article, and, by substituting another minor proposition for yours, the Arians, or any other heretics, may prove themselves to be members of the Church of England. They should be obliged to you for so extraordinary a metamorphosis of the sixth Article.

Scripture passages on this point are quite plain—"A heretic, after the first and second admonition, avoid" (Tit. iii. 10). "Shun those who cause divisions" (Rom. xvi. 17). "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof, from such turn away" (2 Tim. iii. 5). "If there come one unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed" (2 John x.). Hear St. Augustine himself concerning schismatics, the Novatians and the Donatists—"They who believe the incarnation, passion, resurrection, and divinity of Jesus Christ, yet, if they do not communicate with the whole, wherever it is spread, it is evident they are not in the Catholic Church" (Lib. de unit. Eccl., cap. iv.). And, again—"All those who believe in Jesus Christ what faith teaches, but differ about his body, the Church, so that their communion is not with the body, but with some separate part, it is manifest they are not in the Catholic Church, and by reason of the few things in which they are not with us, the many things in which they are with us, avail them not." (Idem. cap. 3). The Donatists denied the efficacy of the sacraments administered by wicked men—(vide Confessio Augustana, Art. viii., Quid sit Ecclesia.) So much for your Biblical research, and for your accuracy in transmitting "the opinions which St. Augustine and Catholics then held."

Now, though I unhesitatingly admit that every individual Church is liable to "error and corruption in doctrine," I maintain that God has distinctly promised that he will have and keep a congregation of faithful men, free from error and corruption, to administer the sacraments, and to preach the Word of God in its purity, such as the compilers of the Thirty-nine Articles must have had in contemplation. This society, though they may be reduced to few in number, yet, having the Holy Spirit in their hearts, and God's never-failing Word to support them, will preserve the faith (1 Tim. vi. 20) and the form of sound words (2 Tim. i. 13), which they shall commit to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also (2 Tim. vi. 2). And though the gates of hell should rise up against them, as in the case of the Arians against Athanasius, the agitation would inevitably convulse the face of society, producing a moral and religious revolution from which the faithful must come forth as gold from the furnace, repelling from them the unsound portion with a centrifugal power, and shine forth, "fair as the morn, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners."—Cant. vi. 10. It is a matter of necessity, that many unregenerate and wicked men be tolerated in this communion of saints, whilst they subscribe to the orthodox formulary of faith, according to the eighth article of the Augsburg Confession, above cited, for "in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth, and some to honour and some to dishonour (2 Tim. ii. 20); see also (1 Tim. iii. 15, and Rom. ix. 21).

Protestant controversialists boast that they are glad to catch Roman Catholics upon Scripture ground. Now, I cheerfully meet you on Scripture ground exclusively, anxious for the triumph of truth, and indifferent as to any ulterior object; and, for the sake of brevity, which with me is a great object, I will select only a few out of numberless passages of Scripture.

"Obey your prelates and submit yourselves," says the apostle (Heb. xiii. 17). Here is an injunction without qualification or limitation of time or place, from which it is most evident that the congregation of faithful men among whom the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacrament duly administered according to Christ's ordinance, must be perpetual and always visible; as the apostle would not command us to obey teachers of error and superstition, of blasphemy and idolatry.

St. Paul calls the Church "the pillar and the ground of truth" (1 Tim. iii. 15). All must admit that this refers to the Church visible, in which the apostle was giving Timothy, the bishop, instructions "how to conduct himself," as he says, "in his own absence." This establishes the moral and doctrinal purity of the Church of Christ, as corrupt and erratic Churches could neither support truth, nor be supported by truth.

Next (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20)—"Go teach all nations," &c. This most palpably refers to the Church visible; for Christ promises to be with the preachers, teachers, baptizers. If they could be invisible the whole order of the ministry, and even the martyrs may be invisible. Let no one say that this promise is confined to the Apostles. No; they were not to preach and baptize to the end of the world except through their lawfully constituted successors in the ministry. It is repugnant to common sense that He should be with apostates and idolaters; such an opinion is inadmissible, unless sanctioned by most positive and unequivocal assurance of Scripture.

(John xiv. 16, and xvi. 13) "I will ask the Father, and he will send you another comforter, to abide with you for ever," and "to teach you all things." The Apostles were not to live for ever in this life, except in their successors: hence this also refers to the Church visible.

Does the ever-memorable passage—"The gates of hell will not prevail against it" (Matt. xvi. 18) refer to the invisible Church? By no means; the Ephesians, to whom St. Paul wrote, were visible, and so will the true Church of Christ, "the household of faith," to the end of time, be, in the same manner, "growing, and framed, and built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone" (Eph. ii. 19, 22).

Our Saviour is the head of his body, the Church (Col. i. 18), the spouse and everlasting husband (Eph. v. 23, &c.); so that she must be undefiled and pure, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. If any person should say that this refers to the Church invisible, I refer him to the "Controversial Manual," published by the British Reformation Society, page 113 (Loudon edition, 1846), where, as a dissuasive from certain Roman Catholic devotional practices, the above passage is very pathetically applied to the visible society of Christians.

Read also, in the 54th chapter of Isaiah, the most solemn and encouraging, the most unlimited, unrestricted, and most unqualified promise of perpetual purity to the visible Church in successive ages (verse 9) "As I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I would not be angry with thee, nor rebuke thee."

Verse 10—"For the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, nor the covenant of my peace be removed from thee, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee" Verse 15—"Behold they shall surely gather together, but not by me, whosoever shall gather together against thee shall surely fall for thy sake;" and (lix. 21)—"My spirit that is upon thee, and my words that I have put into thy mouth shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever." And, again (lxii.) 6—"I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O, Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night." You would have these watchmen converted into "dumb dogs who bark not," in allowing the Church to be swamped with apostasy and idolatry without concentrating around them the faithful few, raising their hands and voices against corruption and error, and making their denunciations reverberate from shore to shore of each benighted and devoted land, till their testimony had been silenced by the torture of the scaffold or the flame.

In the Nicene and in the Apostles' Creed we profess our belief in the one holy, Catholic, and Apostolical Church. It is one by being "one body" (Rom. xii. 5), and "one spirit" (1 Cor. xii. 4 to 13). See, also, Eph. iv. 4, 5, 6, and it is holy by purity of morals, and preserving inviolate the doctrine of the apostles. No one can deny that this refers to the visible Church, as Bishop Pearson says in his exposition of the Creed—"The necessity of believing the Holy Catholic Church appears first in this, that Christ has appointed it as the only means to eternal life. Christ never appointed two ways to heaven, nor did He institute a Church to save some, and make another institution for other men's salvation. There is no other name given under Heaven by which we can be saved but the name of Jesus; and that name is no otherwise given under Heaven than in the true Church."

I call upon you, now, to establish the theory of the moral and doctrinal corruption of the Church, by texts of Scripture, equally plain, obvious, and incontrovertible, at least as those I have adduced; and, also, to enter into an analysis of these latter passages, seriatim and singulatim, and to show that they are irrelevant to prove the contrary opinion. In so doing, if you resort to tortuous or far-fetched interpretations, I do not say that it will excite prejudice, for that would be unworthy; but I say it will excite the commiseration of every man of understanding and Christian philanthropy.

Respecting the Greek Church, I should have said, denying the Filioque procession, instead of "denying the Holy Ghost, the error of Photius." The latter clause should have qualified the former and rendered it intelligible; however the difference is not important in the present discussion. They are both fundamental errors.

My motives for not hitherto noticing the difficulty you have started as to the meaning of the word sensualiter were—first, I had resolved to adhere most strictly to the rule you had prescribed of "confining each letter to some one subject" (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, January 18, 1853, p. 10), one subject being more than I could do justice to within the narrow limits to which I am necessarily restricted. Next, I have been under the impression that your object was to lead me into a by-battle about Transubstantiation, which design I had resolved to frustrate, till you should have disposed of the subject of the visibility.

In the first place, then, I assert, most confidently, and without fear of contradiction, that sensualiter does not mean perceptible to the senses externally. Sensibiliter would be just the word for that precisely.

Secondly, sensualiter (if recognized at all) must mean in a manner capable of gratifying the animal passions, or of perceiving the enjoyment of such passions internally. I appeal to classical scholars to say whether this translation is not quite correct.

Thirdly, as the word sensualiter is not found in any vocabulary of words, either obsolete or post-classical, it is improbable that learned men, living in that region of classical literature, should be betrayed into such a solecism. I have never seen the place from which you quote, nor is there a great probability that I ever shall; but it occurs to me that it should be essentialiter, i.e., substantially, which is the identical word used in the Council of Plaisance, where the doctrine of Berengarius was condemned (Tom. 10, Conc. Lab. p. 502). Any scholar will immediately perceive how it may happen, by an aphaeresis of the first syllable es, and a transmutation or mistake of u for i. Such errors are frequent in transcribing, and even in print. I am satisfied that the emendation I have suggested is both rational and correct.

Hoping you will have the kindness to insert this letter in the next number of your periodical, I remain,

Φιλαληθης.

Dated 3rd February, 1854.

Our correspondent, of course, admits the distinction between the "articles of faith" and other religious opinions, for the Church of Rome admits it. If our correspondent had attended to this distinction, he might have left out a great part of his letter.

We conceive that the succession of a Church, as considered between the Roman Catholics and us, consists in a succession of its bishops, clergy, and people, holding the same articles of Christian faith: but we do not hold it necessary to the succession of a Church that all other opinions about religion should be the same at all times. We have always stated this distinctly, and without hesitation.

We say the Church in England holds the same articles of faith—the same Catholic creed—which were held in the Church over which Lanfranc presided; and that the present Archbishop of Canterbury has succession from him. And we think this enough to establish that it is still the same Church, although other religious opinions may have varied in it. "The succession of doctrine," as a necessary essential, must be confined to "articles of faith"—that is, "the Catholic creeds." We have no difficulty in showing that we got our "articles of faith" from the early Church. Roman Catholics cannot show that they got their articles of faith from the early Church. So our succession in doctrine is clear, and theirs is not.

Take, for instance, the public and solemn profession of his faith, which Pope Pelagius I., on being appointed to the See of Rome, in the year 555, made to Childebert, King of France. It contains the whole sum and substance of the three Catholic creeds, now held in the Church of England, the Apostles Creed, the Nicene, and the Athanasian: but not one word of the additional articles now in the Roman Catholic creed. And then Pelagius adds, "THIS, therefore, IS MY FAITH." We can now take up that confession of Pope Pelagius, and say, as he said, "this is my faith." A Roman Catholic who takes it up must say, "this is only part of my faith; it is essentially defective, for it leaves out the very things which are most essential to being a Roman Catholic at all!" Which has preserved the succession of doctrine unchanged?

The succession of bishops in the Church of England and Ireland, and the succession of Roman Catholic bishops in England and Ireland, we are quite ready to discuss and compare; but as a separate subject.

Now, for our communion with the whole Church. We adopt the illustration which our correspondent produces—the case of the Catholics and Donatists. The Catholics always said to the Donatists, "we are ready to communicate with you on the principles laid down in the Word of God—the principles heretofore held in the Church." The Donatists refused those terms, and said, "we will not communicate with you unless you adopt our notions." The Church of England and Ireland, now and always, said to to all other churches, "we are ready and anxious to communicate with you on the terms of holding the ancient and Catholic creeds, and doing all things lawful by the Word of God." The Church of Rome answers, "we won't communicate with you unless you profess all the things which we have added to the ancient creeds; nor unless you adopt all our practices, whether consistent with God's Word or not." Which party hold the principles of the Catholics, and which of the Donatists? Has our correspondent forgotten the address of St. Augustine, and all the Catholic bishops of Africa, to the Donatists, which was given in our number for July, 1853, p. 80. "If, therefore, it be inquired concerning the Church—what it is—how great it is—what sort it is—the Divine Scriptures alone are sufficient to point her out." Is not this what we say now? and do not Roman Catholics say that we must find the Church first, before we can use the Scriptures?

If our correspondent had attended to our statement that the profession of the articles of the Catholic faith—that is, of the Catholic creed—is essential to being any part of the visible Church, he surely would not have written such a passage as this—"If you once admit the principle of the moral and doctrinal corruption of the Church, you open the door indiscriminately to all the heretics since the days of the apostles; you cannot draw a line of demarcation between the horde of heretics, and the several churches of the 11th century." We reply that we have distinctly drawn the line of demarcation, and that line is the ancient Catholic creeds. Those who deny the articles of the Christian faith contained in those creeds, are out of the visible Church altogether; those who hold these articles, and yet bring in other religious errors, are corrupt. Why cannot our correspondent hold both these statements together? What contradiction is there between them?

We are not the first to hold that the whole visible Church, while it does not actually deny the articles of the faith, is yet liable to error. We learn this from St. Vincent of Lirins, Commonitory, c. 3, who plainly foresaw the danger—"What, then, shall a Catholic Christian do . . . . if some new infection goeth about to corrupt, not in this case only a little part, but the whole Church? Then, likewise, shall he take care to cleave unto antiquity, which can now no more be seduced by any crafty novelty." Would any one write thus, who thought it impossible that error should creep into the Church?

We now come to our correspondent's texts of Scripture:—

"A heretic, after the first and second admonition, avoid"—Titus iii. 10. Does that mean "avoid a man who holds the ancient Catholic creeds as the articles of his faith?" If not, how does it apply to us?

"Shun those who cause division"—Rom. xvi. 17. We offer to communicate with the Church of Rome on the basis of holding the ancient Catholic creeds, as the articles of our common faith: the Church of Rome refuses to communicate with us, unless we will consent to add new articles of faith to the ancient Catholic creeds. Who causes the division?

We agree with our correspondent, that God will always "have and keep a congregation of faithful men." Who were they in the days of Pope Liberius and the councils of Ariminum and Seleucia? That seems to be like the real question between "Philalethes" and us. We take the answer from St. Vincent of Lirins, who wrote about the year, 434. "Then, whoever was truly a lover and a follower of Christ, by preferring ancient faith before new error, was untouched with any spot of that infection."—Commonitory, c. 4.

But, our correspondent challenges us to the discussion of scripture texts, and we gladly comply.

"Obey your prelates, and submit yourselves," says the apostle, (Heb. xiii. 17). Here is an injunction without qualification of time or place." "Well, it needed no limitation to the Hebrew Christians at that time, when St. James was just dead, and Simeon had succeeded him as Bishop of Jerusalem. But what? No limitation at any time or place? Not in the time of Pope Liberius, or at Ariminum or Seleucia? That surely is too much! Let us be willing to learn the limitation from the same apostle in another place (1 Cor. xi. 1)—"Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ." But surely not when Popes and prelates deny him!

"St. Paul calls the Church "the pillar and the ground of the truth." (Our correspondent leaves out the word in Italics, although it is in the Douay Bible, which he quotes). But St. Paul goes on instantly to specify that truth of which the Church is the pillar and support; it is "the mystery of godliness—God manifest in the flesh." God has ever had, and ever will have, a visible Church to support that truth in the world. But St. Paul does not say that the visible Church shall never adopt erroneous opinions or practices in other matters of religion.

"Go teach all nations, &c."—Matthew xxviii. 19. Ah, that little "&c."! It covers words which our Saviour spoke in the same breath, but which Roman Catholics do seldom quote. "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." The promise to be with them all days, extended to such teaching, and no further. He commanded the apostles and those who followed them so to teach; he did not promise that Popes and Councils should never teach otherwise in anything.

John xiv. 16 and xvi. 13. We firmly believe that our Saviour promised his Spirit "to teach you all things," not only to the apostles and those who followed them in the ministry, but to all who believe in Christ. We do not believe that all priests, all councils, and (least of all) all popes, have always been willing to receive and follow that teaching; and where they do not, they go astray from the truth.

Matthew xvi. 18, will be treated of elsewhere.

We are not acquainted with the "Controversial Manual," published by the British Reformation Society; nor would we consider its authority binding on us.

For a general answer to the passages produced from the prophecies of the Old Testament, we must refer to our answer to a "Celbridge Inquirer," when he produced similar ones, vol. i., No. 11, p. 130. Nov., 1852. Those prophecies are often capable of being applied to a future as well as to the present state of the Church. If no passage can be produced from the New Testament to prove that the visible Church must always be free from error, then we have no warrant for applying the Old Testament prophecies in such a way.

Our correspondent asks for some Scripture proof that the Church is subject to error. We refer him to St. John's Epistles to the Seven Churches (Revelation or Apocalypse, c. ii. and iii.), and to St. Paul's address to the clergy of Ephesus, (Acts xx. 30.) We could give many, but must be brief. What St. Paul wrote to the Church of Rome is, perhaps, most to the point, and is sufficient—"Thou standest by faith, be not high-minded, but fear. For if God hath not spared the natural branches (the Jews) (take heed) lest he also spare not thee. See, then, the goodness and the severity of God; towards them, indeed, that are fallen, severity; but towards thee the goodness of God, if thou abide in goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off."—Romans xi. 20, &c. Could the apostle have written thus to the Church of Rome, if Christ had promised that the Church of Rome should never fall from faith, or be cut off?

Our correspondent seems to find it much harder to answer questions about the visible Church of Christ than we do. We asked him "is the Greek Church a part of the visible Church of Church; yes, or no?" He refers to the Greek Church, but does not answer this. If he cannot answer it, surely his notions of the visible church must be much more perplexing to him than ours are to us.

But the great question we asked him was about the confession which Pope Nicolas II. and his council of 113 bishops, compelled Berengarius to sign. "Philalethes" brought this forward as an instance of the things in which we are bound to obey our prelates. In September last, and again in November, we asked "Philalethes," did he believe that decision of the pope and prelates to be right or wrong. Even now his answer to this is not very plain: he says the word "sensualiter" ought not be there, and the word "essentialiter" ought to be in its place. We take this as a confession that it is impossible to defend the decision of the Pope and council, while this word stands in it. So far so good. Well, there is no denying that the word "sensualiter" is in the decision as it now stands in the canon law. But "Philalethes" thinks the Pope and Council never could have written that word there, and we must take it out, and put another word in its place. The word, he says, is not "classical," and "it is improbable that learned men, living in that region of classical literature, should be betrayed into such a solecism." We beg to assure "Philalethes" that in the 11th century, "classical literature" was wholly forgotten and unknown at Rome. The Latin of Popes and Councils at that time is as far from being classical as it is possible for Latin to be. "Philalethes" must not expect to find all the words they used in classical dictionaries; and if he will look at Du Cange's glossary,* he will find that the word sensibiliter is no more there than the word sensualiter; but if he will take the trouble of consulting either Dr. Andrews's or Mr. Riddle's Latin-English Lexicons, following the Latin-German Lexicon of Dr. W. Freund, he will find the kindred word sensualitas translated "the capacity of sensation—sensibility" which quite agrees with our translation of the word sensualiter—"in a manner appreciable by the senses."

The proof is beyond all dispute that sensualiter was the word really put in the Confession by Pope Nicolas II. and his bishops; for it was put in the canon law, and no copy of the canon law ever had any word but sensualiter in it. We have the first edition, printed in 1472, which has that word; and so has every copy since. In the year 1580 the Pope appointed twenty-four of the most learned men in the Church of Rome to correct the canon law; they spent sixteen years in the task. They got the oldest copies of the canon law from all parts of Europe, some as old as the time it was written, and every copy they found had the word "sensualiter;" and they left that word in it; and the Pope, by a solemn bull,* forbid any one ever to alter one word of it. So here is proof past all question that "sensualiter" is the real word.

We are satisfied now that our correspondent feels that that confession, with the word "sensualiter" in it, was false and heretical, and that Berengarius was not bound in conscience to subscribe to it at the command of his prelates.

But, then, how can "Philalethes" now go on to contend that Christ has given such a promise to the prelates of being always right—that we must always, in every thing, submit to what they say, "without qualification, or limitation of time or place?"

ON POPE LIBERIUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Will you be pleased to permit insertion to the following observations, assured, as I am, your only object (as, believe me, it is emphatically mine), is the solution of the truth. I therefore trouble you with these remarks, with reference to the alleged heterodoxy of the Pontiff Liberius, and which has been discussed in yours of January and December.

In the number for December, 1853, page 142, it is said, "At both Selencia and Rimini the bishops passed decrees that the word 'Consubstantial' should be left out of the creed of the Catholic Church, thereby surrendering what the Arians wanted." Now, on consulting the "History of Decline, &c., of Roman Empire," I find it mentioned that the Selencian Council, "after four days unavailing debate, separated without any definite conclusion." The Rimini Council, held in A.D. 359-60, appears to have signed a formulary, "reluctantly obtained, partly by force, sophistry, and cold, and distress, &c.," by Valens, &c., Illyrian bishops, and the Prefect Laurus, who "deceived the honest simplicity of the Latin bishops by fraud," and got them to sign a captious creed, in which some expressions, susceptible of an heterodox sense, were inserted, in the room of the 'ὁμοούσιος,' or 'Consubstantial.'" As soon as Valens, &c., had received it, and the bishops had dispersed to their dioceses, he published it in the Arian sense; which they no sooner discovered than they immediately protested against such an interpretation, and "rejected it with disdain and abhorrence," and "the orthodox creed was more firmly replanted in the Churches of the west."

In view of all this evidence, this proof, how can the Rimini Council be charged with heterodoxy in doctrine—in doctrine, simply? Respecting the allegation of heterodoxy against the Pontiff Liberius, he does not appear to have been at Rimini: that is granted, and what is more, must have been in banishment in Thrace, at the time of its sitting, (having been so for three years, from 357 or 356?) NOT for refusing to sanction its decrees, but those of another council. Therefore, in view of this conclusion, the letter to which you refer, and which he certainly wrote to Constantius, had reference to the decisions of the Milan Council of A.D. 355 and 356, not to Rimini at all, which Milan Council was convened to ratify the decrees of Tyre Synod, held in 336, A.D., in which Athanasius, Archbishop of Alexandria, had been sentenced to exile, on false charges, universally admitted such, and having no ostensible relation to articles of Christian doctrine, and with the breaking a chalice, imprisonment of six bishops, and even homicide!!! In view of these facts, Liberius's letter does not imply or prove any heterodoxy in doctrines, as far as I can perceive. His letter certainly exhibits more anxiety to regain his former position, and also great weakness, and deficiency of what was to be expected from a Roman Pontiff, the head of the Christian Church—high, unbending Christian moral principle—inasmuch as he most culpably betrayed and deserted the cause of a highly injured and calumniated Christian brother and archbishop, who, by his noble and firm determination, maintained his conscientious convictions in their integrity, during forty-six years, twenty of which he passed in exile, "almost every province of the empire successively a witness to his merit and sufferings," "displaying a superiority of character, and abilities,

* Labbe and Cossart, vol. v., p. 803. Edition, Paris, 1672.

* Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis, Paris, 1846.

* We have a copy of the Bull of Gregory XIII., before us, prefixed to the edition of the Corpus Juris Canonici, published at Lyons in 1671, from which we transcribe the following extracts:—

"Ut omnem omnibus aberrandi ab ea occasionem subtrahamus . . . quod nulli omnino hominum totius orbis liceat hujusmodi libris dicti juris canonici sic de mandato nostro recognitis, correctis et expurgatis quicquid addere, detrahere, vel immutare aut invertere, nullave interpretamenta adjungere, sed prout opus hujusmodi Romæ nunc impressum fuit, semper et perpetuo integrum et incorruptum conservetur, statuimus sanctimus et ordinamus.

"Datum Romæ apud Sanctum Petrum sub annulo Piscatoris die prima Julii MDLXXX., Pontificatus nostri anno nono."

This copy, like all the others—and we have consulted eight different editions, all published by authority—has the word "sensualiter" twice over.

&c.," has had his name transmitted to posterity, commanding our admiration, and thereby forms a most striking contrast to that of the Pontiff Liberius, who deserted him to an unjust persecution of the Arians. I find the historian states that Felix, Liberius's rival, was irregularly chosen, by the influence of the eunuchs of the palace, and that "a general assembly being convened, the clergy bound themselves, by a public oath, never to desert his predecessor, never to acknowledge the usurper, Felix," and to which they adhered until Liberius's return. This does not look as if he had been recognised as Pontiff during Liberius's banishment.

I am your obedient servant,
A TRUTH-SEEKER.

Moira, January.

Nothing can be more agreeable to us than to enter into discussion with so candid an inquirer. Our object, like his, is truth; and we shall ever be ready to admit a mistake, when it is shown to us; but as yet we do not see that we have made any mistake in this matter.

"The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," is not just the kind of authority for our pages. The author, Gibbon, was an infidel; and it was his great object to place every thing relating to Christianity in such a light as might lead others to become infidels too. And this wicked desire has led him often to give the grossest misrepresentations of the opinions and doctrines which have prevailed in the Church. And about the facts of the case, Gibbon is too late a witness; he wrote 1400 years afterwards; his statements are worth nothing, except so far as he took them from ancient historians. It is much shorter and more satisfactory to go to the old historians at once. On such a question, we greatly prefer Roman Catholics to infidels; and we prefer ancient Catholics to both.

We take our correspondent's facts in the order he places them in.

I. The Council at Seleucia. One hundred and fifty bishops were collected there; thirty were for abolishing the Nicene Creed; altogether one hundred and twenty were for putting out the word, "of one substance with the Father," the words which, alone, Arians never could get over, and which the Council of Nice had adopted for that very reason. Scarcely a voice appears to have been raised at the Council in favour of the faith of Nice. Some one proposed to adopt the creed which the Arians had drawn up at Antioch, in opposition to the creed of Nice. That proposal was adopted; the thirty withdrew, and composed a most heretical creed of their own; the one hundred and twenty subscribed the creed of Antioch. We take this account from the ecclesiastical historian, Socrates, who wrote his history about 80 years after the event. Book ii. ch. 39.

II. The Council at Ariminum or Rimini. There is no doubt whatever about the creed which was adopted at this council. It was the third creed of Sirmium—a creed drawn up under the personal direction of the Arian emperor, Constantius; and this creed was unmistakably Arian.

Accounts differ about the way in which this creed came to be adopted. One account seems to imply that a majority carried the Arian creed, in the first instance, and that a large minority always continued steadfast against it. Another account, more generally received, both by Roman Catholics and Protestants, states, that most were in favour of the Nicene creed at first, and that all signed the Arian creed in the end. But about the fact, that the Arian creed was adopted, there seems to be no dispute.

In our number for December, p. 142, col. 3, we noticed the account given by St. Vincent, of Lirins, who wrote about seventy years after the event—"Almost all the bishops of the Latin tongue deceived, partly by force, partly by fraud" (1st Commonitory, ch. 4.) In his 2nd Commonitory, ch. 29, he speaks of the great care taken at the Council of Ephesus—"lest there might, by chance, some profane novelty creep in, as happened at that perfidious meeting in Ariminum." The Jesuits Labbe and Cossart call this council "that assembly of Arians." Du Pin calls it "this council whose beginning was glorious, and end deplorable."

III. About Pope Liberius. Our correspondent says he was not at Rimini—"that is granted:" but that he was then in banishment for having refused to sanction the decrees of the Council of Milan, which council passed no decrees about faith, but only condemned Athanasius of crimes.

To this we reply:—

1st. All the Catholics of Milan treated the case of Athanasius as a question of faith. It was an Arian device to treat it only as a question of facts.

2nd. Both Socrates and Sozomen, the oldest and best ecclesiastical historians of that period, give us lists of the persons who were banished at the Milan Council, and neither of them include Pope Liberius. There is no reason to think that he was at that council at all (Soc., b. 2, ch. 36, Soz., b. 4, ch. 9).

3rd. Socrates states expressly that Liberius was at the Council of Ariminum, and that he was banished for refusing to subscribe the creed adopted in that council. (Book 2, ch. 37.) Sozomen gives two different accounts, one seeming to represent Liberius as banished a little before the council at Ariminum, the other expressly stating that he was banished at the council. It may be that both these accounts intended to apply to his banishment at the council. (Book 4, ch. 11, and 19).

The famous letter of Liberius was not intended to confirm the decrees of Milan: this is plain; for the letter is addressed to the eastern bishops, and proposed to confirm their decrees, whereas the decrees of Milan were passed by the western bishops.

But a further quotation from that same letter of Pope Liberius may serve to settle the question about him. After condemning Athanasius, the letter goes on—"My lord and fellow brother, Demophilus, who has vouchsafed, of his own benevolence, to expound the true and Catholic faith, which was treated, finished, and received at Sirmium, by many brothers and fellow bishops of ours, this I receive with a willing mind, contradicting it in nothing." (Epis. 7, Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., p. 751.)

We know it is disputed what creed that was which Liberius signed; for there were three different creeds drawn up at Sirmium. But it matters little, for all three were Arian—all three expressly intended to get rid of the ever-memorable decision adopted by the Council of Nice against Arius.

But who was that Demophilus who expounded the true faith to the Pope, and got him to sign the creed of Sirmium? He was an ARIAN BISHOP! How benevolent it was of him to teach the Pope, and with what praiseworthy humility the Pope submitted to be taught by that Arian bishop! But we know something more of Demophilus; he is expressly named both by Socrates (Book 2, ch. 37), and Sozomen (Book 4, ch. 17), as one of those who produced in the Council of Ariminum, and succeeding in passing there, the third Sirmian creed, drawn up under the direction of the Arian Emperor Constantius.

Now, whenever it was that Liberius was banished, it is clear that the end of his banishment, and his subscribing to the creed of Sirmium, was after the Council of Ariminum. What creed of Sirmium would Demophilus then expound to the Pope? Clearly, we think, that third creed which Demophilus had himself proposed and signed at Ariminum. And it was by the Empress's orders that Demophilus made the Pope sign this creed. What creed would the Emperor ask the Pope to sign? Would he ask him to sign either the first or the second, both of which the Emperor had himself rejected and condemned? Or would he ask the Pope to sign the third creed, which the Emperor himself had got drawn up and approved? We do not want to be positive in a question that is disputed; nor is it necessary for us to be so, as all three Sirmian creeds were Arian; but it certainly is our opinion that it was the third creed of Sirmium—that is, the creed which was passed by Ariminum—that Pope Liberius signed. And it is to be observed that all the ancient fathers who wrote of the matter, St Athanasius himself, St. Hilary, St. Jerome, all speak of Liberius as having fallen into heresy.

So the case stands thus: the Emperor summoned a general council; the eastern bishops to meet at Seleucia, the western at Ariminum. Nearly 600 bishops met. They decreed, in both places, to reverse the most important and essential point of the decision made at Nice against Arius; and the Pope confirmed their decisions. Yet Roman Catholics must all acknowledge that Pope and Council together were wrong in an essential article of the Christian faith.

We say with confidence that if that Pope and council had decided in favour of the Nicene faith, it would have been regarded, to all generations, as a LAWFUL GENERAL COUNCIL. Why is it NOT so regarded? Simply because it decided wrong. If a Pope and a general council decide right, we are to follow them; if they decide wrong, we are to regret their decision. The decrees of a council are to be tried by the Catholic faith; the Catholic faith is to be supported, but not to be tried, by the decrees of councils.

If Ariminum, Seleucia, and Pope Liberius had decided right, would any Catholic ever have denied them the character of a true and lawful general council? Why do we deny them that character but because we see that they decided wrong?

If Roman Catholics confess, as they do, that both Pope and council here were wrong; how can they turn round on us and say that Pope and council must be always right?

P.S.—We have received another letter from our correspondent, who signs himself "A Roman Catholic," on the subject of Pope Liberius. It is rather long, and contains more subjects than suit a letter for our pages. But we should certainly have published it, only that we had already fully answered its principal point about Pope Liberius, in our remarks on the foregoing letter of "A Truth-seeker," before the other letter was received. Our readers would hardly approve of the same things being said twice over in our pages. In this letter "A Roman Catholic" gives up the decision against Berengarius, which he defended in his last. He now says "We do not hold Pope Nicolas and his 113 bishops to be a general council, and, therefore, we do not hold ourselves accountable for their decision." It is, however, an awkward fact, that this decision was put into the canon law of the Church of Rome, as our readers will see in our reply to "Philalethes," and remains there to this day. If the Church of Rome do possess infallibity, why does she not use it better?

It is well for our correspondent that he lives in a Protestant country. In Rome or Spain he would stand a good chance of being treated as a heretic for setting up his own private judgment against a Pope and 113 bishops; and if the Synod of Thurles had the government of Ireland, they would hardly allow him to say that there could be no infallibility without a general council. Will the decision of the Pope about the Immaculate Conception be infallible when it is made? or may it be like Pope Nicolas and his 113 bishops?

WAS THE JEWISH CHURCH THE CHURCH OF GOD IN ITS DAY?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—It is gratifying to see that the doctrine of Infallibility occupies so much of your space. It is the question. It is the baseless dogma on which rests the whole Papal superstructure. Leaving other points to yourself and your able correspondents, I will address myself to a favourite argument in its support, frequently put forward by Romish controversialists. A writer in one of your late numbers, Mr. Rourke, thus expresses it:—"If she (the Church) was liable to err, He (Christ) could not love her," p. 128. Because Romanists think it advantageous that the Church should be a living, speaking, infallible guide, they conclude that she must be so; and then they assume that God could not love her if she were not secured from error. Must God's Church, then, at all times, be infallible? If it be, at any time fallible, is it plain that God cannot love her? Was the Jewish Church God's Church, when the prophet Malachy uttered the oft-quoted words, "The priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of Hosts?" If God loved this Church, must it have been infallible? If so, then, its sentence must have been true—that Christ was an impostor. Mr. Rourke may take whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases. Either Christ was an impostor, or God's then Church was fallible; either God's Church, though loved, was fallible, or the Jewish Church, though God's Church, could not have been loved by him, seeing that he willed to leave her liable to error. So much for a priori arguments. Because Romanists think infallibility convenient, they must needs support it by pretending that infallibility is of the essence of a Church; and, by so doing, they un-Church the people of God before our Lord's time; and, to hide the monstrousness of this, and such other conclusions, they take the Bible out of the hands of the people.

Of course, those who stop at nothing, will find a way out of this as well as out of any other difficulty. God could love his ancient Church without its being infallible; but not so the modern. But is this reasonable? Or is it essentially necessary that the Christian Church should be infallible, but not so requisite that the Jewish should? But how know these men so well with what attributes it behoved the Allwise to endow his Church? Is it less than presumptuous to tell the world, that God could not have acted except in the manner which, to them, seems the best?

They have, no doubt, another way of escaping this difficulty. The Jewish Church, they will say, ceased to be infallible. when it first pronounced a wrong decision. This, I should think, we could know ourselves, without needing their acuteness to discover it for us. But the question is, why they were deprived of infallibility prior to their pronouncing this, their first faulty sentence? That the Jewish Church should have been once infallible; and yet, should have been deprived of that gift just prior to its deciding upon Christ's pretensions, seems extraordinary. If ever there was a point upon which infallibility in the judge was important, it was that, the truth or falsehood of claims to the Messiaship. It is vain to say, that the grave nature of present questions makes a living, infallible judge necessary; no occasion could ever arise more momentous than when the Church was called upon to receive, or reject, the Son of God, presenting himself before her in human form.

If Romanists pretend, that the Jewish Church forfeited infallibility on account of her unfaithfulness to the trust committed to her, why might not any particular part of the Christian Church be deprived, for the same reason, of her privilege? Were not Rome, and the Churches in communion with her, sunk very low in the middle ages, not to speak of any other period of her history? Their own divines are compelled to own and lament this. But why is it incredible that God should make his guidance, both to us and the Jews, dependant upon the careful use we make of the light which we enjoy? We may regard each separate branch of the Church as liable to error; and yet trust that all branches will never unite in renouncing any fundamental of Christianity. But, whatever our hopes may be, let us not presume to say, that if God loved his Church, he could not possibly have left it devoid of a gift, which it is probable it never enjoyed for the 4,000 years before Christ; and which it is certain that it had lost before it rejected our Lord's pretensions to be the promised Messiah and the Saviour of the world.

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
A KILDARE CHURCHMAN.

CARDINAL WISEMAN AND THE APOCRYPHA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As you invite any Roman Catholic priest or layman to state in your pages the evidence for the books called apocryphal, you will, probably, have no objection to print and take into consideration the following summary of the evidence for them, contained in the last number of the "Dublin Review."

"The question of the Deutero-canonical books was investigated with the utmost care at the Council of Trent. Both early and late Councils were referred to in favour of the existing Catholic canon, together with the writings of SS. Cyprian, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Basil, and other fathers. The Protestants had claimed certain of the fathers as on their side; the Catholics answered, that when they wrote, the matter had not been fully investigated or decided on by the Church. The Protestants had asserted that the books in question had formed no part of the Hebrew canon; the Catholics maintained that they had been received with the utmost reverence by the Hellenistic Jews, and that the earliest Christian writers and martyrs, as Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, Polycarp, and Irenæus, refer to them in the same manner as to other parts of Scripture. They quoted St. Augustine:—'We must not omit those books which we know to have been written before the coming of Christ, and which are received by the Church of the Saviour himself, although they be not received of the Jews.' Now, assuredly, the Church, notwithstanding her conviction of her own infallibility, used all those human means for arriving at the truth which God accords to us as a secondary instrumentality. Neither did she stand alone in her judgment. The East has confirmed the decision of the West; and, in 1672, a Greek Synod, held at Jerusalem, under the Patriarch Dositheus, acknowledged, as canonical, the same books to which the Council of Trent had already attached that character."—Dublin Review, xxxv. 307, January, 1854.

I shall only add, that when you assert that several writers, for the first 300 years, did not consider those books inspired, you appear to me to prove what learned Roman Catholics do not deny. Witness the sentence in the above which I have marked in italics. Dr. Milner says ("End of Controversy," letter ix.):—"It was not until the end of the fourth century, that the genuine canon of Holy Scripture was fixed, and then it was fixed by the tradition and authority of the Church, declared in the third Council of Carthage, and a decretal of Pope Innocent I." Again, Mr. Newman says ("Essay on Development," p. 160):—"On what ground do we receive the canon, as it comes to us, but on the authority of the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries? The Church of that era decided—not merely bore testimony, but passed a judgment on former testimony—that certain books were of authority." Does it not appear then, sir, that we have got an answer to your question—"If there was no perfect Bible in the first 300 years, how did the Church of Rome come by it in later times?" Answer—By the authority of the Council of Carthage, and the decretal of Pope Innocent I.

I am, sir,

A SUBSCRIBER.

Our correspondent appears to have taken this account from a great authority, the "Dublin Review," which is known to be under the direction of Cardinal Wiseman. It seems to us fairly to admit that the Church for 400 years did not believe the Apocrypha to be inspired. This is just what we said ourselves; and is this all the answer we are to get? Either the whole Church of Christ was wrong for 400 years about the Bible, or the Church of Rome is wrong about it now. Which is most likely?

FLOWERS FOR FEBRUARY.

SURLY winter has not yet departed, and the month of February, far from being all sunshine, has many an hour

"Of solemn gloom,
Ere yet the lovely spring assume
Sole empire; with the lingering cold
Content divided sway to hold."

Under this bare and chilly aspect appears the SNOWDROP, winter's timid child, with its solitary flowers drooping gracefully over its parent breast of drifted snow.

Its botanical name is "Galanthus nivalis" (milk-flower of the snow). The French call it Pierce-neige, or snow piercer. The monks called it our "Lady of February." Whether it be a natural wild flower of the British Islands has been doubted. Mackay's Flora Hibernica says it is scarcely indigenous in Ireland. It is certainly to be found in the woods and meadows of England now; but had it been a wild flower in the days of Ben Jonson and Shakspeare, it is passing strange that its chaste and simple beauties should have found no place in their groups of wild flowers—with the primroses and daffodils. They make the primrose the first flower of spring; whereas we all recognise the modest little Snowdrop, as "the morning star of flowers"—the first visitant that greets us as chilly winter is retiring at the approach of genial spring. While yet the surface of the earth is covered with snow,

"We behold the snowdrop white
Start to light,
And shine in Flora's desert bowers."

The Snowdrop thus appearing, under the changeful sky of early spring, is "an emblem of human life, and frail as fair." Its life among us is short, and transient, and very soon

"The night breeze tears its silky dress,
Which, decked with silvery lustre, shone;
The morn returns not it to bless;
The gaudy crocus flaunts its pride,
And triumphs where its rival died."

But still, even in its short passage through life, it reads lesson. It appears to arise from its bed of snow to tell us, that while winter, in the economy of nature, has its own especial office, and its gloom and its cold are the necessary preparations for the spring time and summer, and though the songs of birds are mute, and the sun is clouded with dark and frowning clouds, and the hoar frost spreads its mantle all around, the spring is coming, and, like hope, it points to a season more bright than the present.

"So piety, upheld by faith and hope,
Endures serene the passing storm of life,
With eye intent on heaven,
And thought already there."

Long since has the Snowdrop been regarded as the emblem of Consolation. What is its anti-type with us? Is it the consolation for which that just and devout man, Simeon, was looking, which, when he had seen, he exclaimed, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, because mine eyes have seen thy salvation" (St. Luke, xi. 25, 26). This was none other than "the Christ of the Lord." He was emphatically called the Consolation of Israel. So was he the consolation of the early Christian Church, in the apostolic days, for St. Paul says, "So our consolation abounded by Christ" (2 Cor. i. 5); and, as a most solemn appeal to the Philippian Church, he writes, "If there be, therefore, any consolation in Christ." In vain do we search the Old and New Testament Scriptures for any allusion to the consolation presented to her people by the Church of Rome, the Virgin Mary, and the saints in life, and purgatory and masses in death. And how should we expect to find such? If St. Paul be right, our consolation aboundeth in Christ; and again he declares that God in his mercy hath vouchsafed to make a solemn oath, "that we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to take hold upon the hope that was set before us" (Heb. vi. 18); this hope being "Jesus Christ, who is our hope" (1 Tim. i. 1). "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. i. 27).

The first rival of the Snowdrop, is the gaudy Crocus, so called by the Greeks, from the saffron colour of one of its species. The French, for the same reason, call it "saffran printanier." Mackay says, that if not indigenous in Ireland, it has been naturalized in our meadows, and grows plentifully in many parts of Ireland, especially about Dungannstown. Gerarde, perhaps, is more accurate when he states, that "this pleasant plant that brought forth yellow flowers" was first introduced into these Islands in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It has since spread over the meadows of many parts of England, and near Nottingham and the silvery Trent whole acres are to be seen covered with its rich mantle of bright purple. The Crocus is certainly a native of the middle and southern parts of Europe and the Levant; and in our rambles through the mountains and valleys of Switzerland we have met with fields of the wild purple autumnal crocus, almost within the precincts of the eternal snows. The mountain pass from Martigny to Chamouni, by the Col de Balme, about midway up, presents one of the most luxuriant fields in the world of Crocus, in company with wild anemones, violets, and harebells. We raised the bulbs and transplanted them to an Irish soil; but, alas! they withered and died. The Crocus generally, when taken up, appears dry and shrivelled, as if it could never again put forth its rich flowers and green leaves, but yet, at the approach of spring, it awakens to life. So it is with the Christian: his life is hid—all may seem dark and dead, but there arises light out of darkness; the spirit of joy replaces the spirit of heaviness, and the plant of peace is watered with the dew of heaven.

The pretty little HEPATICA (Hepatica triloba), now also appears in our borders, opening its flowers somewhat later than the Snowdrop and Crocus; it derived its name from the lobe, or liver (hepar) shape of its leaves. Formerly it was called Noble Liver-wort, and Herb Trinity. It is indigenous to most parts of Europe, though not, perhaps, to the British Isles; but still with us it has long been a familiar favourite. In the Canadas it is called the Snow Flower, as it is the first flower of a Canadian spring. It has many varieties, of all kinds of colour, and through all the shades of blue and red, from pearl colour to the deep azure of the sky, and from rose colour and peach blossom to purple; and after its flowers are gone, its ivy-shaped leaves are an enduring ornament through the open months of the year.

The Hepatica is a peculiar flower, and somewhat of an oddity in its habits. Gardeners say that if it be removed from its parent bed on which it has been grown from seed, it languishes and changes this bright native colour into a sickly hue, which it never recovers until restored to its former situation.

Its appearance has long been regarded as an unerring indication of the temperature of the earth, showing when seed time has arrived; and, therefore, it cannot be wondered at, that the return of this lovely little flower to our parterre is always welcomed with gladness, as reassuring us of the innate vitality of vegetable life. Perhaps from this cause it has become the emblem of Confidence.

"The Hepaticas are blooming fair,
The hue of constancy they wear;
So bright their vestments blue,
That fancy deems the lovely dye
Was stolen from the azure sky,
And painted by the dew.

"Soon as the hope of spring is told,
Their blossoms in his path unfold,
The glowing sun to woo,
And prove the symbol true;
Thus humble Confidence is given
To the first promises of heaven."

But where is our confidence to be placed? In human nature, human merit, or human works? or in dead men, and women, canonized as saints? or in angels, or in the Virgin Mary, or the Apostle Paul, or the Apostle Peter? David tells us, "God is the confidence (or hope) of all the ends of the earth" (Psalm lxiv. 5—65th Psalm of authorised version). Solomon tells us, "The Lord shall be thy confidence" (Prov. iii. 26). The Prophet Micah tells us, "Put not confidence in a guide"—meaning a human guide—(Micah, vii. 5). St. Paul tells us, "Rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Philipp. iii. 3). St. John tells us, "And now little children abide in him (Christ Jesus) that when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming" (1st Epistle St. John xi. 28). If this be true, all those who have placed their confidence in beads, or rosaries, or scapulars, or penances, or works, or angels, or saints, or purgatory, or any other thing than Christ Jesus, will be ashamed before him at his coming. May that not be the case, reader with you, nor with me.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

EVERY preparation for the season's crops should be put into active operation this month; draining and subsoiling, and the first ploughing and digging, if not finished by the first of the month, should be brought to a close without delay.

Spring Wheat should be sown not later than the middle of the month; no time should be lost, therefore, in getting in the seed at every favourable opportunity. As the season advances, a little increase in the seed will be necessary, so as to prevent tillering, so that it may ripen early and evenly together. Thin sowing at this period will have the effect of promoting second growths at too late a period, and thereby an unevenly ripened sample. From 30 to 40 barrels of lime, or from 2 to 3 cwt. of guano, spread evenly and harrowed in along with the seed, should there be a doubt as to the land being sufficiently rich, will much assist in advancing the crop to maturity.

Beans should be sown early in the month, to make certain of a remunerating crop; they should invariably be sown in drills 2½ feet apart, to allow of being horse-hoed, and dibbled in at four inches bean from bean, but the drill-machine saves much labour and seed. Beans, when sown thin, grow short, and pod freely down to the ground; but if sown thick, they grow tall, do not pod well, and are late in ripening, from the want of sun and air. A strong loam is the best soil for beans, and if well manured they are a good preparation for wheat the next season, which is then found to grow to less straw, produce a good head, with a plump, well-matured grain. The Russian is now allowed to be the hardiest sort; but any of the following may be relied on for a good crop—Tick, Heligoland, and Egyptian, for cattle; and the early Managan, long-pod, or Windsor, for human consumption. Quantity of seed per Irish acre, 3½ bushels, sown broadcast, or 2 bushels drilled.

Peas for an early crop may be sown now. The same culture as that recommended for beans is applicable to peas; but the land suited to them should be lighter and drier than that in which beans may be sown; they will give good crops on all stubble land that is not too much exhausted; but if they can be afforded a little manure, it will amply remunerate for its application. The kinds best adapted for cattle-feeding are—large gray, early gray, partridge, and Pennsylvanian; for human consumption, early Charletoo, double-blossomed May, or Prussian blue pea.

Oats.—Black oats may be sown about the 12th, but the white sorts are best deferred sowing till the end of this, or the beginning of the next month.

Potatoes.—Every dry opportunity should be taken advantage of to get this valuable crop planted, previous to their wasting their strength in pushing out their shoots. The early-ripening sorts should be chosen for this purpose, amongst the best of which are the early Bangors, ash-leaved kidneys, Kemps, pretty Betties, and purple kidneys.

Parsnips may be sown any time this month, in a deepened and properly-pulverised soil, well manured with well-decomposed manure, or rich compost, which should be well and deeply incorporated with the soil. They should be sown in drills 21 inches apart, and the plants afterwards singled out to 8 inches plant from plant; sown now they will come in early, but the general crop need not be sown till the first or second week in March; but a dry seed-time should not be passed over if it occur a week or ten days before that period. The common and the Jersey hollow-crowned, are the most usually sown: but there is a variety particularly adapted to shallow soils, called the turnip-rooted; from 4 to 5 lbs. will sow the Irish acre, if the seed be good.

Odds and ends. Keep a sharp look out after the mouths of the under drains, and clear away all stoppages, and cause all defects to be immediately remedied or repaired. Keep adding to the manure-heaps, prepare and cart dry earth for fresh composts, to make a base and coverings for the sides of the farm-yard manures, and turn over old ones. See that the store stock in the yards and sheds are abundantly supplied with fresh-thrashed straw and turnips. Continue to scour out drains and ditches where practicable; repair hedges and plant new ones.

New, Recent, and Illustrated Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Any Book or number of Books together, within a pound weight, can be sent by post for 6d., and at the rate of 6d. for every pound weight additional.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

RECORDS OF TRAVELS IN TURKEY, GREECE, &c.; and of a Cruise in the Black Sea with the Capitan Pacha. By Admiral Slade. 8vo. 14s.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAMPAIGN OF 1828-29; with a View of the present State of the Eastern Question. By Colonel Chesney. 12s.

THE TURKISH QUESTION:—The Czar and the Sultan—The Cossacks and the Turk—The Turks in Europe. 2s.

PHILIPS' MAP OF THE FRONTIER PROVINCES OF TURKEY, RUSSIA, AND AUSTRIA, THE BLACK SEA, &c. In case. 1s.

THE HISTORY OF YUCATAN, from its Discovery to the close of the Seventeenth Century. By Charles St. John Fancourt, Esq. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF CHRISTOPHER ANDERSON. By his Nephew. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MURRAY'S BRITISH CLASSICS. The Works of Oliver Goldsmith. Edited by Peter Cunningham. 4 vols. 8vo. 30s.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND. By Miss Strickland. New and Revised Edition. With numerous Portraits. Vol. I., II., post 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. (To be completed in 8 monthly volumes)

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION. Vol. V.—Subject:—"The Reformation in England." 8vo. 12s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. Five vols. in One. 8vo. cloth, 8s. Gilt Edges, 9s.

HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN HUNGARY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REFORMATION TO 1850. With reference also to Transylvania. With an Introduction by Dr. D'Aubigne, 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE CROSS AND THE DRAGON; or, the Fortunes of Christianity in China, with Notices of the Secret Societies of the Chinese. By J. Kesson. Post 8vo. 6s.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT; or, the Books of Genesis and Exodus. Illustrated by existing Monuments. 6s.

"THE KINGS OF THE EAST;" an Exposition of the Prophecies, determining from Scripture and from History the Power for whom the mystical Euphrates is being "dried up." With an explanation of certain other Prophecies concerning the Restoration of Israel. 7s.

THE EXPERIENCE OF LIFE. By the Author of "Amy Herbert." 7s. 6d.

THE NET IN THE BAY; or Journal of a Visit to Moose and Albany. By the Bishop of Ruperts' Land. 4s. 6d.

LECTURES ON FEMALE SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. By William Jay. 6s.

THE REV. WILLIAM JAY. A Memoir. By the Rev. S. S. Wilson. With an Appendix containing Remarkable Passages selected from his Discourses. 3s. 6d.

WORK; or Plenty to Do, and How to Do it. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 12mo. 4s.

THE TENT AND ALTAR—SKETCHES OF PATRIARCHAL DAYS. By Rev. Dr. Cumming. 9s.

DAILY BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS—THE APOSTLES AND EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By Dr. Kitto. 6s.

CHRIST OUR PASSOVER; or, Thoughts on the Atonement. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

THE LAND OF THE FORUM AND THE VATICAN; or, Thoughts and Sketches during an Easter Pilgrimage to Rome. By Newman Hall, B.A. Fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE ETERNAL DAY. By the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D. 2s.

WHY WEEPEST THOU? or, the Cry from Ramah Hushed by the Voice from Heaven. By the Rev. Dr. Macfarlane. 2s. 6d.

THE WORDS OF JESUS. By the Author of the "Faithful Promiser." In Cover 8d.; Cloth, 1s.

RELIGION IN HEART AND LIFE; or, the Fruits of the SPIRIT. By Rev. Frederick George Barton. 3s.

THE SUCCESSFUL MERCHANT; Sketches of the Life of Mr. Samuel Budgett. By William Arthur, A.M. 2s. 6d.

FAR OFF; or, AFRICA AND AMERICA DESCRIBED. Part II. By the Author of "Peep of Day." 5s.

CHRIST AND CHRISTIANITY: a Vindication of the Divine Authority of the Christian Religion, grounded on the Historical Verity of the Life of Christ. By William Lindsay Alexander, D.D. 4s.

MARY, THE HANDMAID OF THE LORD. By the Author of "Tales and Sketches of Christian Life in Different Lands and Ages." 2s. 6d.

THE SACRAMENTAL AND PRIESTLY SYSTEM EXAMINED; or, Strictures on Archdeacon Wilberforce's Works on the Incarnation and Eucharist. By Charles Smith Bird. 4s. 6d.

THE CHARACTERISTIC DIFFERENCES OF THE FOUR GOSPELS, considered as Revealing Various Relations of the Lord Jesus Christ. By Andrew Jukes. 2s. 6d.

LETTERS FROM SARAROAK, Addressed to a Child; being an accurate description of the Manners, Customs, and Religion of the inhabitants of Borneo, Malays, and Dyaks, and of the Progress of the Church Mission during the first five years; with Incidents of Missionary Life. By Mrs. M'Dougal. 3s. 6d.

JACQUELINE PASCAL; or, CONVENT LIFE IN PORT ROYAL. Compiled from the French of Victor Cousin, &c. By H. N. 5s.

THE PSALMS RESTORED TO THE MESSIAH. A COMMENTARY ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS. By Rev. R. H. Ryland. With a Commendatory Notice, by the Bishop of Cashel. 6s.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE REV. EDWARD BICKERSTETH. By the Rev. T. R. Birks. Cheaper Edition. 2 vols., fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF THE LIVES OF ROBERT AND JAMES A. HALDANE. By Alexander Haldane, Esq. 8vo. 12s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. W. H. KRAUSE, A.M., Bethesda Chapel, Dublin, with selections from his Correspondence. By Rev. C. S. Stanford. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOUR Illustrative of his Divine Character and Mission. By Rev. A. L. R. Foote. 6s.

THE TWO BROTHERS, AND THE TWO PATHS. By Rev. Philip Bennet Power. 1s. 6d.

POOR HENRY; or, the Pilgrim Hut of Weisenstein. From the German of Dr. Barth. By S. A. M. 1s.

THE KNOT OF TO-DAY, AND A HAND TO UNDO IT. A Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and to the Clergy and Laity of the United Church of England and Ireland on "Church Revival." 1s. 6d.

MEMOIRS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his Son-in-Law, the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D. Part I. II. 2s. 6d. each.

THE CHRISTIAN CYCLOPEDIA; or, Repertory of Biblical and Theological Literature. By Rev. Dr. Gardner. Part I., II. 1s. each.

EXCELSIOR: HELP TO PROGRESS IN RELIGION, SCIENCE, AND LITERATURE. Part I., II. 6d. each.

 The names of subscribers received for these two new monthly periodicals.

THE NECESSITY FOR AN INTERMEDIATE SYSTEM OF EDUCATION BETWEEN THE NATIONAL SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES OF IRELAND. By the Rev. Professor M'Cosh, D.D., Queen's College, Belfast. 6d.

DOD'S PARLIAMENTRY COMPANION. 1854. 4s. 6d.

THE ART OF QUESTIONING; or, a Short Analysis of the Interrogatory Methods of Instruction, designed for the use of Teachers, Pupil Teachers, and Monitors. By W. T. Young, T.C.D. 1s. By post, 1s. 4d.

THE IRISH CHURCHMAN'S ALMANACK, 1854. With the Lessons for every Sunday in the Year, &c., &c. 1s.

THE CHEMISTRY OF COMMON LIFE. By James F. W. Johnston. Parts I., II., III. 1s. 8d.

SELECTION OF HYMNS FOR SABBATH SCHOOLS AND CHRISTIAN FAMILIES. By the Rev. Andrew A. Bonar. Cloth, Gilt. 9d.

FAITH AND CRITICISM; or, Dependance on God, and Independence of Man. By Dr. Merle D'Aubigne. Being the Address delivered by him at the opening of the New College, at Belfast. 6d.

THE DAWN OF LIGHT; or, Scripture Truths for Infant Minds. 1s.

A PEEP INTO THE FAMILY OF MRS. DELMAR; or, a Book for Me and my Children, on National and Important Subjects. 5s.

THE ROYAL PREACHER: an Exposition of Ecclesinstes. By Rev. James Hamilton, D.D. Cheaper Edition 2s. 6d.

A VERSIFIED DESCRIPTION OF THE GREAT INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION in Dublin, 1853, in a Letter from I. Donoghoe to his Brother Dan. Edited by — Scribler, Esq., of Scribblestown Castle. 6d.

THE PROTESTANT IN IRELAND, IN 1853. Fcap. 2s. 6d.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY; a Narrative for the Young, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R., with an introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

TWELVE LETTERS ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION; containing two challenges to the Rev. Dr. Cahill. By James C. L. Carson, M.D. 6d.

NEW WORKS AND NEW EDITIONS.

I.

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND; catechetically Explained, compared with Scripture, and briefly Commented upon; for the use of Families and Sunday Schools. By Rev. Charles Miller, A.B., with Recommendatory Preface by the Lord Bishop of Meath. Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

II.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD:

Showing how the Irish People talk about Irish Doings, when they get a quiet Place at the back of a Ditch, or under a Hedge. Fcap. 8vo., in neat cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.

III.

THE REFINER'S FIRE; or Why am I Tried? 32mo. 1d.

IV.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ELOCUTION; Extracted from "The Elements of Rhetoric," by Archbishop Whately; with alterations and additions. The whole arranged, revised, and corrected under the personal inspection of his Grace. Fcap. 8vo. (Immediately.)

V.

A COMPLETE ENGLISH AND IRISH DICTIONARY, for the use of Students at Trinity College, Edited by Rev. Professor Foley, T.C.D. Demy 8vo. (In the press.)

VI.

The Catholic Layman,

VOL. II.

January to December, 1853. Royal 4to., bound, 5s. 6d, With complete Indices.

VII.

A SERMON TO CHILDREN, Preached in Trinity Church on Thursday, January 5, 1854. By Rev. John Gregg, A.B. (Shortly.)

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH, Paternoster-row.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

February, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Gloir do Dhia an fna hárduibh, agus fíoḃcáin air an dtalamh deagḋoil do na dáoinibh.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 27. MARCH, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 3s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE.
Does the Visible Church never Corrupt The true Doctrine ?	31
The Forged Decretal Epistles—No. IV.—The Canon Law	32
The Old Irish Clergy—No. III.	33
The Parish Priest and his Parishioners	35
Talk of the Road—No. XXII.	37
The Cause of our Success. Proposed reprint of the Catholic Layman—Vol. I.	38
Correspondence:
On the Defects in the Mass, by "a Catholic"	28
On Infallibility, by Mr. Rourke	39
Flowers for March	41

DOES THE VISIBLE CHURCH NEVER CORRUPT THE TRUE DOCTRINE?

There has been latterly a good deal of correspondence in our pages to prove the visibility of the Church—a doctrine which yet we have never meant to deny. The argument has, however, had the effect of developing the true differences between us and our correspondents; and it has turned out that the only point we really disagree on is, not the visibility of the Church, but its constant purity in doctrine. Christianity has always visibly existed since its establishment, patent to the eyes of the world; we believe that it will never cease to so exist—that the gates of death or destruction will never prevail against it; but we do not hold, with our Roman Catholic correspondents, that the Christianity which is thus visible has been, or will be, always free from errors in doctrine.

Nor can we admit, with them, that a Church necessarily ceases to be the visible Church of Christ—or a part of it—only because it adds to the essential tenets of our faith others that are erroneous, or because some mistaken or conflicting opinions prevail amongst its members.

The question has most properly been argued on an authority which we both believe to be inspired, that of the Sacred Scriptures; and it is, therefore, worth while to observe what account they give of this matter, either as historic facts, or by way of prophetic warning. The writings of the New Testament are spread over nearly the first century, when Christianity had the benefit of being taught by living infallible guides, and when, therefore, if infallible guides could ever guard against error, we might expect a perfect visible Church, and a complete exemption from heresies. Yet, what is the account given by the inspired historians? Even before the ascension of our Lord we find a false tradition accepted amongst the brethren—namely, that St. John was not to die.—John xxi. 23. The very Divinity of Christ was denied.—Jude 4. The cardinal doctrine of the Resurrection was questioned—1 Cor. xv. 12. Many "false prophets were gone into the world."—1 John, iv. 1.* St. Paul tells us of the Church of Corinth, that there were "contentions among them" (1 Cor. i. 11); and, again, that there were "schisms."—xi. 18. Nay, there were even "false apostles," claiming their miraculous powers ere the true had passed from the earth.—2 Cor. xi. 13. Many had "erred concerning the faith."—1 Tim. vi. 21. There was even then a tendency to a veneration of angels, of such a kind as was condemned by the apostle.—Col. ii. 18. Thus, too, the whole Church of the Colossians was censured for paying an undue regard to festivals and ordinances, "which things have, indeed, a show of wisdom in superstition and humility, and not sparing the body, not in any honour to the filling of the flesh."—Col. ii. 20 and 23. The Church of the Galatians is similarly censured for laying too much stress on the "observance of days and months, and times and years" (Gal. iv. 10), and at the same time receives a general rebuke for its lapse from the truth; "O senseless Galatians, who hath bewitched you that you should not obey the truth?" (iii. 1.) Speaking of the great apostacy which, at some period of the world's history, was to overshadow the whole of Christendom, St. Paul expressly tells us that the seeds were already then sown—"for the mystery of iniquity already worketh."—2 Thess. ii. 7.

Now, on these passages, as well as on those we are about to cite, the remark is too obvious to require any argument, that the presence of living infallible guides was insufficient to prevent errors insinuating themselves into Christianity; yet the great desirableness—as it appears to human reason—of such an effect, is the chief argument with Roman Catholics for assuming the existence of such an authority; and there is moreover this distinction, that, while the presence of several Apostles in the first ages supplied many and unquestioned tribunals of infallible reference, the Roman Catholic Church does not claim more than one, and cannot point out where exactly that is to be found. What, therefore, the Apostles failed to accomplish, it can hardly hope to acchieve; and what then becomes of the common argument in favour of the existence of such an infallible tribunal, from its supposed efficacy? We should also observe, that the Apostles, while reproving the Churches for their errors, do not condemn them as thereby hopelessly cut off from the body of the visible Church.

But if such errors could take root, in the lifetime of the Apostles, we might naturally expect a far greater number to prevail in after ages, when deprived of the light of these living oracles. Accordingly, we read many prophetic warnings, that such would indeed be the case. Some of these are spoken of individuals, some of great numbers, some of entire churches, while some are specially directed to the Clergy or teachers. St. Paul, in his affecting address at Ephesus to the assembled "ancients of the Church," warns them that "of their ownselves should arise men speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."—Acts xx. 17 and 30. So St. Peter tells us—"There shall be amongst you lying teachers, who shall bring in sects of perdition."—2 Peter ii. 1 and 2. And he adds, what would seem to indicate the probable extent of their success, "and many shall follow their riotousness, through whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of." In the "latter times" we learn that such errors were to spread to an alarming extent—"Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, erring and driving into error."—2 Tim. iii. 1 and 13. And similar language is found in St. Jude, 18 and 19. We need not cite St. Paul's rebuke to the whole Church of the Corinthians, who grossly distorted so important a doctrine as that of the Eucharist. Nor is his language addressed to the Church of Rome itself, that of overweening confidence, but rather of solemn warning against her possible fall from truth. "Thou standest by faith; be not high-minded, but fear. For if God hath not spared the natural branches, fear lest perhaps he also spare not thee." "See then . . . the goodness of God, if thou abide in goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off."—Rom. xi. 20 and 22. We need only refer to the similar tone of solemn warning addressed to entire Churches of Asia in the Apocalypse, particularly those of Pergamus, Thyatira, and Laodicea.—Apoc. ii. 14 and 20, and iii. 16.

We have purposely reserved the lessons which we think are meant to be taught in the remaining chapters of the Apocalypse, both because we consider them of peculiar importance, and because we are anxious not to have our meaning misunderstood. These lofty and mysterious prophecies have been so variously interpreted in their details, and have been applied so often in a manner likely most keenly to wound the feelings of Roman Catholics, that they are too apt to turn from them as either unintelligible or dangerous. We are not about to launch into such tangled disputations; we are rather anxious to draw from the sacred text the inferences that seem designed by its inspired writer to have been prominently taught us from the parts, that all may agree in considering as sufficiently clear. And, we may remark, that this is a portion of Scripture which Roman Catholics are peculiarly at liberty to study for themselves; for their Church has never made any authoritative interpretation of it, and any explanations, therefore, that individuals may adopt cannot be a presumptuous exercise of their private judgment, as their authoritative guide has as yet furnished no other to them. Their tenets do not bind them to wholly refrain from interpreting for themselves, but only from doing so contrary to the teaching of their Church.

Now, the first thing that will strike as extraordinary those who look on this book as too dark and enigmatical for general reading is, that it itself states the very reverse. It opens with the emphatic declaration—"Blessed is he that readeth and heareth the words of this prophecy."—Apoc. i. 3. It repeats almost the same words towards its close (xxii. 9), and concludes with a solemn denunciation that shows the importance of its every line. "If any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life" (xxii. 19).

It is plain, therefore, that there is some peculiar blessing or advantage in religious knowledge, to be gained by the study of this book, and as it cannot be wholly from those passages that are but dimly guessed at, through the purposely obscure language of prophecy, it must be derived principally from those striking features which all who read carefully can gather from its more obvious portions. We shall endeavour, then, shortly to see what these are, and what are the lessons they inculcate.

Now, Roman Catholic commentators differ as to whether its prophecies are already principally fulfilled, or still remain principally future; but few of any side doubt that it is meant to give a prophetic sketch of the then known world (ἡ γη), the then empire of Rome, and that portion of the earth which has since been almost synonimous with Christendom, and within whose limits the struggles and doctrines of the Church visible, of Christianity itself, have been mainly decided. It comprehends the most striking epochs from its establishment to its final consummation at the close of the world.

In all this history, amid the religious ruin it so forcibly describes, we should naturally expect some mention of a mighty, infallible, visible, ecclesiastical establishment, preserving the majority of mankind in constant truth, if indeed any such were to so exist. Its mere silence would be very significant; the omission to point out so obvious and secure a refuge from perplexity and error, looks as if none such were known to the inspired writer. And, accordingly, how different is the picture actually drawn! It consists of a series of woes inflicted by Providence on Christendom, ever repeated and recurring, war, desolation, pestilence, and famine, which are throughout tacitly presumed to be sent by the Almighty as scourges to chastise the errors of the vast majority. There is hardly a chapter which tells of these terrible visitations that does not assume that the greater part of men are sunk in depravity as well as falsity of doctrine. The true believers, on the contrary, are described as few, as persecuted for ages, as often hid from the eyes of men, and as even at times so completely overwhelmed as to leave God without a witness upon earth.

In the limits of this article it would be impossible to follow out the whole train of this history, dark in its particular references, but clear in this general result. But one or two passages will especially illustrate our meaning. The period of 1260 days is repeatedly mentioned, both here and in the confessedly parallel prophecies of Daniel, during which a great heretic power should be predominant. In the prophet Daniel, as in many other prophetic writers, the day is conceded to mean a literal year, and it is difficult not to attach the same meaning to the word here. This at once gives us a vast period, during which the dominant Church was to be also heretic.* The true believers are described as "two witnesses" (the least number that could testify to any fact in the Jewish law), and as "clothed in sackcloth," the emblem of suffering.—Apoc. xi. 3. Even these two are finally overcome and destroyed (xi. 7). This persecuting power that has thus destroyed them will, for the 1260 year-days, be dominant and triumphant. "And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them; and power was given him over every tribe, and people, and tongue, and nation" (xiii. 7). So, too, we find the Church of God, as the note in the Douay Bible correctly explains the emblem of the "woman" (c. xii. 1.), described as driven into "the wilderness" (xii. 6 and 14), where she is hid during these 1260 year-days from persecution. There may, indeed, be true servants of God during that time, but they do not form the visible Church, or its ecclesiastical power. The avenging angel was to smite mankind with successive chastisements, but man's blindness and crime was to obstinately continue; "and the rest of the men, who were not slain by the plagues, did not do penance from the works of their hands"—ix. 20.

Now, let any one candidly read not only these few passages, but the entire history of the Church, as it was un-

* All the verses cited in this article are taken from the Douay Translation.

* It is worth observing, to meet a surmise that might arise in the minds of our Roman Catholic readers, that no one sign of this Mystic Babylon can be made to agree with the characteristics of Protestantism.

folded to the prophetic gaze of St. John, and see if he can discover any sign of a perfect, continuous, never-ceasing, never-erring, visible Church establishment, numbering the greater part of the inhabitants of Christendom amongst its followers, and at some periods apparently embracing the whole—a glory which the Church of Rome alone ventures to claim for herself; or does not he rather read that truth and purity were to be exceptions amid general and grave error, ever persecuted, and for some time overwhelmed, falsehood ruling the religious world for ages, and, for a season, God's truth left without a witness with the courage or the power to proclaim it?

This is the lesson, we think, which is most palpably taught, and which carries the promised blessing to those who learn it; one that must have brought consolation to the bosoms of many, who found themselves often alone, amid a world of error. As the New Testament tells us, had already begun to happen in the days of the Apostles, the Apocalypse reveals the continuance and growth of the like mixed system of good and evil, in which for long the evil should predominate, till the second coming of Christ should effect a retributive change. And so, too, during the long centuries past—as, perhaps, for many still to come—we find the Church visible foreshadowed in the sacred book, as history in fact records the event, as ever stricken with punishments, swept by the fierce Goths and savage Hun, exhausted by its struggles with the Saracen and the Turk, and prostrate beneath successive conquerors, the unconscious instruments of God's wrath. Assuredly, not yet have been fulfilled those prophecies, often triumphantly quoted by our Roman Catholic correspondents, in which it is described as perfect in righteousness, as free from sin, as resting in tranquillity and peace, when wars and tribulations shall have passed away. Yet, it is these prophecies, and these alone, which ever speak of the visible Church as perfect in doctrine, and free from error. They, however, supply us with an obvious test: WHEN SIN IS BANISHED, ERROR WILL DISAPPEAR—but not till then; when a Church of men can show itself impeccable, it may then claim to be infallible. Meanwhile, revelation agrees with history in showing that perfection in either way has not, yet at least, been attained by the Church, as it is seen by the eye of man.

DECRETAL EPISTLES.—No. IV.

HOW THE FORGED EPISTLES WERE USED IN THE CANON LAW.

WE gave in our last number, the labours of the Popes of the ninth century in establishing the forged Decretals as the law of the Church. We did not proceed beyond Pope Adrian II. The succeeding Popes no longer laboured to establish the forgery: that was now accomplished, and they thought only how they could use the vast powers which forgery had acquired.

Thus Pope Sylvester II. restores Arnulphus to the archbishopric of Rheims, of which he had been deprived for his crimes; not from any consideration of the welfare of the Church, but "that Peter may have free power of loosing, and that the dignity of the Roman glory may shine forth everywhere; wherefore, we have thought it fit to assist you, Arnulphus, Archbishop of Rheims, deprived, for whatever excesses, of your pontifical dignity . . . . ."(1) The Pope goes on to restore him to all his honours, making no stipulation whatever for his repentance or his absolution; but saying, "Let our authority protect you upon every side, EVEN THOUGH GUILT OF CONSCIENCE OPPRESS YOU!"(2) As if it were necessary to the dominion which falsehood had established, that it should triumph, not only over public decency and virtue, but over the voice of God in the conscience of man! And, to crown all, Pope Sylvester concludes with pronouncing anathema against any succeeding Pope who should alter this decree!(3)—a worthy use of power so acquired.

And the eloquence of those Popes, and its application, may be judged of from this specimen, taken from the same Pope's first epistle to Azolinus, Bishop of Laon:—"O Juda, magistri proditionem innovans, et Pontificalem gloriam nostris temporibus deturpans!"

Some Popes of the next ages deserve more notice, and may receive it from us hereafter; but our present subject is too extensive to let us dwell on any individual Popes. We undertook to show, in this number, how the forged Epistles and councils were THENCEFORWARD continued and maintained as the laws of the Church of Rome.

For this purpose we take the book, called "The Decretum of Gratian."

This Gratian was a monk, of the monastery of St. Felix, in Bononia, and he published this book in the year 1151. It is a vast collection of everything that he could find, having the force of law or the weight of authority in the Church. Fathers, councils, formularies, Papal decrees, and epistles—all are collected here, not from the original writers, but from the various compilations which Gratian found in use at that time as books of Church law. The variety and contradictions of those former collections were found so inconvenient, that Gratian resolved to bring them all together in one book; and this book had such success, that it became the standard work on the law of the Roman Church.

It has been disputed whether this book was confirmed and authorized by the Pope when it came out. Two ancient authors of credit, Trithemius and Machiavel, say that it was so authorized; others deny it. We think that the latter are correct, and that the book was not authorized by the Pope. Still, the fact is confessed, that it was universally adopted in all the courts of the Roman Church. Our witness is Archbishop Devoti, Secretary to Pope Pius VII., the latest Roman writer on Canon law. Devoti wished to allow this Decretum of Gratian as little authority as possible, because it quotes the forgeries; yet he confesses that "scarcely had the work of Gratian come forth into light, than it was held in such esteem by all, that it was read publicly in the schools (of law), and produced in court as part of the common law."(4) If we consider the law books received in our own courts of law, we may easily understand how this might happen to a book not authorized by law. No book has greater authority in British courts of law than "Coke upon Littleton;" yet that book never was confirmed by act of parliament, nor by any law. Yet all courts receive that book as the law of the land, not because Sir Edward Coke had any authority to make laws, but because he gave the best and most accurate statement of the things that were law before he wrote his book. It was precisely the same with Gratian; he collected everything which he found already admitted as law in the Papal courts, and therefore the Papal courts universally adopted his book as the standard work on their law. Carrying out this object, Gratian adopted the forged Decretals into his collection, because he found them already acknowledged in the Roman courts as the law of the Roman Church. Those Decretals did not become law, because he put them in his book; but he put them in his book because he found them law already. We admit the statement of Devoti (p. 376) "concerning the authority of the Decretum (of Gratian); it is to be thus held, that all things which are related in it have the same force as if they were viewed apart from the Decretum. Therefore, whatever force the places of Holy Scripture, the decrees of Popes and of General Councils have by their own quality and nature, the same they retain in the Decretum; but the others, by being put into the Decretum, do not obtain that authority which they have not of themselves."(5)

It follows from this, that genuine Decretals of Popes in the Decretum, are still law, but forged Decretals in the Decretum are not law, merely because they are found in it. It follows, also, that the forged Decretals, which are in the Decretum of Gratian, while they were believed to be genuine, were universally regarded as the laws of the Church.

So the fact stands thus; in the year 1151, Gratian found the forged Epistles of the Popes universally received in the Papal courts as the law of the Roman Church; Gratian adopted them as such, and the Roman courts adopted his book; and, for at least FOUR HUNDRED AND THIRTY YEARS AFTER (as we shall presently prove), and probably some time longer, no one ever doubted that these forged Epistles were genuine, or ever questioned that they were a part of the law of the Roman Church!

We shall now show briefly to what extent, and with what object, the forged Decretal Epistles figured in the Decretum of Gratian.

We confine ourselves (for reasons given in our former numbers) to the Decretal Epistles of the Popes of the first 400 years, of which we gave a list in our first number, printed in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, December, 1853.

Our readers will remember that we showed in that list that there are 84 forged Epistles for those 400 years, and 23 epistles commonly reputed genuine.

Of the 84 forgeries, Gratian quotes 65.

Of the 23 called genuine, Gratian quotes ONLY ONE, and that one, if not forged, is most probably "cooked."

Our readers may remember what we said in our first number, that while the forged Epistles give just what Roman Catholics wish to find in the early ages, the genuine Epistles of those ages do not give any support to the Papacy. Hence, they may understand why Gratian quotes so many of the forged, and so few of the genuine.

But to come to particulars: this book, the Decretum, is divided into larger divisions (which in modern days would be called chapters), and these are subdivided into smaller divisions, called "canons."

Of these canons, THREE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR are taken from the Decretal Epistles of the first 400 years.

Of these three hundred and twenty-four, THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN are forgeries, ONLY ELEVEN genuine; if, indeed, that one Epistle be really genuine.

We confine ourselves to our list of the 400 years. Were we to take in the forgeries of later Popes, and the number of passages from books that were never written by the authors whose names they bear, we should, perhaps, double the number.

But, compare these THREE HUNDRED and THIRTEEN forged canons, with the number of canons which Gratian took from the Scriptures—from the Old Testament, THIRTEEN; from the New Testament, just NINE.

Each canon is to prove some point in the law of the Church of Rome; whereby our readers may see that it was then, as it is now, much easier to prove the papal system from lying stories, than to prove it from the Word of God.

Now, let us see what did Gratian use these forgeries to prove.

In Distinctions (or, as we might call them, chapters) XXI. and XXII. he brings forward proofs for the supremacy of Rome. In Dist. XXI. can. 2, he quotes the forged Epistle of Anacletus. "..... the sacerdotal order began from Peter, because the Pontificate in the Church of Christ was given to him first ....."(6)

In canon 3 he quotes the Decree of Gelasius about approved and apocryphal books, as follows—"..... the Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church was set over the other Churches by no synodical decrees, but obtained the primacy by the evangelical voice of our Lord and Saviour....."(7)

Again, in Dist. XXII., canon 2, he quotes the forged Epistle of Anacletus (which we gave in our last number). "The Holy Roman and Apostolic Church obtained the primacy and pre-eminence over all Churches, not from the apostles, but from the Lord himself, our Saviour....."

Again, in Dist. XCIII., canon 3, Gratian quotes St. Cyprian, saying—"he who deserts the See of Peter, on which the Church is founded, let him not trust that he is in the Church."(8) But these words were never written by St. Cyprian; they were put into his writings by the forgers many centuries after his death.

As far as we have been able to find, these are all the proofs which Gratian brings from the first eight centuries in support of the supremacy by divine right, of the Roman Church. And they are all forgeries. All his other proofs for it are taken from Popes or other writers of the NINTH and following centuries.

Here we have the confirmation of our opinion, which we hope yet to prove still further, that the supremacy by divine right originated from the forged Decretals of the ninth century, and that all former Popes and writers were ignorant of it.

In support of the authority of the forged Decretals, Gratian, or some one for him, transcribes, Dist. XIX. c. 1, that whole argument of Pope Nicolas I. (which we gave at the end of No. II., January 1854, p. 4, col. 1), in which Pope Nicolas insists on people receiving the Decretal Epistles, written in the times of pagan persecution; which it is impossible to apply to any but the forged decretals.

For the divine inspiration of the Pope's decrees, Gratian (Dist. XXI. canon 7) produced that passage of Pope Nicolas (given in our second number, January 1854, p. 3, col. 1), in which Pope Nicolas produces the forged story about Pope Marcellinus as being given by divine inspiration.

But Gratian brings another proof (Dist. xix., canon 6) for the divine inspiration of the Pope's decrees, which deserves attention. This canon has a heading to it—"The Decretal Epistles are to be reckoned in among the CANONICAL SCRIPTURES"! The canon itself consists of a passage which St. Augustine wrote about the Holy Scripture itself, which passage Gratian altered, so that it might apply to the Decretal Epistles of Popes!

Four hundred and thirty years after, this passage was altered to run as St. Augustine wrote it, by correctors whom we shall speak of presently, but those correctors left the heading as Gratian wrote it!

That the Pope only has the right of calling councils, Gratian proves (Dist. xvii., Canons 1, 2, 3, 5) from the Decretal Epistles of Pope Marcellus, Pope Julius I., Pope Damasus, and Pope Pelagius II.—all forgeries.

That the sacrifice of the mass is a propitiatory sacrifice for the taking away of sin, Gratian proves (de Consecr. Dist. ii., Canon 7) from a Decretal Epistle of Pope Julius I., "every crime and sin is blotted out by these sacrifices offered to God;"(9) and also from Pope Alexander (Canon 8)—"nothing can effect more in sacrifices than the body and blood of Christ, nor is any oblation more powerful than this, but this excels all . . . . ."(10) Both these Epistles are acknowledged forgeries.

For the ceremonies and rules to be observed at the mass, many of which are very like those now observed, Gratian gives canons, many taken from the forgeries; as from Clement (de Consecr. Dist. i., Canon 14). Clement again, Canon 39; Sixtus, Canon 41; Stephen, Canon 42; Sylves-

(1) Ut Petro solvendi libera sit potestas, et Romanæ gloriæ ubique fulgeat dignitas. Quapropter tibi Arnulpho Remensi archiepiscopo, quibusdam excessibus pontificali honore privato, subvenire dignum duximus . . . . Ep. 2 to Arnulphus.—Labbe and Coss., vol ix., p. 778.

(2) Nostra te ubique auctoritas muniat, etiam si conscientiæ reatus accurrat.—Same epistle.

(3) Statuentes apostolica censura sub divini obtestatione judicii, et anathematis interdictione, ut nulli unquam nostrorum successorum pontificum, vel aliæ quælibet magnæ parvæque personæ, hoc nostrum privilegium infringere liceat.—Same epistle.

(4) Vix Gratiani opus in lucem prodiit, tanta ab omnibus in pretio habitum est, ut in scholis publice legeretur, atque in Foro tanquam pars communis juris proponeretur.—Devoti, Jus Canonicum, ed. Rom., 1837, vol. i., p. 373.

(5) De auctoritate Decreti sic habendum est; omnia quæ in eo referuntur, vim eandem habere, ac si seorsim e Decreto spectentur. Itaque loca sacræ Scripturæ, decreta Summorum Pontificum, et generalium conciliorum, quam sua indole et natura vim habent, eamdem in Decreto retinent; cætera vero auctoritatem, qua per se carent, in Decretum translata non consequuntur.—Devoti, Jus Canonicum, vol. i., p. 376.

(6) . . . . A Petro Sacerdotalis cœpit ordo, quia ipsi primo pontificatus in ecclesia Christi datus est. . . .

(7) Romana, Catholica et Apostolica Ecclesia nullis synodicis constitutis cæteris ecclesiis prælata est, sed evangelica vuca Domini et Salvatoris nostri Primatum obtinuit.

(8) Qui Cathedram Petri, super quam fundata est Ecclesia, deserit, in Ecclesia se esse non confidat.

(9) Omne crimen atque peccatum oblatis Deo sacrificiis deleatur.

(10) Nihil in sacrificiis majus esse potest, quam corpus et sanguis Christi, nec ulla oblatio hac potior est, sed hæc omnes præcellit.

ter, Canon 46; Telesphorus, Canon 48; Anacletus, Canon 59; Lucius, Canon 60; Anastasius, Canon 61; Alexander de Consecr. Dist. iii., Canon 1; Clement, Canon 23—all forged; besides many more never made by the Popes whose names they bear. From whence our readers may have some notion how the ceremonies of the mass did multiply so fast, and how the mass came to be so different from the simplicity of the Supper of the Lord, as it was celebrated by the Lord himself, and by his apostles after Him.

But we might go on for ever at the forgeries in this Decretum of Gratian. We stop at one instance more—HOLY WATER; for which Gratian quotes that passage of the forged letter of Pope Alexander (which we gave in our last number), and that alone (de Consecr. Dist. iii., Canon 20).

All these things Gratian found as acknowledged laws of the Roman Church, in the year 1151; and therefore he put them into his book. All these things continued in his book as undoubted and unquestioned laws of the Roman Church for at least four hundred and thirty years, and, perhaps, a good deal longer.

And this brings us to a fact in the history of the Decretum of Gratian, which shows far more strongly than we yet have shown it, the vast influence and authority which this book had acquired in the Church; and how little notion any one had, during all those centuries, of doubting or questioning all the forgeries in it.

At the end of the Council of Trent, about the year 1563, Pope Pius IV. (the same who drew up the creed of the Roman Catholic Church), was authorized by the Council of Trent to revise the Roman Missal and Breviary. About the same time, he undertook to revise and correct the Decretum of Gratian. For this purpose, he selected a number of the most learned cardinals and doctors in the Roman Church, to whom he committed that task. His successor, Pius V., added others; so that seven cardinals and seventeen doctors were employed, of whom two afterwards became popes.

These twenty-four most learned men spent more than sixteen years of most diligent labour in correcting the Decretum of Gratian, which they finally accomplished in the year 1580, under the pontificate of Pope Gregory XIII. There cannot be stronger proof of the vast importance and authority attached to this book in the Church of Rome.

What did those learned men do with the forgeries?

It is true, they do correct a forgery now and then, but not the forged Decretals. For instance:—Dist. xix., Canon 9., has this heading—"Anastasius, being rejected by God, was struck by the Divine Will;" which heading the canon itself seems fully to support. Now, this Anastasius was a pope, and the correctors may well have wondered how Gratian came to put in such a story about a Pope. They did not know that the real story which Gratian, no doubt, meant to give, and probably did give, was just the contrary, that some enemy of Pope Anastasius was thus struck by God. Probably some transcriber afterwards made the blunder in making a new copy. But the correctors, knowing nothing of this, pronounced, without hesitation, in the note which they added, that this story was a forgery. This shows that they felt that it was a part of their duty to point out forgeries in the Decretum of Gratian.

Yet of the THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN canons taken from the forged Decretals of the first 400 years, and of all the other canons taken from other similar forgeries, they never pointed out one as being a forgery!

On the contrary, they everywhere seek to uphold the authority of the forged bundle of Isidore.

They state in the preface which they prefixed to the Decretum, that Ignarus, Archbishop of Rheims, affirms, that it really was the famous Isidore, Bishop of Seville, in Spain, who made this collection, which, if true, would be strongest proof that the forged Decretals were genuine; and they do not say that it is not true.

They appeal to the testimony of the writer of this forged collection, "as Isidore himself testifies."

In many of their notes on forged canons, they speak of the forger as if he were a person of credit, and of the forgeries, as if they were genuine." (11)

Having done all this to support the credit of the forgeries, and having never given the smallest hint that any doubt was, or could be thrown on all these forged canons, they say in their preface, respecting the diligence with which the work was done, that "after this scarcely any one can err so as to follow uncertain things for certain, or to hold suspected those which were certain, as if they were uncertain." (12)

Had they no suspicion, when they wrote that passage, that Isidore's Papal Decretals might be forged? Was it possible that during 16 years spent in examining these canons, and comparing them with the monstrous and absurd forgeries which Isidore had concocted (and it is evident that they did compare them carefully), that no suspicion should ever have arisen in their minds?

They were in constant communication with Antonius Augustinus, Archbishop of Tarracon in Spain, the most learned man of his day, and from him they received a great part of their materials; and he certainly knew of grounds of suspicion, for he had observed that the Epistles of the early Popes did actually quote laws of the Roman emperors, which laws were not made for several hundred years after those popes lived! And he does not understand how this could be done!

But whether the correctors suspected the forgery or not, is of little consequence. If they did not, then we have proof how universally the forgeries were believed and accepted as the law of the Church: if they did suspect it, then we have proof that they did everything in their power to prevent others suspecting it; and that, notwithstanding their suspicions, they put forward the forged decretals in the Decretum, as things that no man, or no court of the Church of Rome, need hesitate to accept as genuine and true.

And the Decretum of Gratian, when thus corrected, was published by authority of a bull of Pope Gregory XIII., who had himself been one of the correctors before he was Pope.

That bull was dated, July 1, 1580, and in the beginning of it Pope Gregory gives, as the reason for correcting the Decretum, the duty of his office "to provide with all zeal and diligence for retaining all Christians in the true and Catholic faith, especially in these so grievous and calamitous times (the Reformation), and, therefore, that, in the first place, is to be attended to and provided for by us, that we may take away from all every occasion of wandering from it." (13)

To accomplish this purpose he sends forth the Decretum of Gratian, with all its forgeries, sustained with fresh credit, and greater approbation; and to provide for the enduring continuance of those forgeries, he inserts this enactment into the bull, "that it shall not be lawful to any one to add anything to this work, or to change or to alter anything, or to add any interpretation; but as it is now printed in this our city of Rome, let it always and for ever be preserved whole and unaltered." (14) And this bull is always printed in the front of the Roman edition of the Decretum of Gratian.

But it was too late for Pope and Cardinals to make these forgeries perpetual. A mighty power had arisen, and was rolling onward, destined to sweep before it, in the next half century, the frauds and forgeries of seven hundred years. The reformers began, not long after, to question and convict the forgeries, and one by one all the most learned men of the Church of Rome were driven to admit the barefaced imposture which, so short a time before, they had sought to bolster up. In 50 years more the victory of truth over falsehood was complete; yet, even when the great battle was thus lost and won, the more zealous champions of the Roman Church, Turrianus the Jesuit, and Binius the Archbishop, made a last desperate effort to retrieve the day, and restore the reign of forgery in the Church. And Binius again ventured to defend the forged epistles of the Popes as being "consecrated by their own antiquity and the reverence of the whole world; filled with gravity, doctrine, and holiness; confirmed by the testimony and use of posterity of all ages; in style and discourse, written most agreeably to apostolic men; interpreting the holy Scripture according to that sense which holy mother Church has held and holds, which is to be bravely upheld to martyrdom in time of persecution by the example of our Saviour Christ; most usefully written for confuting the heresies of our times." (15)

The very arguments by which we now hear men attempting to defend the very things which those forgeries introduced and established!

But the time for ruling by forgery was gone by, and Labbe and Cossart, wiser Jesuits than he, thought it was madness to defend the forgeries any longer, in such a light of ecclesiastical knowledge.

The forgeries are not now the law of the Roman Church, by reason of their being in the Decretum of Gratian, since the forgery is confessed. But they stand there still, as a monument to remind us that for 700 years the Roman Church maintained her doctrines by their help, and never abandoned them until Protestants had made it impossible to maintain them longer.

And now, in looking back on this awful delusion of the Church for so many ages, it does seem to us, that if Protestantism were ever so bad a thing, and if the Church of Rome had power to abolish it from the world with a breath, it might still be prudent for that infallible Church to keep a few Protestants still, just to preserve her from being for ever deceived through the presumption and the ignorance of her own infallibility.

But we have not done with forgeries, for we grieve to say that Roman Catholics have not done with them yet. The next Book in the canon law of the Church of Rome is, "The Decretals of Pope Gregory IX." It is a book of far higher legal authority with them than the Decretum of Gratian; for their latest canonist, Archbishop Devoti, says of it, and the other books that followed it, "Whatever, therefore, is contained in them makes law." (16) The reason is, because these books were actually drawn up and sanctioned by authority in the Church of Rome, which the Decretum was not.

Now, we might hardly think of looking for the forged Epistles of the early Popes in these Decretals of Pope Gregory IX., because that book was intended to be a collection of the later Decretals, Gratian having already embodied the former. Yet a few of the earlier have strayed into it; we have observed five; one attributed by mistake to Stephen, but really from the Epistle of Sixtus I. (17); 2. another from Stephen I. (18); 3. another from Stephen, II. (19); 4. another from Felix II. (20); 5. another from Felix I. (20). All five are from the forged Epistles, and this in the book of which the latest Roman Canonist says that everything in that book is law!

We have not, in our reading, seen it noticed that the forgeries are quoted in this Book of the Decretals of Gregory IX., and we call the attention of the learned to the fact.

But Roman Catholics are not yet clear of these forgeries. The Church of Rome still uses these forgeries to direct and govern the daily prayers of her priests and members. The Roman Breviary directs the daily prayers of the Church of Rome. The Council of Trent formally authorized Pope Pius IV. to correct that Breviary. He did correct it, and issued a bull commanding the use of it so corrected. In the service for April 26th, and in that for December 31st, what does the reader suppose we find? Why, the two lying stories which Pope Nicholas I. produced as being given by divine inspiration!—the forged Council of Marcellinus, and the forged Council of Sylvester!

These are not the only forgeries in the Roman Breviary—the daily prayers of the Roman Church. There are heaps of them, taken from the pontifical book, which had a very similar origin with the forged Decretals.

Roman Catholics, read the Roman Breviary, and think of these things.

Then turn to Clement, whom you call St. Peter's successor, and call to mind his striking words in his genuine Epistle, "Search into the Holy Scriptures, which are the true words of the Holy Ghost. Ye know that there is nothing wicked or forged written in them" (21).

(11) See the notes of the Correctors on Dist. xvi., c. 4 and 12; Dist. xxii., c. 2; Dist. i., c. 16.

(12) "Ut quisquam errare, atque incerta pro certis sequi, certa vero pro incertis suspecta habere post hac queat.

(13) . . . . ut omni studio diligentiaque omnes Christifideles his præsertim tam gravibus calamitosisque temporibus in recta et Catholica fide contineare curemus, ac propterea id in primis nobis agendum et providendum sit, ut omnem omnibus aberrandi ab ea occasionem subtrahamus.

(14) Ac ne cuiquam liceat eidem operi quicquam addere, vel immutare, aut inveriere, nullave interpretamenta adjungere, sed prout in hac nostra urbe Roma anno impressum fuit, semper et perpetuo integrum et incorruptum conservetur.

(15) Epistolas Decretales antiquitate sua et totius mundi reverentia consecratas, omni gravitate, doctrina et sanctitate refertas, testimonio et usu posteritatis omnium sæculorum confirmatas, stylo ac sermone Apostolicis viris convenientissimo exaratas, sacram Scripturam juxta eum sensum quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater ecclesia interpretantes, ad martyrium tempore persecutionis Christi Domini nostri exemplo fortiter sustinendum, ad hæreses sui temporis redarguendum altissime scriptas. . . . .—Labbe and Cossa, vol. i., p. 76.

(16) Quidquid igitur in iis comprehenditur, legem facit.—Jus Canon., vol. i., p. 379.

(17) Lib. v., Tit. 7, c. 1.

(18) Lib. v., Tit. 41, c. 7.

(19) Lib. v., Tit. 1, c. 1.

(20) Lib. v., Tit. 1, c. 2.

(21) Εγκρυπτετε εις τας γραφας τας αληθεις ρησεις πνευματος του αγιου· ιστιασθε ὁτι ουδεν αδικον ουδε παραπεποιημενον γεγραπται εν αυταις.—Labbe and Cossa, vol. i., p. 132, erratum.

THE OLD IRISH CLERGY.

NO. III.

THAT the principle of hereditary succession to ecclesiastical benefices was applied, in a very remarkable and exclusive way, to the Office of Successor of St. Patrick, at Armagh, from an early period in the tenth century to a corresponding period in the twelfth century—or, in other words, for about 200 years, counted from A.D. 926, or thereabouts, to A.D. 1129, or somewhat later—is not only a point admitted on all hands, but one also which has attracted much attention, and given rise to no small discussion. But that the same system was more or less acted on as a much earlier period, among the official personages connected with the Church in Armagh—that it was in operation there, in fact, from the very first foundation of the place, and among the highest dignitaries who flourished in it, appears to be indicated by evidence in the Annals not much less palpable or certain than what applies to the later history of the same church, although this evidence in the former case has attracted little or no observation.

Let us look at each case by itself, taking them in chronological order. Out of the names connected with Armagh during the first period, i. e.—the one ending at A.D. 927—the following selected catalogue appears to include all such as are most worthy of notice in illustration of the subject before us:—

A.D. 525. Ailill, Bishop of Armagh, of the tribe of Hy-Brasil, died.

A.D. 535. Oilill, Bishop of Armagh, who was likewise of the tribe of Hy-Brasil, died.

[The Hy-Brasil territory, Dr. O'Donovan considers (Note, A.D. 525.) to have been co-extensive with the present barony of O'Neilland East, Co. Armagh, on the south of Lough Neagh, where the Banu enters that lake.]

A.D. 557. Phelimy Finn, Abbot of Armagh, died.

[Ware says that he was born in the territory of Hy-Nellan, or O'Neilland.]

A.D. 587. St. Caorlan, Bishop of Armagh, died; ["born in a territory called Hy-Niellan,"—i.e.—O'Neilland. Ware.]

A.D. 606. Hugh, son of Colga, Chief of Oriel and of all the Oriors, died on his pilgrimage, at Clonmacnoise, [i.e., resigned his crown, to end his days in religious retirement. So saith Colgan, AA. SS., p. 732.]

A.D. 620. Ronan, son of Toole, lord of the Oriors, died.

[The Oriors, as Dr. O'Donovan observes (Note A.D. 606), were in the eastern part of the ancient Oriel, and co-extensive with the present baronies of Orior, Co. Armagh.]

A.D. 660. St. Tomene, son of Ronan, Bishop of Armagh, died.

[He was, according to Ware, "a man of noble birth," being son, probably, to the lord Ronan, mentioned at A.D. 620, or else to another Ronan, lord also of the Oriors, but son to the Hugh mentioned at A.D. 606. This Ronan, son of Hugh, is not mentioned by the Four Masters, but is by Adamnan, in his life of S. Columba, Book 1, Chap. 43. The name Ronan is not very common in the Annals, and the only one specially identified in them, in connection with the north of Ireland, in the sixth century, or the seventh, is the Ronan whose name occurs at A.D. 620, whose territory being in the present Co. Armagh, it is very probable that he was the father of the last-named prelate.]

A.D. 704. Flann Feola, son of Scanlan, Abbot of Armagh, died.

[He was, according to Harris's Ware, of the race of Colla-da-chrioch, brother to Colla Uais, monarch of Ireland, A.D. 327; and Brasal, head of the Hy-Brasil family, was great grandson of the same Colla-da-chrioch.]

A.D. 729. Sweeney, son of Cronnmael, son of Ronan, Bishop of Armagh, died June 21st. He was of the Hy-Niallain tribe.

[He seems plainly to have been a nephew of Tomene, or Thomian, above named at A.D. 660. Of his family Dr. O'Donovan remarks here:—"This tribe, who furnished so many archbishops to the See of Armagh, were seated in the present baronies of O'Neilland, County Armagh."]

A.D. 757. Kelepedair, Abbot of Armagh, died. He was of the Hy-Brasil tribe.

A.D. 771. Fardaery, Abbot of Armagh, son to Sweeney, son of Ronan, son of Cruanmael, died.

[He was evidently a near relative to Tomian, A.D. 660, and Sweeney, A.D. 729. His grandfather, Ronan, may, perhaps, have been brother to the latter. Dr. O'Donovan remarks of him, that he is set down as Archbishop of Armagh, in the catalogue in the Psalter of Cashel, and that he succeeded in 758. Generally, it may be remarked, that the persons called Abbots of Armagh, in the Annals, are considered to have been the same with the Primates of Ireland, although there is much reason to doubt the accuracy of the prevalent views entertained on the subject.]

A.D. 779. Kearney, son of Sweeney, Prior of Armagh, died.

[He appears to have been son to Bishop Sweeney, A.D. 729. In the Annals of Ulster, at A.D. 783, he is called equonimus, (i. e., for œconomus, 'house steward') of Armagh.]

A.D. 791. Hoey, son of Kearney, œconomus of Armagh, died.

A.D. 792. Dudalche, son of Sionach, Abbot of Armagh, died.

A.D. 806. Conway, son of Dudalche, Abbot of Armagh, died suddenly.

A.D. 807. Torbach, son of Gorman, Scribe, Lector, and Abbot of Armagh, died.

[He was son to Gorman, Abbot of Louth, and father to Egan, Abbot of Louth, according to what we have seen already, in the first of these papers on the subject under investigation.]

A.D. 808. Toichea Ua Tierney, of Tir-Imclair, Abbot of Armagh, died.

A.D. 812. Cumusgach, son of Kearney, Economus of Armagh, died.

A.D. 825. [The Four Masters record at length, under this year, how Cumuscach, son of Cahal, Lord of Oriel, deposed Owen Monaistreach from the primacy, to put in his own maternal half-brother, Artri: whereupon Owen appealed to Niall Caille, supreme King of Ireland, to defend his rights; which Niall accordingly did, with bloody slaughter of the Oriel men, among whom fell Cumasgach also; and Owen, regaining the primacy, held it for nine years after, with the aid of the secular power—i. e., of his friend Niall: so little idea had the Irish in those days of appealing for the settlement of such a question to any foreign ecclesiastical tribunal.]

A.D. 829. Sweeney, son of Farney, Abbot of Armagh for the space of two months, died. [The Annals of Ulster call him Sweeney, son of Foranan. See at A.D. 834 below.]

A.D. 831. Rathyal, son of Sweeney, priest of Armagh, died.

A.D. 834. A change of Abbots at Armagh,—viz., Forannan of Rath-mic-Malais being substituted in the room of Dermot Ua Tierney.

A.D. 841. Murray, son of Kearney, Economus of Armagh, died.

A.D. 863. Kearney, son of Farney, prior of Armagh, died.

A.D. 867. Flann, son of Ferchair, Abbot of Lann Leire, and Œconomus of Armagh, died.

[His father Ferchair seems to have been, without doubt, the Abbot of Lann Leire, who died in A.D. 848.]

According to Keating, O'Conor, and others, the brothers known as the three Collas (sons of Hector Devlen, son of Carbery Liffeachair, supreme King of Ireland, A.D. 268) overran and conquered for themselves vast territories in Ulster, in A.D. 331 or 332, destroying withal the royal palace of Emania, or Eamhain Macha, now the Navan Fort, close by Armagh. Colla Dachrioch, one of the three, became ancestor of the MacMahons of Monaghan, the Maguires of Fermanagh, and the O'Hanlons and MacCanns of Armagh; and his great-grandson Brasal, as we have seen above, became progenitor of the Hy Brasil or Clann Brasil family, who were anciently settled in the present O'Neilland in that county. In this royal race appears to have been vested the chief power and interest connected with the prerogatives belonging to the Successor of St. Patrick, his office, and appointment, from the earliest period, for many successive ages. Thus may we understand the mode in which there came to be so many of those dignitaries from the district of O'Neilland, the family of Hy-Brasil, and the race of Colla Da-chrioch. And it would seem to have been nothing else than an opposition to this powerful influence, on the part of the Owen mentioned at A.D. 825, that involved him in that struggle, in defence of his claims as a member of a different family, which occasioned so much bloodshed and destruction as is noticed in connection with the history of that year. That family influence greatly affected, if it did not wholly regulate, the successive appointments to the primacy and other offices referred to in the above extracts, they certainly appear strongly to indicate. But the principle was not, perhaps, then, either so exclusively acted on, or so productive of abuses in other ways, as in the period which follows: and this may possibly have been one reason why the circumstance, as connected with the former period, has attracted so very little attention, while so much has been bestowed on its results as exhibited in the history of the latter.

Proceeding now to this latter portion of the subject, we find, in the corresponding part of the Annals, i. e., from an early part of the tenth to the middle of the 12th century, the following entries, bearing more or less on it:—

A.D. 925. St. Maelbride, son of Torman, successor of Patrick, &c., died at a good old age.

A.D. 936. Two successors of Patrick—viz. Joseph, scribe, bishop, and anchorite, the wisest of the Irish, and Maelpatrick, son of Maeltila, bishop and wise man, who had been Abbot for five months, died.

A.D. 946. Casey, son of Ailche, Bishop of Cinel-Owen, i. e., Tyrone, died.

A.D. 957. Casey, of Drumhorry, son of Dulgen, successor of Patrick, a bishop eminent among the Irish, died.

A.D. 965. A change of Abbots at Armagh—viz., Dudalche in the place of Murray of Slievegullion.

A.D. 966. Murray, son of Fergus, successor of Patrick, died. Casey, son of Murchadan, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 980. Conaing Ua Flannagain, vice-Erenach of Armagh, died.

A.D. 982. MURRAY, son of Murechan, prior of Armagh, died.

A.D. 983. Murray Ua Flannagain, lector of Armagh, died.

A.D. 985. A great riot in Armagh on the Sunday before Lammas, &c., in which was killed a son of Traynor,

A.D. 993. MURECHAN of Bodoney, successor of Patrick, made a visitation of Tyrone, &c.

A.D. 994. Clerken, son of Leren, priest of Armagh, died. Maelmury, son of Scanlan, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 998. Dudalche, son of Kellach, successor of Patrick and Columkille, died June 2nd.

A.D. 1001. Traynor, son of Kelchan, prior of Armagh, killed. A change of Abbots in Armagh—viz., Maelmury, son of Hoey, substituted in the room of Muregan of Bodoney.

A.D. 1003. HOEY Ua Flannagain, Erenach of the Strangers' Asylum in Armagh, and of Clonfeacle, and a sage of repute among the people of Ireland, died.

A.D. 1006. Arvey, son of Cosgry, Bishop and Scribe of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1010. Murray, son of Crechan, successor of Columkille, and lector of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1011. Scoly, son of Clerken, noble priest of Armagh, [died of an epidemic.]

A.D. 1015. Flannagan, son of Conaing, Vice Erenach of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1020. MAELMURRY, son of Hoey, successor of Patrick, head of the clergy of all the north-west of Europe, and Head of the Dignity of the Western World, &c., died, and AWLEY was appointed successor of Patrick by the laity and clergy.

A.D. 1022. Malachy the great [King of Ireland], &c., died at Cro-Inis, in Lough Ennell, in the 73rd year of his age, on Sunday, September 2nd, after earnest penitence for his transgressions and offences, after the receiving of the body and blood of Christ, and after having been anointed at the hands of Awley, successor of Patrick: for he, and the successor of Columkill [i. e., Abbot of Derry,] and the successor of Kiaran [i. e., Abbot of Clonmacnoise,] and most of the seniors of Ireland, were in attendance upon him, and sung masses and hymns, psalms and canticles, for the welfare of his soul.

A.D. 1032. MAELTILA, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1039. Murray, son of Flanagan, Vice Erenach of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1044. Niall Ua Kelehan, lord of Hy-Brasil, and his brother, i.e., Traynor, were blinded by the sons of Madden, through treachery and guile.

A.D. 1049. AWLEY, successor to Patrick, died; and DUDALEHE, son of MAELMURY, son of Hoey, succeeded to his place, from the office of Lector. And Hugh Ua Forrey succeeded to the Lectorship.

A.D. 1053. Dulgen, noble priest of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1056. Hugh Un Forrey, chief Lector and eminent Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1061. Conaing, Vice Erenach of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1063. Madden Ua Kelehan, prior of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1064. DUDALEHE, son of Maelmury, successor of Patrick, died, after choice penance; and MELISA, son to AWLEY, succeeded to the abbacy.

A.D. 1068. Colman Ua Crechan, lector of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1069. Flannagan, son of Hugh, Vice Erenach of Armagh, died after a well-spent life.

A.D. 1075. CUMUSGACH Ua Heron, abbot of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1077. Elva, wife to the Lord of the Oriors, and successor of Moninna [i.e., Abbess of Killeavy, near Newry], died.

[N.B.—She was, no doubt, sister to the Conaing mentioned at A.D. 1061, above, he being called in the Annals of Ulster 'Conaing,' son to Innavar, and she, in like manner, 'Elva, daughter to Innavar.' Dr. O'Donovan's remark on her is as follows:—"This is an instance of a married woman being successor of St. Moninne."]

A.D. 1089. Gilpatrick Ua Kelehan, vice-abbot—i. e., prior, of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1091. MELISA, successor of Patrick, died after penance, on December 20th; and DONALD, son of Awley, was immediately appointed in his stead.

[This Donald was brother to Melisa, both being sons of Primate Awley (A.D. 1049, and A.D. 1064, sup). A sister of theirs is thus noticed in the Annals of Ulster, at A.D. 1078:—"Dunesa, daughter to Awley, the successor of Patrick, and wife to the King of the Oriors, died." See the entry at A.D. 660, above, and the note there.]

A.D. 1096. Maelpatrick, son of Arvey, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1099. Kencorach Ua Boyle succeeded to the bishopric of Armagh, on Whit-sunday.

A.D. 1105. DONALD, son of Awley, exalted successor of Patrick, &c., died. . . . KELLACH, son to Hugh, son of Melisa, was appointed to the successorship of Patrick by the election of the men of Ireland, and took his orders on St. Adamnan's day.

[The death of Kellach's father, "Hugh, son of Melisa, successor of Patrick," is noticed in the Annals of Ulster, at A.D. 1095, but omitted by the Four Masters.]

A.D. 1106. Kencorach Ua Boyle, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1108. Hugh, son of DUDALEHE, one entitled to succeed to the office of successor of Patrick, and who was Vice Erenach of Armagh, died.

A.D. 1113. Flannagan, son to MELISA, entitled to become successor of St. Patrick, died after unction and choice penance.

A.D. 1129. KELLACH, successor of Patrick, &c., . . died. . . . MURTAGH, son of DONALD, was thereupon appointed to the successorship of Patrick.

A.D. 1132. MAELMOGUE Ua Morgair—[i. e., the famous St. Malachy,] sat in the successorship of Patrick, by desire of the clergy of Ireland. . . . . Maelbride, son of Dulgen, noble priest of Armagh, &c., died August 27, aged 80.

A.D. 1133. Conaing, son of DUDALEHE, Vice Erenach of Armagh, died. . . MURTOGH, successor of Patrick, made a visitation of Tyrone, &c.

A.D. 1134. Melmogue Ua Morgair made a visitation of Munster, &c. . . . MURTOGH, son of DONALD, son of AWLEY, successor of Patrick, died, after the victory of martyrdom and penance [i. e., died penitent and triumphant over all his earthly troubles]. NIALL, son of Hugh, was appointed to the successorship of Patrick. A change of abbots took place in Armagh, Maelmogue Ua Morgair being substituted for Niall, &c.

A.D. 1135. Flann Ua Shinney, warden of the Staff of Jesus [i. e., the Crosier of St. Patrick, supposed by the Irish to convey to the possessor a title to the primacy], died. Maelmogue Ua Morgair, successor of Patrick, bought the Staff of Jesus, &c.

A.D. 1136. Maelmogue Ua Morgair, successor of Patrick, visited Munster. A change of abbots took place in Armagh, Niall, son of Hugh, being substituted in place of Maelmogue. . . Maelmogue resigned the successorship of Patrick for the sake of God.

A.D. 1137. A change of abbots in Armagh—viz., the Erenach of Derry [Gelasius] in place of NIALL, son of Hugh.

A.D. 1139. NIALL, son to Hugh, son of MELISA, successor of Patrick for a time, died, after earnest penitence.

Among the prelates, whose names occur in the latter part of this list especially, the system of hereditary succession comes out in a very plain and striking light. Hoey, an Erenach of Armagh, who died in 1003, was father to Maelmury, primate in 1020, who, dying in this latter year, was immediately succeeded by Awley. After him comes, A.D., 1049, Dudaleibe, son to primate Maelmury aforesaid; next, A.D. 1064, Melisa, son to primate Awley. Then, A.D., 1091, Donald, another son to primate Awley. After him, A.D. 1105, Kellach, or Celsus, grandson to Melisa. Then, opposed by Malachy, but still acknowledged as primate in the Irish Annals, Murtogh, son to Primate Donald, A.D. 1120; and, after him again, A.D. 1134, Niall, son of Hugh, and brother to Primate Kellach.

How much longer this interesting family succession might have gone on inheriting the chief place of dignity in the Irish Church, according to their national system of Tanistry, had not such a course been interrupted by extraneous causes, it is impossible to say. But what was thought of the system when it began to attract attention abroad, and how it came to be altered, will appear in what is to follow.

(To be continued).

THE PARISH PRIEST AND HIS PARISHIONERS.

Times of controversy are often times of trouble and annoyance to the religious instructors of the people. We sometimes think that the Roman Catholic clergy of the present day must look back with a sigh of regret to the comparatively quiet and tranquil lives which their predecessors passed in this country eighty or one hundred years ago; or, still more, to that long period of repose, which lasted from the seventh to the fifteenth century, and to which ill-natured writers have given the name of "the dark ages." In those days, the clergy led an easy life; their peace was undisturbed, and their slumber was unbroken by the angry storms of controversy. There were but few books, and no newspapers or penny posts, in those days. What little learning there was, was altogether in the hands of the priests, just as it was in ancient times among the Egyptians; and the clergy could teach the people what they pleased, and how they pleased, without fear of reproof or contradiction. If they chose to tell their flocks that purgatory or extreme unction were taught by our blessed Lord, in the gospels, the people were sure to believe them; for but few of them, from the prince to the peasant, were able to read, and fewer still had a copy of the Bible in their possession. If a priest, in his sermon, were to quote the authority of St. Augustine, or St. Chrysostom, or any other of the ancient fathers, in proof of the Pope's infallibility, he might be absolutely certain that his assertion, whether true or false, would be implicitly believed; for there was no one to contradict him. In short, with regard to all matters relating to books or learning, the people were in the condition of blind men, who, if they wished to know anything at all, were obliged to see with the priest's eyes.

Now, however, the case is widely different. Knowledge is not confined to the priesthood; the schoolmaster is abroad; and mankind can no longer be kept in the leading-strings by which, in olden times, they were wont to be led. Men have learned to read, aye, and to think for themselves; and it is no wonder that religion, the most important of all concerns, should now begin to occupy much of their thoughts. Now-a-days, if a priest, in his sermon from the altar, quotes a passage from scripture (though it is commonly said that this is not a very usual occurrence), many of his hearers have their Douay bibles at home, and can quickly tell whether the priest be right or wrong. If he brings forward any argument from the fathers, for the authority of the church, the people need not take his word for it. They can read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, or they can go to some controversial sermon, or, in some other way they can contrive to learn both sides of the question; and those of them who are really in earnest, and anxious to be taught the truth, can lay their doubts before the priest, and ask him to remove their difficulties. From all that we can learn, however, the priests in general are not at all fond of this. They do not like to be asked questions, and no wonder; for the questions are often puzzling questions, and require a good deal of learning to answer; and the joint sagacity of the parish priest and the coadjutor are often unequal to the task, especially if they happen to have forgotten what they learned at Maynooth. And then, if by any chance they should happen to be drawn into an argument with a Protestant clergyman or layman, in the presence of any of their own flock, it is a very unpleasant thing for them to be beaten, (for such accidents will sometimes happen, even in the best regulated parishes), and to be then obliged to scold and to get angry. When people lose their temper, it is generally a sure sign that they are getting the worst of the argument. This happened not long ago to the parish priest of Ballymartyr, the day he preached his sermon about "the Rock of the Church." But, before I tell you the story, I had better explain, in the first place, how the matter came about.

Ballymartyr is thought by some persons to be the prettiest village in all Munster. It is many years since I have been there, and I do not know what changes the famine or the emigration may have made in it: but, when I knew it, it was quite a pleasure to walk or ride through it, from the contrast which it afforded to most Irish villages. It consisted chiefly of one long street of white-washed cottages, most of which were models of neatness. At one end there was a handsome nobleman's place, the road to which was bordered by a double row of tall old trees, whose long branches had interlaced, and, in summer time, proved an effectual screen against the burning rays of the sun. The old church stood on a little hill, overlooking one end of the village; and at the other, a large new chapel had recently been erected. Altogether, it would be hard to meet with a calmer or a prettier spot.

In olden times, the Protestant clergyman and the parish priest, Father O'Reilly, used to get on very peaceably together. The former, to his shame be it said, was a careless, lazy man, who did not look after his own flock, much less the Roman Catholics. He contented himself with going through the ordinary services in church, and allowed the priest, unchecked and unheeded, to carry off, from time to time, many members of his small congregation. This was chiefly done by the promotion of mixed marriages; when these took place, the children, almost as a matter of course, went to mass; and it is in this way, as every body knows, that so many persons in Ireland are now Roman Catholics, whose grandfathers or grandmothers were Protestants. In our own day, the Protestant clergymen do their duty better, and the children of mixed marriages are often taught and brought up as Protestants, which is the reason, I suppose, why Archbishop Cullen, in his last jubilee pastoral, has pronounced such a bitter condemnation of these marriages. Had that prohibition always been in force, Ireland would have been, for the most part, a Protestant country now.

However, the old clergyman at last died, and a new one, the Rev. Mr. Smith, came to Ballymartyr, in his stead. He was a hard-working, active man, up early and late, who knew every house, and almost every person in his parish, and had a kind word for everybody. He established a relief society, to distribute food and clothing to the poor; he got up schools, and provided the best masters for them; and, in short, he left nothing undone to promote the welfare of the people. The old churchyard, as I have said, was on a hill-side, overlooking the little village; and sometimes, when any person died, and the country people, as will often happen, came in crowds to his funeral, Mr. Smith would stand on a tumbstone, with his hat off, in such a position that the wind carried what he said, and would speak a word in season to them, about death and eternity, and their immortal souls, and would direct them to Jesus, the only Saviour of sinners. Emboldened by the kindly reception he met with on these occasions, and encouraged by the attention with which his remarks were received, he, at last, ventured to hold some evening lectures in his church, to discuss, in a friendly way, the principal points of controversy between the Churches of England and Rome. He is now gone to his rest, having been carried off by the famine fever, which he caught while carrying food to a starving Roman Catholic family; but his memory is still fondly cherished by the warm-hearted people among whom his life was spent.

Among the persons who used sometimes to go to these lectures, was a respectable farmer, named John Mahony. This man bore a high character among his neighbours for steadiness and good conduct. He lived in a neat cottage, at the far end of the row of trees before mentioned, and was looked upon, by Father O'Reilly, as one of the best members of his flock. He was never absent from his place at mass; his Easter dues were punctually paid, and his house was always one of the "stations" visited by the priest in his annual rounds. Some time, however, before the date of our story, one or two circumstances had occurred, which rather weakened Mahony's confidence in Father O'Reilly. One night, his wife Norah, whom he dearly loved, was taken dangerously ill—so much so, that she was not expected to live many hours. The distracted husband sent a messenger in all haste for the priest, to administer to her the last rites of the Church. The way was long, and the night wet and tempestuous, and Father O'Reilly, though not in general an indolent man, could not bring himself to leave his fireside, and persisted in saying, that the case was not so urgent as was supposed. To satisfy the importunity of the messenger, he gave him the vessel containing the holy oil,* and promised to be at the house early the next morning. When he arrived, however, Mrs. Mahony was dead.

The grief of John Mahony for the loss of his wife was much increased by the injury which he believed she had suffered from the absence of Father O'Reilly, and his vexation was augmented when the priest asked what seemed to him to be a very large sum as the price of the masses to be said for her soul. Father O'Reilly was not commonly a griping man; but the new chapel which I before mentioned had cost more money than he expected, and the balance must be made up some way or other. Mahony would have given all he possessed in the world if he thought it would save his departed wife a moment's pain; but somehow the priest's carelessness about extreme unction made him doubt whether the masses would really help her out of purgatory. Mr. Ferguson, a gentleman of considerable learning, who lived near Mahony, and used often talk with him on the road, once made a remark on the subject which caused a very deep impression. "There are two things," said Mr. Ferguson, "which I think, if I were a Roman Catholic, I should never like in the Pope, because they seem to me to argue a great want of good nature. The one is, that he can see his children wrangle so fiercely about the sense of Scripture, and yet will not give one the infallible meaning of every place that is controverted; and the other is, that he suffers so many souls to lie in purgatory when he may let them all forth if he please, which yet he will not do, unless money is paid him." Mahony's oldest little boy used to bring home his Douay Testament from school, and his father happened one day to take it up, and opened it at the place in the Acts (chapter viii. 20), where St. Peter said to Simon Magus, who offered him money—"Keep thy money to thyself to perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money." "Deliverance from purgatory," said Mahony to himself, when he read these words, "is surely the gift of God; and can the priests be the true followers of St. Peter if they refuse to say masses unless they are paid for them? Is it not too bad that the advantage which the rich have over the poor in this world should last even beyond the grave?"*

These feelings were shared by others in the parish besides John Mahony; but the circumstances above-mentioned caused them to take a stronger hold of his mind than of the rest. The doubts which he began to entertain of the truth of the Roman Catholic system were considerably strengthened by what he heard at one or two of Mr. Smith's lectures. He took more interest than he had hitherto done in the discussion of the points of difference between the two churches, and he used sometimes talk the matter over with one or two of his neighbours of an evening, after the work of the day was done. Father O'Reilly quickly discovered that several of his flock were beginning to think for themselves, and the discovery caused him no small alarm. He had denounced Mr. Smith's lectures from the altar; but the curiosity of the people had been excited, and although they stopped attending them for a time, after a little while they came as freely to the lectures as before. What was Father O'Reilly to do? After long deliberation, when he found that he could not silence Mr. Smith, he determined to try and meet him at his own weapons, by taking up the controversy himself. Accordingly notice was given in the parish that on the following Sunday, after last mass, Father O'Reilly would preach a sermon on the authority of the Church. Great interest was excited by this notice, and the chapel was crowded to excess.

Father O'Reilly took for his text the well-known passage of St. Matthew's Gospel (xvi. 18)—"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church." On these words he delivered a long and clever address to his flock; in the course of which he did not spare the Bible-readers, who were causing him so much trouble and uneasiness. "Protestants," said he, "are always talking about the Bible, and arguing out of the Bible; but why won't they listen to all that the Bible says? Did not our Blessed Lord declare, in words so plain that the children yonder can understand them, that St. Peter was to be the rock on which the holy Catholic Church was to be built?—'Thou art Peter,' said he. Now, Peter means a rock; and will any man tell me where this rock is to be found, except in our holy father the Pope and the Catholic Church? Stand out before me and the congregation, any of you that go sneaking along in the dark to listen to Parson Smith. 'Tis well seen that you are ashamed of what you're doing, leaving the Church in which you were born and bred, to follow a ranting Methodist like him. Stand out before me, and tell me, if any of you can, on what rock is Parson Smith's Church built? Can he claim any share in St. Peter, when, as everybody knows, the name of Protestant was never thought or heard of until the time of the turncoat, Luther, about three hundred years ago? You say you want to belong to Christ's Church; and how can you belong to it, if you leave the Church that is built on St. Peter, the rock and foundation-stone that Christ himself laid? And where would you look for St. Peter's Church, if not in the holy Church of Rome? The blessed St. Peter lived at Rome, and died at Rome. His bones are under the high-altar, where the Pope himself says Mass. The Catholic Church is not like your new-fangled Protestant sects—it is as old as St. Peter himself; it has existed from the very beginning of Christianity! it has grown and spread to the farthest corners of the world, and the gates of hell shall never prevail against it!"

This, and much more to the same purport, and sup-

* A similar occurrence happened, a short time since, in the West of Ireland. The survivor shortly after became a Protestant. The writer had an interesting conversation, about three summers ago, in Switzerland, with an intelligent Chamouni guide, which shows how sensitive Roman Catholics are to these instances of neglect. "There are seven priests," said he, "in Chamouni; sometimes they all go off together to the town of Serroz to amuse themselves; and if any person is sick, he may die during their absence. Now, the priests are always telling us that if we die without the rites of the Church, we shall be badly off in the next world, and yet they go away themselves, and expose us to this very danger. They must either be very hard-hearted men," he added, "or else they cannot believe what they tell us."

* If our friend Mahony's reading had extended to the history of the Council of Trent, he would have seen that some of the learned fathers of that body were quite of his way of thinking. They proposed to decree that the sacraments should be given for nothing, and that not only should the priest ask for nothing, but that he should accept of nothing. "Freely ye have received," said the Gospel (Matt. x. 8), "freely give." Their advice, however, was rejected by the rest. The great majority of the venerable men who composed the Council could not find it in their hearts to assent to such a liberal scheme, which would for ever dry up some of the richest sources of their wealth. Their feelings, in fact, seem to have corresponded pretty closely with those of the miser in "Old Mortality"—"I canna do it, Allie, I canna do it—I canna part with the siller." And so they left the old usages and abuses as they found them.—Vide Father Paul Sarpi, Hist. Conc. Trid. lib. ii. § 57.

ported by a good deal of learning, was delivered with great energy—for Father O'Reilly was terribly in earnest—and he ended by denouncing a heavy curse against any person who should venture to go near Mr. Smith for the future. The crowd of people dispersed: some praised Father O'Reilly up to the skies, for they had never heard him preach such a sermon before, and the unwonted display of learning had quite overcome them. "Isn't he the great preacher entirely!" said one to another. "What a power of larning he has in his head! Well, it is a fine thing, surely, to have a priest that knows all the ould writers, with the big, jaw-breaking names! No one ever heard the like of that from Parson Smith. Poor man! 'twould be long before he could preach such a sermon; he speaks so simple-like, that he's fit only for the children to listen to. Father O'Reilly would settle him at once."

John Mahony was, of course, in his place in chapel that morning, and was one of the most attentive listeners to the sermon. He was a good deal perplexed by Father O'Reilly's confident assertions, that all the old writers, from the earliest times, acknowledged St. Peter to be the rock of the Church. "If the only true Church," thought he, "is built on St. Peter, and if the Church of Rome is built on him, and the Pope is his successor, mustn't we be safe if we stay in that Church? Sure, all the learned people that lived long ago can't be wrong; and why should we give up the old Church, even though the priests are careless, griping men?" As he was walking slowly home, intent on these thoughts, he met Mr. Ferguson on the road. The latter had heard some rumours about the sermon, and was curious to know what Father O'Reilly had said. Mahony was glad of the opportunity of telling his doubts to a clever, sensible man, like Mr. Ferguson; and almost before this gentleman had time to put a few questions to him, Mahony began to relate the scene which took place in the chapel, as well as he could remember it. He was just in the middle of the sermon, when who should come up but Father O'Reilly himself, looking rather heated, after his morning's work. The parish priest was on pretty intimate terms with Mr. Ferguson, for he was naturally of a sociable turn; and besides, one of the near relatives of the latter was a wealthy Roman Catholic, at whose house they frequently met. The following conversation then took place:

Mr. Ferguson.—Good morning, Father O'Reilly, I hear you had a fine congregation at Mass to-day.

Father O'Reilly.—True for you, Mr. Ferguson, and glad would I have been to have seen you in the front of them all, by the side of your worthy uncle. Who knows but you may become a Catholic yet?

Mr. Ferguson.—My friend Mahony has been telling me a little of the sermon you preached; and there are one or two things that I would be glad to have cleared up, if you have time to listen to me now.

Father OReilly.—With all the pleasure in life.

Mr. Ferguson.—Is it not the case, Father O'Reilly, that every parish priest, when he gets his benefice, takes a solemn oath that he will never interpret Scripture, except according to the unanimous consent of the ancient Fathers?

Father O'Reilly.—It is the case; and this is the great advantage which the Catholic Church possesses over all the Protestant sects. A Protestant parson may turn and twist Scripture as he pleases, according to what he calls his private judgment; but we know that we must be right, when we follow the unanimous teaching of the great doctors of the Catholic Church.

Mr Ferguson.—Mahony tells me that you were proving in your sermon to-day, that St. Peter is the rock on which Christ said he would build his Church. Now, do all the Fathers agree in this interpretation of St. Matthew's words?

Father O'Reilly.—Certainly they do—that is, not exactly all; there may be one or two, perhaps, that differ a little; but they are not worth mentioning. Tertullian, Cyprian, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, and all the great divines of the Church, all teach that St. Peter was the rock.

Mr. Ferguson.—The reason I ask you the question is, that I was lately reading on this very subject; and I copied in my note-book some of the passages I met with, that seemed to deny that St. Peter was the rock. Perhaps, as you are fresh from your sermon, you might be able to explain them to me.

So saying, he pulled his note-book out of his pocket, and began to turn over the pages. Father O'Reilly began to feel a little uneasy. The fact was, that, notwithstanding his confident manner, his learning was by no means profound, and he was rather alarmed by the cool, quiet, determined way, in which Mr. Ferguson was going on. However, as Mahony was obviously listening with eager interest to the conversation, he felt that it would never do for him to shrink from the discussion. The conversation then proceeded as follows:—

Mr. Ferguson.—The learned writer, Origen, who lived about 200 years after Christ, in his explanation of this very text in St. Matthew, writes as follows*—"He is the Rock, whosoever is a disciple of Christ. If thou thinkest that the whole Church is built by God upon Peter alone, what wilt thou say of John the son of Thunder, and of each of the other apostles? Shall we dare to say that the gates of hell shall not prevail only against Peter? Or are the keys of the kingdom of heaven given only to Peter?"

Now, what do you say to this, Father O'Reilly?

Father OReilly.—Oh! every one knows that Origen was a heretic. Who would go to learn the doctrine of the Catholic Church from the like of such a fellow as that?

Mr. Ferguson.—Well, I am willing to admit that Origen, with all his learning, did hold some strange notions; yet, for all that, he seems here to speak good common sense. And though he was a heretic on some points, yet many of your own divines, Father O'Reilly, are very glad to praise him, and make much of him, because in two or three places, he talks like a man who had some glimmering notions about purgatory, (which was the chief subject, by the way, on which his opinions were condemned as erroneous by the ancient Church). But we will let Origen alone. Have you any fault to find with St. Augustine?

Father O'Reilly.—No; St. Augustine was a sound orthodox father, and he is one of the chief authorities I quoted in my sermon. Did you ever read what he says in one of his discourses (Serm. xv., de Sanctis) "The Lord called Peter the foundation of his Church; and, therefore, the Church deservedly venerates this foundation stone on which the lofty ecclesiastical edifice is built?"

Mr. Ferguson.—Yes; I know Cardinal Bellarmine quotes that passage; but if you had looked into the edition of St. Augustine's works, published by the learned Benedictine editors, they would have told you that this discourse was none of Augustine's. But I suppose you were misled by your Breviary which makes the very same mistake as Bellarmine.

Father O'Reilly.—Well, you cannot deny that he wrote the following words (Psalm. cont. par. Don.)—"Reckon up the priests who have sat in the seat of Peter. This is the rock which the gates of hell cannot conquer."

Mr. Ferguson.—Did you never read the Retractations of St. Augustine, Father O'Reilly?

Father O'Reilly.—No!

Mr. Ferguson.—For if you had, you would have seen that this eminent Father changed his mind upon the interpretation of this very text. "I wrote in a certain place," saith he, "of the Apostle Peter, that the Church was built upon him, as upon a rock;" but I know that afterwards I very frequently expounded our Lord's words—"Upon this rock I will build my Church"—as referring to Christ, whom Peter confessed, saying—"Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God." Of these two opinions, let the reader choose whichever is the most probable."* Now, did you give your congregation this liberty of choice, Father O'Reilly?

Father O'Reilly.—No! why should I? Cock them up with a choice indeed! What right have they to choose, when the Catholic Church has already settled the question?

Mr. Ferguson.—Well, you see St. Augustine, at any rate, thought that Christian people had a right to choose for themselves in this matter. But there is another passage in which he expresses his meaning yet more plainly, in his comment on the last chapter of St. John's Gospel (Tract cxxiv.), "The Lord said, 'upon this rock I will build my Church,' because Peter had said 'Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God.' Upon this rock, saith he, which thou hast confessed, will I build my Church. For the Rock was Christ, on which foundation even Peter himself was built. 'For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ' (1 Cor. iii. 11)."† There is no possibility of mistaking the meaning of these words: even a child could understand them. But I fear I am trying your patience, Father O'Reilly, so we will go on if you please to another orthodox writer. Did you quote St. Chrysostom as one of your authorities?

Father OReilly.—No; I do not think I did.

Mr. Ferguson.—Well, perhaps, you were right, for I fear any reference to St. Chrysostom would have rather spoiled your argument. In his comment on this text (Matt. xvi. 18.), he says—"Upon this rock I will build my Church—that is, on the faith of his confession (τουτεστι τη πιστει της ὁμολογιας.)‡ And again, in his homily on St. John (i. 49) "Christ saith, that he would build his Church on Peter's confession."§ And I could give you the names of a whole host of fathers—Hilary, Cyril of Alexandria, and many others‖ who agree with St. Chrysostom in his interpretation. One of them in particular, Theodoret, remarks very sensibly—"Our Lord permitted the first of the apostles, whose confession he fixed as a prop and foundation of the Church, to be shaken."¶ He seems to have thought that if Christ had fixed St. Peter's person as the foundation of his Church, instead of his confession, the Church would have been shaken when Peter so shamefully denied his Lord. Perrone, a distinguished controversial writer of your own Church, in giving an account of the opinions of the fathers on this text, reckons up seventeen as interpreting our Lord's words of St. Peter's person directly; while of those who interpret them as referring to Peter's confession of faith, there are no less than forty-four! So now, Father O'Reilly, what becomes of your "unanimous consent of the fathers," which you are sworn to follow in the interpretation of Scripture?

Father OReilly.—How can you expect me to mind all that the fathers have said? They may have been mistaken sometimes; and we are only bound to follow them, when the doctrine which they deliver agrees with that of the Catholic Church.

Mr. Ferguson.—What you have just said reminds me of a story I once heard about a lady who was excusing herself, to a friend, from the charge of having acted contrary to her husband's injunctions—"I promised," she said, "to obey my husband; and so I will, gladly, if he will only let me have my own way!" So, in like manner, you are willing enough to follow the fathers, on condition that they will only teach in accordance with what you believe to be the doctrines of the Catholic Church. But what you will say if I can produce you the authority of a Pope who contradicts what you said to-day in your sermon?

Father O'Reilly.—That is quite impossible! The Catholic Church has always taught the same doctrine, and always steadfastly maintained that the person of the blessed Apostle Peter was the rock on which it was founded.

Mr. Ferguson.—Perhaps you think so; but, nevertheless, Pope Gregory the Great thought differently. "Persist," saith he, "in the true faith, and establish and fix your life upon the rock of the Church—that is upon the confession of blessed Peter."*

Father O'Reilly.—I declare, Mr. Ferguson, you are enough to drive a man out of his senses! How can I tell that you havn't been quoting a pack of lies to me, taken out of some heretical book?

Mr. Ferguson.—Well, Father O'Reilly, I am quite ready to give you exact references to all my authorities when you are at leisure; and, as you are so hard to be persuaded, perhaps you would like to know that Pope Leo I. and Pope Felix III., and Pope Adrian I., and various other popes, all agreed, more or less, with Pope Gregory the Great; so that if the doctrine of the Church of Rome is not now what it was in their time, perhaps it has changed for the worse, that's all. But there is one question more which I would like to ask you before we part. Did you ever know that the Council of Trent declared that it was Peter's confession, and not Peter's person, which was the rock of the Church?

Father O'Reilly.—Do you mean to say, that you know the doctrine of the Council of Trent better than I do? Well, some people's impudence is surprising!

Mr. Ferguson.—Don't get angry, Father O'Reilly. Anger will never help a man a bit nearer to the truth. I was quite serious in what I said about the Council of Trent. In its third session, speaking of the Nicene Creed, it says, "Wherefore the Council has thought good that the symbol of faith, which the Holy Roman Church makes use of, as being that principle wherein all who profess the faith of Christ must necessarily agree, and that firm and only foundation against which the gates of hell shall never prevail, be expressed in the same words in which it is read in all the Churches."† Here you see that the Council of Trent declares, that the faith of the Church, as embodied in this creed, is the rock and foundation of the Church. Now, the Nicene Creed is fully and cordially believed by the United Church of England and Ireland, as well as by the Church of Rome; and, therefore, even by the showing of the Council of Trent, the members of the Church of England rest upon the one true foundation. But we do not need to rely upon the word of any man, or any set of men, in a matter of such vital importance. We are told in the Bible (1 Cor. iii. 11), "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." He is the "tried corner stone" (as he is called by St. Peter in his first Epistle), which was laid by God himself (1 Pet. ii. 6); and, if we build our hopes of salvation on him, we shall be safe for time and for eternity. Whatever be the exact meaning of the text in Matthew, whether the "Rock of the Church" be the confession of Peter, or Christ, whom he confessed, or Peter himself making this confession, one thing is clear from this, as well as other passages of Scripture, that Christ alone is the foundation on which a Christian ought to build. If we look away from Christ, and seek to rest the fabric of our hopes upon any fallible and contradictory interpretations of the fathers, or upon any branch of the visible Church, which is liable to error and corruption in the lapse of centuries, we may find out our mistake when it is too late"!

Father O'Reilly's patience had long been exhausted, and his temper was too much ruffled to allow him to reply, after the ill success of his previous efforts. He snatched the bridle from the hand of Mahony, who, all this time, had been leading his horse, and rode off without even the courtesy of bidding Mr. Ferguson good bye.

---

* We have thought it right to supply the references to Mr. Ferguson's quotations. The above passage is found in Origen, Tom. iii. p. 524-5. Paris, 1739.

* Op. S. Aug., vol. i., col. 32, Par. 1679. † Ib. vol. iii., col. 822.
‡ Op. S. Chrys., vol. viii., p. 615. Paris, 1838.
§ Ib. vol. viii, p. 138.
‖ Super hanc igitur confessionis petram ecclesiæ ædificatio est.—Hil. de Trin., vi. It would be tedious to cite all the passages ¶ Op. Theod. Ep. lxxvii.
 Vide Perrone, Præl. Theol. t., 911—"Prima classis complectitur eos patres qui verba Christi Matt. xvi. de Petri persona directe intellexerunt; tales sunt xvii. Secunda classis eos exhibet patres qui exponunt eadem Christa verba, Tu es Petrus, &c., de fidei confessione a Petro edita, quatuor nempe supra quadraginta."

* "In verâ fide persistite, et vitam vestram in petrâ ecclesiæ, hoc est, in confessione beati Petri apostolorum principis solidate." Op. Greg. M. Ep. iii., 33.

† Quare symbolum fidei, quo sancta Ecclesia Romana utitur, tanquam principium illud, in quo omnes qui fidem Christi profitentur necessario conveniant, ac fundamentum firmum ac unicum, contra quod portæ inferni nunquam prævalebunt (Matt. xvi.) totidem verbis, quibus in omnibus ecclesiis legitur exprimendum esse censet.—Decret. S.S., Conc. Trid. Sess. iii.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. XXII.

"Well, Jem, what's the talk about now?" said Pat.

"America letters, Pat," said Jem.

"Signs by, you got one, Jem," said Pat.

"'Deed then, I did, from my daughter, Biddy, that went out a year ago; and the good daughter she is, sending me two pounds to put wee duds on the childer, and she'll send more when she gets it," said Jem.

"Well, America is the fine place," said Pat, "sure its long till she would make that here."

"There's a deal that does well there, Pat," said Jem; "but, I doubt, there's a deal too that goes there, and wishes themselves home again."

"Well, I never heard tell of that, Jem," said Pat; "there's hardly an America letter I hear of but has money in it."

"Aye, Pat," said Jem, "sure enough the creatures write when there's money to send; but then there's a deal that never writes at all, and that's more like as if they had nothing, than as if they forgot them they left in Ireland."

"Well, that's true, I'm sure," said Pat, "for sure it's good for the heart to think how them that goes remembers them that is left; and I marked that often, that them that doesn't write or send money, is seldom heard of in the neighbours letters. But how comes it, Jem, that they wouldn't write?

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "I heard something of that, and I mind it well. A while back I was waiting for the railway at Glasson, and there was a nice old gentleman standing on the platform, talking to a man; and he was a gentleman to look at, for his face looked as if it had seen all weathers, and his long white hair, and his clear gray eyes, that looked as if they had seen all the world; and the life there was in that old man, you would wonder to see it in one so old. And it was about that he was talking, how it came that so many that went there out of Ireland didn't write home; it was about the years of the famine and the fever he was talking, how the creatures took out the fever with them in the ships; and there was an island in America that was turned into an hospital, and all the ships had to put the people there; and he was there in the island, and I'm thinking maybe he was taking care of them, and I hope he was, for he was a kindly-feeling gentleman; and I heard him tell how he seen ninety-six of them buried in the one grave. And to hear him speaking, and him striking his stick on the ground, you would think the dead was rising up again afore his face, and him speaking. And it just come into my mind then, it was no wonder there was so many that was never heard tell on more; for sure the old mothers and the sweethearts in Ireland might think long afore they would get word nor tidings of the poor boys and girls that was buried in that grave."

"Well, that's the sad story, Jem," said Pat, "but sure, I mind myself, when Johnny Davis, the whitesmith, went out, with his wife and the five children—and they all took the fever, and went to hospital—and maybe it was in that island; and when he got well, and found them all dead, he just took his passage by the next ship, and came home to the old forge, a lone and sorrowful man; and I mind well the words I heard him say—'I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty;' but I don't know were them words his own, or where did he get them."

"Well, I can tell you that, Pat," said Jem: "he got them words in the Book of Ruth, in the Bible, the beautifullest and feelingest story that ever was told; nothing could beat it; and I'm often thinking there's nothing can come across us but we'll find the right words for that in the Bible, if we only knew where to look for it; and that story of Ruth is worth your reading; it goes to the heart clean."

"Well, I'll look for that next, Jem," said Pat; "but sure when we do hear of them that goes to America, isn't it the blessed thing to hear how they think of them they left in Ireland, and how good they are to them, and how they think long of the old country and the old places. I mind now, when I went up to Meath, with some cattle, last spring, and I just called in to see Biddy Farrelly, that's my mother's brother's daughter, and she showed me a letter she got from Mary Brady, that's a cousin of her's; and Mary was gone out two years, and was doing well, and she said she wanted to get married; but there wasn't a Meath boy in all that country she was in, and she said she would never marry none but a Meath boy; so she just writes home to Biddy Farrelly (for she knew that Biddy had the good heart), and she tells her to look out for a Meath boy that's a good son, and didn't drink, and she sends home seven pound ten, to get him a new suit, and send him out to marry her. So Biddy had got a clean, decent boy, in Meath, and was just sending him out, in a new suit, to be married upon Mary Brady. And, now, doesn't it show how they think of the old place and them so far off?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "it does one good surely to know how they think of the old place; but there's one thing they learn to think of new. I hear there's a deal of them that goes out that takes to reading the Bible. Now, I mind the letters that old Ned Flanagan showed me that he got from his daughter. Well, in the first letter he got she told him she was in a good place and doing well; but one thing was breaking her heart, for there was no chapel, nor priest, nor Mass within thirty miles of her. So, says she, 'Father dear, won't you try and get a Mass or two said for me in Ireland, and I will send the money to pay for them when I get it.' Well, its little money old Ned had, and maybe he would have thought better to spend it on duds for the children that was almost naked; but anyway he hadn't it, and so he be to wait for the masses till he got the money; for you know, Pat, 'no money no Mass.' So the next letter comes a month after with two pounds in it to keep him and the children warm, and at the end of it, says she, 'Father, dear, there's no hurry about the Masses, and you needn't get them said till I write again.' Well, a month after there comes another letter, with more money, and, says she, 'Father, dear, you needn't mind the Masses now, for I'm took to reading the Bible, and I find that better nor Masses.' So, you see, the Masses were done without, Pat, after all."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "sure we needn't go past Father John's own sermon for that, when he read us Father Mullen's letter,* out of America, and preached against any of the people going to America any more; and told them they might as well turn Protestants at once, and sell their souls to the devil, and turn Bible-readers; and sure he made it out that there wasn't one in ten that kept to the Church of Rome there; but, sure enough, Jem, that didn't stop people going, for all that; and I'm thinking there's many a one goes, just for that same reason, because Father John told them there was plenty there to make it easy to do as they liked; and now I mind what a man told me that went to Liverpool to see his daughter off to America; there's a Protestant clergyman in Liverpool, and it's just his business to attend all the America ships that's going off; and there's a steamer that takes all the America ships down the river, pulling them with a rope; and the clergyman goes off with every ship, and comes back by the steamer; and he's reading the Bible, and talking, and praying with them as far as the steamer goes; and this man went down with his daughter, to come back with the steamer; and there was a priest, too, on board, but whether he was going to America with that ship, I did not hear; but the clergyman had them all reading the Bible, and talking to them; and the priest was looking mighty cross, at the end of the ship; and at last the priest comes for'ad, and, says he to all the people, "Is there any Catholics there?" says he. "Yes there is, severals, your reverence," says the people to him. "Well," says he, "I command all Catholics to go away out of this, and not to listen to this stuff any more;" well, with that the clergyman spoke up, and says he, "It's the Word of God himself that I am reading to you, my friends, and you are going to begin life again in the new world, and I want you to begin it new, with the word and the blessing of God;" and, with that, he asked them all to kneel down, and pray with him for that blessing; and man, woman, and child knelt down with him, and not one went away, barring the priest himself. Now, doesn't that show, that once they are out of Ireland, the people is free and willing, too, to listen to the Word of God?"

"But, Pat," said Jem, "if it's that way out of Ireland (and sure Father John himself let on that it is), why couldn't it be that way in Ireland too?"

"That's what I'm studying, Jem," said Pat, "and I don't see it plain yet; but sure that's worth the studying."

And if they see their way to that, it may help other men to see it too.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The great mass of communications with which we are favoured renders it impossible for us to insert everything we could desire as promptly as we could wish. At this moment several letters, actually in type, are necessarily omitted for want of room, in consequence of the great length of Mr. Rourke's letter.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

* We noticed this letter of the Rev. Mr. Mullen, R. C. Curate of Clonmellon, which was published in the Freeman's Journal, in our number for September, 1852. He calculates the numbers lost to the (R.) Catholic Church in America at 1,990,000, or, in round numbers, TWO MILLIONS.

NOTE.—It may interest our readers to know, that we ourselves saw the letters that Pat and Jem were speaking of; and we were present, too, when the old gentleman struck his stick on the ground, and told of the grave of the poor Irish emigrants. We hope that many of those who died, may have commenced their voyage with the prayers of that Liverpool clergyman.—EDITOR C. L.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1854.

THE value of our periodical appears to be every day more generally felt, and the most flattering letters have lately reached us from various parts of America, expressive of a wish that agents, for the sale of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, should be appointed there—a proposal which we think worthy of our serious consideration.

Teeming, however, as the public press does, with numerous ably-conducted religious periodicals, we think we should delude ourselves if we attributed the almost unexampled success of our paper merely or principally to any superior talent or learning on the part of its conductors; though we should not have had the presumption to attempt such a paper, if we had not endeavoured to secure the co-operation of those whose abilities and acquirements, in our opinion, best fitted them for such a task.

The true reasons of our popularity, we think, consist in the fairness and novelty of the plan we adopted, which had something in it suitable to the times in which we live, when earnest men, wearied with watching mere intellectual gladiators struggling for personal or party victory, can alone be satisfied by bona fide exertions to arrive at truth.

The plan we adopted from our very first number, and which we have honestly carried out to the best of our power ever since, was to allow perfect fair play to those who differ from us, without compromising our own opinions or principles; not like other journals driving our opponents to find the best means they could of meeting our arguments in other periodicals, which might not be accessible to the great majority of our readers, and which might never be seen by them, but fearlessly offering them our own pages, in order to afford them every facility to refute our arguments, and convince us of the correctness of their doctrines if they could. In short, we desired that either we should convince our Roman Catholic friends, or that they should convince us—not on the points on which the Roman Catholic Church and all the Reformed Churches which we think have any claim to be recognized as branches of the one great Catholic Church agree—viz., the three ancient creeds (the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian), but on the points in which they differ—viz., the twelve points contained in the comparatively new creed of Pope Pius IV., drawn up after the last sitting of the Council of Trent, in 1563.

Now, in order to produce conviction, neither party could hope to succeed without practising gentlemanly and Christian courtesy towards each other, and we rejoice to think how little acrimony is to be traced on either side in our pages. We give our correspondents full credit for the general tone of their communications, and think, the only subject for regret is, that they have grappled only with a few points, and have left untouched many of the most important subjects, which we have most elaborately dealt with.

To illustrate this by a few instances, we would ask why no attempt has ever been made in our pages to support the doctrines of Auricular Confession, Invocation of Saints, withholding the Eucharistic Cup from the laity, Indulgences, compulsory Celibacy of the clergy, the inspiration of the books called by us Apo-cryphal, the alleged superior accuracy of the Douay version of the Scriptures, and many others. Surely, our able Roman Catholic correspondents cannot think it right or charitable to let all we have said, from time to time, on those important subjects, pass without any answer. Whether their object be the conversion of Protestants to what their Church calls truth, or the protection of Roman Catholics from what the Church of Rome holds to be error, they cannot be altogether silent on such topics, unless they are willing to have them considered indefensible. It is in vain that they would support the credit of their Church, by writing, however ingeniously or ably, on a few points, if they shrink from the discussion of multitudes of others, which, if our arguments cannot be answered, or got over by countervailing and stronger arguments on the other side, must, in every fair and rational mind, subvert the whole system of infallibility, by proving that the Church of Rome has erred, and is unable to defend a variety of her own dogmas. If the decrees of the Council of Trent, which took twenty-five sessions (spread over eighteen long years) to arrive at, were based upon satisfactory reasons and arguments, and we know that much argument and discussion took place at that council during its most protracted sittings (whether it was free or fairly conducted is another matter), those reasons and arguments ought to be capable of being reproduced, and the experiment should be tried whether the best and most cogent of them might not possibly satisfy fair men still, without asking them to give up the use of their own reason, by servilely adopting the results of that of other men centuries ago.

We feel sure that if none of our highly-gifted and able correspondents will undertake the task, it is not for want of zeal or learning, but because they are not able to satisfy their own minds that the best arguments they can find in their ablest controversial writers will stand the test of a full and fair examination, such as we are accustomed to bestow on the subjects treated of in our pages. If we be wrong in this, we shall rejoice to find ourselves mistaken.

Again we say, our pages are open to every Roman Catholic bishop or priest in Great Britain or Ireland (and the more able and learned the better we shall be pleased) who will, in a spirit of candor and Christian love, come forward to support the dogmas of his Church by calm reasoning out of the Holy Scriptures, or the Primitive Fathers—and we can assure any such writer that he will be dealt with in an equally candid and friendly spirit, and that he will be treated with all the respect due to men earnestly desiring the propagation of what they sincerely believe to be true. We believe there are some able and high-minded men among the Roman Catholic priesthood, who would willingly see the Church of Rome reformed, if they could venture to express their real sentiments, without drawing down on themselves not only the anathema of their superiors, but the terrors of an ignorant rabble. Perhaps, the time will come, and that not very distant, when the reign of despotism and lawless intimidation may yield before the all-powerful influence of education and enlightened principles, and when priests and their flocks will co-operate cordially with one another, to promote the reign of peace, and mutual goodwill, and brotherly love, and when all will enjoy that true civil and religious liberty, which would leave every man free to worship God after the dictates of his own conscience, and when pains and penalties will no longer be the portion of those who venture to use the faculties which God has bestowed on them upon the most important and interesting of all subjects, involving in their consequences (whichever Church be true), the safety of millions, and, perhaps, among others, of their own immortal souls.

We shall unceasingly labour for a "consummation so devoutly to be wished", and, we trust, our friends and readers will do their part also, in so glorious a struggle.

PROPOSED REPRINT OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN—VOL. I.

Though, through the kindness of friends and correspondents, we have been enabled to complete sets of our first volume for a considerable number of new subscribers, the demand has so far exceeded the supply, that we have been reluctantly obliged to disappoint many of those who applied for them, though we have, at considerable expense, already reprinted several numbers. It is now proposed to reprint vol. i., if a sufficient number of copies should be ordered, within the next two months, to indemnify the publisher against heavy loss. Vol. ii., neatly bound and lettered, price 5s. 6d., can be had at once, and those desirous of having vol. i., also at the same price, are requested, without delay, to signify their wishes to the publisher, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Correspondence.

ON THE DEFECTS IN THE MASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the January number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, you inserted my remarks on the misrepresentation of the Doctrine of the Mass in the Talk of the Road, No. xix. I have to thank you for your fairness in so doing, and also for the candid manner in which you admit Mr. Burke's mistake, as to that defect in the mass, on which he founds his attack on the Catholic faith. In the course of your remarks you dwell upon another defect, which you state to be of such a nature as to render it impossible for the people to know whether a true sacrament is ever administered, and that, therefore, their faith is vain. In "Talk of the Road," No xx., the same line of reasoning is pursued, in language, I must observe, less courteous, and, therefore, less calculated to persuade, than yours. You conclude by calling on me to solve the difficulty. This friendly invitation I felt bound to accept, being persuaded that the truth can never suffer by fair and temperate discussion; I intended to appear in the February number, if you allowed me that privilege, but many engagements prevented me from preparing a letter for your paper in time. My silence, I find, has reassured Mr. Burke and his friends, for Jem says to Pat, in "Talk of the Road," No. xxi., Mr. Burke is right this time, anyway." You must allow me, sir, to make some extracts from your remarks in order to state the difficulty which you require me to solve. "Suppose," you say, "that the wine was not made of grapes (de vite), or suppose the wine had been made of sour or unripe grapes (de uvis acerbis seu non maturis expressum), is the sacrament made in that case?" And, again, "what knowledge have the people whether the wine was made of grapes that were ripe or unripe, &c.; they must trust to the priest for that; can they be sure of his judgment? . . . . . And if the priest did taste the wine (i.e., before consecration) is every priest an infallible judge whether the grapes, from which the wine is made, were really ripe or not?" In all this you seem to put the selection of wine, of a certain flavour, or degree of sweetness, on the judgment of the priest, and that in case his judgment fails, the sacrament, according to the rubric, is not made. Allow me to tell you, sir, you are in error: The rubric requires no such judgment—no such discrimination, in order to the completion of the sacrament; for a convincing proof I need only refer to sec. 2, art. iv., de defectu vini, "Si vinum cœperit acescere vel corrumpi vel fuerit aliquantum acre, &c.—conficitur sacramentum, sed conficiens graviter peccat,' which, in English, is, "If the wine begin to be sour, or decomposed, or acid, &c., the sacrament is made, nevertheless, the priest who celebrates is guilty of a grievous sin"—of grievous sin in not making proper and decent preparation for the celebration of so august a mystery. The sum of the matter is this, there are two kinds of defects, as I have already pointed out; those, namely, which are capital, in consequence of which, if they exist "non conficitur sacramentum," and others which are defects in a lower sense, which do not hinder the sacrament, which ought not to occur in the celebration of such divine mysteries, and cannot occur without great sin and scandal. Few in number, and simple in character are those defects which may be called capital. In my last letter I quoted them in the words of the Rubric—viz., 1st, proper matter; 2nd, form, with intention; 3rd, priestly order. The question between us refers to the first of these, namely, "proper matter," which the rubric requires shall be wheaten bread, and wine made from grapes. In this the Catholic Church follows the institution of our blessed Lord, and does not feel itself at liberty, in any the least degree, to vary from that form of matter which He, on so holy an occasion, vouchsafed to consecrate. This is but reasonable, and cannot be objected to by Protestants of the Established Church; for I find, on consulting the order for administering the communion, in the Book of Common Prayer, that bread and wine is the matter directed to be used; and, with regard to the bread, that it shall be "the best and purest wheat bread that can conveniently be gotten." I think I am safe in saying, that if any minister of the Established Church, either through madness or impious design, substituted for bread and wine a piece of cheese and a bottle of vinegar, no one in the congregation would consent to receive the communion in such a manner administered, or would consider that the sacrament, even according to his view of a sacrament, was administered at all. I beg to state that I do not propose this case with the slightest wish to offend, but merely as an illustration of my case. And, now, with regard to the "sour, or unripe grapes," I wish to show that the design of the Church, in her rubric, is simply this—that the matter shall be wine, and not vinegar or any other liquor whatever. Let us read sec. 1. art. iv. "Si vinum sit factum penitus acetum, vel penitus putridum, vel de uvis acerbis seu non maturis expressum, vel ei admixtum tantum aquæ ut vinum sit corruptum, non conficitur sacramentum," which, in English, is—"If the wine has become perfect vinegar or perfectly putrid, or if it has been made of sour or unripe grapes, or if so much water has been mixed with it as that it has become decomposed, the sacrament is not made." I need hardly remind the educated reader of this letter, that by the process of "acetous fermentation," that which is wine to-day may, in a few weeks, become vinegar, which not only, in common parlance, but also in a scientific sense, is a totally different substance. Even to the unlearned understanding of Jem and Pat I think I can make this matter plain by a familiar household illustration. Mrs. Burke, suppose, wishes to prepare a few gallons of vinegar, for pickling; she dissolves a stone of sugar in ten gallons of water, adds a little barm, and lets the vessel stand in a warm place. In the course of some weeks that which was sugar becomes, by a strange chemical process, very good vinegar, a substance of a perfectly different nature, quite unfit to use for those purposes for which sugar is required, and vice versa. To complete this case, I shall have to treat my readers to a little more science. Wine is the fermented juice of the grape, the fermentation being arrested in that stage called vinous or alcoholic. If the fermentation proceed farther—i.e., into the stage called acetous, the substance becomes vinegar, and, accordingly, in the manufacture of wine, it is absolutely necessary that the grapes from which the wine is expressed shall be perfectly ripe, if otherwise, the product will be vinegar, not wine. To fortify this statement I shall quote a very respectable authority—viz., Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures—Article, Wine—"It is known," he says, "that a few green grapes are capable of spoiling a whole cask of wine, and, therefore, they are always allowed to become completely ripe, and even sometimes to undergo a species of slight fermentation before being plucked, which completes the development of the saccharine principle." The first paragraph, therefore, in article iv., amounts to this, that vinegar must not be used; that if anybody should so far dare to pervert our blessed Lord's institution, "non conficitur sacramentum." The next paragraph is exegetical, and leaves no doubt of this. Wine somewhat acid or somewhat decomposed, may be used without detriment to the sacrament, but certainly not without sin to the priest, who is bound by reason and sacred obligation not to engage in such divine mysteries without due preparation. The Church is as anxious, by strict and well-defined terms, to guard against heretical practices as against heretical doctrines; nor should this anxiety be wondered at when we reflect on the profane extravagances of some of the ancient heretics. The Encratites or Hydroparastatæ, because they thought it sinful to drink wine, consecrated water, the Artotyritæ offered bread and cheese. Some, animated, as the decree of the ancient council well expresses it, by a schismatical ambition, offered milk, others honey and water, some substituted pulse for bread, others pressed juice from grapes into the chalice at the time of celebration. Nor have these profanities ceased in modern times, as there is a well authenticated case of a sect of tectotallers in the United States, who, for the same reason as the ancient Encratites, have rejected the use of wine in their so-called communion, and have substituted—what? Let the reader guess. Raspberry vinegar and water. I do not know what Mr. Burke will say to this; but of this I am sure that no sensible and candid member of the Established Church can blame our rubric for requiring that the matter shall be wheat bread and grape wine; and that, for decency's sake, and the respect justly due to so divine a mystery, the best and purest quality of each "that can conveniently be gotten" shall be procured.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

A CATHOLIC.

P.S.—In the course of your remarks, you hastily put forward as a matter of fact that which you think is probable, "how is the wine provided for mass in the workhouses," you say, "we believe it is generally paid for out of the rates, and purchased by the master's boy in the next shop, in a country town." Allow me to tell you that this is not the fact.

We have again to express our gratification at the very dispassionate and candid manner in which our correspondent writes, creditable alike to himself, and to our paper, which serves as a vehicle for such letters.

We have shown our own readiness to correct an error. Our correspondent will also bear with us while we keep our argument to the point.

We have not complained of the Church of Rome for taking due care that the sacrament of Christ should be celebrated according to Christ's own institution—that is, with real bread and wine. We never objected to any care that can be taken for securing this. On the contrary, our great objection to the Church of Rome is where she presumes to change what Christ appointed, as when she denies to almost all communicants that cup of which Christ said—"Drink ye all of it."

The point in question is this—when a Roman Catholic attends a mass, and bows down and worships the bread and wine, taking that bread and wine to be CHRIST HIMSELF, can he be sure (even supposing transubstantiation to be possible at all) that it has really taken place at that mass?

If he cannot be infallibly certain of it, there must be something wrong in the doctrine of the Church of Rome; for it is not credible that God should require us to worship something as God, without giving us the means of knowing certainly whether the thing which we worship is really God or not.

We pointed to the rubric of the mass, which expressly says, that if the wine be made "of grapes not ripe, the sacrament is not made." In that case the people are clearly worshipping mere bread and wine, and if they have no certainty that the grapes were ripe, their worship cannot be an act of faith, even if transubstantiation be true.

Our correspondent does not tell us how the people can be certain that the grapes were ripe. He only says that the meaning of it is that wine is to be used, and not vinegar; but that is not the meaning of the words "made of ripe grapes." There are other words expressing that the wine is not to be used after being turned into vinegar; but these words which we quoted and argued from, say that the wine must be made of ripe grapes. Our correspondent argues as if all wine made from grapes not fully ripe (maturis) would be vinegar and not wine. This is not the case. A few green grapes may spoil the flavour of a cask of wine, but do not turn it into vinegar, or make it cease to be wine. If our correspondent were to travel in the north of France or Switzerland, and taste the wine at the roadside inns, he would find abundant proof that wine may be made from unripe grapes and yet be wine still, and not vinegar.* And the rubric of the mass says that if such wine be used the sacrament is not made, and then, of course, the people are worshipping nothing but mere bread and wine, and that with the worship which is due to the true God!

And now, again, we ask our correspondent, when he goes to any mass, what certainty has he that the wine then in the cup was really made of ripe grapes? If he can have no certainty of this, how can he be certain that transubstantiation has taken place? How he can be certain that the bread and wine at that mass has really been turned into the body and blood of Christ? and if he be not certain of this, how can he fall down and worship it?

But we put another question to him also. The wine must be made de vite, of the vine. Now, it is notorious that a large proportion of what is sold in this country as wine was never made de vite, of the vine, and the imitation is often so perfect that a good judge of wine may be deceived by it; perhaps not one priest in twenty would be capable of detecting the difference. Our correspondent must admit that if such wine did get into the cup, no sacrament would be made, there would be no transubstantiation, nothing to worship but mere bread and wine. When our correspondent goes to mass what certainty has he that such wine has not got into the cup? If he can have no certainty about this, what certainty can he have that the bread and wine is really turned into the body and blood of the Lord? What certainty can he have that he is worshipping Christ, and not mere bread and wine.

We asked him this question, too, as well as about the ripe grapes; and now we beg to point out to him that he has not said one word in answer to this. We ask him to seek for truth with courage equal to his moderation and candour, and to try what answer he can give to this.

We will then be willing, if he wish to pursue the search for truth, to examine the doubts that must arise from the doctrine of the Church of Rome about "the intention of the priest."

---

* That wine may be, and is often made from unripe grapes, even in England, might be proved by many authorities; let the following extract suffice, from "Accums Art of Making Wine from Native Fruits." London, 1820. Page 70—"As no bad flavour is communicated by the husk, or even by the stems of the grape, this fruit may be safely taken in any stage of ripeness in which it can be most conveniently obtained. Unripe grapes may be obtained where the vine is largely cultivated, from the thinning usually practised on the branches in this country, where the vines are under cover. Dr. Macculloch recommends to wait till the grapes show a tendency to ripen, or till the advance of the cold season shows that no further change can be expected."

ON INFALLIBILITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I beg to tender you my best thanks for your kind consideration in giving a place in your journal to my simple letter on the infallibility of the Church of Christ. May I request a continuance of your indulgence, whilst I bring forward a small portion of what remains "behind" on that interesting and all-important subject.

First, allow me to correct a mistake into which you fell, by supposing that the initials "P.B.," with which I marked the major part of my scriptural quotations, meant Protestant Bible. Now, they meant no such thing; it was "pure Bible" for which they stood. I am glad you say that the quotations thus marked are not from the authorised version.

I will begin by giving a passage from the Acts of the Apostles, which alone would be sufficient to establish the infallibility of the Church—viz., "For it hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay no farther burden upon you than these necessary things."—Acts xv., 28, P.B. The holy councils of the Church, lawfully kept for determination or clearing of doubts, or condemning of errors and heresies, or appeasing of schism and troubles, or reformation of life, and such like important matters, have ever the assistance of God's Spirit, and, therefore, cannot err in their sentences and determinations concerning the same, because the Holy Ghost cannot err, from whom (as you see here), jointly with the council, the resolution proceeds. We learn, also, that in the councils, especially (though otherwise and in other tribunals of the Church, it be also verified), Christ's promise is fulfilled, that the Holy Ghost should suggest to them, and teach them all truth, and that not in the Apostles' time only, but to the world's end. For so long shall councils, the Church, and her pastors, have this privilege of God's assistance, as there are either doubts to resolve, heretics to condemn, truths to be opened, evil men to be reformed, or schisms to be appeased.

"But when the Paraclete cometh, whom I will send you from the Father, the Spirit of Truth, who proceedeth from the Father, he shall give testimony of me; and you also shall give testimony, because you are with me from the beginning" John xv., 26, 27, P.B. "We learn by this passage that our Lord vouchsafes to join together the testimony of the Holy Ghost and of the Apostles; that we may see the testimony of truth jointly to consist in the Holy Ghost and in the prelates of the Church. "But when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will teach you all truth. For he shall not speak of himself, but what tidings soever he shall hear he shall speak; and the things that are to come he shall show you."—John xvi., 13. Ever note that the Holy Ghost in that he is promised to the Church, is called the Spirit of Truth, which Holy Spirit, for many other causes, is given to divers private men, and to all good men to sanctification; but to teach all truth, and preserve in truth, and from error, He is promised only to the Church, and chief governor, and general councils thereof; and this spirit is contrary to the spirit of error, heresy, and falsehood. Therefore, the Church is infallible, and, consequently, cannot fall into apostacy. "For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you."—Matt. x., 20, P.B. "As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord, my Spirit that is upon thee, and my words, which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, said the Lord, from henceforth and for ever. Arise! shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising," —Is. lix., 21, and lx., 1, 2, 3, Protestant Bible. These are passages, sir, every word of which sets forth, with perfect lucidity, the infallibility of our Lord's Church; and the whole is a plain and positive prediction that that infallibility was to be perpetual, and last to the end of the world. "He said, therefore, to them again: Peace be to you. As the Father hath sent me, I also send you; receive ye the Holy Ghost."—John xx., 21, 22. "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me."—Luke x., 16, P.B. Therefore, the Church is infallible; because to hear the bishops and prelates of Christ's Church, is to hear Christ himself; and to despise them, is to despise him.

"Remember your prelates, who have spoken the word of God to you; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation."—Heb. xiii. 7. We are here warned to give great regard, in our belief, to the holy fathers, doctors, and glorious bishops gone before us in God's Church; not doubting but they, being our lawful pastors, had and taught the truth; of whom St. Augustine says —"That which they found in the Church, they held fast; that which they learned, they taught; that which they received of their Fathers, the same they delivered to their children." The faith and teaching, then, of the prelates of Christ's Church, who are the legitimate successors of the Apostles, must indisputably be infallible; otherwise the Holy Scriptures would never command us to hear them, and to follow their faith. Again—"Obey your prelates, and be subject to them. For they watch as being to render an account of your souls; that they may do this with joy, and not with grief. For this is not expedient for you."—Ibid., v. 17. "There is nothing more inculcated in the Holy Scriptures, than obedience of the lay people to the priests and prelates of God's Church in matters of faith, conscience, and religion. Whereof the Apostle giveth this reason, because they have the charge of men's souls, and must answer for them; which is an infinite pre-eminence and superiority, joined with burden, and requires marvellous submission and most obedient subjection from all that are under them and their government." It follows, of course, that their teaching is infallible. In the name of goodness, if they were fallible, would we be commanded to obey and be subject to them? "Sanctify them in truth," says our Lord.—John xvii., 17. "Christ prayeth that the Apostles, their successors, and all that shall be of their belief, may be sanctified in truth. Which is no desire that the Church may ever have the Spirit of Truth, and be free from error. Which prayer of Christ had not been heard if the Church might err." If anything, said God, be hard and doubtful, thou shalt come to the priest of the Levitical race, and thou shalt follow their sentence. The lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and the law thou shalt require of his mouth. Ask the law of the priest. See Dent. xvii., 8, &c. Much more must we refer all to our bishops and pastors whom God has placed in the government of his Church, with much larger privilege than ever he did the old priests over the synagogue.

"For no man ever hated his own flesh, but nourished and cherished it, as also Christ did the Church."—Eph. v., 29. "It is an unspeakable dignity of the Church, which the Apostle expresseth often elsewhere, but especially in this whole passage, to be that creature only for which Christ effectually suffered; to be washed and embrued with water and blood issuing out of his holy side; to be nourished with his own body; to be his members; to be so joined unto him as the body and members of the same flesh and substance to the head; to be loved and cherished by him, as wife by husband; yea, to be his own most dear spouse, taken and formed out of his own side on the cross, as Eve, our first father Adam's spouse was made of his rib. This incomparable excellency of the Church, so beloved by Christ, and so inseparably joined in marriage with him, proves to every man of common sense, that she is infallible—that is to say, can never err, can never be divorced from her dear Spouse for idolatry, heresy, or other abominations." This Church, sir, is the pillar of truth, the establishment of all truth; therefore, it cannot err. It has the Spirit of God to lead it into all truth, unto the world's end; therefore it cannot err. It is built upon a rock, hell-gates shall not prevail against it; therefore, it cannot err. Christ is in it till the end of the world; he has placed in it Apostles, doctors, pastors, and rulers, to the consummation and full perfection of the whole body, that in the meantime we be not carried about with every blast of doctrine; therefore it cannot err. He has prayed for it, that it be sanctified in truth, that the faith of the chief governor thereof fail not; it is his spouse, his body, his lot, kingdom, and inheritance, given him in this world. He loveth it as his own flesh, and it cannot be divorced or separated from him; therefore, it cannot err. The New Testament Scriptures, sacraments, and sacrifice cannot be changed, being the everlasting dowry of the Church, continued and never rightly made use of in any other Church but this, our Catholic Church; therefore, it cannot err. Lactantius says—"It is the Catholic Church only that keepeth the true faith and worship of God; this is the fountain of truth; this the house of God; this the temple of faith; whither if any man enter not, or from which if any man go out, he is a foreigner and a stranger from the hope of everlasting life and salvation." St. Cyprian says—"That the Church never departeth from that which she once hath known." St. Irenæus says, that—"The Apostles have laid up in the Church, as in a rich treasury, all truth." And that "she keepeth, with most sincere diligence, the Apostles' faith and preaching." It would be endless to recite all that the holy Fathers say of infallibility; all counting it a superlative, and most vicious, pernicious absurdity to affirm that the Church of Christ may err in faith and religion. Our Lord says to his Church—"How beautiful art thou, my love, how beautiful art thou. Thou art all fair, O my love, and there is not a spot in thee. Thy lips, my spouse, are as a dropping honeycomb; honey and milk are under thy tongue, and the smell of thy garments as the smell of frankincense. Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, and comely." "Who is she that cometh forth as the morning rising, fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army set in array? Who is this that cometh up from the desert, flowing with delights, leaning upon her beloved."—Canticles. Yes, the Church has Christ for her support, and leans upon his infallible promises that the gates of hell shall not prevail against her. After all these passages I have given from Holy Writ, which indubitably prove the infallibility of the Church of Christ, you cannot longer, without confusion, maintain that she is fallible. I defy you to show me one passage, one text, one word in the Sacred Volume which justifies the belief that the Church may err in matters of faith. I asserted that if the Church was fallible (that is, liable to err—to teach erroneous, antichristian, idolatrous doctrines), Christ could not love her. If that approaches blasphemy, I assert, reassert, iterate, and reiterate it. If she taught, or were capable of teaching such doctrines, she would cease to be the beloved spouse of Christ, and would be full of spots and wrinkles.

May I trespass on your space and courtesy a little more, for the purpose of answering your and Bedale's objections to infallibility. You assert, that "if the Church be perfect, she must always have a perfect head." To show, then, that she always had not a perfect head, you point to the immoralities of Alexander VI. But what do that Pope's moral imperfections make against the perfection and infallibility of the Church's teaching? I fearlessly answer that they make nothing. His criminal conduct only proves that Popes are subject to human frailties in common with the rest of mankind; and that no power or authority affords sufficient security against the corruption of human nature and the influence of the passions. St. Peter denied our Lord: but did his weakness prejudice the other Apostles? No. Neither do the crimes, moral or other, of individual Popes prejudice the perfection of the Church. Our Lord foresaw the shortcomings of some of them; what he says of the Pharisees and Jewish doctors may be said of them—"Saying, the Scribes and the Pharisees have sitten on the chair of Moses. All things, therefore, whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do; but according to their works do ye not, for they say and do not."—Matt. xxiii., 2, 3, P. B. St. Augustine, on this verse, says—"Did our Lord Jesus Christ, for the Pharisees, find any wrong to the chair wherein they sat? Did he not commend that chair of Moses, and, preserving the honour of the chair, reprove them? For he saith—'They sit upon the chair of Moses, that which they say do ye.' Neither for the Pharisees did our Lord command the chair of Moses to be forsaken, in which verily he figured his own, for he commanded the people to do that which they say, and not to do that which they do, and that the holiness of the chair be in no case forsaken, nor the unity of the flock divided, on account of the naughty pastors."

Although, in their capacity as men, the Popes have many times exhibited proofs of their weakness and corruption, yet, as heads of the Church, and in connection with the universal Church, they have, during these eighteen hundred years, taught one and the same Catholic doctrine. Liberius, of whom you spoke so much in your last number, in persecution, might yield; Marcellinus, through fear, might commit idolatry; Honorius might fall to heresy; and, more than this, some Judas might creep into the office; and yet, all without prejudice to the infallibility and perfection of the Church, or even to the office and seat, "in which," says St. Augustine, "our Lord hath set the doctrine of truth." So your first objection to infallibility, on being touched, ascends in subtile vapour.

I asserted that every work of God is perfect. You denied it, and fled like lightning, leaving your shadow behind, to the tomb of our primogenitor, whom you exhumed and planted against me, to sustain your blasphemous denial. But permit me to tell you that you gained nothing for your far-fetched argument, because Adam, in leaving the Garden of Eden, was as perfect a man in shape, form, and manly beauty as when he was created. His fall, then, did not deprive him of perfection. "Bedale" says, in your last number, that the works of God are not absolutely perfect. I beg to refer him and you, Mr. Editor, to the books of Job, Ecclesiastes, Psalms, and Ezechiel, where you will see that the works of God are declared to be perfect. I also beg leave to refer ye to the eighth verse of the sixth chapter of the Canticles, where your Lord says that his Church is perfect—"One is my dove, my perfect one is but one." If, after this, you persist in asserting that the Church of Christ is fallible, imperfect, I must only have a feeling of pity for your incredulity. God, also, calls his Church eminent. "Thus," saith the Lord God, "I myself will take of the marrow of the high cedar, and will set it. I will crop off a tender twig from the top of the branches thereof, and I will plant it on a mountain high and eminent."—Ezec. xvii., 22., P. B. What, I ask you, do all these titles—high, eminent, glorious, holy, spotless, beloved, fair, comely, beautiful, bright, perfect, &c.—which our Lord confers on the Church prove? I fearlessly maintain that they prove infallibility; and I may safely advance, and assert, without fear of being refuted, that none, not even one of these characteristic epithets could, justly, be applied to the Church, if she was fallible—that is, liable to lead the flock committed to her pastoral care from the rich, old pastures into new and sterile ones. I said that—"Without an infallible tribunal unity in faith is a thing impossible, and that unity is found, by experience, to exist nowhere but in the Roman Catholic Church." "Oh," you replied, "the Quakers are united." I emphatically deny it. Because each one, in that and every other sect, is allowed to interpret Scripture according to his private fancy; and will any rational man say that such unscriptural liberty is calculated to produce perfect unity? No; it is an absolute impossibility that anything but "individual unity" (hardly that) could be attained by such means. For instance, it is not long ago that two Protestants, of this town, had a very tart, acrimonious discussion on capital points of belief; one maintaining that such and such were the Scriptural doctrines, and the other as stoutly and as fearlessly maintaining that they were not.

> "So high at last the contest rose,
> From words, they almost came to blows."

And what threw your correspondent and the by-standers into almost breathless, convulsive laughter, was the fact that, a few moments before, when arguing against a Roman Catholic, these unpacific dialecticians declared that their thoughts and principles about religion and its mysteries were "exactly" alike. Such is the unity that exists in the sects of the Christian world. "Light is only required to make their differences appear." That is what you call the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Individual unity. This is very far from being the unity of the Spirit of Truth and concord, which resides in, and distinguishes the Church of Christ—the holy Catholic Church. We read of spirits of discord. I wish you joy of their agreement. Perfect, collective unity, I repeat, is nowhere found to exist but in the one Church. Our Lord, to secure this unity, has furnished his Church with an infallible guide, which will preserve it until time shall be no more. You assert that our Lord has given this guide no credentials; and you add, if you found in your Bible such a text as this—"Receive the Bishop of Rome as the interpreter of my will," you would believe in the infallibility of the Church over which he presides. But what is your "receive" to these texts of the Holy Bible—"Thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven."—Matt. xvi., 18, 19. "But I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not; and thou being once converted confirm thy brethren."—Luke xxii., 32. "And the names of the twelve Apostles are these—The first Simon, who is called Peter," &c.—Matt. x., 2. "Simon son of John, feed my lambs—Simon, son of John, feed my sheep."—John xxi. These are a few extracts from the credentials which our Lord has given to the Bishop of Rome and to the Church, of which he is the head, to which your "receive," &c., is not worthy to be compared. St. Bernard says—"Why did our Lord shed his blood? Truly to redeem those sheep, the care of which he committed both to Peter and also to his successors, the Bishops of Rome."

You will never be able with all your fine arguments, to disprove the infallibility of the Church of Christ, because the odds are too much against you. On one side there is the testimony of Scripture, tradition, the Fathers, and reason; against which are "set in array" only tinsel arguments, which are the glare of false philosophy and the offspring of sophistry.

I now "come to the bower," or wood, in which you placed a blind man, and I sat down to laugh at the facility and apparent pernicity with which you got him from thence to the town without a guide; thereby endeavouring to prove the existence of a conductor to be entirely unnecessary. You forgot, in the meantime, to inform your readers that there was a learned Ethiopian, whose sight was unimpaired, in that very wood, and being asked could he find his way out, replied—"How can I unless I am guided." The Bereans, too, were in this wood, endeavouring to find the true way, but could not until two authorised guides pointed out to them the right path, in which they walked, and found it led to the town. It is written in universal characters in that wood, that the true paths thereof are so difficult to be found, from which the volatile and those void of knowledge deviating, are led to destruction; thereby implying, unmistakably, the absolute necessity which exists for a guide.

It is also written in the wood, that the private pathfinder can never arrive at the true path, because he does not put himself in communication with the makers thereof.

If, as some of your corps say, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Austin, and many other ancient luminaries, went astray in that wood, how is it possible, I ask, that your "fear coach" could get to the town so easily as you say? I say that he could never get there, but would be tossed to and fro, torn, and eventually destroyed by his own pride and presumption in trusting his unstable judgment in opposition to the guides appointed to conduct him safely to the town. That is my answer to your humorous parable.

"Bedale" refers me to the Apocalyptic Churches, and particularly to the Church of Ephesus, for the purpose of showing that infallibility of teaching depended on conditions. Now, if he had read carefully the second chapter of the Apocalypse, from the first to the seventh verse, he would see that that particular branch of "Christ's Church," though fallen in charity, still preserved the true faith, and hated the deeds of the heretical Nicolaites, which our Lord says he also hated. He also refers me to the promises made to Moses and Aaron, notwithstanding which the latter fell into idolatry. But he signally failed to establish a parallel case between Aaron and the Church of Christ, to which our Lord promised the Spirit of Truth to remain with her for ever; and that the words which he had put in her mouth should not depart out of her mouth for ever. These promises were never given to Moses, Aaron, nor the old priesthood; consequently, if they fell, it would be superlatively preposterous to infer that the Church might fall. "Bedale" asserts that God's promises are conditional. I answer, that if this objection had any force, it would prove a great deal more than "Bedale" designs. For if the promises of Christ, which were addressed immediately to his Apostles, be only conditional, it follows that the Apostles had not an absolute promise of being always assisted by the Holy Ghost; which, in effect, would undermine all they either taught or wrote—that is, the whole New Testament.

He also says—"What can the Church of Rome plead more than Israel and Judah that infallibility should be hers?" I answer this question with St. Paul (Heb. viii., 6), that Christ "is the mediator of a better covenant, which is established upon better promises." It is very certain the the synagogue was never styled "the pillar and ground of truth;" nor had she a Divine assurance that "the gates of hell should never prevail against her." On the contrary, her fall in rejecting the Messias was positively foretold by the prophets; as that he should be a "stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to both houses of Israel," &c.—Isah. viii., 14. So that if the synagogue had ever any promise of infallibility, it was not to be perpetual. But of Christ's Church, the royal Psalmist says—"They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure throughout all generations."

"Bedale" with all his might endeavours to draw a parallel between Aaron and the Church of Rome, saying—"The people were weary of waiting upon God according to his own words, and desired something more tangible and exciting, and induced him, who should have restrained them, to join in their sin. Just so with the Church of Rome. The Scriptures were a sufficient guide, but the people liked not the spirituality of the simple faith; they required something more externally attractive, and their guides, seeing this disposition, did as Aaron had done, forget God, and reared up a golden idol in his place." Now, this is the grossest calumny I have yet seen. I publicly defy "Bedale" to bring forward the least proof to sustain his charge!!! He cannot, surely, be so unreasonable as to think that your readers will believe his mere, unsupported assertion. I challenge him to show me where or when the Church of Rome reared up the golden idol like Aaron. Did "just so!" It must be thinking about "Jim Crow" he was when penning that sentence. It is plain to be seen that he is on the wrong side when he could not answer my arguments without having recourse to calumny of the basest description.

The Church of Rome, sir, which is the one, holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church of our Lord Jesus Christ, whose faith is spoken of in the whole world, and her obedience published everywhere (St. Paul), did never and will never rear up "Bedale's" golden idol, but will ever be subject (Eph. v. 24) to her Divine founder, ever loved by him (v. 25), ever glorious, holy, and without blemish.—(v. 27.) She will be, until the termination of ages, as beautiful as the Aurora, as luminous as the noon-day sun, and as fair as the moon.

I am, Mr. Editor, your very humble servant,
Passage of Waterford. WILLIAM ROURKE.

P.S.—Were it not that I have already unpardonably trespassed on your space, I would undertake to answer the questions of Mr. O'Mara (who is, I may say, a cohabitant of mine), which appeared in your last. I will do so, however, on a future occasion.

In printing the above letter from Mr. Rourke, we must confess ourselves rather disappointed. From the ability and clearness displayed in his previous letter, we had expected, on the present occasion, some brief and cogent arguments in defence of the infallibility claimed by the Church of Rome. In his present declamatory and lengthy epistle, confident assertion and re-assertion, iteration and re-iteration, stand in the place of proof; and the small quantity of argument really contained in it, seems, to our plain understanding, well nigh lost in a misty cloud of words. Perhaps, however, Mr. Rourke is hardly to be blamed, if, having expended all his good arguments in his former letter, he had nothing better left than some long extracts from his common-place book.

We shall make no excuse for having supposed that Mr. Rourke used the letters "P. B.," in the same way as other writers of his Church. If Mr. Rourke deals in riddles, we do not; and we opine, that few of our readers, Roman Catholics or Protestants, would have guessed, unless Mr. Rourke had himself enlightened them, that the initials "P. B." were not meant to designate the Protestant Bible, but the Roman Catholic Douay version. We pass by the sneer with which Mr. Rourke terminates the passage, correcting and enlightening us in this particular. To follow Mr. Rourke through all the mazes of his dictatorial, rather than argumentative epistle, would far exceed the limits of our pages; but we think we need look for no better illustration of the manner in which some controversialists are wont to build an immense fabric upon a very small and insufficient Scriptural foundation than one or two of the examples with which the foregoing letter supplies us. Let us take, for instance, his first extract out of the 15th chapter of the Acts. It would, of course, be impossible to know the meaning of any passage of Scripture without referring to the passage, and looking at the context in which it stands. Our readers, then, on referring to the chapter of the Acts just mentioned, will find that the facts narrated in it are as follows:—Certain Jewish converts had come down from Jerusalem to Antioch, and informed the Christians of that city that they must be circumcised and keep the law of Moses. The people of Antioch, desirous to know whether this was really the case, sent up a deputation to the Church at Jerusalem to ask for their decision upon what was then a very important question. The apostles and elders met together at Jerusalem, and decided that the observance of the law of Moses, was not made obligatory upon Gentile, converts, either by the authority of the Holy Ghost or by the power which our Lord had left to his apostles to make regulations for the government of his Church. This is the plain meaning of the passage quoted by Mr. Rourke; and we now request our readers to turn back to his letter and see what a structure he has built upon this narrow foundation. Let them compare the two lines of what the Bible actually does say, with the seventeen lines which, according to Mr. Rourke, it ought to have said. For, undoubtedly if councils in every age were as certain of infallible guidance as the apostles were, it would have been but reasonable to expect to find in Scripture some such declaration and assurance of their infallibility as Mr. Rourke professes to have found in this 15th chapter of the Acts—with how much or how little reason our readers can now judge for themselves.

The next passage quoted by Mr. Rourke is an equally convincing illustration of his power of seeing deeper into the meaning of Scripture than his more matter-of-fact neighbours. Our readers will have the goodness to refer to the extracts from the 15th and 16th chapters of St. John's Gospel, which commence Mr. Rourke's fourth paragraph —"But when the Paraclete cometh, whom I will send unto you from the Father—the Spirit of Truth, who proceedeth from the Father—he shall give testimony of me; and you, also, shall give testimony, because you are with me from the beginning." "But when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will teach you all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but what tidings soever he shall hear, he shall speak, and the things that are to come he shall show you."

Now, listen to the meaning which Mr. Rourke has extracted out of these simple words. "To teach all truth, and preserve in truth, and from error, he is promised only to the Church, and chief governor (!) and general councils (!!) thereof; and this spirit is contrary to the spirit of error, heresy, and falsehood; therefore (!!!) the Church is infallible." If St. John had really intended, in the above passages, to give an assurance of the infallibility of the "chief governor," and "general councils" of the Church, we humbly venture to think he would have used a little plainer language, and not left us to the somewhat precarious guidance of Mr. Rourke's logical skill, in such an (if true) all-important matter.

We proceed to Mr. Rourke's next proof of infallibility, which he finds in Hebrews xiii. 7—"Remember your prelates, who have spoken the word of God to you; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation." Mr. Rourke here appears to maintain that it is the duty of Christian people, in all cases, as another of our correspondents (Philalethes) roundly asserts, when he calls it "an injunction without qualification, or limitation of place or time,"* to obey their prelates. If so, there can be but little doubt what the duty of the people of Ireland was at the period of the Reformation. At that time the great majority of the prelates embraced the reformed faith, and their successors, the Protestant bishops, are now, unquestionably, the prelates whom the Roman Catholics of the present day ought to obey. "No, certainly not," says Mr. Rourke. And why? we may beg leave to ask him. "Because," he would reply, "the Protestant prelates are not in communion with the See of Rome." But then, we may venture to suggest, does St. Paul say a single word about the See of Rome in the passage quoted above? And yet some such reference to the See of Rome is absolutely necessary, to enable Mr. Rourke to defend the position which he has taken up.

In charity to our readers, we must excuse ourselves from going over texts and arguments which have already been sufficiently discussed in our paper before, merely referring them to some of the pages where our articles are to be found.† They have had a sample of Mr. Rourke's power of finding new meanings in what appears to ordinary persons to be plain and simple passages of Scripture; and we could have found it quite as easy to adduce specimens of these far-fetched, if not impossible, interpretations in those parts of his letter on which we forbear to comment. We had asked, for instance, that he should produce any one single text which attributes an infallible authority to the Bishop of Rome; and he thinks that he has satisfactorily done this by citing one or two passages which speak of the precedency of the Apostle Peter—e. g., Matt. x. 2 —"And the names of the twelve apostles are these, the first Simon, who is called Peter."

As to Mr. Rourke's other speculative arguments about the perfection of the Church, we can but repeat our former assertion, that there is not a text which appears to prove that the Church must possess perfect purity of doctrinal teaching, which would not also prove, by similar reasoning, that it should possess perfect purity of life and conduct. Mr. Rourke admits that the Church of Rome often possessed a very faulty head—as, for instance, Alexander VI.—but denies, at the same time, that it taught any faulty doctrine. We believe that the only ground for this distinction was this, that the one fact was too stubborn to be dealt with, whereas the other might be plausibly denied by a dexterous controversialist. And here, not to weary our readers, and exceed our space, we take our leave of Mr. Rourke for the present.

* See last number, page 26.

† See CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii., pages 82, 113, and 121.

FLOWERS FOR MARCH.

MARCH, with its many weathers, has, for once, come in like a lamb; it is to be hoped it may not go out like a lion. A few weeks have made a wondrous change in the length of the day and the face of nature. The feathered tribes have nigh recovered their mirthsome voices, and the air is glad with their song. As we go abroad, the honeysuckle meets us with its winding sprays, the chesnut tree is bursting its winter shield, and the wild flowers of the wood and field are around our feet.

The foremost among the wild flowers of the spring is the PRIMROSE (primula vulgaris), called the prime (first) rose of spring, from the early flowering in the field of this

"Offspring of a dark and sullen sire,
Whose modest form so delicately fine
Was nursed in whirling storms,
And cradled on the wilds."

The pale-eyed, peering, little primrose loves to dwell in woods, hedge-banks, and pastures, and to hide its beauties under the bramble shade. It has many varieties; white, lilac, crimson, double and single, all beautiful exceedingly. The cowslip, also, was ranked, by Linnæus, as belonging to the primrose family. Their lovely sister, the evening primrose, appears much later in the season. It is called the evening star of flowers, from its peculiarity of expanding after the vesper hour.

"In this glimmering earth-born star we read
The hope that, as its beauteous bloom
Expands to glad the close of day;
So, through the shadows of the tomb,
Shall breathe forth mercy's ray."

David had a foresight of this ray of mercy in the tomb. He said, boldly, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me (Psalm xxiii. 4). He is speaking of one whom he calls "the Lord, my Shepherd;" explained by our blessed Lord Jesus Christ himself, when he said, "I am the good shepherd" (John x. 14). Could we but realize that he is with the Christian pilgrim in his passage to that unknown bourne whence no traveller returns, and that his rod and his staff will be there to comfort and support him, the purgatory of the priests would have few terrors; masses for the dead, and prayers to saints and angels would never be thought of; and our people would apply themselves directly to the great High Priest, who has made one sacrifice and oblation of himself for their sins once and for ever, and now sits on the right hand of power to make intercession for them.

The primrose is generally found in company with the VIOLET (viola odorata). The name of the violet is said to be acquired from the strength of its perfume (violendi). The common violet (viola odorata), with its flowers of dark purple, is found in the woods and hedge-banks throughout the country. Between Killiney Hill and Bray they are abundant, and around Finglas. Another variety, the viola hirta, grows by the sea-side and on banks of sand, as at Portmarnock, and the coast near Dublin from Clontarf to Kilbarrick; it is also plentiful in the woods of Blarney, in the county Cork. The marsh violet (viola palustris) is met with in the marshy ground around Glenerce, and near the Waterfall of Powerscourt. Another of its species is called viola clandestina, from its habit of modest seclusion, hiding itself under its green, dark leaves, or under the grass, till betrayed by its sweet odour.

We need not say that the dark, blue violet has been ever a favourite with poet, peer, and peasant. Its colour was the great object of imitation among the ancient Romans—

. . . . . "Quid placet ergo?
Lana Tarentino violas imitata veneno."

Its perfume gave Shakspeare an illustration of the sweet sensations produced by music—

"It comes o'er me like the scent
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odour."

Another poet has sung of its modesty and meekness—

"When the spring comes with her host
Of flowers, the flower beloved the most Shrinks from the crowd that may confuse
Her heavenly odour and virgin hues.

It joys and cheers whene'er I see
Pain on earth's meek ones press,
To think the storm that rends the tree
Scathes not thy loveliness."

The mighty men shall be humbled, and the eyes of the lofty shall be humbled (Isaiah v. 15), yet the Lord forgetteth not the cry of the humble (Psalm xix. 12), but giveth grace and exalteth him (1 Peter v. 5; Matthew xviii. 4). Accordingly the Apostles exhort us to put on and be clothed with humility as with a daily garment.

Another field flower of March is the DAFFODIL (Narcissus pseudo Narcissus) the asphodèle of France. It is the Lent lily and daffydowndilly of the early English poets. It opens its yellow chaliced flower in the commencement of the month in the woods and meadows, and along the banks of streams; and though Mackay says, he had never seen the true daffodil in a wild state in Ireland, we believe that others have been more fortunate. The poet's Narcissus and the Jonquil, so well known for their fragrance and beauty, flower in May. They are wild flowers in England, but naturalized with us, and the poet's Narcissus now grows in the open field in the county Cork.

The daffodil is a very transitory visitor, it speedily concludes its growth, and hastens away.

The MEZEREON TREE (daphne mezereum) now also presents its pretty sweet-scented pink flowers, clustered round its bare stem—

"Though leafless, well attired, and thick beset
With blushing wreaths investing every spray."

It is a native of our own isles, though only first noticed when imported from abroad. When its leaves are some time gone, it produces its scarlet berries, contrasting with the light pale green of its leaves.

Another early blossoming shrub of our gardens is the ALMOND TREE (amygdalis communis), which just now appears clad with a deep roseate bloom like the peach blossom. Its flowers and perfume have caused it to be cultivated with us, though it is in this country incapable of ripening its fruits, which we know of only from the sweet and bitter almonds of Jordan and Smyrna. In Palestine, the almond tree is a conspicuous object in the spring, and its blossoms cover the face of the land. It is associated with many interesting events in Scripture history. When Jacob was separating his flocks from those of Laban, it was rods of the almond tree that he employed. Solomon introduces the almond tree in a very touching connection in Ecclesiastes xii. 1, when enforcing the exhortation—"Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth"—by presenting to the mind the sudden decline of human life and strength, under the emblem of "the flourishing of the almond tree," the buds of which, when full blown, and having accomplished their purpose, suddenly change from a deep rose colour to white, and then wither and fade away. "When the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail; because man goeth to his long home"—

"His locks were white as driftet snow,
(Or as the almond tree doth show)
When fully spread upon the leafless tree."

From much the same reason the almond tree is employed in another place (Jeremiah i. 2), to illustrate the promptitude of God's judgments, as it is there called "the hastening tree," from the suddenness with which it puts forth its blossoms, while its branches are yet bare and unclothed with foliage. So, again, in the controversy of Moses and Aaron with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, it was the blossoming of Aaron's rod of almond tree, yielding almonds, that determined his title to the priesthood. This blossoming is as good a text as ever appeared on the Romish controversy, as to the office and calling of the priesthood. It is sadly perverted in the note in the Douay Bible on Numbers xvi. 2, which says, "that the crime of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who rebelled respecting God's appointment as to the priestly office, was schism and rebellion against the authority of the Church, and pretending to the priesthood without being called to it, as is the case of all modern sectaries." The narrative itself will tell a different story to any of our friends who will read, in the Douay Version, the history of the transaction. Korah and his brethren were Levites, or ministering servants to the people in holy things, as are the pastors of the Christian Church now, set apart for the ministry of the Gospel; but not content with this, Korah and his fellows aspired to something more—to be sacrificing priests, and to fill the office of Aaron, the great type of Jesus Christ. This is exactly the position of the Romish priesthood, who, not content with the service of the tabernacle, and standing before the people to minister among them, must usurp the office of the priest (or sacrificing minister); whereas with us Christ our Passover is sacrificed.—1 Cor., v. 7. And Christ having appeared for the destruction of sin by the sacrifice of himself (Heb. ix. 26, Eph. v. 2), it has been done once and for ever. "For by one oblation he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14). "Nor yet that he should offer himself often as the high priest entereth into the holies every year with the blood of others."—(Heb. ix. 25.) This being so, the rebuke of Moses to Dathan would seem more fitting to the Romish priesthood than to the modern sectaries. "Is it a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath joined you to himself, that you should serve him in the service of the tabernacle, and should stand before the congregation of the people, and should minister unto him, that you should challenge to yourselves the priesthood also."—Numb. xvi. v. 9, 10.

We can scarcely close without saying a word about our national emblem the SHAMROCK (seamrag, trefoil in Gaelic). Mackay, in his Flora Hibernica, pronounces the shamrock, which Irishmen wear on St. Patrick's Day, to be the trifolium repens (Dutch clover of agriculture). It flowers in summer, and is to be found in our meadows and pastures in the spring. Its leaflets are accurately disposed in triplets; and the four-leaved shamrock is so rare that an old Irish superstition attaches to the finder of it the power of magic—

"I'll seek a four-leaved shamrock
In all the fairy dells;
And if I find the charmed leaves,
Oh, how I'll weave my spells."

Everybody knows wherefore St. Patrick is supposed to have adopted the shamrock as the national emblem of Ireland —namely, that being at a loss for an illustration of the Trinity, when preaching to the heathen Irish, he turned round and his eye rested on the shamrock. St. Patrick's teaching must have been very different, indeed, from that of Archbishop Cullen, one of whose latest pastorals adds another person to the Holy Trinity. Writing of the Blessed Virgin Mary, he says—"This tender mother destined to co-operate in the great work of our redemption will listen to the cry her children send forth from this valley of tears." St. Patrick taught his hearers that the work of redemption was planned by God the Father, performed by God the Son, and applied to the hearts of the Christian by God the Holy Ghost; but here we have a fourth co-operating power. Dr. Cullen has the gift of magic if he can educe from the Scriptures that which St. Patrick could not, that the Virgin Mary in any manner whatsoever co-operated in the redemption of mankind. Those who agree with Dr. Cullen should present him with the four-leaved shamrock on each anniversary of St. Patrick's Day.

New and Recent Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

BURKE'S PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE FOR 1854. Revised and corrected to the present time. Royal 8vo. 38s.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

RECORDS OF TRAVELS IN TURKEY, GREECE, &c.; and of a Cruise in the Black Sea with the Capitan Pacha. By Admiral Slade. 8vo. 14s.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAMPAIGN OF 1828-29; with a View of the present State of the Eastern Question. By Colonel Chesney. 12s.

HISTORY OF RUSSIA, from the Earliest Period to the Treaty of Tilsit, (1807). By Robert Bell, Esq. 3 vols., fcp. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE RUSSIANS OF THE SOUTH. By Shirley Brooke. 1s.

TURKEY AND CHRISTENDOM: An Historical Sketch of the Relations between the Ottoman Empire and the States of Europe. 1s.

THE SECRET HISTORY OF THE COURT AND GOVERNMENT OF RUSSIA, under the Emperor Alexander and the present Czar, Nicholas. By J. H. Schnitzler. 2 vols. 8vo. 16s.

TRAVELS IN SIBERIA. By S. S. Hill, Esq. With a large coloured Map of the Russian Empire. 2 vols. post 8vo. 24s.

PROGRESS OF RUSSIA IN THE WEST, NORTH, AND SOUTH. By David Urqhart. 1s. 6d.

WYLD'S MAP OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE, THE BLACK SEA, AND THE FRONTIERS OF RUSSIA AND PERSIA. Coloured, 2s. 6d.; mounted and in case, 4s. 6d.

WYLD'S CHART OF THE NORTH SEA AND THE BALTIC. 5s.

PHILIPS' MAP OF THE FRONTIER PROVINCES OF TURKEY, RUSSIA, AND AUSTRIA, THE BLACK SEA, &c., with a detailed Map of the River Danube, showing the Fortified Towns, &c., along its course. In case. 1s.

PHILIPS' CHART OF THE MEDITERRANEAN, with detailed Plans of the Bays of Gibraltar, Genoa, Marseilles, &c. 1s.

PHILIPS' CHART OF THE NORTH SEA AND THE BALTIC, with detailed Plans of Cronstadt, Revel, &c. 1s.

THE TURKS IN EUROPE: A Sketch of Manners and Politics in the Ottoman Empire. By Bayle St. John. 7s. 6d.

TURKEY AND THE TURKS. By Rev. Archibald Boyd. 6d.

THE TURKISH QUESTION:—The Czar and the Sultan—The Cossacks and the Turk—The Turks in Europe. 2s.

HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN HUNGARY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REFORMATION TO 1850, with reference also to Transylvania. With an Introduction by Dr. D'Aubigne. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"THE KINGS OF THE EAST:" An Exposition of the Prophecies, determining, from Scripture and from History, the Power for whom the mystical Euphrates is being "dried up." With an explanation of certain other Prophecies concerning the Restoration of Israel. 7s.

THE CROSS AND THE DRAGON; or, the Fortunes of Christianity in China, with Notices of the Secret Societies of the Chinese. By J. Kesson. Post 8vo. 6s.

WORK; or Plenty to Do, and How to Do it. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 12mo. 4s.

MY SCHOOLS AND MY SCHOOLMASTERS; or, the Story of my Education. By Hugh Miller. post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

PHYSIOLOGY IN HARMONY WITH THE BIBLE, Respecting the Value and Right Observance of the Sabbath. By James Miller, F.R.S.E. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

ROME AND THE GOSPEL. By the Rev. Dr. Morgan, Belfast. Fcp. 8vo. 2s.

RUSSIA UNDER THE AUTOCRAT, NICHOLAS I. By Ivan Golovine. 2 vols. 10s.

HISTORY OF OLIVER CROMWELL AND THE ENGLISH COMMONWEALTH, from the Execution of Charles I. to the Death of Oliver Cromwell. By M. Guizot. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.

THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANT REFUGEES, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Charles Weiss. 8vo. 14s.

A BATCH OF WAR BALLADS. By Martin F. Tupper. 6d.

ALGERIA: the Topography and History—Political, Social, and National—of Fremch, Africa. By J. Reynell Morell. 8vo. 6s.

LETTERS FROM SARAWAK, Addressed to a Child; being an accurate description of the Manners, Customs, and Religion of the inhabitants of Borneo, Malays, and Dyaks, and of the Progress of the Church Mission during the first five years; with Incidents of Missionary Life. By Mrs. M'Dougal. 3s. 6d.

THE NET IN THE BAY; or Journal of a Visit to Moose and Albany. By the Bishop of Rupert's Land. 4s. 6d.

THE GREAT SACRIFICE. By Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 5s.

THE COMFORTER. By Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

CHRIST OUR PASSOVER; or, Thoughts on the Atonement. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

THE TENT AND ALTAR: Sketches of Patriarchal Days. By Rev. Dr. Cumming. 9s.

DAILY BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS: The Apostles and Early Christian Church. By Dr. Kitto. 6s.

THE PSALMS RESTORED TO THE MESSIAH: A Commentary on the Book of Psalms. By Rev. R. H. Ryland. With a commendatory notice, by the Bishop of Cashel. 6s.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOUR ILLUSTRATIVE OF HIS DIVINE CHARACTER AND MISSION. By Rev. A. L. R. Foote. 6s.

THE WORDS OF JESUS. By the Author of the "Faithful Promiser." In Cover, 8d.; Cloth, 1s.

RELIGION IN HEART AND LIFE; or, the Fruits of the SPIRIT. By Rev. Frederick George Barton. 3s.

THE ROYAL PREACHER: an Exposition of Ecclesiastes. By Rev. James Hamilton, D.D. Cheap Edition 2s. 6d.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY: a Narrative for the Young, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. With an Introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

THE DAWN OF LIGHT; or, Scripture Truths for Infant Minds. 1s.

A PEEP INTO THE FAMILY OF MRS. DELMAR; or, a Book for Me and my Children, on National and Important Subjects. 5s.

THE NECESSITY FOR AN INTERMEDIATE SYSTEM OF EDUCATION BETWEEN THE NATIONAL SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES OF IRELAND. By the Rev. Professor M'Cosh, D.D., Queen's College, Belfast. 6d.

THE ART OF QUESTIONING; or, a Short Analysis of the Interrogatory Methods of Instruction, designed for the use of Teachers, Pupil Teachers, and Monitors. By W. T. Young, T.C.D. 1s. By post, 1s. 4d.

MEMOIRS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his Son-in-Law, the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D. Vol. I. 6s.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE REV. EDWARD BICKERSTETH. By the Rev. T. R. Birks. Cheaper Edition. 2 vols., fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF THE LIVES OF ROBERT AND JAMES A. HALDANE. By Alexander Haldane, Esq. 8vo. 12s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. W. H. KRAUSE, A.M., Bethesda Chapel, Dublin, with selections from his Correspondence. By Rev. C. S. Stanford. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

THE SUCCESSFUL MERCHANT: Sketches of the Life of Mr. Samuel Budgett. By William Arthur, A.M. 2s. 6d.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND. By Miss Strickland. New and Revised Edition. With numerous Portraits. Vols. I., II., III. post 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. (To be completed in 8 monthly volumes.)

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION. Vol. V.—Subject:—"The Reformation in England." 8vo. 12s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. Five vols. in One. 8vo. Cloth, 8s., Gilt Edges, 9s.

EXCELSIOR: HELP TO PROGRESS IN RELIGION, SCIENCE, AND LITERATURE. A Monthly Magazine, Conducted by the Rev. James Hamilton, D.D., London. Price 6d.

 The names of subscribers received.

In a few days will be Published, Second Edition, price 6d., by post, 10d.,

A VERSIFIED DESCRIPTION OF THE GREAT INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION in Dublin, 1853, in a Letter from I. Donoghoe to his Brother Dan. Edited by —— Scribbler, Esq., of Scribblestown Castle. 6d.

Dublin: WM. CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Lately Published,

WILLET'S "SYNOPSIS PAPISMI." New Edition. Edited by the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. Ten vols., 8vo. Price £3.

London: JAMES MILLER, 17, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, and all Booksellers.

Fcap 8vo, cloth, 2s.

THE CONFESSION OF ST. PATRICK (translated from the original Latin), with an Introduction and Notes. By the Rev. Thomas Olden, A.B., Curate of Knocktemple, in the Diocese of Cloyne.

Dublin: JAMES M'GLASHAN, 50, Upper Sackville-street. London: JAMES NISBET and Co., Berner's-street.

Just Published,

Second Edition, with additional Facts and Anecdotes, in limp cloth, 1s. 6d., or in cloth, 2s. 6d.,

POOR PADDY'S CABIN; or, SLAVERY IN IRELAND. A true Representation of Facts and Characters. By an Irishman.

"We could desire nothing better for the British Empire, and indeed for the interests of mankind everywhere, than that 'Poor Paddy's Cabin' may have a circulation as extensive as Mrs. Stowe's beautiful narrative. The story on which the incidents are engrafted is in the highest degree interesting and gratifying, and it would do more good within the British Islands, if found in every hand, than even 'Uncle Tom's Cabin has done for the cause of Negro Emancipation in the New World!"—Standard.

"The Author, whose long residence in Ireland, and intimate acquaintance with the habits and feelings of the people, enable him to draw a true picture of the state of things in this hitherto neglected and most unhappy country, has, with considerable discretion, scrupulously avoided hurting the feelings of individuals, by any personal allusions. His censures are directed against the systems and principles, that prevail in Ireland."—Morning Herald.

London: WERTHEIM and MACINTOSH. Dublin: WM. CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Just Published, Price 3d.,

CHILDREN IN HEAVEN; A Sermon to Children, preached in Trinity Church, on Thursday, January 5, 1854. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

II.

Price Twopence.

GOOD TO BE DONE, AND WHO SHOULD DO IT; A Sermon preached in Trinity Church, on Sunday, January 1, 1854. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

III.

Price Twopence.

A CURE FOR CARE. A Sermon preached in Trinity Church. By the Rev. John Gregg.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Just Published, Price 3s.,

THE TWO SUFFERERS; a Record of Facts, from the Chamber of Sickness and Death. By the author of "Memorial of Christian Affection," "Token of Love to Little Children," &c.

London: Published by J. H. JACKSON, Islington Green; and SEELY'S, Fleet-street.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.
MARCH, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Tláir do Dhia aiñ ṗna háṗuiḃ, agur ṗíoḋċáin air an ḃealaiḋ deaġċoil do na ḋáoiniḃ.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 28. APRIL, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 3s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

PAGE.

The Vulgate 43
On the Constrained Celibacy of the Clergy—Dialogue IV. . . 44
The Old Irish Clergy—No. III. (continued from page 35) . . 45
How far is the Reformation effected by the characters and motives of the Reformers? 45
Results of Intolerance in France—Revocation of the Edict of Nantes 46
The Index Expurgatorius 48
Talk of the Road—No. XXIII. (The Glories of Joseph.) . . 49
Toleration and Unity 49
CORRESPONDENCE:
Pope Liberius and Infallibility, by a Truth-seeker . . . 50
Primitive Fathers on the Holy Eucharist, by Mr. John Duffy . 51
On the Unanimous Consent of the Fathers, by J. R. D. B. . 51
On Purgatory and the Fathers of the first three centuries . 52
What are the points of faith which the Roman Catholic Church requires to believe, and which are not in the Bible? by Mr. Collette 53
Flowers for April 53
Farming Operations for April 53

THE VULGATE.

Two Hindoos are said to have disputed once about the meaning of a speech which the Queen of England had just addressed to Parliament, in which there was some important reference to Indian affairs. The one had derived his knowledge from a translation of the speech into Bengalee, the language spoken in the province of Bengal; while the other had read a Hindostanee version, which had been made from a Persian translation; the Persian language having been for a long time used in all government offices in India. The Bengalee version of the speech flatly contradicted the Hindostanee version; and each of the disputants stoutly maintained that his translation gave the true account of what the Queen had really said. The dispute might have been indefinitely prolonged, and would probably never have arrived at a satisfactory termination, were it not for the fortunate intervention of a third person, who happened to know English, and who had in his possession a copy of the Times newspaper, containing the speech itself. The production of this document to the two disputants at once settled the question, and restored harmony between them. The story verified the old adage, that "the stream is always clearer, the nearer the fountain head."

Now, if any of our Roman Catholic readers, who may be in possession of a Douay Bible, will open the title page, he will see that it is said to be translated from "the Latin Vulgate." It would be natural for him, when he reads these words, to feel some curiosity to know what is this Latin Vulgate, from which the Word of God, the message of the King of kings, has been translated into his own mother tongue. It may occur to him to ask, was Latin the original language in which the books of Scripture were written? But a very moderate amount of knowledge will show him that this could not have been the case. Moses, and David, and Isaiah did not write in Latin, but Hebrew—in truth, the Latin language scarcely existed in their time. Again, when we come to the New Testament, we find that St. Peter and St. Paul wrote in Greek, not in Latin; and, in fact, there is not a single book, of either the Old or New Testaments, that was originally written in the Latin tongue.

When these facts have been ascertained, the question still remains to be answered—Why was the Douay Bible translated from the Latin Vulgate? Our inquirer will naturally say, would there not have been less risk of mistakes and inaccuracies, if the translators had gone at once to the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, and the Greek text of the New. Why, he may ask, did they go to the Vulgate at all? What need was there of looking to a translation of what Isaiah or St. Paul wrote, when they had the original words of these inspired writers written in the language in which they thought and spoke? It would have been just as reasonable for the Hindoos of our story to have relied upon the accuracy of their Bengalee or Persian translations, when they might have read the Queen's own words in the English tongue.

Our readers might puzzle themselves for a long time in searching for the true cause of this seemingly strange anomaly, which we will now proceed to explain to them. Before doing so, however, we will first state, in a few words, what was the origin of the Latin Vulgate.

In the period which immediately succeeded the first preaching of Christianity, translations of the Scriptures were made into most of the languages which were spoken in the then civilized world. The Christian pastors and teachers were everywhere anxious that their flocks should be able to read and study the Word of God for themselves. No fears were then entertained, lest the people should make a bad use of their knowledge. The early bishops and martyrs would, at once, have silenced all such doubts by our Blessed Lord's words (Matt. iv. 2)—"It is written, not in bread alone doth man live, but in every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God." In those days, Latin was the language spoken at Rome, and throughout the greater part of the western world; and in the second and third centuries, there appear to have been, not one, but several Latin translations of the Scriptures in common use, derived, probably, from some one original version. Printing, of course, was unknown in these times, and each copy of a book had to be separately written out, in which process, if the transcriber was a careless man, several mistakes might arise. In this way many of the Latin versions had become so corrupt in the fourth century, that the eminent scholar, Jerome, was induced to make a new translation from the original Hebrew and Greek. Jerome's translation at first met with considerable opposition. He was pronounced a heretic, and accused of falsifying the Word of God. Gradually, however, the value of his version became recognised by eminent scholars who succeeded him; and towards the close of the seventh century, it was generally received in all the churches of the west, from which circumstance its name of Vulgate—i.e., the common or vulgar translation—was derived.

In this state matters stood for a long time, until at length, in the sixteenth century, the Council of Trent, among other matters, commenced to frame its decrees about the Holy Scriptures. The first question raised for discussion was, in what written document was the Word of God contained? This does not seem to be a question about which much difference of opinion ought reasonably to exist. A writer, whether inspired or not, commits his thoughts to paper. Is it in Hebrew? Then it is in Hebrew, and in Hebrew alone, that you are sure of having his thoughts, all his thoughts, nothing but his thoughts. Is it in Greek? Then it is in Greek that you will find what he meant. If you do not understand these tongues, nothing is more natural than that you should make use of a translation; but if you do understand them, why should you be prevented from going to the book as it came from the hands of the author? The only rational pretext for setting up a translation in place of the original work would be, by proving that the translation is of absolutely perfect accuracy. But if you have to do with an inspired book, the only ground on which we can reasonably assert that the translation is equal to the original, is to show that the translator is inspired as well as the original author.

And, accordingly, this was the view of the case taken by the most learned members of the Council of Trent. Louis de Catane* in particular, laid great stress on the well-known opinions of the eminent scholar, Cardinal Cajetan. This able writer was in the habit of saying, that to listen to the Latin text was not to hear the Word of God, which is infallible, but that of the translator, who was liable to error, and might deceive; he added, that Jerome himself, the author of the Vulgate, was in the right when he asserted, that to write the Books of Scripture needed the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; but to translate them into another language was a matter involving merely the exercise of ordinary talents. It was acknowledged, indeed, that if the Council of Trent were infallibly certain that their deliberations were guided by the Holy Spirit, and if they themselves undertook the task of revising the Latin Bible, they might then order their translation, so made, to be an infallible authority in matters of faith, but that they had no right to pronounce such a decision about Jerome's Vulgate, of the accuracy of which they could not be sure.

But these reasons, however strongly urged, failed to convince the understandings of the venerable men who composed the majority of the council. They had an innate horror and dread of Greek and Hebrew, and no wonder, for, perhaps, nine out of ten of them did not understand a line of either, but in Latin they were more at home; they felt somewhat like a sailor who is unwilling to trust himself to the perils of the wild ocean, when he has a safe anchorage at which he may ride securely. There was another cause which increased their antipathy to the two great original languages in which the Word of God had been composed. Many of the early reformers were eminent scholars, and used frequently to appeal to the Scriptures in their original tongues; and, as a matter of course, the venerable bishops of the council transferred a part of the hatred with which they were wont to regard the reformers, to the languages which the latter knew, but which, to themselves, were a dead letter.

An eminent historian* has given us the following sketch of a sermon, preached about the rise of the Reformation, which represents in a vivid light the horror with which the "new learning," as it was called, was regarded by the old-fashioned clergy of those days—"A new language," said a monk from the pulpit, "has been discovered, which is called the Greek. It must be carefully avoided; this language is the mother of all heresies. I see in the hands of many a book written in that tongue, it is called the New Testament; it is a book full of briars and vipers. As for Hebrew, those who learn it immediately become Jews."† These two tongues, new, because they were old, were looked upon as intruders; and venerable priests, grown grey in the recital of their missals and breviaries, asked indignantly what right Greek and Hebrew, forsooth, had to come and disturb the old familiar Latin, in the throne which it had so long occupied. Nay, even Cardinals themselves were not exempt from the prevailing prejudices; and in the year 1502, when the famous Bible of Alcala was published, in which the Vulgate was printed between the Hebrew text and the Greek text, Cardinal Ximenès did not scruple to assert, that it was an exemplification of Christ between the two thieves.

The Council of Trent, therefore, eventually decided that the Latin Vulgate of Jerome—that very Vulgate which had gained the writer the imputation of heresy in his own day—should now be pronounced the true text of the Holy Scriptures, and that nobody, under any pretext, should dare or presume to reject it. "If," said they, "we allow of a reference to the Greek or Hebrew text, we shall be kept in perpetual hot water. The grammarians will throw everything into universal confusion. They will then become the arbiters and judges of our faith; and bishoprics and cardinalships must be given to those pedants, to the exclusion of theologians and canonists. How can the inquisitors proceed against the Lutherans, unless they know Greek and Hebrew? These heretics will quickly say that the translation is wrong, and that the original text speaks in quite a different manner. Thus a door will be opened for the admission of every quirk and subtilty which a grammarian, either through malice or ignorance, may take it into his head to put forward and defend, by some rule of syntax, or other paltry evasion."‡ In order, therefore, to prevent simple, grammarians from giving the law to bishops and divines, the whole council—fathers, prelates, and archbishops—decided almost unanimously to approve the Vulgate version, as the authentic text of Sacred Scripture.§

Their conduct, it must be allowed, was natural enough, however indefensible on grounds of right reason, and unworthy of men professing to act under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit. However, having come to this decision, they seemed to feel that having erected the Vulgate,

* Vide Father Paul Sarpi, Hist. Conc. Trid., lib. ii., sec. 31.

* Sismondi, Hist. des Français, vol. xvi.

† We may remark, in connection with this subject, that we once met with a saying, current about the times of which we have been speaking, which exactly tallies with the discourse of the worthy monk given above—"To know Greek," it said, "is a heretical offence: to know Hebrew, is a diabolical one." (Scire Græca, hæreticum: scire Hebraica, diabolicum.) We have lost the reference to the original authority.

‡ In the above account of the differences which existed in the Council of Trent on this subject, we have not, in the slightest degree, exaggerated the plain and truthful statement of Father Paul Sarpi, who gives the names of those who spoke on the question, and the arguments which they employed.—See his Hist. Conc. Trid., lib. ii., secs. 31-33.

§ "Sacrosancta Synodus statuit et declarat, ut hæc ipsa vetus et Vulgata editio——pro authentica habeatur, et ut——quam emendatissime imprimatur."—Decret. S.S. Conc. Trid., Sess. iv.

for the first time, to the pinnacle of perfection, as an authentic exposition of the mind of Holy Scripture, it would be but prudent, to say the least of it, to make every endeavour that it should be made as accurate as possible. The Council of Trent first approved of the Vulgate, as the authentic text of Scripture, and then decided that it should be corrected! Ordinary people may think, perhaps, that they ought to have reversed this order, that they should have corrected first, and approved after; but there is no accounting for tastes. We profess merely to give a faithful account of the course which the council did actually take on this question. Their conduct would have been more rigidly consistent, though certainly not a whit more reasonable, if they had denied the faults of the Vulgate, and proclaimed it at once infallible and perfect, than to declare it inviolable, even while confessing its faults, and that it was about to be corrected.

The task of correction went on but slowly. Towards the close of the Council, Pius IV. appointed a commission which made some little progress in the work. Pius V. renewed it and accelerated its labours. Gregory XIII., who succeeded him, appears to have thought the reformation of the calendar a business of more pressing importance than the reform of the translation of the Holy Scripture. Twelve years afterwards, Sixtus V. ascended the Papal throne, and found the work still incomplete. With characteristic energy he urged the matter forward, and, at length, at the beginning of 1589 (a quarter of a century after the close of the Council of Trent), the Pope announced, by a Bull that the work was drawing to a close. The new Vulgate was printed under his own eyes, at the Vatican, and the Pope himself revised the proofs. "We have corrected them with our own hands," he says in the preface (nostra nos ipsi manu correximus). At length this wonderful work, the work of four Popes and five and twenty years, appeared in 1590. In the Papal Bull, which begins on the fourth page, the text of this edition is pronounced "the true, legitimate, authentic, and indubitable text;"* and all persons who should presume to alter it are threatened with "the indignation of Almighty God, and of the blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul.†"

A glance at the volume was enough to show the folly, not to say impiety, of such boastful presumption. "When the work appeared," says Hug, an eminent Roman Catholic writer, "it was impossible that it should not have given occasion for criticism and pleasantry. Many passages were found, particularly in the Old Testament, covered with slips of paper, on which new corrections had been printed; others were scratched out, or merely corrected with a pen. In fine, the copies issued were far from all presenting the same corrections."

It was clear, therefore, that the work should be done over again. Sixtus V. died; and the Romish theologians endeavoured to suppress the work entirely, and to substitute a new edition in its stead. Urban VII. lived only twelve days; Gregory XIV. made but little progress in it; Innocent IX., who reigned only two months, seems to have taken no part in it; and the completion of the work was reserved for Clement VIII., who published it in 1592. This new edition was also declared authentic, and accompanied with similar threats of excommunication against any who should presume to alter its text.

When these two editions—that of Sixtus V. and that of Clement VIII.—came to be compared, it was quickly found that there was the greatest diversity between them. Clauses were found in the one which were omitted in the other. They even contradict one another in various passages; and, in short, it was found that the two books differ in more than two thousand places!

Here was a nice difficulty for the advocates of Papal infallibility to solve! Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. had each declared that his edition was authentic and indubitable; and they had both denounced the heavy curse of Almighty God upon any one who should dare to assert the contrary.

But how, then, were the Romish divines to get over the awful, startling fact of the two thousand discrepancies? The most eminent divines were consulted. It was a difficulty which required all their cleverness and ingenuity to surmount—a real Gordian knot, which none but very sagacious casuists would ever dream of untying.

At last Cardinal Bellarmine took the matter in hand. If any one could defend the fortress of Papal infallibility, he was certainly the man to do it.

"Si Pergama dextrâ Defendi possent etiam hâc defensa fuissent."

He is said by Hug to have owed his canonization as a saint to his publication on this question. And now the reader will ask how did Bellarmine get over the difficulty? By a very simple expedient. He proposed that all the blame should be laid upon the printer! Thus the honour of Pope Sixtus V. was saved: all the imperfections of his Vulgate were—errors of the press. Errors of the press! Surely nothing but the hardest necessity could ever have induced a writer of Bellarmine's great abilities to resort to an excuse so utterly weak and untenable. Did not Sixtus V. himself say, in the preface to his own Vulgate, "that he had corrected the sheets with his own hand?" The old and new editions, moreover, differ in many places where there was no error of the press in the former. The latest historian of the Vulgate on the Continent* does not hesitate to to call the assertions of Bellarmine on this point "lies and pious frauds," a decision which, we regret to say, appears fully borne out by the plain facts of the case. How much more manly and straightforward would Bellarmine's conduct have been if he had frankly avowed that his task was hopeless, that there were differences between the Sixtine and Clementine Vulgates which no ingenuity could reconcile. But, alas! such an admission would have been a heavy blow to the Romish dogma of Papal infallibility—a dogma which Bellarmine was resolved to defend at all hazards and in the face of the most incontrovertible facts. By his preface to the Clementine Vulgate, Bellarmine may have succeeded in gaining the honour of canonization as a saint in the Church of Rome; but we fear that he thereby justly forfeited his character as an honest man and an impartial inquirer after truth.

We cannot avoid contrasting the conduct of the two Popes who issued these "indubitable, authentic," and yet contradictory editions of the Holy Scriptures to the world with that of the translators of the authorized version of the English Bible about twenty years later, in the year 1611. The latter make no boastful pretensions to infallibility; they utter no imprecations against their opponents; their own names are not once alluded to; they merely tell us that the great object of their labours was, "that out of the original sacred tongues, together with comparing of the labours, both in our own and foreign languages, there should be one more exact translation of the Holy Scriptures into the English tongue." The new translation was to be "more exact than its predecessors;" but perfect accuracy was, perhaps, unattainable, and to this they made no claim. However anxiously we may desire to possess a perfectly faithful version of the Word of God, yet we have reason to feel deeply thankful that our faith does not depend upon an absolute agreement in every particular between the original text and the translation into our own tongue. It has often been remarked, that of all the books in the world the Bible is, perhaps, less dependent than any other upon the skill of its translators, so far, at least, as regards its general tone and purport. While it calls for the exercise of the highest abilities and more than repays all the labour that can be expended on it, yet the great leading truths which it contains are such as cannot be obscured, even by the most careless version. A sinner who feels his need of salvation can learn, even from a very inaccurate translation of the Scriptures, that "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin" (1 John i. 7), and that "there is no other name under heaven given to men whereby we must be saved"—Acts iv. 12.

We entreat those of our readers, who may have leisure and opportunity, to examine for themselves the facts we have cited above, and then to consider how far they are consistent with the boasted claims of the Church of Rome, either for herself or for the Pope, to be the sole, supreme, infallible judge, both of the letter and sense of Holy Scripture. We think we have said enough to show that the decision of the Council of Trent was contrary to reason and common sense; and as regards the rival Pontiffs, Sixtus V. and Clement VIII., who could not refrain from uttering curses while sending forth into the world the Scriptures of the God of Mercy and Love, we leave them to the real or pretended influence of their own rash denunciations.

DIALOGUE ON THE CONSTRAINED CELIBACY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME, BETWEEN TWO ITALIAN GENTLEMEN.—No. IV.

Eustachio.—According to what you have said hitherto, it is clear that from the earliest times of the Christian Church the clergy, as well as the laity, had an undoubted right to marry. Now, if it be true that the long possession of anything secures enjoyment of it to the possessor, the Church of Rome cannot in reason forbid the marriage of her clergy.

Salviano.—Long possession is, sometimes, pleaded even in matters of religion. Why, the Church of Rome uses this very pretence, and says that our reformers have wronged her, whilst by their reformation they have tried to take away her purgatory, her masses, and many other things of which she boasts a long possession. This is not the place to enter into controversy about our reasons for having protested against such doctrines. I only ask you how (admitting the theory of long possession) Rome has taken away the right of marriage from the clergy, a right which they possessed for more than a thousand years? She may, perhaps, assert that this right was not well founded; but how can that be, when it was granted them by God himself, and when so many holy bishops and priests have taken advantage of it?

Eustachio.—But tell me, was there none who ever thought of once more permitting the clergy to marry? I think I have heard it said that many have urgently required this.

Salviano.—Ah! dear friend, it was soon perceived what would be the fruits of the new law of celibacy. St. Bernard says, "take away from the Church" (observe that Rome, by the word Church, means the clergy), honourable matrimony, and it will be filled with keepers of concubines (Bernard, serm., 66 in Cant.). In the 13th century, Bishop Durandus, in prescribing the method of reforming the Church, gave his advice, that it would be useful if, by a council, marriage should be granted to the priests, seeing that up to that time they were forced to chastity in vain; and that that might be easily brought about, inasmuch as the Greek Church still possessed this right, and that the Church in general acted upon it in the time of the apostles—De modo concilii celebrandi, art. 46. Æneas Sylvius himself says—"Perhaps, it would not be the worse that many priests should marry; many might be saved in conjugal priesthood who are destroyed in a barren presbytery" (In actis concil. Basil, lib. 2): and Baptista Platina explains the sentiments of this author in these words—"The clergy have been forbidden to marry for good reasons, but for better ones should this privilege be restored to them" —(In vita Pii II., fere in fine).

Eustachio.—Truly, this was the speech of an honest man. What I wonder at is, that Æneas Sylvius, when he became Pope Pius II., never thought of abolishing the celibacy of the clergy. I think that he should have considered it his duty to restore to them that of which they had been unjustly deprived by others.

Salviano.—You are right, but you must consider that Æneas Sylvius and Pius II. are very different. It is one thing, in fact, to be a man, and another to be a Pope. Æneas Sylvius, as a man, did not speak ex cathedrâ, when he said that the right of marriage should justly be restored to the priests; but, as a pope, his own interests being changed, his mind was changed along with them. In fact, if he had corrected the error, by setting aside the ordinances of his predecessors, Papal infallibility would have fallen, on which Gregory the Seventh having built was desirous thus to enforce his law. Gregory exclaimed, "I cannot err;" and Pius, by abrogating his law, would have made it plain to all men that he did err, at the very time in which he asserted that he could not err. Æneas Sylvius, as Pope, did not wish that the clergy should marry, although, as a man, he himself had children without being married.* I might, also, adduce many other of your popes for whom it would have been much better if they had lived in the holy state of matrimony. Innocent VIII. was the father of four sons and four daughters. I need not say anything about Alexander VI., Sixtus IV., and very many others.

Eustachio.—I think I have heard it said, that even in the Council of Trent there was a request made that the right of marrying should be restored to the clergy.

Salviano.—Certainly, many distinguished persons pledged themselves to present to the Council of Trent a memorial to this effect. Charles, Duke of Austria, son of the Emperor Ferdinand I., and Albert, Duke of Bavaria, did all that was in their power to procure for the clergy once more the right of contracting marriage; and their ambassadors demanded it loudly in the council. The same was done by Henry II., and by Charles IX., kings of France, who took great pains to promote this object. The aforesaid Emperor Ferdinand I. made strong entreaties about it to the council; and even to his death considered that it was only just to grant marriage to the clergy. But all his endeavours having been vain, Maximilian I., by means of Count Prosper, made the same request of the pope. This monarch brought forth very weighty reasons to induce him to grant the marriage of the clergy; but these too were fruitless, and did not make the least impression upon the mind of the pontiff. The Council of Trent turned a deaf ear to these most just requests, as also to many others, made by a number of the princes, for the restitution of the cup, so that the holy supper should be administered to all with bread and wine, as it was ordained by Christ, and according to the custom of the Church for many ages. It was requested, likewise, that divine service should be celebrated in the churches in the vulgar tongue, so that it might be understood by the people, but all these remonstrances were useless.

Eustachio.—At other times, however, the popes were not ashamed to retract their errors; one pope abrogated the laws of another pope, one council corrected the decrees of another council; it seems, however, that the popes who directed the Council of Trent, by sending the Holy Spirit to it from Rome, would not yield one jot; in fact, in spite of all the protests that were made to them, and all the prayers and entreaties addressed to them by people of every degree, they could not be brought to decree that Rome should grant that to the clergy, which was granted to them by God.

Salviano.—I have told you that the popes are very different men from the first holy Bishops of Rome, and that in the councils men sat who were very different from those who took their seats in the holy Apostolic assemblies. The fathers of the Council of Trent imagined that they were infallible, and their watchword was "we will not yield; we will not give in to the Lutherans; if we yield in one point only, we shall prejudice all the others; if we yield one single tittle, how shall we maintain in future that the Church of Rome is infallible?" Could there have been asked of this council, anything more just than the restoration of the cup to the people in the Lord's supper? The authors

---

* "Vera, legitima, authentica et indubitata."

† "Si quis autem hoc attentaro præsumpserit, indignationem omnipotentis Det ac beatorum Petri et Pauli Apostolorum ejus se noverit incursurum."

* Van Ess, Geschichte der Vulgata, p. 324.

* His reply to his father, who reproved him for having had a child, is so grossly indecent that I cannot bring myself to put it into English.—Translator.

of this request had nothing else in view than to see the holy supper of the Lord administered according to the command of Jesus Christ, and according to the custom of the Church for many ages. But, notwithstanding that, these very reverend fathers were most obstinate in their refusal. Do you know why? Because Rome had approved of communion under one kind only, and they wished to make it appear that that Church was infallible.

Eustachi.—This seems impossible; but at all events the Council of Trent must have decreed something concerning the marriage of the clergy. It must, at least, have given some satisfaction to those who demanded that they should be left at liberty to marry or not as they pleased.

Salviano.—In the 24th Sess. (which was the eighth under Pius IV.), in the 9th canon, the fathers of the Council of Trent thus decreed—"If any one shall say that clerks constituted in sacred orders or regulars who have solemnly professed chastity, are able to contract marriage, and that, being contracted, it is valid, the ecclesiastical law or vow notwithstanding, &c., let him be anathema." Among the canons which were made in that same session, there is one which excommunicates all those who shall say that the Church has not power to dispense with the impediments of contracting marriage in some of the prohibited degrees (Can. 3). Now what is this Church except it be the pope, who permits a man to marry his sister-in-law? Is it the church? No; the Church has the name of this power, but the pope possesses it in fact. Pius IV., who was the last ruler of the council, and author of these canons, gave Philip II. permission to marry his own sister. St. John the Baptist said to Herod, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife" (St. Matthew, xiv. 4.); but if that incestuous union was condemned by St. John, I suppose it might, for all that, by a particular dispensation, be allowed by the pope, for what is the Baptist himself when compared with his Holiness? A Roman council, moreover (celebrated under Gregory III.), thunders forth its interdicts, in the 5th canon, against the incestuous. It says—"If any one shall take in marriage his brother's wife, let him be anathema:" and all the fathers cried out three times "let him be anathema." But the Council of Trent (Sess. 24th, Canon 12), by adjudging every marriage case to the clergy, takes away the impediment—"If any one shall say that matrimonial causes do not concern ecclesiastical judges, let him be anathema." We must be very blind, if we do not see that this is a hurt to society and to secular government. In ancient times the sovereigns made the laws about matrimony, and St. Augustine (de civit. Dei lib., 15, cap. 16), and St. Ambrose (epist. 66), are our witnesses that Theodosius Cæsar was one of those who did so.

(To be Continued.)

THE OLD IRISH CLERGY—No. III.

(Continued from page 35.)

The exertions of the Church of Rome to strengthen her system of discipline, by the prohibition of marriage among the clergy, at the close of the eleventh and commencement of the twelfth centuries, are matters with which students of church history are familiar. Less generally known to them, perhaps, is the (however, not less certain) fact, that the first propagation in Ireland of the influence in support of which such efforts were made, was owing to the settlement of the Danish invaders in the country; one of whom, Gille, educated at the Norman abbey of Bec, and afterwards bishop of the Danes of Limerick, brought over with him, from France, those predilections for the whole system of the Church of Rome which he had there imbibed; and his activity and zeal being such as to gain him, in the course of time, the appointment of first Pope's legate for Ireland, his exertions in that capacity appear to have been the instrument, more than any other, of securing for the principle and system of Papal supremacy a firm foundation in this island.

Kellach, or Kelly (called also Celsus), successor of St. Patrick, whose name occurs at A.D. 1105, &c., above, was an earnest adopter of the views propagated by Gille, as was in a still higher degree the famous Malachy, or Melmogue, whom he nominated as his successor to the primacy: this act, although not a very canonical one, indicating sufficiently Kellach's adoption of the new system, which led him thus to exert himself, in defiance of all rights claimed by other members of his family, to alienate from them the succession to the primacy, to which their hereditary title had been through many generations so firmly established. But his efforts to break this national custom could not be expected to be let pass without violent opposition.

Malachy, on his way to Rome, in A.D. 1139, and again when returning to Ireland on that occasion, and once more, just before his death, in A.D. 1148, paid three successive visits to the great St. Bernard, at Clairvaux, which gave the latter an opportunity of inquiring with great interest into the state of the Irish Church, and learning from his visitor much concerning her circumstances that was curious and worthy of note, especially to one educated under so different a system as that under which Bernard had been brought up. Among other things, Malachy gave him a particular account of the hereditary succession which had so long been regulating the appointments to the primacy in Ireland, and of the efforts at length made to break it, in which he was himself so much interested. But in giving this recital Malachy seems to have confined his information to the case of Armagh, either not mentioning at all that this mode of succession was common and generally prevalent in Ireland, or else, perhaps, describing it as carried out in Armagh in an exclusive way, which led to abuses not so much to be observed elsewhere. This appears from the circumstance that St. Bernard, in his Life of Malachy, attacks with much fury the Armagh family succession, but makes no allusion to the operation of the same system in other places in Ireland. With regard to the former, his observations are to the following effect:—

"A most atrocious practice had been established, by the diabolical ambition of certain people of noble rank, that the holy see [i.e., of Armagh] should be obtained by hereditary succession; for they would allow none to be bishops there save such as were of their own tribe and family. Nor was it for any short period that this execrable succession had been going on, some fifteen generations having already been exhausted in such villainy. And so firmly had this wicked and adulterous generation established their unholy right (or wrong, rather, deserving to be punished by the worst death), that although there were at times no clergymen to be found of their blood, yet bishops they never were without. In fine, there had already been before Celsus, eight persons, who were married and without orders, yet still men of education. Hence arose throughout Ireland all that relaxation of Church discipline, powerlessness of censures, and annihilation of religion aforesaid."

Celsus, therefore (or Kellach), anxious, according to St. Bernard, to remedy these evils, nominated Malachy for his successor; who, however, did not immediately nor easily obtain the office. "For, lo, of the wicked race, another, named Murtogh, seizes on the post, who for five years, by the aid of the secular power, settled himself on the Church, not a bishop, but a tyrant." And his "presumption," Bernard says, maintained this condition of "ecclesiastical adultery" (a Church with two bishops appearing to him like a wife with two husbands) for three years (see A.D. 1129, 1132, above); after which Malachy secured in part the "successorship of Patrick," in spite of the "numbers, power, and ambition of that noble family who had now for about 200 years kept possession of the sanctuary of God." He could only, however, act in the office through the country, being excluded from appearing in Armagh by the power of his adversary, Murtogh, so long as he survived.

Murtogh dying A.D. 1134, "one Niall" (Nigellus—i.e., blackish), says St. Bernard, "yea, a thorough black, seized upon the see. For Murtogh, while yet alive, had made provision to this effect, against his own soul, that, going out of the world to be damned, he might have for heir one in whom he could still persist in adding to his works of damnation; for this latter, too, was of that damned race, a kinsman of Murtogh's."

What a strange contrast between the Irish obit of Murtogh, as above given from the Four Masters, at A.D. 1134, and the obit of the same individual in St. Bernard's Latin Life of Malachy. According to one, "Murtogh, Successor of St. Patrick, died penitent—yea, triumphant;" according to the other, "Murtogh—no bishop, but a tyrant, an ecclesiastical adulterer—went from this world to be damned, yet still to live in an heir, provided for the purpose of adding to his deeds of damnation!" Why this difference? It arises, simply, dear reader, from the different feelings of the parties telling the same story in their different ways—it being told, in the first case, by men who looked at the matter simply in an old Irish and national point of view; in the other case, by one who viewed it as a zealous member of the Church of Rome as then existing, and seeking to establish her influence in Ireland.

Our next paper will, we hope, throw some further light on the matter so far elucidated in the present one.

R. K.

HOW FAR THE REFORMATION IS AFFECTED BY THE CHARACTERS AND MOTIVES OF THE REFORMERS.

It has been usual with Roman Catholic controversialists, since the time of the Reformation, to attempt to throw discredit on the Reformation itself by vilifying the characters of the principal persons who were engaged in bringing it about. Luther, Calvin, Zuinglius, Cranmer, and Knox have been charged with almost every crime that has disgraced the most infamous of men; and the vocabulary of malignant abuse has been exhausted to supply epithets sufficiently vile for such pestilent disturbers of the established order of things. These charges, it is needless to tell any one who knows anything whatever about the subject, have been met and refuted, over and over again. The most irrefragable evidence has been adduced, not from friends of the reforming party, but from impartial historians, and even from enemies, showing that the charges in question are either pure inventions, or such gross misrepresentations of facts as to be destitute of any force as proofs. Yet these charges still continue to be brought forward. Like the giant in the fable, each successive overthrow only seems to lend them new life and vigour. Thus, in a recent Roman Catholic Catechism,* which, it appears, enjoys an extensive circulation, the very first page that we open contains a choice selection of the old stories about Luther, by which it was attempted to drag him down to the level of the heretics, the magicians, and unnatural monsters who, it is admitted by Baronius and Bellarmine, found means to seat themselves, from time to time, in the chair of St. Peter. In this Catechism, we ourselves soon recognised all our old acquaintances—the stock stories which we had occasion, some time since, to track through many a dusty folio, until we left them overwhelmed, as we thought, by a weight of opposing evidence which no wise Romanist would now venture to resist. It was, therefore, not without some surprise that we found them all furbished up anew, and marshalled in imposing array, just as if they had never before been challenged and refuted. At first, we felt inclined to be somewhat provoked at this cool ignoring of all that had been said and written upon the subject; but, upon second thoughts, we saw reason to change our mind, and rather to rejoice that these ancient calumnies were again raked up and paraded with such affected triumph. In matters of every-day life, when two rival causes are submitted to our judgment it is usually regarded as a presumption in favour of one of them, when its opponents, instead of assailing it with legitimate arguments, endeavour to raise a prejudice against it by abusing its advocates, and blackening their characters; and we are, on the other hand, irresistibly led to suspect that there must be something radically unsound in the cause of those who indulge in such personalities, and seek to divert attention from the facts and reason of the case to discussions either entirely irrelevant, or, at least, of very secondary importance. We recognise, at once, the well-known tactics of unscrupulous advocates, and we conclude that a cause which needs such advocacy, must be inherently weak and bad. This, we think, is the result to which, in ordinary disputes, every impartial and sensible looker-on is inevitably led. And the presumption becomes a certainty, when it further appears that the individuals so attacked have already satisfactorily vindicated their characters from the aspersions cast upon them, and that the charges, so pertinaciously insisted on, are nothing better than exploded calumnies. Unfair dealing of this kind, at all times reprehensible and offensive, becomes doubly so in matters of religion. Every right-minded man feels instinctively that the sacredness of the subject ought to protect it from the pollution of such base and dishonourable devices. And yet, unfortunately, it is too true that the proverbial bitterness of religious strife has nowhere more frequently displayed itself than in this very mode of procedure. When the doctrines of the Reformation proved too stubborn to be refuted by argument, the characters of the Reformers were assailed by every vile calumny which the malignity of defeated controversialists and the wrath of an offended hierarchy, conscious that their system had received a fatal wound, could devise. These accusations were, as we have said before, met and answered as soon as they were made. But they form too inviting a topic for popular declamation to be given up merely because they are groundless. Accordingly, Mr. Keenan and other controversialists of the same stamp gloat over them with manifest delight, and retail them for the benefit of those who are ignorant enough to believe that they are all unquestioned facts.

Nor is this the only unfairness of which inquiring Roman Catholics, no less than Protestants, have to complain in this matter. A moment's reflection will show that besides the suspicious charges which are sought to be palmed upon the ignorant as established facts, there is also a gross fallacy at the bottom of the argument deduced from them. The argument is the following:—The Reformers were bad men; therefore the Reformation must be a bad thing, and its doctrines must be false. No reasonable man requires to be told that this conclusion is not necessarily true, even admitting the assumed fact that the authors of the Reformation were worthless men, influenced by selfish and bad motives. Let us just apply the same argument to one or two other cases in which party bias does not interfere to warp our judgments. The Barons of England, in the time of King John, were licentious, lawless, and selfish men; therefore, Magna Charta is worthless. The Crusaders were, for the most part, greedy and unprincipled adventurers; therefore, the religion of which they were the champions—viz., Christianity—is false; and the faith against which they fought—viz., Mahometanism—is true. Every one, including, probably, Mr. Keenan himself, would at once exclaim that this reasoning is invalid. And yet, the argument of Roman Catholics against the Reformation and in favour of their own system, from the supposed bad characters of the promoters of the former, is, in principle, not one whit more sound.

We might let the matter rest here, as even the general answer just given is abundantly sufficient for the vindication both of the Reformers and the Reformation. We are not, however, disposed to stop at this point, but we shall proceed to examine the question more in detail; and we undertake to show not only that the assumed facts are false, and that the argument founded upon them is nugatory; but that, if it be admitted to be valid, it puts into Protestant hands a weapon which may be wielded with the most deadly effect against the very system which it was framed to uphold—viz., the system of the Papacy.

We have then two distinct assertions to deal with—first, that the principal Reformers were selfish, worthless, and wicked men; and, secondly, that the fact of their being so necessarily vitiates everything which proceeded from them. We will discuss the second point first, because if it be once shown that such an inference is untenable or proves too much, the cause of the Reformation, about which we are more concerned than about the characters of its promoters, remains unshaken, whatever may be said or thought of the motives or acts of the Reformers.

* "Controversial Catechism," by Rev. S. Keenan. Edinb., 1851.

Now, in the first place, it is most important to bear in mind that Luther and the rest of the Reformers did not seek to set up a system of their own devising in opposition to that of Rome. They objected to certain received dogmas and practices that they were unscriptural and opposed to the teaching and usages of the best ages of the Church. Their professed design was to free the existing Church from the corruptions which had gradually overspread it in the lapse of ages, and to bring it back to the simplicity and purity of primitive times. This design they sought to effect by directing men's attention to Holy Scripture, as the authentic record of the Divine will, and asking them to judge for themselves whether the doctrines and practices against which they protested were or were not conformable to the letter or spirit of the Gospel. No matter, then, what their motives or what their private characters may have been, such was the professed object of the Reformers, and such were the means which they employed to compass it. To the written Word of God, as the sole ultimate standard of truth, and to the teaching of the primitive Church, embodied in the Creeds, the Reformers ever appealed, utterly rejecting the notion that they intended, like the heretics and schismatics of old, to call in question those doctrines for which clear Scriptural warrant could be produced, or those institutions and rites which could be shown to have been established by sufficient ecclesiastical authority and not to be contrary to Holy Scripture.

Against such a design, prosecuted by such means, it is utterly idle to object that its promoters were influenced by base and unworthy motives. Admitting, for argument's sake, that the existence of such motives is compatible with the pursuit of such an end, every one sees that the excellence of the latter is not compromised by contact with the former. It is unnecessary to appeal to Scripture in support of so self-evident a proposition. If Scripture proof were wanting, it exists in abundance. Thus, our Blessed Lord says to His disciples and the multitude, "The Scribes and the Pharisees have sitten on the chair of Moses. All things, therefore, whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do; but according to their works do ye not: for they say and do not"—Matt. xxiii. 2, 3. Here a broad line of distinction is drawn between the doctrine taught, and the teachers of it. If the former be Scriptural, it is to be received with all attention and reverence, even though the life and conversation of the teachers may be in direct opposition to what they inculcate. And, in fact, it is, as every one knows, a fundamental tenet of the Roman Catholic, as well as of the Protestant Church, that the efficacy of the Sacraments is not impaired by the unworthiness of those who administer them. Again, St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Philippians, alludes to certain persons who were then preaching Christ in opposition to himself, and under the influence of strife and envy; but so far is he from deprecating such preaching, or warning his Philippian converts to beware of teaching coming from such a source, as necessarily dangerous and false, that, on the contrary, he rejoices at it. His words are as follow—"Some, indeed, even out of envy and contention; but some also for good will, preach Christ: some out of charity, knowing that I am set for the defence of the Gospel. And some out of contention preach Christ, not sincerely; supposing that they raise affliction to my bands. But what then? So that by all means, whether by occasion or by truth, Christ be preached; in this also I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" —Phil. i. 15, &c. If St. Paul had reasoned—with reverence be it spoken—as Mr. Keenan and those who agree with him do, he must have denounced the doctrine of such teachers as necessarily heretical and dangerous. They taught out of contention and strife and envy (the very motives attributed to the Reformers); and yet the apostle rejoiced that even from such motives Christ was preached. The doctrine he approved, while he condemned the unworthy motives of those who inculcated it.

But, in truth, such reasoning as that of Mr. Keenan is based on principles which involve an utter disregard of all that we learn from the Bible and from the course of God's natural providence, relative to the means which He employs in order to bring about His purposes. We need not now dwell on the numberless examples, furnished by the social and political history of the world, of means apparently most inadequate to, or even positively unfitted for, the accomplishment of certain ends, yet being the very means by which those ends were attained. We prefer to notice one or two of the numerous cases recorded in the Bible, which illustrate the great truth, that His ways are not our ways, nor His thoughts our thoughts.

Who would have believed, beforehand, that a hard-hearted and unfeeling tyrant would be selected as the means of displaying Jehovah's power and glory to all the earth? And yet, so it was. God himself says to Pharaoh—"Therefore have I raised thee, that I may show my power in thee, and my name may be spoken of throughout all the earth."—Exod. ix. 16, comp. Rom. 9, 17. Who would have conjectured, before the fact, that a greedy soothsayer—perhaps an enchanter—would have been chosen as the person to bless the hosts of the living God? Yet so it was. The evil purposes of Balaam were overruled by Divine appointment, so that his employer, Balak, was forced to exclaim in the bitterness of disappointed wrath—"I called thee to curse my enemies, and thou, on the contrary, hast blessed them three times."—Numbers xxiv. 10.

Let us now consider, for a moment, whether the New Testament history lends any support to Mr. Keenan's principle, that we are competent judges beforehand of the means by which God may be expected to effect His ends. We say Mr. Keenan's principle, because his argument against the Reformation, from the supposed unworthiness of the reformers, ultimately resolves itself into the position just stated. Let us then take as the most obvious tests of the correctness of his reasoning, the cases of our Blessed Lord and His disciples. Is anything more opposed to the received notions of the adaptation of means to ends, than the fact that the author of a new religion, destined to become co-extensive with the limits of the world, should have appeared among a people proverbially despised, and separated by civil and religious institutions from all the rest of the world? And yet the Redeemer was a despised Jew. Nay, more, he was a poor Galilean, despised even by the Jews themselves. Accordingly, his countrymen rejected him (and, on Mr. Keenan's principles, very naturally) on the ground—"Can any good thing come out of Galilee?" Dr. Newman—of whom, as a convert, the Church of Rome is so proud—will suggest to Mr. Keenan another Scriptural fact, connected with the Messiah, still more opposed to antecedent probability—"Is it not," says Dr. Newman,* "very strange, and very significant, that our Lord and Saviour, the immaculate Lamb of God, should be descended not only from virtuous Ruth, the Moabitess, but also from incestuous Tamar?" We earnestly commend this "significant" fact to the attention of Mr. Keenan, and those who argue as he does.

And if we pass on from our Lord to his Apostles, we find a further illustration of the fact that the means employed by Divine Wisdom, are often antecedently improbable. What more unlikely than that a few ignorant Galilean fishermen should have been commissioned to revolutionize the world by the preaching of the religion of one who had been just condemned to the most ignominious of deaths? Might not any Jew or heathen have fairly argued, on the principles of Mr. Keenan—"It is utterly impossible that an all-wise and all-powerful Being should intend to accomplish a vast religious revolution by such means as these?" The Jew might add, still reasoning as Mr. Keenan does—"If Jehovah designed to effect a reformation of the Mosaic law, he would, doubtless, employ as His instruments the authorized heads and teachers of the established religion, the divinely-instituted priesthood, and the great ecclesiastical Council of the nation, presided over by the High Priest. An irregular movement, such as you Peter, James, John, and the rest of you, are agitating, must be the result of delusion or of fraud." Such would be the natural inference, on the principles adopted by Mr. Keenan. But hear what God himself says, speaking by his inspired Apostle, St. Paul—"But the foolish things of the world hath God chosen, that he may confound the wise; and the weak things of the world hath God chosen, that he may confound the strong. And the base things of the world, and the things that are contemptible hath God chosen; and things that are not, that he might bring to nought things that are; that no flesh should glory in his sight."—1 Cor. 1, 27, &c.

And this suggests a word, in conclusion, regarding the case of the Apostle Paul himself. What more unlikely beforehand, than that the mightiest champion of the Christian faith, the great Apostle of the Gentiles, should have been chosen from among that sect which was noted at once for the bitterest animosity against the religion of Jesus, and the most bigoted attachment to Judaism? And yet, so it was. Saul, of Tarsus, "a strict Pharisee, a blasphemer, a persecutor, and contumelious" (1 Tim. i. 13), was selected "as a vessel of election to carry Christ's name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel."—Acts ix. 15.

It is, we trust, unnecessary to guard ourselves against the misconception that, in anything that has just been said, we intend to institute a comparison between the characters of the Reformers on the one hand, and those of our Lord and His apostles on the other. We utterly disclaim any such intention. Our object has been, to show the unsoundness of the principles in Mr. Keenan's argument against the doctrines of the Reformation, derived from the seeming unfitness of the means then made use of to effect an end really designed by God. And if the facts and considerations just adduced be carefully weighed, they must, unless we are greatly mistaken, cause any reasonable man to pause before he assents to principles opposed to what we learn from God's dealings in Providence as well as in Revelation.

In our next number we propose to show how dangerous a weapon this argument of Mr. Keenan's (admitted to be valid) puts into our hands against the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome itself.

* Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church, p. 438.

RESULTS OF INTOLERANCE—REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES.

In a former number of this publication we called the attention of our readers to the intolerance of the Roman Catholic system in all former periods of her history, and we pointed out that the boasted unity of that Church was really founded upon the extermination of all its opponents. The example we then brought forward as illustrating the application of their system and its results was Spain, and we showed how intimately the intolerance of Rome, as carried out in that country, was connected with the decay and present prostration of that once potent and flourishing monarchy.

Our next instance of the same result, flowing from the same causes, shall be drawn from the history of France, and though this connection may not at first sight appear so obvious, we do not doubt that a little consideration will satisfy any impartial mind, that the fall of the French monarchy, the expulsion of the Bourbons, and the anarchy and confusion that has existed in that country for the last fifty years, may, in a great measure, be traced to that act of Louis XIV. so applauded at Rome, so startling to Protestant Europe—namely, the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

In France, far advanced as she was amongst the nations of Europe in the arts and sciences, the Reformation had originally made great progress. The birth-place of Calvin and of Le Fevre, the reformed doctrines had also found favour with many of the nobles, and had been embraced by the sister of the king, and by several of the princes of the blood. We are not going to recount here the scenes enacted in that country in the 16th century; the horrors of St. Bartholomew; the long civil war which the French Roman Catholics, instigated by the Court of Rome and aided by the Spaniards—the hereditary enemies of the French monarchy—carried on against their lawful sovereign because he was a Protestant, are too well known to need recapitulation here; but we propose to take up the history of French Protestantism at that period when the intestine discords of France were at length healed by the establishment of Henry IV. on the throne, and by the peace which, founded on the Edict of Nantes, secured to the Huguenots the right of worshipping God in the way their consciences allowed them.

That edict was promulgated in the year 1598, and for a period of thirty years that followed it, the Huguenots, instigated by ambitious chiefs, and distrustful, perhaps, of their old enemies, abused its provisions, and laid themselves open to the charge of rebellion and insubordination. In 1629, however, the vigorous measures of Richelieu, and the capture of Rochelle, left the Huguenots without the ability of giving further resistance to the government, and thenceforth, deserted by their former leaders—the Condes, the Turennes, and the Rohans—they devoted themselves entirely to the arts of peace. A recent French author, M. Weiss, who has written their history, says—"Compelled to apply themselves to agriculture, trade and manufactures, they abundantly compensated themselves for the other restraints imposed upon them. The vast plains they possessed in Bearn and the western provinces were covered with rich harvests. In Languedoc, the cantons peopled by them became the best cultivated, and the most fertile, often in spite of the badness of the soil. The skilful vine-dressers of Berri restored its former prosperity to that district. Those of the Pay Messin became the elite of the population of more than 25 villages; the gardeners of the same province brought their art to a degree of perfection previously unknown. The Protestants who dwelt in towns devoted themselves to manufactures and trade, and displayed an activity, an intelligence, and, at the same time an integrity which perhaps has never been surpassed in any country. In Guienne they took possession of almost the whole of the wine trade. In Alencon almost all the trade passed through the hands of about 4,000 Protestants. Those of Caen resold to English and Dutch merchants linen and woollen cloths manufactured at Vere, Falaise, and Argentan. The important trade which Metz maintained with Germany was almost entirely in the hands of the Huguenots. It was also to the Protestants that France owed the developement of its maritime trade at Bordeaux, La Rochelle, and the Norman ports. In the provinces of Picardy, Champagne, Normandy, the Isle of France, in Touraine, Lyonnais and Languedoc, it was they who created the most important manufactures." Previous to the Revocation of the Edict, we are told by the same author, "France possessed the finest woollen manufactures, and shared with the English, Dutch, and Italians, the rich trade in cloth. At Sedan the manufacture of arms, of implements of husbandry, of scythes, buckles, and, in general, of all kinds of steel and iron articles, had become very considerable. The fine hats of Caudebec found an immense sale in England and Germany. They were manufactured exclusively by Protestant workmen. The beautiful paper manufactures in Auvergne and the Angoumois were also in their hands. It was the Protestants who gave to France the magnificent linen manufactures that so long enriched her north-western provinces. Such was the extent of this manufacture, that in one branch of it alone, the English bought, at Morlaix, every year, 4,500,000 livres' worth, a fact verified by the register of the duties they paid for the stamp on their export from the kingdom. The silk manufactures of Tours and Lyons, so flourishing in the middle of the 17th century, are also said to have owed nearly all their splendour to the industry of Protestant workmen." Such, we are told, was the position of the Protestants prior to the Revocation of the Edict.

It now remains to notice what the Revocation actually was, and its results. From 1662 down to 1685, a series of measures were adopted, all tending to the injury of the Protestants. They were gradually excluded from all public employment, prohibited from entering any profession, and assailed in the daily exercise of their religion, in the education of their children, and in the management of their families. In 1680 a royal declaration forbade Catholics to embrace the reformed religion under penalty of the galleys for life. An edict of 1681 allowed children to abjure at the age of seven years; and if a child of that age could be induced to enter a church, to kiss an image of the Virgin, or make the sign of the cross, any of these acts was sufficient to justify the taking the child from its parent, and compelling them to make an allowance for its maintenance, proportionate to their supposed ability. In the same year, 1681, began also the dragonnades, which meant the quartering of soldiers upon the Protestants, with an unlimited license to plunder and oppress them;* and to this treatment all the provinces in the kingdom were, in turn, subjected. At last, in October, 1685, the Edict of Nantes was revoked. By the Edict of Revocation the temples of the Protestants were directed to be demolished, and all exercise of their worship to cease, as well in private houses as in the castles of the nobles, under pain of confiscation of body and goods. Ministers who refused to be converted were ordered to quit the kingdom within fifteen days, under pain of the galleys. Protestant schools were to be closed; children born after the publication of the edict were to be baptized by the parish priest, and brought up in the religion of Rome. A period of four months was granted to refugees to return to France and abjure; that term expired, their property was to be confiscated. All the provisions of the law, regarding relapsed converts, were confirmed; and, to complete the iniquity of this decree, it was also ordered, "Under pain of the galleys, for men, and of imprisonment, confiscation of goods, for the women, that no Protestant should quit the kingdom, or carry their goods abroad." Such was the terms of the edict that revoked the Edict of Nantes. All the Protestants who could escape, and who preferred exile to a denial of their religion departed, and though we are told by the author, from whose work we quote, that it is now impossible to ascertain the exact number who left, yet he computes, that out of one million at least 250,000 or 300,000 left France. In a celebrated memorial, addressed to Louvois in 1688, Vauban deplores the desertion of 100,000 men, the exit of 60 millions of livres, the ruin of trade, hostile fleets recruited by 9,000 of the best sailors in the kingdom, hostile armies by 600 officers and 12,000 soldiers inured to war.

Nor was this all that France suffered by the Revocation. What France lost others gained, The emigrants carried to England, to Ireland, to Holland, and to Prussia, the industry, the knowledge, and the skill which had hitherto enriched France. And we shall now proceed to enumerate the various manufactures which owed their origin and success in this country to the Huguenot refugees:—

It appears an ascertained fact, that in consequence of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, In 1685, 70,000 manufacturers and artisans, who came principally from Normandy, the western maritime provinces, Lyons, and Tonraine, were dispersed throughout England, the greater number of whom established themselves in London, in the neighbourhood of Soho, St. Giles, and the uninhabited parts of Spitalfields, which were almost exclusively peopled by them, and which still are inhabited by their descendants. The English are indebted to them for many new branches of industry, and the improvement of others. Thus, for instance, before this period, nothing but a very common description of paper was made, and from the Continent, chiefly from France, the superior qualities of glass and hats were imported, and many other articles in common use. It was to the French emigrants, that the English are indebted for the manufacture of the superior qualities of the above articles, as also for the lighter make (tissue) in linens, woollens, and silks; also, for brocades, satins, velvets, clocks, watches, cutlery, hardware, locks, spits, surgical instruments, and children's toys. The Bill of Rights, which in 1680 rendered the liberty of the people sacred, and secured the property of the individual, added still more to the influence exercised by the French artificers, and became the signal for the unprecedented extension of English manufacture, commerce, and navigation. Of all the manufactures introduced by the refugees into England, none became so extensive as that of silk. It was at Blackfriars, in Canterbury, that some intelligent artisans from Tours and Lyons first established themselves. In 1694 their numbers had so increased that they possessed already 1,000 looms, giving employment to 2,700 workmen. The principal number, however, ended by establishing themselves permanently at London, in the neighbourhood of Spitalfields; from this their manufacture spread to Dublin, where it flourished to an unexpected degree. Thus, at this period, England and Ireland presented the ever memorable examples of a manufacture which owed its origin to a foreign country—the materials employed in it all coming from abroad—and yet arriving at such a state of advancement as to equal, sometimes even to surpass, the productions of the very places where it had so long been cultivated. Models of looms, similar to those used in the towns of Tours and Lyons, were brought over by the French artisans, who instructed the English in the improved method of weaving; they taught them how to manufacture brocades, satins, thick black silks (known as Padua silks), watered silks, black and fancy velvets, and mixed materials of silk and cotton.

The embroidered silks, which, at the close of the seventeenth century, were produced by the London manufacturers, were due to the industry, almost exclusively, of three refugees, named Lausen, Mariscot, and Monoceaux. The artist who furnished the designs was, in like manner, a refugee, named Baudouin; and a common workman, of the name of Mongeorge, brought over to them from Lyons, the secret, lately discovered there, of giving a gloss to taffetas. The French Ambassador, Barillon, made him (at the express command of Louis XIV., transmitted by the Minister Louvois) the most attractive offers to induce him to return to his country; it was too late. This secret, which, by a happy accident, Octavio Mai had discovered, which had raised his fallen fortune, and had since that time become a source of wealth to the whole of the Lyons manufacturers, had been made public. The English had been, in the habit, until this time, of purchasing every year 200,000 crowns worth of black lustred taffetas, manufactured expressly for England, and known by the name of English taffetas; 150 cases, each weighing from 400 to 500 pounds weight, were frequently, during one fair, exported to England. The British Government (after the Revocation) tripled the duty, which, until then, had been put upon this article on its entrance into England. It cost the French merchants, soon after this, fifty-three per cent. to get these taffetas into that country. In 1698 they were entirely prohibited. From the close of the seventeenth century, the English manufacture supplied not only its own home consumption, but that of other countries, with taffetas, and various other kinds of silks, formerly supplied by France. By the invention of the stocking loom, the English were enabled to export, even to Italy, quantities of silk stockings, and at advantageous prices. It is stated by Keyles, the traveller, who, in 1739, travelled over Europe—that in the kingdom of Naples, when a shop-keeper wished strongly to recommend his silks, he maintained they were of English manufacture. During the whole of the eighteenth and half of the nineteenth centuries England witnessed the increase, year by year, of her revenues, by means of that fine manufacture bequeathed to her by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

The importations of raw silk which England brought from abroad was about one million pounds weight; at the present day it exceeds 5,500,000 pounds weight. In 1820, the acknowledged value of the silk stuffs exported to Germany, Belgium, Holland, the United States, and even to France, amounted to £371,000; in 1847, to £978,000; and in 1849, the exportation to France alone of articles of silk, of English production, was 4,000,000 of francs

Previous to the Revocation the intelligence of the manufacturers of Lyons, and the expertness of its artizans, had placed that town foremost in rank for its manufacture of satins, taffetas, velvets, and damasks. The looms of Italy, little by little, had yielded to this formidable rivalry, and France seemed destined to keep the monopoly of this fine manufacture, when religious persecution forced more than one-half of its weavers to expatriate themselves. Let us bear in mind that in 1698 the number of looms at Lyons had decreased from 11,000 to 4,000; that the 8,000 looms at Tours were reduced to 1,200; its 700 mills to 70; its 40,000 workmen to 4,000; its 3,000 ribbon looms to less than 60; and instead of its 2,400 bales of silks, not more than 700 to 800 were consumed in the capital of La Tonraine.

Before the Revocation, the English were in the habit of purchasing, in Normandy and Brittany, a great portion of the sail-cloths employed by them. In 1669 this article alone cost them £171,000. It was also in the above-named province that they procured bleached linens, which they sold again in the West Indies. In 1681 the elders and deacons belonging to the French Church, in Threadneedle-street, supplied funds for the establishment of a manufactory of bleached linens at Ipswich, where a considerable number of refugees were granted permission by Charles II. to found a colony. It was a Protestant, named Bonhome, one of the most clever of the manufacturers in flax materials in Paris, who extended this branch of industry in England, and taught the English the manufacture of sail-cloths. In 1685 fresh refugees added the manufacture of sail-clothe to that of bleached linens, established four years previously at Ipswich. Other linen manufactures were established in different towns throughout England; the result was a great decrease in the sale of these fabrics, both in Brittany and Normandy. The shopkeepers at St. Malo made a complaint to Bonrepaus on the subject. Twelve years later the trade in bleached linens, at Morlaix, had diminished two-thirds. At Brest and at Landernau the trade in hempen cloths had almost entirely disappeared. Not only Protestant operatives, but a vast number of Roman Catholics, had crossed the Channel to follow their masters. There must have been at least 4,000 who left the towns of Rennes, Nantes, and Vitré; had they continued in France, they must have found themselves reduced to the necessity of abandoning their trade and cultivating the soil, like many of their former companions.

The splendid linen manufacture of Coutances totally disappeared. The entire number of manufacturers and operatives had in succession emigrated to Jersey or Guernsey, and thence to England; and, of the 20,000 working men who manufactured fine linens at Laval, upwards of 14,000 had left the kingdom.

The minister Seignelay felt deeply the decline of a branch of industry but lately so flourishing in France, and by his orders ten pistoles were offered by Bonrepaus to every operative at Ipswich who would return. To accomplish his end more surely, Bonrepaus represented himself as the partner of a wealthy manufacturer, who promised to ensure to them a far more lucrative employment in their own country. Through cunning and falsehood, he ultimately succeed in ruining the manufacture of sail cloth at Ipswich, and then that of bleached linens. He expended on this grand exploit 300 crowns. Several other factories were destroyed in a similar manner, through his malicious exertions. Bonrepan's endeavors, however, did not last beyond the reign of James II., and on the Revolution of 1688, new manufactures of sail-cloth and bleached linens were established by the refugees in England and Ireland, where William III. fostered with all his power the introduction of this admirable trade. Printed calicoes were, for the first time, manufactured in England in 1690, by a refugee who established a manufactory on the Thames, near Richmond. A second, and a much more considerable one, was established at Bromley Hall, in Essex, which was removed to Lancashire. Other factories for printed calicoes were established near London at the beginning of the eighteenth century. They became a fresh loss to France—a fresh source of wealth to England.

The earliest manufacture of fine linens called "Cambrai linens," from their having originally been made in that town, was introduced by the refugees. Previous to the Revocation, the English were in the habit of purchasing yearly to the amount of £200,000 of these. It was, therefore, with extreme satisfaction that they received the operatives from Tournay and Cambrai, who brought them this beautiful manufacture. Many of these established themselves, later, in Scotland, when the town of Edinburgh granted to them, in 1730, five acres of land, on which to erect a large factory for the weaving of cambrics. The quarter once inhabited by them bears still the name of Picardy.

After the reign of Elizabeth, numerous Protestant artizans, who had come from Flanders, Brabant, and France, established themselves in London and Sandwich, and thence dispersed themselves through all the manufacturing towns of England, where they carried on a manufacture of serges, flannels, and woollen cloths. This last manufacture was particularly extended and improved by the refugees. It was stated by the members of the houses of Lords and Commons, in a conference in the year 1703, and in justification of the aid granted to the Protestant outlaws, that to them they were indebted for the establishment of many new and useful manufactures, and for the improvement of the old, so much so, that during the last few years the exportation of woollens had exceeded, by upward of £1,000,000 sterling, the exportation of this article under Charles II.

The first manufacture of carpets in England, after the manner of the "Gobelins," was established by an old Capuchin monk, who had been sent over by his superiors as a missionary. Discouraged, probably, by his want of success in his endeavours at conversion, he became a Protestant, and, under the name of Parisot, founded a carpet manufactory at Fulham. He was assisted in the undertaking by the English nobility, who lent him the sum of £10,000. The first attempt was unsuccessful; the manufactory was sold; but a refugee, named Passavan, having bought it at a low price, removed it to Exeter, where he carried it on prosperously, aided by some of the artizans from the "Gobelins," who had been tempted over by the promises of his predecessor. Bonrepaus, writing in 1686, from London, says—"The other manufactures established in this country are the hats of Candebec, and the manner of dressing chamois skins." The manufacture of hats was really one of the most important with which the refugees endowed England. It had been in France almost exclusively in the hands of Protestants; they alone possessed the secret for the composition used in dressing rabbit, hare, and beaver skins; they alone held the commerce of the fine quality of hats, made at Candebec, so much in fashion in both England and Holland. After the Revocation, the greater number of these manufacturers withdrew to London, carrying with them the secret of their art, which was thus lost to France for upwards of forty years. It was not until the middle of the eighteenth century that a French hatter, named Mathieu, after having worked for a long time in London, gained possession of the secret brought over by the refugees, carried it back with him to his country, and generously imparted it to the hat manufacturers of Paris, and founded an extensive factory in the Faubourg St. Antoine. Before this fortunate theft, the French nobility, and all who piqued themselves on any degree of elegance, wore none but those of English manufacture; and even at Rome the cardinals caused their hats to be procured from the celebrated manufactory at Wandsworth, established by the refugees. In England, the felt hats, made by the French, and known by the name of Carolines, had become so much the rage as to excite the jealousy of the English hatters, who in vain complained of a preference bestowed on hats which were (according to them) both inconvenient and inferor to their's in quality and durability.

The only paper manufactured in England before the Revocation was produced by the manufacturers of Kent, particularly from the extensive establishment at Dartford; it was a brownish, coarse kind of paper. The first manufactories of superior qualities of white paper were established in London in 1685 and 1686, by French tradesmen who came from Castelfaloux, Theirs, and Angouleme principally, which, in consequence, lost three-fourths of its paper mills. Barillon succeeded (by the same means as those employed by Bonrepaus) in destroying the manufactories founded by them in their adopted country. He distributed amongst the workmen of one factory alone to the amount of 2,800 francs, in order to decide them on returning into France. Six months after, he announced to Louis XIV. that he had expended 1,150 francs in order to induce 500 workmen who remained behind to recross the Channel. In the reign of William III., however, all these factories which had been destroyed were re-established by the Protestants, and England finally remained in possession of this branch of industry.

With these facts before us is it possible to disconnect the fall of the French monarchy with the fatal edict of 1685? The century that elapsed from the promulgation of the edict of Nantes in 1598 to its revocation in 1685 saw the French monarchy increase in power and consideration, and the close of that period saw France the arbiter of Europe. Another

* Some idea of the draggonades may be formed from the following statements of one of the sufferers, Jacob de Bye: "Six devils of dragoons fell to my charge, and afterwards 15 others, who, having shut me up in a room, made me eat and drink with them, sending for all sorts of dainties from the inns, flooding the floors with the best of wines, and as soon as night came, beginning to break and burn our furniture. That done, they set me in a chair, saying, with many foul expressions—'Thou dog of a Huguenot, you know that the king orders us to do all the evil your accursed body is capable of enduring; if you wish to be spared give us two louis d'ors a man.' The money was given. An hour afterwards one of the worst threw the money at his head, saying—'Dog of a Huguenot, I prefer to return thee thy money, and to torment thee.' They then put me in a chair near a great fire, took off my shoes and stockings, and burned my feet, letting the tallow of the candle drop upon them."

century passes and the French monarchy, though, during that period, it might boast the outward unity of its subjects, falls under the weight of those financial difficulties, which, undoubtedly, were aggravated, if not created by the loss of trade and commerce that followed that fatal Edict of Revocation. And who is there that does not read, in that subsequent history, the retribution that has followed on that great crime? The Bourbons and the great and wealthy Church, that then conspired to extirpate Protestantism, are proscribed and driven from France, and if again restored, restored to an uncertain and precarious dominion. The so-called heresy, supposed to be extirpated, still flourishes. And if the promise so often arrogated by the Church of Rome, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against her, be indeed intended for any visible church, who can put forward a stronger claim to the fulfilment of that promise than that persecuted Church which has outlived the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the dragonnades of 1681, the proscription of 1685, the persecution of a century, and still numbers its members by hundreds of thousands, and can show, amongst its professors, many of the most distinguished names in France.

THE INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.*

WE showed in our number for October, 1853, vol. II., page 110, column 3, what a vast and comprehensive system of tribunals the Roman Church, for three hundred years past, has provided for judging of books.

The duties of those tribunals are, as we then showed—

1. To condemn and prohibit such books as they will not permit to be read at all.

2. To correct books which they may think capable of being corrected, by blotting out and altering whatever they think fit.

3. To give a formal sanction, on the part of the Church, to such books as they think fit to be read.

Hence we have—1. The Index Prohibitorius, or list of books that are not to be read at all.

2. The Index Expurgatorius, or list of passages to be corrected in books before they may be read.

3. The approbation prefixed to each book published in countries where these laws of the Church of Rome can be enforced.

We then undertook to show what kind of things the Church of Rome sends forth to be read with the express approbation of those tribunals. This, of course, is to be shown from the "approbation" printed in the beginning of the books published.

We undertook also to show what sort of things the Church of Rome condemns, and will not allow to be published and read, when she can stop it.

This may be shown either from the list of prohibited books, or the list of expurgated books. But it is best to show it from the latter list; for this reason: if we take a passage from a prohibited book, and say "The Church of Rome forbids this," Roman Catholics may fairly say, "The Church forbids the book, but does not say for what particular things she forbids it; and it may be that it was not for this particular passage that she forbid it, but for some other heretical things contained in it;" and this might be true enough. But in expurgated books the matter is made plain, because the Index Expurgatorius expressly points out the very passages that are to be blotted out or altered; and these are, of course, the passages that the Church of Rome considers heretical, or dangerous to faith or morals; and we, therefore, find here exactly what she condemns.

There is, however, a difficulty in choosing the Index Expurgatorius. For while the Index Prohibitorius, or list of forbidden books, was always published freely to the world, the Index Expurgatorius was as carefully concealed. The reason is evident. It was desirable that every one should know what books were forbidden; but when the books of some great man were altered, by cutting out some passages, and changing others to an opposite meaning, it was not desirable that every one should know that; it was thought much better that people should not know that the Church of Rome had found occasion to alter his writings; but that they should think they had the real opinions of that great man, when in fact they only had the opinions which the correctors permitted him to give, or put into his mouth for him. Hence, the Index Expurgatorius was carefully kept secret. It is true, they had to print it, in order that all those who had to see that books were corrected, might know how to do it; but all these persons were strictly required to keep the printed index quite secret. It was only by accident that copies were at first discovered, and it is possible that there are many such lists of expurgated books not yet published or known.

When the first Index Expurgatorius was discovered, this was found on the back of the title page—"By the decree and command of the Duke of Alba, let care be taken that no one, except the king's head printer, should print this Index; nor that he, nor any other, should publicly or privately sell it, or have it, without permission from the ordinaries" (i.e., the bishops). A diploma of Philip the Second, King of Spain, forbids copies of the Index to be given to any but the examiners of books, who were not to lend it, nor let any one take a copy of it. Gretzer, the Jesuit, says, this Index was not made "that it should be read and made common by everybody, but by those only to whom the duty of correcting and expurgating books was committed."—De Jure et More prohib. libr. p. 17. And he asks—"What was that Index to other people?" (p. 11.) However, notwithstanding all precautions that could be taken, copies of some lists came to light, and were published; which we shall use from time to time.

We can, in this number, give but one or two instances; but more will follow hereafter.

We take as our first instance of the things which the Church of Rome wishes to blot out, the Bible of Vatablus. Of course the correctors could not think of blotting passages out of the Bible itself; but they would think notes on the Bible a fair subject; and the Bible then most used by the learned, was the Bible which had the notes of Vatablus in it.

We extract the following account of this book from the learned Roman Catholic, Du Pin.* Vatablus, who was a a Roman Catholic, was the most learned man of his time in the Hebrew language. The French King, Francis I., made choice of him to be Regius Professor of Hebrew. He made so learned lectures on the Sacred Scriptures that people came from all parts to hear them. He spoke his lectures, and did not write them. His hearers took down in writing many of his notes on the Old Testament. Robert Stephens, a famous printer in Paris, got these notes collected, and printed them in a Bible. Du Pin says of these notes—"These notes are very useful for the understanding of the text; because there are few difficult passages but what he explains in a few words, according to the most natural sense." However, as the printer was a Protestant, the book got a bad name, and was condemned by the University of Paris, who, as Du Pin says, "were not sufficiently acquainted with the Hebrew tongue." However, "the doctors of the university of Salamanca (in Spain) were more favourable to this work (though Roman Catholics also), and caused the text and the notes of Vatablus's Bible to be printed in Spain, with approbation. Stephens defended them against the censures of the divines of Paris, and since that time they have been almost generally received, and approved of by men of learning."

Such a commentary on the Bible, of course, attracted particular notice, and it is expressly mentioned in the 3rd of the Ten Rules, drawn up by the committee of the Council of Trent, and sanctioned by Pope Pius IV. "But if any notes are circulated with versions of this kind which are permitted, or with the Vulgate edition, SUSPECTED PLACES HAVING BEEN EXPUNGED by the faculty of theology of any Catholic university, or by the general Inquisition, they (the notes) may be permitted to those persons, to whom the versions are permitted; upon which conditions the whole volume of the Bible, which is commonly called the Bible of Vatablus, or parts of it, may be conceded to pious and learned men."†

Of course a book which was of such importance as to be specially mentioned in this rule, would be corrected with more than ordinary care. It was accordingly corrected by the master of the Pope's Palace, who, as our readers have seen in our number for October (vol. II., p. 111, col. 1), was the person whose duty it was to correct books at Rome. A copy of that Vatican Index has been published,‡ and there we find what corrections were thought necessary.

On the 18th chapter of Exodus, Vatablus's Bible had this note—"Moyses secundum leges Dei judicat lites populi;" that is—"Moses judges the people according to the laws of God."—See verse 16. On this the Index Expurgatorius says—"Deleantur illa verba"—"let those words be blotted out!" Now, really it is hard to see what harm there could be in that note. Every one must admit that what the note says is quite true; but, perhaps, the note might have put it into some one's head to think, that if Moses in old times went by the laws of God, the priests ought to do so now.

In the 26th chapter of Leviticus, the Bible of Vatablus had this note on the margin, or edge of the page—"Sculptilia prohibet fieri"—"he forbids graven things to be made;" and on this the Index says—"deleatur illud"—"let that be blotted out!" Well, now, really this precaution might seem almost useless; for the very same thing is found in the very first verse of the chapter itself. In the Latin Bible itself, which the Council of Trent pronounced authentic, the first verse has this in it—"Non facietis vobis idolum et Sculptile"—"you shall not make to yourselves any idol or graven thing."—Douay translation. Now, what great harm was it to put a note on the edge of the page beside this verse—"He forbids graven things to be made?" Was this note any worse than the word of God itself? Yet the master of the Pope's palace tells the booksellers at Rome that they shall never sell a copy till that note is blotted out! But some one will ask, what great use could there be in blotting out the note, when they dare not blot the words out of the Bible itself? We answer; the use of putting a note beside a verse in the Bible, is to call people's attention to that verse: the use of blotting out the note is to prevent people's attention being called to that verse. Surely it was bad enough to have those words in the Bible, without having people's attention called to them in that way.

Again, in the 4th chapter of Deuteronomy, these two notes were, in like manner, placed in the margin—"Exhortation against any similitude to be adored"—"that images should not be made which might be adored." "Let that be blotted out," says the Index, of each! Now, considering that the Douay Bible itself thus translates verse 16, of that chapter—"Lest perhaps being deceived you might make you a graven similitude, or image of male or female," those notes do not seem more worthy of being blotted out than the words of the Bible itself. The offence of those notes was, that they called people's attention to what was in the Bible.

Again in the seventh chapter of the 1st Book of Kings,* there was this note in the margin—"Serviendum soli Deo"—"God only is to be served;" and, of course, the Index says as before, "Let those words be blotted out!" Now the Douay Bible itself translates the third verse of that chapter thus:....."prepare your hearts unto the Lord, and serve him only....." What harm then to put this note beside that verse, "God only is to be served?" Why blot out these notes, except it be that calling people's attention to these verses of God's word strikes terror into the hearts of the Pope and tribunals and officers of the Church of Rome?

Again, the first verse of the 66th chapter of Isaiah stands thus in the Douay Bible—"Thus saith the Lord, Heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool; what is this house that you will build to me, and what is this place of my rest?" Beside this verse the Bible of Vatablus had this note—"God dwelleth not in temples made by hand." Now, it so happens that this note was not made by Vatablus: it was made by the Martyr St. Stephen, speaking by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost; so we read in the Douay Bible, Acts vii. 48—"The Most High dwelleth not in houses made by hand, AS THE PROPHET SAITH, Heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool, &c." So it was the Martyr St. Stephen that made that comment on that verse of Isaiah, the Holy Ghost inspiring him to do so; and all that poor Vatablus did, was to take that note, and place it beside the verse to which the Holy Ghost applied it. But this was more than the master of the sacred palace could stand; so he put his thumb upon that—"LET THAT BE BLOTTED OUT."

What reason could there be but this, that if the note of St. Stephen on that verse of Isaiah be true, the consecrated wafer cannot be the Lord Jesus Christ, and transubstantiation is false?

Now, let the reader turn back for a moment to that third rule of the Council of Trent, which directed how the notes in the Bible of Vatablus were to be corrected—"Suspected places having been expunged:" what was there to suspect in these notes? What design could have been suspected in them, except a design to call attention to what is in the word of God? That, then, was the object of "suspicion" at Rome.

We might give many more instances from this book; but we must be brief. Still we cannot pass by the Index; for the Church of Rome corrects the Index of a book too, for fear it should help people to find what is dangerous to faith or morals. Rule V. provides expressly for this; and in that Vatican Index Expurgatorius we find the following direction about the Index in the Bible of Vatablus:—"In the indexes of these books of the Old and New Testaments, let the subjoined propositions be blotted out as SUSPECTED." We give here two or three of the suspected propositions in italics, (and marked thus: Prop.) placing after each, the verse of the Bible to which it may be supposed to refer.

Prop.—He who believes in Christ shall not die eternally.

Verse—"God so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son; that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting."—John iii. 16, Douay Bible; see also chapter v. 24, and chapter xi. 26.

Prop.—Hearts are purified by faith.

Verse—"Purifying their hearts by faith."—Acts xv. 9, Douay Bible.

Our readers now see what things Rome suspects, and wishes TO BLOT OUT, by means of the tribunals and the laws which she has established for judging of books.

Now for what she sanctions and approves by those same tribunals; and here for the present we must be very brief.

Our readers may remember a paper quoted by us, in our last article on this subject (vol II., p. 110, col. 3), from Azorius—"The image is to be worshipped with the same honour and worship with which we worship those whose image it is."—Instit. Moral. p. 1, l. 9. c. 6). The sanction of the tribunals of the Church of Rome has been given to the works of Azorius, and it is printed in them; and the tribunals never thought it necessary to blot out that. Let Roman Catholics compare this fact with the notes above given about worshipping images, which they have blotted out.

We stated in our number for August (vol. II., p. 91, col. 3), that the great Pascal, himself a Roman Catholic, has collected these opinions, among others, out of the works of the Jesuits—"That it is lawful for a gentleman to kill on the spot any one who strikes him a blow, in order to preserve his honour; that it is lawful to fight a duel, to preserve his honour; that it is lawful for servants to steal, if they

* This paper would have appeared before as promised, and has actually been in type for several months, but want of room obliged us to postpone it.—Ed. C. L.

* History of Eccl. writers, vol. iii., p. 399. Ed. Dublin, 1723.
† Rule III., printed at the end of the Council of Trent.
‡ We take it from an exact reprint, published by the Rev. R. Gibbings. Dublin, 1837

* Called the First Book of Samuel in the Protestant Bible.

think their wages too small; that priests or monks may lawfully kill those who injure them or their order; that it is lawful to kill those who speak ill of us, if we cannot stop them in any other way; that it is lawful to circulate false slanders against those who we fear may hurt us; that it is not the duty of Christians to avoid immediate occasions of sin, if their doing so should give a handle for people talking or be inconvenient to them;" also (In p. 92, col. 1), that "the command is not so much to love God as not to hate him."

All these horrible opinions Pascal found in books approved and sanctioned by the authorized tribunals of the Church of Rome!* Those tribunals had not thought it necessary to blot out any of those things! The books of the Jesuits pass easily; not like the Bible of Vatablus. The Jesuits are "safe men"—they will never teach that "images are not to be worshipped," or that "God alone is to be served," or that "hearts are purified by faith," or that "he who believes in the Lord Jesus Christ shall not die eternally;" and, therefore, the Jesuits are not objects of suspicion at Rome, and the Church of Rome does not think it necessary to blot out the greatest idolatries and impieties that they can publish in their books.

We shall return to this subject again; and in the mean time our readers may learn, from the examples we have given, something of the real object and practical working of that vast system which the Church of Rome has established of forbidding, correcting, and approving of books by her authorized tribunals. They may see as in a glass what doctrines the Church of Rome wishes to blot out from the minds of her members, and what doctrines she is willing to circulate among them.

TALK OF THE ROAD—NO. XXIII.

"Jem," said Pat, "do you mind the talk we had about the 'Glories of Mary?'"†

"I do, well, Pat," said Jem, "that won't be forgotten easy."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I have got a match for it anyway."

"And what is it, Pat?" said Jem.

"Why, then, it's the 'Glories of Joseph,' the husband of Mary," said Pat.

"Ay," said Jem, "and had he glories too?"

"Why, you know, in course Jem," said Pat, "sure a man wouldn't be behind his wife, you know."

"Well, but Pat," said Jem, "it isn't the same; for sure the Blessed Virgin was the real mother of Jesus Christ, but Joseph wasn't his father."

"Well, Jem, here's the book," said Pat, pulling a little book out of his pocket, with "The Glories of St. Joseph"‡ printed in big letters on it.

"Sure enough, there it is," said Jem; "what's coming now at all?"

Perhaps our readers are saying just the same; and if they read on they will know.

"Why, just listen to the sense of this, Jem," said Pat, "doesn't the book make Joseph as great as the Blessed Virgin herself? Just read this, man;" and so Jem read, "If, therefore, she be a princess, he is a prince; and he is also king wherever she is queen"—p. 15. "And now, Jem," said Pat, "isn't she the queen of heaven; and isn't it plain by the book that Joseph is the king of heaven?"

"Well, Pat, there's a big IF in that," said Jem.

"Sure there is, Jem," said Pat, "and don't I just want you to take the big IF along with you all through? IF she is the Queen of heaven sure her husband be to be the King.

"Well, Pat, I see it now," said Jem, "and sure enough there's more reason in you nor in the book; it's a great IF entirely."

"And in course, Jem," said Pat, "there's more follows on that; read this here;" so Jem read—"O rich Joseph, to whom God himself becomes a beggar!"—p. 16.

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "that does beat all; I wonder how any living man durst write it!"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "sure it follows quite natural, out of the big IF: will you read this now." So Jem read—"God helps us in all necessities by St. Joseph, as by his plenipotentiary, to let us understand, that as he was subject to him in all things upon earth as to a father, so he was the same in heaven, granting whatever he asked"—p. 47. "Now," said Pat, "isn't Joseph king in heaven, if God himself is subject to Joseph there?"

"Oh, Pat," said Jem, "it's too bad entirely for any Christian to listen to: I wonder the Irish people does not rise up at once again such things."

"Maybe the people is waiting for the priests and bishops to rise up again such things," said Pat; "sure, it is the bishops and priests that ought to put down books that teaches such shocking things again the Christian faith."

"Well, Pat, that's past waiting for. Sure, don't I see here in the first page, that it's printed by Grace, the great Catholic bookseller, and sure, the Bishops would have only to say the word to stop it at once."

"But who ever heard the bishop or the priests say one word against such books as that, Jem?" said Pat. "Sure they keep all that for the Bible. And, sure, look here at the end; here's all the indulgences that the popes give to every one that stands up for Joseph. Why, here's one that gives an indulgence of 300 days in purgatory to every one for every time that he prays to Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, all together. Why, how could the priests or the bishops go again that?"

"That's plain, Pat," said Jem; "we must quit all they say and do, to keep to Christ alone."

"Well, there's more things in it, Jem," said Pat, "sure Jesus, Mary, and Joseph is the Trinity on earth! (pages 17 and 26); and Joseph was the handsomest man at all; why wouldn't he? Sure the book says Jesus Christ wouldn't take an ugly man to be his father, but one as handsome as himself."—page 20.

"Stop there, Pat," said Jem, "till I find what the Bible says about Jesus Christ." So Jem found it in Isaiah liii. 2.—"There is no beauty in him, nor comeliness, and there was no sightliness that we should be desirous of him." "So you see, Pat," said Jem, the book is only inventing lies."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "here's a place to tell how easy devotion to St. Joseph is; it's just the easiest thing at all; only a picture, or a bit of a prayer or two. 'Deed he doesn't ask much for all he does."

"And what does he do at all?" said Jem.

"A deal of things," said Pat. "If there's anything lost, it's only to go to St. Joseph (p. 84), and he'll look till he finds it; and, sure, that would keep him busy in Ireland itself, let alone the rest of the world. Or if there's a match to be made between a boy and a girl, only get St. Joseph at it, and it's done (p. 127); and he can put his hand to anything; for if a girl is in love, it's only to go to St. Joseph, and he'll put that out of her head in nine days (p. 108); and if a couple want children, Joseph's the man, though he had none of his own (p. 128); and he's the best man-midwife at all (p. 127); and for saving the agents from the ribbonmen he beats the scapular all out;* for see here's a story of a man that was shot with a blunderbuss, with thirty slugs in it, and every slug went into his body, and three of them staid in his belly, and one of them was beat flat on his nose, and he wasn't a hair the worse; and sure the man that wrote the book says, that the man that was shot told him the story himself"—p. 132.

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "I'm thinking one or other of them was a mighty great liar, and no mistake."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "there was a convent, and no nuns going into it, and St. Joseph got them a young lady, with a good fortune, and the book says 'which favour will never be forgotten by that community.' Sure enough it's girls with fortunes they take in, and not poor unfortunate creatures that it would be the place for."

But, Jem, here's something that is good; it's about the interior or spiritual life in the soul; and it makes out this spiritual life is faith, hope, charity, religious adoration, thanksgiving, humiliation—p. 95.

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "I think that's as true as if it was in the Bible."

"So it is, Jem," said Pat. "But see here, Jem, what the book says next." So Jem read (p. 99), "in a community of three score religious† you will scarce find six true interior persons; and amongst a hundred religious men, or five hundred seculars,‡ it would be hard to find ten such as we speak of, who are eminent in their interior life, and make their desire of perfection their chief endeavour."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "that's the sorest thing I heard yet again the convents and the priests; I wonder how did it get into the book at all."

"Well maybe it isn't easy to write a book, and let no word of truth get into it at all," said Pat; "but there it's down in the book, however it got in."

So Pat went on—"Well, Jem, here's quare things; there's a great day for St. Joseph every year in Canada, and just read the story." So Jem read (p. 73)—"Also many dozens of great rockets, twelve at a time, resting somewhile between each dozen. At the close of the evening the governor of Quebec (accompanied with all his officers, in sight of a great number of savages who live round the country come to see the solemnity) puts fire to these machines; the wonderful sight whereof gives great occasion to the savages to honour and esteem St. Joseph, for whom they perceive the Christians have so great a veneration."

"Well," said Jem, "that beats all ways ever I heard of making Christians of savages; but I never heard tell of it in any of the letters the people wrote home."

"Well, I suppose it's an old story now," said Pat; "and sure if all the savages is converted, there would be no more call for rockets. But here's a story as quare, about a lady called Margeret de Chateau, who had a great regard for Jesus, Mary, and Joseph; and now read that, Jem," said Pat. So Jem read—"After she was dead, she was opened, and in her heart they found three precious stones, on which were engraved the three objects of her love."—page 51. "Now, Jem," said Pat, "do you believe there ever was a woman that had her heart full of little stones, just like the gizzard of an old fowl?"

"Well, 'deed, Pat," said Jem, "I don't believe God Almighty ever made a woman with a gizzard instead of a heart. But what will the Catholic books come to at all?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "hear the advice that the Blessed Virgin gives, however the book got at it." So Jem read (page 120)—"Wherefore if we desire her to advise us what is best TO SECURE OUR SALVATION, we cannot doubt but she will say, 'be devout to St. Joseph; love my dear spouse, St. Joseph.'"

"Oh, stop, stop, Pat," said Jem, "I can't stand it any more; to think us poor Irish is let to read such books, to set us so far astray about our salvation, and the Word of the living God kept off us. Oh, doesn't it cry out against them that allows it? Will there never be no light nor knowledge from God, to them that's kept in darkness and the shadow of death?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "it's enough to give one a heartscald again the Church of Rome, sure enough; but I'll only look out one thing more: here's a whole chapter to explain why the worship of St. Joseph was so late getting into the Church. Why, the book says that, 'in the primitive ages no mention is made of any particular devotion to this saint (p. 29); and it says, I cannot, therefore, but own that this marked devotion towards St. Joseph is only of late standing' (p. 29); and the book makes out that no one did worship Joseph for 1,400 years after Christ (p. 30), and that was all 'for St. Joseph's greater honour' (p. 35); and it allows that St. Teresa 'was the first who set up the standard of devotion to St. Joseph' (p. 48); and 'deed, Jem," said Pat, "when I came to that, I thought to myself, it's little call we have to trust to the saints, if they set us that far astray."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "if any prays to St. Joseph after that, it's their own faults; but how will it be with the priests that never says a word against such books, and with the bishops that doesn't stop the Catholic booksellers from printing the like?"

Plenty of such books there are, printed and circulated for the Irish people to read instead of the Bible. And if Pat and Jem should talk of any more of them, our readers may like to hear of that too.

* Some propositions from the writings of the Jesuits were condemned at various periods subsequent to the year 1650; which condemnations we may probably have to refer to again; and the order itself was abolished in 1772. But as the propositions quoted by Pascal were all taken from books formally approved by the Church of Rome, and as the order itself has been restored to the highest favour and power in the Church of Rome, we feel at liberty to use the approbations actually given to them. The variations of the indexes, sometimes approving and sometimes condemning the very same things, will be shown hereafter.

† CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. i., page 40. 1852.

‡ "Glories of St. Joseph, from the French of Father Paul Barrie. Printed by Richard Grace, Catholic Bookseller, Dublin, 1843.

* See CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii., 1853, p. 66.

† The word "religious" here means nuns. The passage shows how improper it is to use the word of all who are members of an order.

‡ "Seculars" here means priests.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been obliged to postpone several valuable letters, from both Roman Catholics and Protestants, from want of room.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 0, Upper Sackville-st.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1854.

THERE is no subject of deeper interest to every humble follower of Jesus Christ, than the promotion of Christian unity. Truth is one, and all those who have embraced the true faith of the Lord Jesus Christ, must, to the same extent that they have sincerely adopted it, become a real part of the one spiritual fold under the one spiritual shepherd. Like all other virtues, however, this virtue also has its counterfeit. There is unity of faith, which must be internal and real, and there is unity of profession which may be external and unreal. How often, under circumstances unfavourable to the development of truth, has the one passed, and been mistaken for, the other?

Those who have watched our progress since the commencement of our labours, will not suppose that we are in love with religious controversy for its own sake. We think controversy only tolerable when conducted in a mild and Christian spirit, and with a sincere anxiety to arrive at truth. Want of unity in the Christian world unhappily exists; the fact is a sad one, but it is still a fact. Is it according to the will of God, that disunion should continue? We earnestly think not—any more than it is the will of God that vice should continue. God permits, but does not approve of either disunion or vice. He would, assuredly, have us all brought to unity of belief, as well as to virtue in practice; but how does He design that this unity should be effected?

Time was, when it was thought that unity was to be brought about by ecclesiastical authority wielding the arm of the secular power, extirpating heresy by the extirpation of heretics. Those days are gone by, and we think no good or wise man would wish for their return. The religion of Christ was not founded by the sword, nor can any part of it be defended or inculcated by the sword. Every attempt to do so inflicts a grievous wound on Christianity itself.

Men's minds cannot be coerced. Pains and penalties, denunciations and calumnies may coerce men into silence, but can never convince the understanding or soften the heart. The secular arm may be invoked to punish the body, but it is powerless to convince the intellect of a single mind. Christianity was never advanced by violence, and it would be against its essential character that such a mode of propagation should be attempted. And if Christians were never allowed even to persecute Pagans into Christianity, surely a fortiori it must be unlawful, and against the first principles of true Christianity for any one set of Christians to persecute another. The folly, indeed, of such religious persecution is as great as its wickedness, and almost always recoils upon the persecutor, by creating sympathy and popularity towards the cause of the oppressed.

All men can admit this when it comes to be their own case—the minority are always for toleration. It has been well said by an acute observer, "that no man who was himself under the rod did ever think it lawful to have opinions forced or heretics put to death, and yet many men, who have themselves escaped the danger of the fire and faggot, have changed their opinion just as the case was altered, and their party uppermost."

The wickedness and folly, however, of religious intolerance remains the same, whether the dominant party holds true or incorrect opinions; and the history of mankind demonstrates that persecution never put down a single error, and has ever been found rather to encourage the persecuted in holding fast the proscribed opinions than to deter them from it.

But, then, we may be asked, though violence and force cannot conquer religious error, may not less extreme pains and penalties do so? Experience proves, too, that this is not the case, for such expedients are either despised and set at nought by those against whom they are directed, or they drive men into mere external profession, and make them hypocrites; they cannot, and never did convince a single mind.

What, then, remains but the gentler and nobler resources of Christian wisdom, and the mildest toleration? If we would have true unity, we must persuade and not coerce. Let men but once adopt this golden rule, and they will find it equally applicable to all men, in all places, at all times. Let men but speak the truth (or what each man thinks truth) in love, and as sure as the God of the Christian is a God of truth and love, he will give success to those who advocate His cause, and Truth will prove mighty and prevail. This we feel persuaded is God's way of producing unity; and the only way in which it can ever be approximated to. Man's way has been tried long enough, and has egregiously failed; and the differences which have sprung from its path of blood and shame, are as lamentable proofs of human frailty, as the rancour and animosity of religious differences, are proofs of the fallen nature of our race.

These are the grand principles on which we have striven to act, and which we shall never cease to inculcate, in our endeavours to promote the cause of truth and real unity; and they will be found equally applicable in favour of our Roman Catholic brethren when they are in the minority, as to those who differ with the Church of Rome, when it is in the ascendant.

But it will be said, might not unity be effected more simply still, if all men would but voluntarily yield their private views and opinions to those of God's Church? We answer, no doubt, if all men would but voluntarily yield their private views and opinions to that of any one man, or set of men, of course there would be unity, but it would not necessarily be the unity of truth. But what prospect is there that men will voluntarily give up the privileges of thinking beings, and delegate to any other the power to think for them. They would not if they could. We doubt whether they could if they would. A blind man may be content to be led by one who can see, a weak man may consent to be carried by a strong one, an ignorant man may save himself trouble by acting on the knowledge of the wise, especially if he be too indolent or stupid to acquire knowledge for himself; but that men who are not blind, or weak, or indolent, or stupid, should ever agree, as a body, absolutely to yield their right to think, and learn, and judge for themselves, to any other, is to suppose that the nature of the human mind is totally different from what it is actually and practically found to be. Education has been progressing for several centuries; and is it possible to expect that as the world gets more advanced in civilization and general education, men should become more passive and subservient to authority, instead of more active minded and independent? All history proves the contrary; and though improved and enlarged education, and fair and free discussion may, and we trust will, bring active-minded men to agree together better as to what is truth, and thus advance the cause of unity, the result of enlarged and diffused education can never render men more willing to submit to mere authority in matters of either reason or religion. If the existence of an infallible guide was a self-evident truth, or a matter easy of proof to any fair mind of ordinary capacity, it would, of course, be only perverse and wicked men who could dispute it. The difficulties, however, of proving any Church to be infallible, and of persuading seriously-disposed religious men voluntarily to submit to mere Church authority as the regulator of their belief, are necessarily great, and we are convinced that the amount of proof necessary to establish the infallibility of any Church to a mind not previously determined to take it for granted, must and ought to be greater than would be sufficient to establish any other religious opinion, simply because the subject of inquiry is in its consequences immeasurably of more importance than any other single opinion could be. We may follow any ordinary guide of good recommendations confidently, who will allow us, at the same time, to use our own ears and eyes to assist us in our faith, but we must be well assured indeed of the character and powers of the extraordinary guide, who would ask us to shut our eyes and stop our ears, that he might lead us by the hand with more security. We do not say that men may not reasonably wish for, and examine whether there be an infallible guide, to follow whom would lead to unity; but we do say that the claims of any set of men to such infallibility require the clearest proof and closest scrutiny, if men in their search for unity would escape the risk of ruin. At any rate until it can be established to the satisfaction of all intelligent and candid men, that God has delegated to an infallible church the exclusive right to judge of religious truth, as His means of producing unity of belief, the practice of toleration is obviously an indispensable duty, and the right to inquire into, and discuss freely the preliminary question, whether God has or has not constituted such a tribunal for the settlement of controversies, and what that tribunal is, and what are its limits and nature, must be a right inherent in, as well as a duty incumbent upon, every rational being.

We have already partially discussed this deeply important subject, but purpose recurring to it again, and we trust, in a perfectly impartial and candid spirit.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us that several Roman Catholics in his neighbourhood meet to read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN; but that they do not give us full credit for telling truth. For instance, he says, "in the February number for 1854, page 18, column 3, there is a story about one Wimar, who murdered his three sons!" This, they say, is all a lying fabrication of the LAYMAN, and of Labbe and Cossart, to whom reference is made.

Now, Labbe and Cossart were two French Jesuits, not very likely to enter into a plot with the CATHOLIC LAYMAN; especially as they lived 180 years ago. But we took that story from a letter written by Pope Nicolas II. We call on the Roman Catholic priests to tell those Roman Catholics, in our pages, whether Pope Nicolas did write that letter, or not. If the priests say Pope Nicolas did not write that letter, we will discuss that with them. If the priests say Pope Nicolas did write that letter, very good. If the priests say nothing, let Roman Catholics judge of that for themselves.

Correspondence.

POPE LIBERIUS AND INFALLIBILITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have reconsidered the subject of the alleged heterodoxy of the Pontiff Liberius, in the fourth century, and am fully convinced he did not wilfully lapse into Arianism, but was entrapped into the reception of the Sirmium formulary by the sophistry of the Arian bishops and the emperor's other satellites, as the Council of Rimini had been. This appears more evident by the use of the words, "to expound the true Catholic faith," &c., which occur in his letter of reconciliation. He was evidently a weak-minded man, and, in great measure, destitute of moral courage, and fond of ease and peace. Gibbon expressly says—"Liberius, Oscius, Paulanus, Dionysius, Eusebius of Vercellæ, Lucifer, and Hilary of Poitiers, were banished by the Emperor Constantius; and refers to Ammianus, xv. 7; Theodoret, 1, ii., c. 16; Athanasius, tom. i., p. 834–837; and Hilary, Fragment i. I am fully convinced this is the correct position of events. His or the heterodoxy of the Rimini Council cannot be proved; as, though they made a false step, it was obtained by sophistry and fraud, which mistake they BOTH repudiated when the Arian party published the creed in the Arian sense, to which SENSE neither had agreed. The real question is, if a Pontiff or a Pontiff and Council be INFALLIBLE in matters of doctrine, can either or both be deceived in the manner they evidently were? If INFALLIBILITY is not sufficient to PREVENT their understandings from such or similar deceptions, on such or similar subjects, can there be such a thing as infallibility at all? Is it not mere delusion, and the mere creation of a deceived fancy? My individual opinion is, that out of the region of the mathematics, absolute certainty, such as would amount to infallibility, is unattainable by mortal man. I send this as a postcript to my former, and am, sir,

Your obedient servant,
A TRUTH-SEEKER.

Moira, February 23, 1854.

THE SENTIMENTS OF THE PRIMITIVE FATHERS AND DOCTORS OF THE CHURCH ON THE HOLY EUCHARIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the second age, St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch a disciple of the apostles, who suffered martyrdom about the year 107, in his epistle to the Christians of Smyrna, calls the Eucharist "the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, which suffered for our sins, and which the Father raised by his bounty." Thus this disciple of the Apostle wrote, who certainly know the meaning of their doctrine. In the same age St. Justin Martyr, in his apology to the heathen Emperor for the Christian religion, affirms, "that as our Saviour Jesus Christ was himself by the word made flesh, and took for our salvation both flesh and blood, so we are taught that the eucharist is the flesh and blood of the same Jesus incarnate." (Apolog. 2. ad Antoninum.) Would any man in his senses write thus to a heathen if he understood Christ's words in a figurative sense? In the same age, St. Irenæus, in his fifth book (chap. xl.) against heresies, speaking of the bread and wine says—"that by the Word of God they are made the Eucharist, which is the body and blood of Christ." In the third age, St. Cyprian, in his sermon on the Lord's supper, says, "the bread which our Lord gave to his disciples being changed, not in shape, but in substance, by the omnipotency of the word, is made flesh." He likewise says (Lib. de Orat. Domini) "that in the eucharist we eat Christ's body, and drink his blood." In the same age, the learned Origen tells us (Hom. 7, in Levit.) that "in the old law the manna was a figurative food (in senigmate); but now the flesh of God is meat (in specie) in reality, as he himself says, 'my flesh is meat indeed.'" He speaks no less plainly in many other places. In the same age, Tertullian says (L. 4, Cont. Marcion, c. 40) "that the bread which Christ took at his last supper, and distributed to his disciples, he changed into his body." In the fourth age, the great St. John Chrysostom delivered in more clear terms the doctrine of the Catholic Church. In his eighty-third homily upon St. Matthew, he has these excellent words: "let us everywhere believe Almighty God, nor contradict him, though what he says seems contradictory to our reason and sense. His words cannot deceive us; our senses are easily deceived: his words never err; our senses are frequently mistaken. Since, therefore, he says, 'this is my body,' let us be persuaded of it. He who did these things at his last supper, the same now performs them; we are only his ministers; it is he who sanctifies; it is he who transmutes or changes these things." Thus writes St. Chrysostom, whose words are equally plain in several places of his excellent works.

Let us now give ear to St. Ambrose, another famous doctor of the Church, in the same age, in his book, "De his qui mysteriis initiantur," chapter the ninth—"Perhaps you will say," says he, "I see quite another thing. How do you assure me that I receive the body of Christ? And this is what remains for us to prove. How great," says he, "are the examples which we used to show—that it is not the thing which nature formed, but the thing which the blessing has consecrated, and that the blessing has greater force than nature, because by the blessing even nature itself is changed." Afterwards he instances, or makes mention of the change of rods into serpents, and of water into wine, and thus pursues his discourse: "if," says he, "the words of Elias were powerful enough to command fire down from heaven, shall not, therefore, the words of Christ be able to change the nature of the elements? You have read of the whole creation—he said, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created; the word, therefore, of Christ, which could make out of nothing that which was not, cannot it change those things which are into what they are not?" Thus, St. Ambrose, not only proposes but proves the doctrine of the Catholic Church. In the same age, St. Gregory Nyssen, in his catechistical discourse, professes the same faith. "I do believe" says he, "that, by the word of God, the sanctified bread is changed into the body and blood of Christ."

In the same age, St. Cyril, patriarch of Jerusalem, discourses thus of the Eucharist (Cat. Mys. fourth)—"Do not consider it," says he, "as mere bread and wine, for now it is the body and blood of Christ, according to our Lord's own words." Again, "Judge not the thing," says he, "by the taste." And, a little after, "knowing," says he, "and holding for certain, that the bread and wine which we see is not bread, although it taste like bread, but it is the body of Christ." What Catholic of this present age can express in plainer terms than this saint has done, our faith of transubstantiation? In the fifth age, that great doctor of the Church, St. Augustine, in Psalm thirty-third, says—"How David could be carried in his own hands we know not, but in Christ we do; for he was carried in his own hands, when, at his last supper, he gave to his disciples his own body and blood, saying—'This is my body;' for he then carried his own body in his own hands."

Every one of these fathers, dear sir, which I have here quoted, lived above thirteen hundred years ago, and were certainly better qualified to know the sense of the Scriptures, and doctrine of the apostles, than those who came but lately into the world. And all the rest of the fathers, in all succeeding ages, unanimously agreed in the same doctrine; so that this article of our faith is as ancient as the apostles.

The institution of the blessed Eucharist is related in three different evangelists, viz., by St. Matthew (c. xxvi. v. 26.); by St. Mark (c. xiv.); and by St. Luke (c. xxii.); and St. Paul, in his first epistle to the Corinthians (c. xi.). Here dear sir, we may expect to find something decisive on this point. I shall now conclude, dear Mr. Editor, by exhorting every one to "remember the days of old; consider the years of many generations. Let us ask our elders, and they will tell us. Let us stand in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein;" for there is no other way, our divines tell us, which can conduct us safely to the joys of heaven.

Dear Mr. Editor, be pleased to give me an answer to this letter, that I may know your opinion also on this subject.

Your humble and obedient

JOHN DUFFEY.

Our correspondent has requested us to state our opinion on the passages which he cites from the fathers, relating to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. We have been put to some trouble by his omission of the editions and pages of the volumes to which he refers, as we cannot, in general, undertake to discuss passages which are quoted so vaguely as those given in his letter. In consequence of the crowded state of our columns, our remarks must necessarily be very brief.

Our correspondent asks—"What [Roman] Catholic of the present age could express our faith in transubstantiation in plainer terms than St. Cyril, and others of the Greek and Latin fathers?" In order to ascertain, therefore, whether the ancient fathers really believed in transubstantiation, it is necessary, in the first place, to call to mind the definition which the Council of Trent have given of this word. It is, say they, "a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ; and of the whole substance of the wine, into the substance of his blood" (Conc. Trid. Sess. xiii. Can. 2). And to the same effect, the catechism of the Council of Trent declares, that, "not only the true body of Christ, and whatever pertains to the character of a true body, as bones and sinews (ossa et nervos), but that Christ, whole and entire, is contained in this sacrament" (Cat. Rom. II. iv. § 33). Bearing these things in mind, let us examine the passages cited from the fathers by our correspondent.

His first authority is Ignatius, who says that "the Eucharist is the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Does this passage necessarily imply, that the substance of the bread is changed into the actual body, bones, and sinews of our Lord? Surely not. St. Paul, in speaking of the rock in the wilderness, says—"That rock was Christ" (1 Cor. x. 4). And how does St. Augustine interpret these words? "The thing that signifieth," saith he, "is commonly called by the name of that thing that it signifieth; therefore is it that St. Paul saith, 'The rock was Christ.' For he saith not, the rock signified Christ, but, the rock was Christ, as if the rock had been Christ indeed; whereas, touching the substance it was not so, but so it was by signification" (per substantiam non hoc erat, sed per significationem.—Op. Tom. iii. col. 516). It is in this manner that Ignatius calls the Eucharist "the flesh of our Saviour Christ;" not physically, but as St. Augustine saith, "The sacrament of Christ's body, after a certain manner of speech, is the body of Christ" (Secundum quemdam modum, sacramentum corporis Christi corpus Christi est, sacramentum sanguinis Christi sanguis Christi est.—Op. Par. 1679; Tom. ii. col. 267).

Again, St. Chrysostom, in writing of the sacrament of baptism, says, "St. Paul showeth in this place (Heb. ix. 19), the blood (of Christ) and the water (of baptism) are the same" (δεικνυσιν ενταυθα το αυτο ον και αιμα και ὑδωρ.—Tom. xii. 228, Par. 1838). Does he mean that the water of baptism is changed into Christ's blood? Certainly not; but each borrows the name of the other; because they are joined together in one mystery. The water is called Christ's blood, because it is a sacrament of that blood; and so Ignatius writes, that the Eucharist is the flesh of Christ, because it is the sacrament of his body.

That this is the true principle upon which this and other similar passages are to be interpreted, is evident from a passage in the epistle of the same writer, Ignatius, to the Romans, § 7:—"The drink of God I desire, even his blood, which is incorruptible love and eternal life" (το αἱμα αυτου, ὁ εστιν αγαπη αφθαρτος και αιωνιος ζωη.) Is, then, the blood of Christ actually incorruptible love and eternal life? No, surely; but it is the sacramental pledge and token of these blessings, to all faithful believers. A physical change or transmutation, or an assertion of actual identity, would, in this case, be simply absurd.

The fallacy which we have just pointed out, runs through most Roman Catholic interpretations of the passages of the Fathers which are quoted on this subject. Whenever an ancient writer states that Christians, in the Eucharist, partake of the body and blood of Christ, Roman Catholic controversialists at once exclaim, "This writer must have believed in transubstantiation." But this is a great mistake. The Church of England holds just as firmly as the ancient Fathers ever did, that "the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's supper" (Catech.); but the whole question turns on the manner of the reception. When any ancient Father of the first five centuries can be produced, who states, as the catechism of the Council of Trent does, that the bread and wine are changed into the body, blood, bones, and sinews of Christ, we will be content to avow our error, but not till then.

We need not dwell on the passage which our correspondent quotes from Justin Martyr, as its real meaning will be sufficiently evident from what we have just said. A few lines before, Justin had said, "This food is among us called the Eucharist, for we take not these as common bread, or as common drink." Do not these words sufficiently imply that Justin considered the sacramental element to be still bread, after consecration, although it was no longer common bread? and if this be so, is it not plainly manifest that he could not have believed in transubstantiation?

The same remarks apply to Irenæus. In the passage quoted by our correspondent, (which is in lib. v. c. ii., p. 400, Ox. 1702), that ancient Father had said, that "the Eucharist is the body and blood of Christ." But if our correspondent had taken the trouble to refer to one or two other passages of the same writer, even he, we should imagine, could not have mistaken his true meaning. Thus, for example, Irenæus writes (lib. iv. c. 34, p. 327)—"Bread, which is from the earth, receiving the vocation of God, is now not common bread, but the Eucharist, consisting of two things, an earthly thing and a heavenly thing." (Qui est a terra panis, percipiens vocationem Dei, jam non communis panis est, sed eucharistia, ex duabus rebus constans, terrena et coelesti.) Irenæus, like his predecessor Justin Martyr, and his successor Cyril of Jerusalem, denies that, after consecration, the eucharistic bread and wine are any longer common bread and common drink; but he speaks, as the voice of antiquity fully teaches, of their moral or sacramental change from a secular application to a holy purpose, not of their physical or material change from mere bread and wine into Christ's literal body and blood—a change, which the fact of his calling the sacramental element bread, after consecration, sufficiently disavows.

Hitherto, our correspondent had gone pretty regularly through the list of the Fathers, but now he makes a great jump, from Irenæus to Cyprian. Was there, then, no writer of eminence between these? There was; one of remarkable ability, whom Cyprian was wont to call his master, the well-known Tertullian. And does not Mr. Duffey refer to him? He does, a little lower down; but we request the special attention of our readers to the fact, that he stops short in the middle of a sentence, which, if quoted entire, would, instead of proving transubstantiation, have furnished a conclusive argument against it, so far as Tertullian's authority goes. The passage, as quoted by Mr. Duffey, runs thus—"The bread which Christ took at his last supper, and distributed to his disciples, he changed into his body." Here Mr. Duffey's quotation stops; but what follows in the original? "he changed into his body, saying—This is my body"—that is a figure of my body! (Corpus illum suum fecit, hoc est corpus meum dicendo, id est, figura corporis mei. Adv. Marc. iv. 40, p. 458, Par. 1675.) What will Mr. Duffy now say to the authority of this ancient writer, one of his own chosen witnesses?

If, according to Tertullian, the sacramental elements were only changed into a figure of Christ's body, it is pretty plain that he could not have believed, as the Catechism of the Council of Trent declares, that the bread and wine are actually changed and transmuted into the flesh, bones, and sinews of the Lord Jesus Christ—that is, he was no believer in transubstantiation. Is it fair or reasonable, we ask, to quote an ancient writer as holding a particular doctrine, when, if his words were given entire, they would prove that he held the very opposite? Mr Duffey's letter is written in such an earnest and candid spirit, that we entirely acquit him of any dishonesty in this matter. He has borrowed the quotation, we have no doubt, from some controversial book, the name of which, for the sake of his own character, he ought to send us. The original author who stopped so conveniently short when it suited his purpose, was certainly no lover of truth, and we grieve to say, this is not the first occasion on which we have detected Roman Catholic writers in similar dishonesty of quotation.

But Tertullian does not stand alone. Precisely similar language regarding the Eucharist is found in St. Augustine, whom Mr. Duffey claims as one of his authorities. He, too, writes as follows:—"Our Lord doubted not to say—'This is my body,' when he gave a token of his body." (Non dubitavit Dominus dicere, hoc est corpus meum, cum daret signum corporis sui. (Op. Tom. viii. col. 124.) It is clear, from this passage alone, if there were none others, that St. Augustine was no believer in transubstantiation.

Our remarks have run to such a length on this interesting subject, that we are unwillingly obliged to defer the consideration of the other passages cited by Mr. Duffey to some future opportunity. We had intended especially to prove that St. Ambrose, whom our correspondent claims so triumphantly as one of his main authorities, had to be expurgated by the Romish editors in one important passage, which was utterly irreconcileable with the dogma of transubstantiation. We hope to refer, however, to this topic hereafter; meanwhile, what we have said will, we trust, enable our correspondent and our Roman Catholic readers generally, to perceive in what sense the Fathers, in the old time, understood these words of our blessed Lord—"This is my body."

WHAT IS THE UNANIMOUS CONSENT OF THE FATHERS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The 2nd article of Pope Pius IV.'s creed thus concludes:—

"Nec eam [Scripturam] unquam nisi juxta unanimem consensum Patrum accipiam et interpretabor;" which Mr. Butler translates—"Nor will I ever take or interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers."

Perhaps you or some of your Roman Catholic correspondents would kindly explain the meaning of the (apparently) plain word "unanimous."

If it means, as it generally does, "agreed in or to by all," it would seem that the opinion of even one Father in the explanation of a text, must, if opposed to all others, be sufficient to prevent any use being made of that text by members of the Church of Rome.

Take, for example, the principal text brought forward by that Church in support of St. Peter's primacy, and its own infallibility—"And I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.—St. Matt. xvi. 18, R. C. version.

The note on this text in the Douay Bible says—"By the plain course of the words Peter is here declared to be the rock upon which the Church was to be built."

St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine give a directly contrary interpretation. St. Chrysostom says (Op. Tom. vii., Benedictine ed., p. 548)—Τῇ πέτρᾳ· ταυτεστι τῇ πίστει τῆς ὁμολογίας—(The rock, that is the faith of his confession. See also Opp. Tom. viii., p. 785-6.)

St. Augustine says (Serm. 66, cap. ii., de verbis Evang., Matt.)—"Tu ergo, inquit, es Petrus, et super hanc petram quam confessus es, super hanc petram quam cognovisti, dicens, Tu es Christus Filius Dei vivi, ædificabo ecclesiam meam." "Thou, therefore, he says, art Peter, and upon this rock which thou hast confessed—upon this which thou hast recognized, saying, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God—I will build my Church." (Op. S. Aug. Tom. v. col. 415, ed. Ben.)

Again (Serm. de sanctis. 295, i.)—"Super hanc petram ædificabo fidem, quam confiteris. Super hoc quod dixisti, Tu es Christus Filius Dei vivi, ædificabo ecclesiam meam." (Tom. v. col. 1194.)

"Upon this rock I will build the faith thou didst confess—upon this which thou hast said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God—I will build my Church.

A Romanist who holds the creed of Pope Pius IV. cannot, I think, interpret this passage in opposition to Chrysostom and Augustine, and is, therefore debarred from the interpretation given by the Romish note.

J. R. D. B.

We do not see how this difficulty is to be got over. If we could have the unanimous consent of the Popes on this passage of Scripture, it still would not come up to what the creed of Pope Pius requires. Yet, even this much consent we cannot have, though one would think that the Popes, at least, might agree among themselves about the interpretation of this passage, but they do not. Some of the Popes say Christ is the rock; some say Peter is the rock; some say the See of Rome is the rock. Pope Gelasius, in the 5th century, alluding to Matthew xvi. 18—"that word which promised that the gates of hell should never prevail against the confession of the blessed apostle Peter." So here the confession of faith in Christ is the rock (Ep. 1, Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 1158); and Pope Gregory the Great says, "found your life on the rock of the Church—that is, on the confession of blessed Peter, the chief of the apostles" (Labbe and Coss., vol v., p. 1157); and Pope Hormisdas says—"when many have separated themselves from the firmness of that rock, which is Christ." (Labbe and Coss., vol. vi., p. 1459); and Pope Felix III. represents St. Peter himself as speaking thus of Christ—"who promised that the gates of hell should never prevail against his Church, founded on my confession" (Labbe and Cosss., vol. iv., p. 1053). That confession was—"thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." We believe that the confession of this is, indeed, the rock on which Christ founded his Church.

Can any of our correspondents give us the interpretation of these words—"on this rock I will build my Church," according to the creed of Pope Pius IV., that is, according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers?

PURGATORY, AND THE PRACTICE OF PRAYING FOR THE DEAD, PROVED FROM THE FATHERS OF THE FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD CENTURIES, ETC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The writings of the holy Fathers of both the Eastern and Western Churches, most clearly prove, that, from the earliest dawn of Christianity, the belief of a purgatory was general in the Church. Tertullian, the famous champion of the Christian religion, who lived in the second age, says, "No man will doubt but that the soul doth recompense something in the places below."—Lib. de Anima. c. 58. And, again, in his book, "De Corona Militis," "We make yearly oblations for the dead." St. Clement, in the same age, tells us St. Peter "taught them, among other works of mercy, to bury the dead and diligently perform their funeral rites; and also to pray and give alms for them."—Epist. 1st. de St. Petro. In the third age, St. Cyprian says, "It is one thing being cast into a prison, not to go out thence till he pays the utmost farthing—another, presently to receive the reward of faith; one thing, being afflicted with long pains for sins to be mended and purged long with fire—another, to have purged all sins by suffering."—Epis. 52, ad Anton. In the same age, Origen says—"Though a releasement out of prison be promised, St. Mat. v., yet it is signified that none can get out from thence but he who pays the utmost farthing."—Epist. ad Roman. et Hom. iii. St. Luc. In the fourth age, St. Ambrose says—"But where, as St. Paul says, 'yet so as by fire' he shows, indeed, that he shall be saved, but yet shall suffer the punishment of fire; that being purged by fire he may be saved and not tormented for ever, as the infidels are, with everlasting fire."—Cap. iii. Ephes. ad Cor. In the same age: "This is that (says St. Jerome) which he saith thou shalt not go out of prison till thou shalt pay even thy little sins."—Matt. v. In the same age, St. Cyril, of Jerusalem, says, "We beseech God for all those who have died before us, believing the obsecration of that holy and dreadful sacrifice which is put on the altar to be the greatest help of the souls for which it is offered."—Catech. Mystagog. v. Again, in the same age, the above-quoted St. Jerome says—"These things were not in vain ordained by the apostles, that in the venerable and dreadful mysteries of the mass, there should be made a memory of those who have departed this life; they knew much benefit would hence accrue to them."—Hom. iii. Epist. ad Phil.

Indeed, Mr. Editor, it would fill volumes to quote all those passages from the holy Fathers, which prove the belief in a third place, and prayers for the dead to be coeval with Christianity

Those I have quoted, lived twelve, thirteen, and fourteen centuries before the Reformation, and were, of course, as good judges of genuine apostolical tradition as the gentlemen of the Reformation could be.

If these holy and learned doctors, some of whom were the immediate successors of the apostles, did not think themselves guilty of superstition in praying for the dead, but declared, that in doing so they followed and obeyed the ordinances of the apostles, neither do we think ourselves guilty of superstition, in believing and doing, as they did. "He who sowed sparingly, shall reap sparingly; and he who soweth in blessings, shall also reap of blessings."—2 Cor. ix. 6.

He then who soweth so sparingly in this world as to remain, in his dying moment, indebted to the Divine justice, will after his death be compelled to pay to the last farthing what, by more serious endeavours, he might have paid in this world.

You will, I hope, excuse the length of this letter; I could not make it shorter; and you, Mr. Editor, have inquired so often for those authorities that I have produced from the first, second, and third centuries, &c., for the support of our doctrine, that I think in fairness you ought to insert it, and give your readers a view of what is to be said on the other side. I am a constant reader of your pages.

I remain, sir, your humble and obedient servant,

JOHN DUFFY.

We have to apologize to Mr. Duffy for having postponed inserting the above letter, though in type a considerable time, in consequence of the great pressure of other matter.

If our correspondent be, as he says, a constant reader of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN he must be aware that the two subjects to which his letter relates—purgatory, and prayers for the dead—are perfectly distinct, and he must know that it is useless to endeavour to prove the antiquity of the doctrine of purgatory by passages which merely speak of prayers for the departed. We admit that the practice of prayers for the dead was introduced into the Church at an early period, though not in the first century; but we confidently deny that any support can be got for the doctrine of purgatory from the writings of orthodox Fathers of the three first centuries. In the early Church, prayers were made for the departed, not indeed that God would deliver their souls from purgatory, but that He would give them a blessed sentence in the day of judgment; that He would hasten the resurrection, and so on. These prayers were offered, in fact, for the greatest saints, those whom no one ever supposed to have been in purgatory, for the apostles and martyrs, and even for the Virgin Mary herself. We could show this abundantly by citations from the Fathers, and the ancient liturgies; but we must not weary our readers by recurring to a point which has been frequently insisted on, and we conceive fully established in the pages of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Let us proceed to consider the passages adduced by our correspondent. The first quotation is from Tertullian; and here we may remark that the heading of our correspondent's letter, "Purgatory, and the practice of praying for the dead, proved from the Fathers of the first, second, and third centuries, &c.," is scarcely appropriate, because, as will presently be seen, there is no passage cited from the genuine works of any writer earlier than Tertullian, who was born in the middle of the second century. Let us see, however, what is the value of Tertullian's evidence. The first passage is from his Treatise de Animâ, c. 58. "No man will doubt but that the soul doth recompense something in the places below." Now, will our correspondent believe us when we state that the great Roman Catholic controversialist, Bellarmine, brands as heretical the views as to the state of the departed, put forward by Tertullian in this same Treatise de Animâ, and in the very chapter from which the above quotation is taken. Such, however, is the case (see Bellarmine, de Ecclesia Triumphante, l. 1.); but as we Protestants would not be much influenced by Bellarmine's decision, as to what was or was not heresy, we must explain why we attach no importance to this assertion of Tertullian. There lived in the second century a man named Montanus, who made a considerable stir in the Church. He took up the monstrous notion that he was himself the COMFORTER promised by Christ to his disciples, and he pretended to be able to prophesy, under the influence of divine inspiration. Notwithstanding the absurdity of this and other opinions which he held, he had many followers, and, among others, Tertullian. Now, in the very next sentence to that quoted by our correspondent, Tertullian justifies the assertion he has made by a reference to Montanus, under the name of the Comforter! Can it be maintained that a statement so supported is deserving of any attention?

The next passage is also from Tertullian, from his Book de Coronâ Militis.—"We make yearly oblations for the dead." Though this passage might be cited to prove the practice of prayer for the dead in Tertullian's time, it is obvious that it does not bear at all on the doctrine of purgatory.

The next passage—that from Clement—we are unable to verify, as our correspondent has given us no reference; but we have do doubt that he means to refer to the first of the series of epistles of Clement, of Rome, to St. James, which epistles are now universally admitted to be spurious. As our attention has been directed to this letter, we think it worth while to give an extract, which will show that, even in the late period at which this forgery was perpetrated, no idea of a purgatory, such as is now believed in by Roman Catholics had entered into the Church. The following words are put by the writer of the epistle into the mouth of St. Peter (p. 7, L. Paris ed., 1544), "With regard to those who could not completely fulfil the rule of righteousness, but have left some traces of wickedness, their bodies, indeed, are dissolved, but their souls are preserved in joyful and happy places, that in the resurrection of the dead, when they have been reunited to their bodies, purified by the very dissolution, they may enjoy their eternal inheritance for the good deeds they have done." From this it would appear that in those comparatively late times no means of purification after death were believed in, beyond bestowing on the risen souls purified and glorified bodies in place of their present ones. It is obvious, too, that the passage of the pseudo-Clement, which our correspondent has quoted, even if it were genuine, would not give the least support to purgatory.

A well-known passage from Cyprian is next quoted; but if our correspondent will refer to the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii, p. 68., June, 1853, he will find the true meaning of this passage, as explained by a learned Roman Catholic commentator, and he will see that it has no reference whatever to purgatory.

The next passage is from Origen. Here again we must refer our correspondent to former discussions in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN (see vol. ii., pp. 56, 67, 105). If he will take the trouble of consulting the articles referred to, he will see what were Origen's views as to the punishments of a future life, and how they differed from the modern Romish doctrine of purgatory; he will learn, moreover, that Origen was condemned as heretical on this very point.

Our correspondent next cites passages from Ambrose, Cyril, and Jerome, who, as every one knows, flourished in the fourth century. As Mr. Duffy's object was to prove purgatory and prayers for the dead from the Fathers of the three first centuries, it would be as irrevalent for us to discuss, as it was for him to introduce, quotations from writers of the fourth century. However, if it was desirable, something might be said about all these passages too.

Let us now review the proofs which our correspondent has brought forward—that purgatory and prayers for the dead were held and taught by the Fathers of the first three centuries. He does not quote a single passage from the genuine remains of any Father of the first century. Of the passages from writers of the second or third centuries, two only seem to give any support to the doctrine of purgatory, and neither of these from orthodox Fathers. The remaining passages quoted, either have no reference to purgatory, or are taken from writers later than the third century. Mr. Duffy does not profess to be a scholar, and he may say, that if he was, he could furnish more ample evidence of the truth of his opinions; but we can assure him that, if he had the learning of Bellarmine, the evidence for purgatory, which he could extract from writers of the first three centuries, would be meagre in the extreme.

Our correspondent has given no quotation from any of the genuine works of the Apostolic Fathers. In truth, it would be impossible to find in their writings any proof of the doctrine of purgatory. Surely, their silence on this doctrine, of such vast importance if true, is very remarkable. It may be said, that to argue from their silence is not very convincing; but there are cases in which the silence of a writer on a subject may be a most conclusive proof that he knew nothing about it. If the introduction of a topic be necessary or pertinent, the fact of its not being introduced goes a long way to show that the writer was ignorant of everything about it. Now, we could refer to passages in the Apostolic Fathers where the mention of purgatory could hardly have failed to be introduced, if the existence of it had been known or believed in at the time. For instance, Clement, when expressly treating of death and the resurrection (I. Ep. ad Cor. sec. 24, 27), would inevitably have alluded to purgatory had he believed in its existence; but he is totally silent on the subject. The absence of any allusion to purgatory here is almost as clear a proof that Clement did not believe in the doctrine, as if he had expressly alluded toit, to repudiate it. Moreover, there is a passage in his second epistle to the Corinthians, which, if the epistle be genuine, demonstrates that he knew nothing about purgatory—vide II. Ep. ad Cor. 8. The testimony of Ignatius is equally cogent. The following passage occurs in his epistle to the Magnesians, sec. 5.—"When our existence here is at an end," he says, "there are two states set before us—a state of death, and a state of life—and every one shall depart to his appropriate habitation." We ask if it can be conceived possible that the doctrine of purgatory was included in the creed of Ignatius?

WHAT ARE THE POINTS OF FAITH WHICH THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH REQUIRES AND WHICH ARE NOT NAMED IN THE BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Will some one of your Roman Catholic readers favour me with a plain, honest, and straightforward answer to the following question?

Roman Catholics are taught to believe that the BIBLE is not a sufficient rule of faith; that TRADITION is of equal authority with the Bible. It follows, of a consequence, that there are POINTS OF FAITH which, for our salvation as Christians, are necessary to be believed, and which are not contained in or taught by the Bible, but established by tradition.

The question I wish to put is—What are the POINTS OF FAITH which the Roman Catholic Church requires us, as Christians, to believe as necessary to salvation, which are not revealed in the Scriptures, but established by tradition?

To assist the inquiry, I would beg to call the Roman Catholic reader's attention to the copious references to Scriptural authority cited in the index accompanying the octavo edition of the Bible, sold by Richardson, and sanctioned by Dr. Wiseman.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
C. H. COLLETTE.

FLOWERS FOR APRIL.

THE spring is come, and we may welcome it in the language of Solomon—"So the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of the birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell."—Canticles ii. 10-13. With us the rich blossom of the peach tree, and the white flowers of the pear, the apple and the cherry tree convert our orchards, gardens, and shrubberies into groves of flowers, while the hedges are becoming white and radiant with the blossoms of the blackthorn or early sloe (prunus spinosa).

"Sweet April, many a thought
Is wedded unto thee, as hearts are wed.
Nor shall they fall, till to its autumn brought Life's golden fruit is shed."

The soft refreshing showers of April and its alternating sunshine bring forth a host of primroses, violets, wild anemonies, and hyacinths, spread, like a rich and gaily-variegated carpet, over our woods and meadows.

Not the least of these is the wild HYACINTH (hyacinthus non scriptus), with its long, blue, bell-shaped petals so gracefully curled. It is to be met with flowering under the shadows of trees, and near the flowing stream of a rivulet, which breathes its soft fragrance as it glides along in the stillness of its retreat.

"Shade loving hyacinth, thou comest again,
And thy rich odours seem to swell the flow
Of the lark's song, the redbreast's mirthful strain,
And the stream's tune."

The wild hyacinth is sometimes confounded with the harebell or bluebell of the heath-lands. The garden hyacinth (hyacinthus orientale) is derived from the Levant and the Holy Land. It has become a familiar in-door acquaintance from its early flowering in water, and the variety and richness of its colours. It was an old favourite of the poets, who have given it, accordingly, a classic origin—

"Apollo, with unwitting hand,
Whilome did slay his dearly-loved friend,
Young Hyacinth, the pride of Spartan land,
And then transformed him into a purple flower."

Hence the flower has been associated with the sombre sentiment of death—

"The deep blue tincture that robed it seemed
The gloomiest garb of sorrow,
As if in its eye no brightness beamed,
And it never in clearer moments dreamed
Of a fair and calm to-morrow."

There is no feature of the Christian revelation more distinctive than the manner in which it presents to us the King of terrors, so different from the view given of it by the superstitions of heathenism and of all other systems of false religion.

Although the Bible is very plain in its declaration that sin first entered, and then death by sin (Rom. v. 12), as its wages (Rom. v. 23), and that we all by nature had the sentence of death in ourselves (2 Cor. i. 9), we are not allowed to dwell upon the dismal topic, which is brought home to our observation, from year to year, in our neighbourhood, our acquaintance, and in our family circle. We are rather directed to one who abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel (1 Tim. i. 10); and we are invited to look forward to that time when the prophecy shall be fulfilled, that he should "swallow up death in victory, and wipe away tears from all eyes."—Isaiah xxv. 8. This time is thus spoken of by St. Paul—"We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised, and we shall be changed. When this mortal shall put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written. Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Cor. xv. 55. It is very remarkable how little the Church of Rome enters upon this glorious subject: her whole attention seems directed to a supposed intermediate state of purgation or punishment, of which St. Paul must assuredly have known nothing, or he would have said something.

The ANEMONE (Τανεμόνε) ανεμος, wind-flower, also makes a permanent figure in the flora of April, both in the field and in the flower-garden. It is supposed to be named anemone or wind-flower from its quivering in every breeze, or, as some suppose, because it opens its flowers to the wind; but this latter explanation is considered apocryphal by botanists. They are all, certainly, a hardy race, growing naturally, in high and exposed situations, and blooming at an early period of the year. They freely bare their petals to the cold embrace of an ungenial east wind.

The wood anemone is better known in the woodlands of England than with us. Its simple white flowers, slightly tinged with pink, are spread in great profusion on the surface of the woods.

"Anemonies, weeping flowers!
Dyed in winter's snow and rain;
White the leaf-strewn ground again,
And make each wood a garden then."

There are two other species of anemone indigenous to these islands, but not often met with—The blue mountain anemone (anemone pulsatilla), with dark purple leaves and silky stem, and the yellow anemone (anemone ranunculoides), with soft flowers, sometimes found nodding among the moss and the dry leaves under the trees.

The beautiful garden anemonies which show such varieties of colour through so many months of the year, are all natives of the east. They now dazzle the eye with their brilliant scarlet, and now please it with their soft purple and lilac tints fading into white. Foremost among them is the poppy anemone (anemone coronaria), white, with a red ring round its centre; and the star anemone (anemone stellata), and that which is commonly called the garden anemone (anemone hortensis), both of which are purple, with a white centre, and from these there spring all the varieties which our gardens can boast.

"With rubies flaming and with living gold"

Like the hyacinth, the ancients prized the anemone so highly that they attributed to it no ordinary birth. Their poets traced its origin to the time when Venus, in her grief at the death of her favourite, Adonis, mingled her tears with his blood, and thence sprung, as they said, the first anemone. It is still a very favourite flower in the east, and is highly esteemed by our florists at home, not only for its beauty and hardiness, but still more from yielding to our management, so as to flower almost at any season, according as we keep the roots above ground; as, by planting them every successive month, they can be made to bloom almost throughout the year. The anemone prefers a fresh loamy bed, of a heavy nature, rather than a light soil; but with all its hardiness, and like many a rustic beauty, it languishes in the town, pure air being indispensable to its health, indeed to its existence, as we have more than once lamented to find, when healthy, luxuriant plants introduced into our town garden in high hope and promise, have immediately declined and perished.

The anemone is also a natural barometer, closing its petals when the air is moist and rain at hand. It is like many other flowers, affected by the alternations of day and night, and on the approach of evening, it droops and closes up till sunrise.

"The flower enamoured of the sun,
At his departure hangs her head and weeps,
And shrouds her sweetness up and keeps
Sad vigils, like a cloistered nun,
Till his reviving ray appears,
Waking her beauty, as he dries her tears."

Among the Persians the anemone was supposed to possess some magic charm, and the first flower that was found in the fields, in the spring, when gathered and kept, was fancied to be a preservative against pestilence. The Christian's amulet is mentioned by David—"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord he is my refuge, and my fortress, my God, in him will I trust, surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence."—Psalm xci. 1, 2, 3.

Then there is the AURICULA (auricula primula), blooming side by side with the hyacinth. Its botanic name is auricula ursi, or bear's-ear, from the shape of its leaves. The richness of its flowers has associated it with the sentiment of pride.

"Arrayed in sporting dust and velvet pride,
Like heroes at state arranged in splendid row,
The proud auriculas their lustre show."

Kindred with the auricula is the POLYANTHUS, of numbered dyes (primula elatior); it is, in fact, a variety of the wild primrose, though differing widely in its colours, and mode of flowering in clusters. Its prevailing colours are red, claret colour, and lilac.

We have not space to notice the stately crown imperial, with its drooping bell-flowers, and coronal of leaves; the pretty speedwell (veronica), with its flowers of cerulean blue peeping through the hedges, nor the Iris "of all hues," the symbol of eloquence among the ancients; but we would say a hasty word on the Pansy.

The PANSY, in its native state of wildness, is the viola tricolor, or heart's-ease of the fields. Though variously tinted, its petals are generally of purple, yellow, and white—whence it derives its name of three-faces-under-a-hood. As we roam through the fields in spring,

"Their triple boast, the white,
The purple, and the gold do far outvie
The eastern monarch's garb."

They stand out well from the mass of green, and, again, they appear among the stubble of our corn-fields in harvest, as fresh and rich as in the early days of spring. This rustic beauty is the parent stock of all the florists' splendid pansy flowers—the deep purple, the maroon, the yellow, and the white. It is one of the strongest exemplifications of the beneficial effects of proper and well-directed culture. We see this also in the lower order of animals and in mankind itself. And how strongly must not David have felt this, from this his fervent and constant prayer throughout the entire of the Psalms—"Oh, teach me thy paths; teach me thy ways; teach me thy statutes; teach me thy judgments; teach me thy will; teach me good judgment;" and then, in another Psalm, he gives the other side of the picture—"Blessed is the man whom thou teachest out of thy law."—Psalm xciv. 12. This law is to be found in the Scriptures, given by inspiration, which our Lord directed the Jews to search, and the Apostle Paul commended the Bereans for studying.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR APRIL.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

THE spring's work should now be considerably in advance, if the unusually fine seed time we have enjoyed for sometime has been taken advantage of, though, from various uncontrolable causes, much may yet have to be done.

Spring Wheat.—It is too late now, and has been so for the last fortnight, to sow any of the usually recommended white wheats for spring sowing; but this is the proper month to sow the true April wheat (Triticum æstivum), which is a red or yellow bearded wheat. It may be sown in any soil usually sown with wheat, comes in early, and yields well. The grain is inclined to be coarse; but some experience in its culture and knowledge of its habit may lead to much improvement.

Winter-sown Wheats will require hoeing, harrowing, and rolling during the month. When strong and luxuriant, it will require eating down with sheep or mowing.

Barley should be sown and completed early in the month, and when sown with clovers and grasses, should be well rolled afterwards.

Carrots and Parsnips.—Where the intended breadth has not been sown, no time should now be lost in doing so, remembering to germinate the seeds, as directed in last month's calendar, which will give to the middle of the month to get in those valuable root crops.

Flax should now be sown, the land having been previously well-pulverized, and all root weeds gathered and removed. To insure a level surface and even covering, the land should be rolled before sowing. Three and a-half to four bushels of seed should be sown to the Irish acre, and well harrowed in, first up and down, and then across, with light harrows, to disperse the seed evenly. Finish with the roller, if the soil be dry enough without sticking to the roller. Clover and grass seeds are sometimes sown with the flax crop; but the flax manufacturers object to it as being injurious to the plant, but recommend substituting carrots, sowing them in drills, on the flat, which may be hoed and cleaned after pulling the flax.

Spring Vetches.—Sow a breadth commensurate with requirements in July and August. Sow about the beginning of the month, and again at the latter end, and mix some oats and rape with the vetches.

Beans and Peas will require hand-hoeing sometime during the month.

Cabbages.—Finish planting out the general crop of cabbages, and sow more seed to produce plants to put out in June and July.

Potato planting should be proceeded with with all possible despatch. Those planted in the autumn will soon be making their appearance, and if in lazy-beds should have some fresh earth cast over them from the furrows to protect them from frost, which will be fatal to the young shoots if exposed to it. If planted in drills, they should be carefully harrowed down, before coming to the surface, the drills should then be set up again with the double mould-board plough.

New and Recent Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION: Being Comments on 1 Cor. chap. xv. By the Rev. Robert Noble. (Immediately.)

THE DOMESTIC COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY SCRIPTURES. By a Clergyman of the Church of England. 4 vols. Imp. 8vo. £2 15s. 6d.

CHRISTOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, and a Commentary on the Messianic Predictions. By E. W. Hengstenberg. vol. 1. 10s. 6d.

INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL IN CENTRAL AMERICA, CHIAPAS AND YUCATAN. By the late John Lloyd Stephens. With numerous Engravings. 8vo. 12s.

GRATITUDE: an Exposition of the Hundred and Third Psalm. By the Rev. John Stevenson. 8vo. 6s.

THE BIBLE IN THE COUNTING HOUSE: a course of Lectures to Merchants. By the Rev. H. A. Broadman, D.D. 8vo. 5s.

LEILA ADA, THE JEWISH CONVERT: an authentic Memoir. By Osborne W. Trenery, Heighway. 3s. 6d.

SELECT EXTRACTS FROM THE DIARY, CORRESPONDENCE, ETC., OF LEILA ADA. By Osborne W. Trenery, Heighway. 3s. 6d.

THE BUD OF PROMISE: a Memoir of Eliza H. M. Græme. By the Rev. D. Pitcairn. 3s. 6d.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAMPAIGN OF 1828-29; with a View of the present State of the Eastern Question. By Colonel Chesney. 12s.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

PROGRESS OF RUSSIA IN THE WEST, NORTH, AND SOUTH. By David Urquhart. 1s. 6d.

THE RUSSIANS OF THE SOUTH. By Shirley Brooke. 1s.

TURKEY AND CHRISTENDOM: An Historical Sketch of the Relations between the Ottoman Empire and the States of Europe. 1s.

RUSSIA AND THE RUSSIANS; comprising an account of the Czar Nicholas, and the House of Romanoff, with a sketch of the Encroachments of Russia from the reign of the Empress Catherine. By J. H. Cole. 21st Fusileers. 2s. 6d.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY: a Narrative for the Young, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. With an Introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

WORK; or Plenty to Do, and How to Do it. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 12mo. 4s.

MY SCHOOLS AND MY SCHOOLMASTERS; or, the Story of my Education. By Hugh Miller. post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANT REFUGEES, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Charles Weiss. 8vo. 14s.

HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN HUNGARY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REFORMATION TO 1850, with reference also to Transylvania. With an Introduction by Dr. D'Anbigne. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE CROSS AND THE DRAGON; or, the Fortunes of Christianity in China, with Notices of the Secret Societies of the Chinese. By J. Kesson. Post 8vo. 6s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION. Vol. V.—Subject:—"The Reformation in England." 8vo. 12s.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. Five vols. in One. 8vo. Cloth, 8s., Gilt Edges, 9s.

THE NET IN THE BAY; or Journal of a Visit to Moose and Albany. By the Bishop of Rupert's Land. 4s. 6d.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOUR ILLUSTRATIVE OF HIS DIVINE CHARACTER AND MISSION. By Rev. A. L. R. Foote. 6s.

THE WORDS OF JESUS. By the Author of the "Faithful Promiser." In Cover, 8d.; Cloth, 1s.

THE PSALMS RECORDED TO THE MESSIAH: A Commentary on the Book of Psalms. By Rev. R. H. Ryland. With a commendatory notice, by the Bishop of Cashel. 6s.

THE GREAT SACRIFICE. By Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

THE COMFORTER. By Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

CHRIST OUR PASSOVER; or, Thoughts on the Atonement. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 2s. 6d.

THE TENT AND ALTAR: Sketches of Patriarchal Days. By Rev. Dr. Cumming. 9s.

MEMOIRS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his Son-in-Law, the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D. 2 Vols., 12s.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE REV. EDWARD BICKERSTETH. By the Rev. T. R. Birks. Cheaper Edition. 2 vols., fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF THE LIVES OF ROBERT AND JAMES A. HALDANE. By Alexander Haldane, Esq. 8vo. 12s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. W. H. KRAUSE, A.M., Bethesda Chapel, Dublin, with selections from his Correspondence. By Rev. C. S. Stanford. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

THE SUCCESSFUL MERCHANT: Sketches of the Life of Mr. Samuel Budgett. By William Arthur, A.M. 2s. 6d.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND. By Miss Strickland. New and Revised Edition. With numerous Portraits. Vols. I., II., III., IV., post 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. (To be completed in 8 monthly volumes.)

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN PYE SMITH, D.D., L.L.D. By John Medway. 12s. 6d.

DAILY BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS: The Apostlse and Early Christian Church. By Dr. Kitto. 6s.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES; THE MOSLEM, AND HIS END; THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS HOPE. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 1s. 6d.

NUNS AND NUNNERIES. Two Lectures. By the Rev. Hobart Seymour. 1s. 4d.

THE MYSTERY SOLVED; or, Ireland's Miseries; the Grand Cause and Cure. By the Rev. Marcus Dill, D.D. 2s. 6d.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the End of the Reign of George II. By Hume and Smollett. With Continuation to the Accession of Queen Victoria. By the Rev. T. S. Hughes. Vol. i. 4s. (To be completed in 18 monthly vols.)

ST. PATRICK AND THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH IN IRELAND. By the Rev. W. P. Walsh. Third Edition. 6d.

THE NECESSITY FOR AN INTERMEDIATE SYSTEM OF EDUCATION BETWEEN THE NATIONAL SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES OF IRELAND. By the Rev. Professor M'Cosh, D.D., Queen's College, Belfast. 6d.

THE ART OF QUESTIONING; or, a Short Analysis of the Interrogatory Methods of Instruction, designed for the use of Teachers, Pupil Teachers, and Monitors. By W. T. Young, T.C.D. 1s. By post, 1s. 4d.

PHILIPS MAP OF THE FRONTIER PROVINCES OF TURKEY, RUSSIA, AND AUSTRIA, THE BLACK SEA, &c., with a detailed Map of the River Danube, showing the Fortified Towns, &c., along its course. In case. 1s.

PHILIPS' CHART OF THE MEDITERRANEAN, with detailed Plans of the Bays of Gibraltar, Genoa, Marseilles, &c. 1s.

PHILIPS' CHART OF THE NORTH SEA AND THE BALTIC, with detailed Plans of Cronstadt, Revel, &c. 1s.

JOHNSTONE'S MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR in the Danubian Principalities, the Black Sea, &c. 1s.

JOHNSTONE'S CHART OF THE BALTIC, with enlarged plans of Kronstadt and St. Petersburgh. 1s.

WYLD'S MAP OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE, THE BLACK SEA, AND THE FRONTIERS OF RUSSIA AND PERSIA. Coloured, 2s. 6d.; mounted and in case, 4s. 6d.

WYLD'S CHART OF THE NORTH SEA AND THE BALTIC. 4s.

WYLD'S CHART OF THE THEATRE OF WAR, on an enlarged scale. 3s. In case, 5s.

WYLD'S PLAN OF CRONSTADT, with its Fortifications and Batteries. 1s.

Lately Published,

WILLET'S "SYNOPSIS PAPISMI." New Edition. Edited by the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. Ten vols., 8vo. Price £3.

London: JAMES MILLER, 17, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, and all Booksellers.

Just Published, No. II., Price 6s.,

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND QUARTERLY REVIEW.

CONTENTS:

I. Convocation.
II. American Painters.
III. Prophet and Seer.
IV. Life Assurance.
V. Cholera, and its Causes.
VI. Cathedral Reform.
VII. Tractarianism in London.
VIII. Russia, its Power and Prospects.
IX. Quarterly Journal of Facts and Progress.
X. Literature of the Quarter Classified and Reviewed.

London: Sampson Low, and Son. Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND CO., 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET.

Just Published, New Edition, Price 2s. 6d.,

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND,

Catechetically Explained, Compared with Scripture, and Briefly Commented upon, with the Date and Origin of each Collect annexed. For the use of Families and Sunday Schools.

By the Rev. Charles Miller, A.B.,

With Recommendatory Preface by the Bishop of Meath.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY, 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET. London: Wertheim and Mackintosh.

Just Published,

Second Edition, with additional Facts and Anecdotes, in limp cloth, 1s. 6d., or in cloth, 2s. 6d.,

POOR PADDY'S CABIN; or, SLAVERY IN IRELAND. A true Representation of Facts and Characters. By an Irishman.

"We could desire nothing better for the British Empire, and indeed for the interests of mankind everywhere, than that 'Poor Paddy's Cabin' may have a circulation as extensive as Mrs. Stowe's beautiful narrative. The story on which the incidents are engrafted is in the highest degree interesting and gratifying, and it would do more good within the British Islands, if found in every hand, than even 'Uncle Tom's Cabin has done for the cause of Negro Emancipation in the New World!"—Standard.

London: WERTHEIM and MACINTOSH. Dublin: WM. CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Just Published, Price 3d.,

CHILDREN IN HEAVEN: A Sermon to Children, preached in Trinity Church, on Thursday, January 5, 1854. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

II.

Price Twopence.

GOOD TO BE DONE, AND WHO SHOULD DO IT: A Sermon preached in Trinity Church, on Sunday, January 1, 1854. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

III.

Price Twopence.

A CURE FOR CARE: A Sermon preached in Trinity Church. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

IV.

Price Twopence.

THE WAY OF ESCAPE: A Sermon preached in Trinity Church, on Sunday evening, January 1, 1845. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

V.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE POOR: A Sermon preached in Trinity Church, on the 11th December, 1853. By the Rev. John Gregg, A.B.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

APRIL, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Θlóιρ νο Dhια αñ γηα hάηνωιδ, αgυγ γíννċáιη αιρ αη νċαlαιη νeαgċoιl νο na νáoιmδ.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 29. MAY, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 3s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE.
The Infallible Church not Infallible	55
The Life of St. Philomena—"The Young Christian's Library"	56
How far is the Reformation affected by the characters and motives of the Reformers—No. II.	57
The Heir of Ballymanus—No. III.	58
Is the Scaffold the safest way to Heaven?	61
CORRESPONDENCE:
Cardinal Bellarmine and the CATHOLIC LAYMAN—by Investigator	62
On Infallibility—by Mr. Rourke	63
On Prayers for the Dead and the Burial Service—by Mr. E. Power	63
Flowers for May	65
Farming Operations for May	65

THE INFALLIBLE CHURCH NOT INFALLIBLE.

In Dr. Johnson's interesting tale of Rasselas, prince of Abyssinia, with which many of our readers are, doubtless, familiar, one of the most amusing chapters is that which records the fate of the ingenious artist, who attempted to discover the method of making wings. Before his project was quite ripe for trial, we are told that, in the course of a conversation with the prince, he drew a vivid picture of the new pleasures of which mankind would shortly be put in possession, as the result of his fortunate discovery. "With what delight," said he, "will a philosopher, furnished with wings, and hovering in the sky, see the earth and all its inhabitants rolling beneath him! How it must amuse the spectator to see the moving scene of land and ocean; to survey, with equal security, the marts of trade, and the fields of battle! How easily shall we then trace the Nile through all his passages, pass over to distant regions, and examine the face of nature from one extremity of the earth to the other!"

Rasselas, we are told, modestly suggested some doubts of the practicability of the design. He hinted that the imagination of the artist prevailed over his skill, and that it suggested rather what he wished than what he knew. His fears, however, were dismissed as groundless. "Nothing," replied the artist, "will ever be attempted if all possible objections must be first overcome." At length, the wings were finished, and the time came to make trial of them. The attempt was made, and the adventurous artist waved his pinions for flight; but, alas for the vanity of human wishes! in an instant he dropped into the lake beneath, and the prince had much difficulty in drawing him to land.

We have often thought that the incident just related is an apt illustration of the modern Romish theory of infallibility. Nothing can be more attractive than the picture which Bishop Milner, and other Roman Catholic writers, draw of the blessings arising from the possession of an infallible guide in all matters of religion. "How delightful," say they, "to feel oneself raised, as on eagle's wings, above the atmosphere of doubt and uncertainty, which envelopes poor, benighted Protestants, dimly groping after truth! How satisfactory to be able to survey, in calm security, the contentions of rival sects, and the angry warfare of religious parties! If borne aloft by the principle of infallibility, how easily can we trace the stream of orthodox doctrine from its earliest origin, and discern the distant regions over which the Catholic Church is spread, from one extremity of the earth to the other!"

> Felix, qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas,
> Atque metus omnes et inexorabile fatum
> Subjecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari.

All this is, doubtless, very pleasing and very delightful to think of and write about; but the mere fact of our wishing for such an infallible teacher as would save us all trouble in religion, does nothing towards assuring us that God has actually given us such a guide. We have seen that the artist, in the tale, often consoled his mind with similar visions, when he was employed in his attempt to provide for mankind organs which God did not see fit to bestow upon them. The wings, however ingeniously contrived, failed to accomplished the purpose for which the artist designed them; and the question naturally arises, does the infallibility, claimed by the Church of Rome, actually realize the delightful promises its advocates make on its behalf? We shall endeavour to lay a few facts before our readers, which will enable them to answer this question for themselves.

Whence, then, arises the necessity for an infallible guide, and what is the great advantage to be derived from one? Roman Catholic divines always take for granted that the great mass of mankind are utterly unable to arrive at the knowledge of the truths of revelation for themselves. They assume that God must be supposed to have provided for all men a safe and easy method of attaining to religious truth—in other words, an infallible guide. From these premises they conclude that this guide can be no other than the Church of Rome, which they always identify with the whole Catholic Church. They boldly assert that the local Church of Rome has always taught the pure doctrines of Christianity, from the time of St. Paul to the present day; that she has never fallen into the slightest error or heresy—in short, that all her authoritative statements may be implicitly embraced, as setting forth those important truths which will make men wise unto salvation. Here, then, they tell us, is the infallible guide we need. If we listen to her, we are secure from the seductions of false doctrine; if we tread in her footsteps, we are in no danger of going astray.

But is it a fact, that the Church of Rome has never varied in her doctrines or teaching? Has she never put forth contradictory statements upon vital questions of religion? A Church which claims infallibility must of necessity be always the same. One instance of contradiction is enough to destroy all reliance upon her testimony, just as one plain, unequivocal lie is fatal to a man's character for veracity. Jesus Christ, the great head of the Church, is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever" (Heb. xiii. 8), and it follows, that all the doctrines which claim Him as their author, and rest upon His authority, must necessarily agree.

Let us, then, suppose the case of some honest, sober-minded Christian, whose sole anxiety is to be taught the truth. He is told, that the Church of Rome claims to be infallible, and that he may safely place himself under her guidance. He sets his mind, therefore, to learn the doctrines propounded by that Church from the earliest times; he prepares to soar aloft upon the wings of infallibility, that he may contemplate, as from some lofty eminence, the broad stream of Catholic doctrine flowing down from the first ages of Christianity, and taking its rise in the city of the seven hills.

But, when he tries to spread his wings, is the attempt successful? or, to drop the metaphor, does our inquirer find that the Church of Rome is, in point of fact, infallible? Alas! far from it. Let us hear the evidence of one of the acutest thinkers and ablest writers of the seventeenth century, one who certainly had no prejudices against Romanism, for he was himself, in early years, a Roman Catholic*—"I see plainly, and with mine own eyes, that there are Popes against Popes, councils against councils, some Fathers against others, the same Fathers against themselves, a consent of Fathers of one age against a consent of Fathers of another age." The theory of the Church of Rome being an unerring, infallible guide in religion, like many other theories, looks very well upon paper, and has a plausible, captivating look as long as it is not tested by facts; but let any adventurous inquirer, who is in search of truth, and wishes for some better evidence for his religion than the mere word of a priest, only try to put this principle of infallibility to the test—let him attempt to spread his wings, and he finds, on a sudden, that they won't work. A host of Popes and Cardinals, councils and divines, pour their discordant blasts upon his head from all the four winds of heaven; and fortunate will he be if, as the result of his rash experiment, he is not plunged deep beneath the dark waters of hopeless infidelity.

We have said that, as a matter of fact, the Church of Rome cannot be infallible, for that she has contradicted herself at various times in the statement of important doctrines of Christianity. General assertions, however, rarely carry conviction along with them, unless they are supported by proofs. We proceed, therefore, to substantiate our charge, by citing a few of these contradictory statements, with the authorities on which they rest. We take, for the sake of convenience, the catechism and decrees of the Council of Trent, as the most authoritative exposition of the doctrines of the modern Church of Rome; and by a comparison of these decrees with the recorded opinions of some of the ancient Popes and divines of that Church, even the most unlearned of our readers will be able to judge whether Romanism is as infallible as she pretends. We give accurate references, as usual, to all the authorities which we quote.

1. And first, concerning the important doctrine of The Eucharist.

The modern Church of Rome teaches as follows:—"By the consecration of the bread and wine, the whole substance of the bread is converted into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and the whole substance of the wine is converted into the substance of his blood; which conversion is suitably and properly called transubstantiation."—Decret. Conc. Trid., Sess. xiii., c. iv.

Now, listen to the doctrine of the ancient Church of Rome.

Pope Gelasius (A.D. 492) writes as follows:—"The sacraments of the body and blood of the Lord, which we receive, are divine things, because by these we are made partakers of the divine nature. Nevertheless, the substance or nature of bread and wine ceases not to exist; and, assuredly, the image and similitude of the body and blood of Christ are celebrated in the performance of the mysteries."†

Is it possible for two statements to be more directly opposed to one another than these?‡

2. Communion in one kind.

The modern Church of Rome teaches thus—"If any person shall say, that it is required either by the precept of God, or for necessity of salvation, that all the faithful in Christ shall partake of the holy sacrament of the Eucharist in both kinds, let him be accursed."—Decret. Conc. Trid. Sess. xxi., can. 1.

Now, let us hear what was the custom and practice of the old Roman Church on this point.

S. Thomas Aquinas says, that, "according to the ancient custom of the Church, all men, as they communicated in the body, so they also communicated in the blood."‡

The testimony of Cassander, the famous Romish ritualist, is still more express to the same effect—"In the Latin Church, for above a thousand years, the body of Christ and the blood of Christ were separately given, the body apart, and the blood apart, after the consecration of the mysteries."§

These authorities show pretty plainly the novelty of the decree of the Council of Trent, on the subject of half communion. The following extract, from Pope Gelasius, is equally plain, as to its unlawfulness:—"We find that some, having received a portion of the holy body only, do abstain from the cup of the holy blood, who, doubtless (because they are bound by I know not what superstition), should receive the whole sacrament, or be driven from the whole; for the dividing of one and the same mystery cannot be done without great sacrilege."‖

---

* Chillingworth.

† Certe sacramenta quæ sumimus corporis et sanguinis Christi, divina res est, propter quod et per eadem divinæ efficimur consortes naturæ; et tamen esse non desinit substantia vel natura panis et vini. Et certè imago et similitudo corporis et sanguinis Christi in actione mysteriorum celebrantur."—Gelasius, de duabus naturis in Christo. Bibl. Vet. Patrum, tom. viii., p. 703. Lugd., 1677.

‡ The contradiction between the sentiments of Pope Gelasius and the Decree of the Council of Trent, is, indeed, so glaring, that Baronius and Bellarmine were obliged to resort to the desperate expedient of attempting to prove that the treatise above named was not written by Pope Gelasius, but by some other man of the same name! The Roman Catholic historian, Du Pin, however, to his credit be it spoken, possessed more honesty than the brace of Cardinals. He exposed the hollowness of this "pious fraud," and proved incontestably that the work in question was rightly ascribed to Pope Gelasius.—Vide Du Pin, Eccl. Hist., vol. i., p. 520. Dublin, 1723.

‡ "Secundum antiquæ ecclesiæ consuetudinem, omnes, sicut communicabant corpori, ita communicabant et sanguini."—S. Thom. in Joannem, cap. vii., sec. vii., p. 363. Paris, 1640.

§ "Occidentalis vero, sive Romana Ecclesia mille amplius annis continuis, non aliter quam sub duplici hac specie in conventu Ecclesiæ sacramentum hoc Dominici corporis et sanguinis administrasse legitur, idque in pane et vino, atque adeò separatim.—Cassander, de Sacr. Commun., p. 1075. Paris, 1616.

‖ "Comperimus quod quidam, sumpta tantummodo corporis sacri portione, a calice sacri cruoris abstineant; qui proculdubio (quoniam nescio qua superstitione docentur obstringi) aut integra sacramenta percipiant, aut ab integris arceantur; quia divisio unius ejusdemque mysterii sine grandi sacrilegio non potest provenire."—Corpus Juris Canonici, De Consecr., Dist. II., cap. 12, tom. i., col. 1918. Lugd., 1671.

It is quite plain, that the curse of the venerable Fathers of the Council of Trent would have lighted on the head of poor Pope Gelasius, if he had had the ill fortune to have been alive in their time.

3. Solitary masses by a priest.

The Council of Trent decreed as follows:—"If any person shall say, that masses, in which the priest alone communicates sacramentally, are unlawful, and, therefore, ought to be abrogated, let him be accursed."—Decret. Conc. Trid. Sess. xxii., can. 8.

But, the ancient Church of Rome taught the very reverse. Thus, for example, the Romish canon law tells us, that Anacletus, Bishop of Rome, decreed "that all present should communicate, or else be turned out of the Church: for so the Apostles did order, and the holy Church of Rome observeth."*

And Gregory I. forbids the priest to celebrate the Eucharist alone—"A priest," saith he, "should never celebrate the mass alone; for as the mass cannot be celebrated without the salutation of the priest, and the answer of the people, it ought, consequently, by no means to be celebrated by a single individual."†

We may well ask, which is infallible, Pope Gregory the Great or the Council of Trent?

4. The Seven Sacraments.

The doctrine of the Council of Trent runs thus—"If any person shall say, that all the sacraments of the new law were not instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, or that they are more or fewer than seven, let him be accursed."—Decret. Conc. Trid., Sess. vii., can. 1.

But we are assured, on the unexceptionable authority of Cassander, "that we shall not likely find any writer before Peter Lombard [who lived about 1130] that did define the number of the sacraments!"‡ And the famous canonist, Alex. de Ales, states particularly, with regard to confirmation, that "this sacrament was instituted in the Meldensian Council."§ Did the Church not know how many sacraments it had before the twelfth century, or was it left to Peter Lombard and the Meldensian Council to inform it upon a matter of such vital importance to every Christian man? And yet, notwithstanding all this, the Church of Rome claims to be immutable as well as infallible!

5. Worship of Images.

In the catechism of the Council of Trent we read as follows—"The priest is to teach that it is lawful to have images in churches, and to give them honour and worship."‖

The worship of images, however, was forbidden in the most express terms by Pope Gregory the Great. In a letter to Serenus, Bishop of Marseilles, he writes—"Forbid, by every means in your power, the worship of images."¶

Ordinary persons will, perhaps, be of opinion that the doctrine of Pope Gregory the Great, in the sixth century, corresponds more nearly with God's law, as laid down in the Second Commandment, than does the doctrine of the Council of Trent. One thing, however, is pretty clear, that Pope Gregory and the Council cannot both be right.

6. Supremacy of the Pope.

The earliest assumption by a Pope of the title of Universal Bishop of the Christian Church, appears to have been by Boniface III., in the beginning of the seventh century. At a later period Gregory VII. declared "that the Roman Pontiff alone can be properly called universal." In the fourteenth century Pope Boniface VIII. published his famous Bull, "Unam Sanctam" (which was inserted in the Canon law) to the following effect—"We declare, say, define, and pronounce it to be absolutely necessary to salvation, for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff."††

This decree asserts the Pope's claim to the office of universal bishop, in very clear and unmistakeable terms. And in conformity to it we find that, at the end of the Bull of Pope Pius IV., confirming the decrees of the Council of Trent, the first signature is—"Ego Pius, Catholicæ Ecclesiæ Episcopus"—i.e., "I, Pius, Bishop of the Universal Church," standing at the head of a long list of cardinals and ordinary diocesan bishops.‡‡

Now let us hear the sentiments of Pope Gregory the Great, in the sixth century. The Bishop of Constantinople had laid claim to this title of Œcumenical or Universal Bishop, whereupon Pope Gregory writes as follows—"I earnestly admonished my brother and fellow-bishop, that if he had any regard for the peace and concord of the Church, he would abstain from this foolish title. For I confidently assert, that whoever calls himself, or desires to be called, Universal Priest, is the forerunner of Antichrist, because he proudly sets himself above others."*

If any of our readers, after comparing the foregoing extracts, should see cause to agree with Pope Gregory the Great, we must confess that we think they could not be very greatly blamed. But, between such contradictory and discordant opinions, not of one, but of several Popes, we ask again, where lies the infallibility?

7. Indulgences.

The Council of Trent decreed as follows—"The power of conferring indulgences was given by Christ to his Church; and the Church hath made use of this power in the most ancient times."†

When we turn to Cardinal Cajetan, however, what do we read?—"Concerning the rise of indulgences," saith he, "if any certainty could be had, it would aid us in discovering the truth; but no authority of sacred Scripture, or of ancient Greek or Latin Fathers hath brought this knowledge to us."‡

If there be no mention of indulgences in Scripture, or any ancient writer, with what face could the venerable fathers of the Council of Trent make the bold assertion we have quoted above?

8. Purgatory.

The decree of the Council of Trent, on the subject of Purgatory, is singularly moderate, considering the generally confident and sweeping manner in which this grave assembly of divines scattered their anathemas on other subjects. They assert merely "that there is a purgatory."—(purgatorium esse, Sess. xxv.) The catechism of the Council went a little farther, and speaks of "the fire of purgatory, in which the souls of the pious expiate (their sins) by torture, for a definite time."§

Now, what doctrine was taught by the ancient Church of Rome, with regard to the state of souls after death? Let us begin with the respectable authority of Pope Gregory the Great. In his commentary on Job, he writes as follows:—"At the moment of death, either the good or the evil spirit seizes upon the soul as it departs from the prison of the flesh, and keeps it for ever with itself, without any change."‖ Does this passage look as if Pope Gregory (whatever his precise sentiments may have been) believed in the modern Romish doctrine of purgatory?

But, perhaps, the testimony of the old writer, Polydore Vergil, is still more express on this point. (His statements, we may observe in passing, were considered of such dangerous tendency, that they came under the ban of the Roman Index Expurgatorius.). They are as follows:—

"For what cause, or by what authority, indulgences were first introduced into the Church, has given modern divines a great deal of trouble. In a subject which is by no means clear, I think it better to use the testimony of John, Bishop of Rochester [Bishop Fisher], in a work which he wrote against Luther. 'Many persons,' saith he, 'are inclined to place but little reliance upon indulgences, because their use seems to have come in rather late in the Church.' And, then, he adds—'No orthodox [Roman Catholic] doubts whether there is a purgatory, concerning which, nevertheless, there is either no mention or the very rarest mention in ancient writers (nemo certo dubitat orthodoxus, an purgatorium sit, de quo tamen apud priscos nulla vel quam rarissima fiebat mentio). To this day, purgatory is not believed in by the Greek Church. As long, then, as there was no anxiety concerning purgatory, no one looked for indulgences; for all the value of indulgences depends upon it. If you take away purgatory, what use will there be in indulgences? Indulgences, therefore, began when people began to entertain fears about the torments of purgatory.' These things, saith the Bishop (Fisher); but you, my reader, may, perhaps, think the subject of so great importance, that you might expect more certainty in the matter from the mouth of God" (quæ tu fortè cum tanti sint momenti, ut magis certa ex ore Dei expectabas).¶

We cordially concur in opinion with old Polydore Vergil. A subject of such vital importance to the peace and happiness of every true Christian is surely one, if there be any, or which we might expect some certain authority in holy Scripture, some reliable information in ancient writers. But, alas! Bishop Fisher tells us, there is none or next to none. During several centuries, it would seem, the people never frightened themselves about purgatory, but, at last, the priests, or somebody else, put them all in a state of alarm, and then they began to look for indulgences. For, as the old bishop very candidly asks, If you take away purgatory, what use will there be in indulgences?

One use, indeed, there was of indulgences, to which we can now only briefly allude. The Council of Trent condemned all "disgraceful traffic" in indulgences (pravos quæstus omnino abolendos esse, Sess. xxv.), thereby tacitly admitting that they had been disgracefully bought and sold, in many parts of Christendom. If the priests, for a series of ages, were covetous men—if they could frighten the people generally into the belief of a purgatory which had no existence, and could persuade them to buy indulgences, in order to deliver themselves or their friends from these visionary torments, we can see, even without the aid of Bishop Fisher, how the belief of both purgatory and indulgences gradually crept into the Church.

We are sorry to leave our readers in purgatory, but our limits warn us that we must conclude for the present. We have merely touched on a few of the most obvious topics, on which the ancient and modern Church of Rome are directly at variance. If there be even one such point (and every scholar knows that there are several) what becomes of the boasted claim of Romish infallibility? To find even one plain error and contradiction in a Church calling itself infallible, is to overthrow the pretended authority of that Church. For what is the usual reason given for forsaking other Churches, but because they are fallible? What is the reason why some few go over to the Church of Rome, and why most of its members remain in it, but because she is (as they are made to believe) infallible? But if, with her infallibility, she has mistaken error for truth; if with her certainty she contradicts herself; if she was one thing in one age, and another in another, then there is the same or greater reason for all such persons to quit the Church of Rome, as there seemed to be at first for them to embrace it, or continue in it.

ST. PHILOMENA.

As ardent lovers of our country, we feel a warm sympathy with all those who labour for the benefit of Ireland, and especially with those who exert themselves in the department of labour in which we are ourselves employed—namely, the diffusing religious information among the people. It was, accordingly, with some interest that we watched the results of an announcement, made by Mr. Duffy, at the commencement of the present year, when he declared his intention to issue weekly a series of "Sweet little books," each number containing the life of some saint or great servant of God, to be published at the low price of one penny, and so to place edifying and instructive reading within the reach of the very poorest classes. But we found that, however heartily we approved of the general character of this plan, we could by no means bestow the same commendation on the manner in which it was carried out. In fact, when we pronounce it desirable to circulate religious information at a cheap rate among the people, we consider it absolutely essential that the information circulated shall be true. But we fear the compilers of Mr. Duffy's little volumes hold the historic accuracy of their biographies to be a matter of minor importance, and that they believe, that a work containing the life of a saint must be sure to be edifying reading, even though its details be as pure fiction as any novel writer of the present day has imagined. Several of these tracts would be reduced to very narrow dimensions indeed, were we to pare away from them all that was mere legend, unsupported by any historical evidence. We felt, however, that it was rather a delicate matter to criticise these mixtures of truth and falsehood, lest in assailing the falsehood we should be represented as enemies of the truth to which it was joined, or lest in exposing a legend told of a saint we should seem to throw ridicule upon the venerable saint himself. But there is one volume of the "Young Christian's Library" which we can review without being troubled with any fear of this kind; and in calling our readers' attention to the LIFE OF SAINT PHILOMENA we can assure them beforehand, that the task of separating the parts of the story which are true from those which are false is one which will not be attended with the slightest difficulty.

But who is Saint Philomena? exclaims one of our ignorant Protestant readers. Saint Philomena, you should be ashamed not to know, is one of the most popular saints of the present day on the Continent, and it will not be Mr. Duffy's fault if she is not so in Ireland too. There is a fashion about saints as about everything else, and before the commencement of the present century (for reasons hereafter to be explained) Saint Philomena had not a single votary to demand her intercession. Now, however, after fifteen centuries' inactivity, she has commenced working miracles, resolved to make up for lost time, and, as we have said, counts her worshippers by thousands in Spain, and France, and Italy. In the sketch of her history which we give, Mr. Duffy is our chief authority, though we borrow a few particulars from a French and

---

* "Peractâ consecratione, omnes communicent qui noluerint ecclesiasticis carere limitibus: sic enim et apostoli statuerunt, et sancta Romana tenet ecclesia."—Corp. Jur. Can., tom. i., col. 1917. Lugd., 1671.

† "Sacerdos missam solus nequaquam celebret; quia aicut illa celebrari non potest sine salutatione sacerdotis et responsione nihilominus plebis, ita nimirum nequaquam ab uno debet celebrari."—Cassander, Liturg. p. 83. Paris, 1616.

‡ "Nec temere quenquam reperias ante Petrum Lombardum, qui certum aliquem et definitum sacramentorum numerum statuerunt."—Cassander, p. 951. Paris, 1616.

§ "Institutum fuit hoc sacramentum spiritus sancti instinctu in concilio Meldensi."—Alex. Ales, Op. Omn., vol. iv., p. 109. Venet, 1575.

‖ "Non solum autem docere in ecclesia imagines habere, et iis honorem et cultum adhibere, ostendet parochus, . . . verum etiam maximo fidelium bono ad hanc usque diem factum declarabit."—Cat. Conc. Trid., pars iii., c. ii., qu. 24.

¶ "Adorari vero imagines, omnibus modis veta."—S. Greg. Ep. lib. i., ep. xiii., vol. ii., col. 1161. Paris, 1705.

 "Quod Solus Romanus Pontifex jure dicatur universalis."—Greg. vii., Ep. lib. ii., ep. 55. Harduin Concil, Tom. vi. pars i., p. 1304.

†† "Subesse Romano Pontifici omni humanæ creaturæ declaramus, dicimus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis."—Corp. Jur. Canon. Extrav., lib. i., tit. viii., cap. 1. Tom. ii., p. 394. Paris, 1687.

‡‡ Decret. Conc. Trid., p. 221. Lipsiæ, 1852.

* "Eundem verò fratrem meum et cœpiscopum meum studiose admonere curavi, ut si habere pacem omnium concordiamque desiderat, ab stulti vocabuli se appellatione compescat . . . Ego autem fidenter dico, quia quisquis se universalem sacerdotem vocat, vel vocari desiderat, in elatione suâ antichristum præcurrit, quia superbiendo se cæteris præponit."—S. Greg. Op., vol. ii., col. 881. Paris, 1705.

† "Cum potestas conferendi indulgentias a Christo ecclesiæ concessa sit, atque hujusmodi potestate divinitus sibi tradita antiquissimis etiam temporibus illa usa fuerit."—Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xxv., cont.

‡ "De ortu indulgentiarum, si certitudo haberi possit, veritati indagandæ opem ferret; verum quia nulla sacræ scripturæ, nulla priscorum doctorum Græcorum aut Latinorum auctoritas scripta hanc ad nostram deduxit notitiam."—Card. Caj. Opusc., tom. ii., fol. 46 verso. Venetiis, 1580.

§ "Præterea est purgatorius ignis, quo plorum animæ ad definitum tempus cruciatæ expiantur."—Catch. Conc. Trid., pars. i., qu. iii.

‖ "Quia cum humani casus tempore, sive sanctus, sive malignus spiritus egredientem animam claustrâ carnis acceperit, in æternum secum sine ullâ permutatione retinebit."—S. Greg. Mag., Op., vol. i., col. 255. Paris, 1705.

¶ Polyd. Verg., de inventor rerum, lib. viii., c. i., p. 476. Amstel, 1671.

from a Spanish life of this saint, accounts of which we have met with.*

St. Philomena is said to have suffered martyrdom on the 10th August, A.D. 286, in the reign of the Emperor Diocletian. She was the daughter of a king who (our author has discovered) reigned at this time over a little state in Greece. Her mother was also of royal lineage. Both her parents were idolators, and, being childless, never ceased to offer sacrifices to their gods, that they might obtain offspring. Their prayers were long unsuccessful, until a Roman physician named Publius, who resided in their palace, prescribed baptism, and promised them children if they would consent to embrace Christianity. They agreed to the conditions, and on the 10th of January (for we follow an author at no loss about details), obtained, in a daughter, the reward of their faith. She was baptised Philumena, a name, as to the derivation of which we should doubtless mistake, had it not been made the subject of a divine revelation from the saint herself to an Italian nun. It signifies (we are informed by Mr. Duffy) the "friend of light," being derived, apparently from the Greek φιλεω, and the Latin lumen, light. Possibly half her name may have been given by her Grecian parents, and the other half, by the Roman physician who had foretold her birth.† Well, Philomena lived very happily with her parents, until she was turned twelve years of age, when her parents brought her to Rome, whither her father was obliged to repair, in order to renew his allegiance to the Emperor Diocletian, who, at that time, threatened Greece with an unjust war. No doubt, secular historians are misinformed when they represent Greece as a peaceable province of Diocletian's empire. No sooner had the emperor seen Philomena than he determined to make the child his empress, and he assured her father, that he might banish from his mind all fear of war; and that in return for the hand of his daughter, he would set all the forces of the empire at his disposal, and confer on him, and on his country, the greatest advantages. The parents, delighted with this proposal, found an unexpected obstacle; and this was, that the pious little girl had taken the precaution to make a vow of perpetual virginity two years before! In vain did her father urge that she was too young to contract such an engagement, and persuade her to become an empress, and to seat herself on the greatest throne in the world. In vain did he utter "the most wicked threats." In vain did her parents cast themselves on their knees to her, saying, with tears in their eyes, "Daughter, loved daughter, have pity on thy father, thy mother, thy country, our subjects." "No, no," she replied, "God before father, or mother, or country;" and adhered to her vow with a firmness which plunged her mother into despair.

Her baffled parents handed her over to the emperor, who proceeded to attempt to gain her heart by other methods. The first step of his courtship was to load her with chains and cast her into a dungeon of his palace, where she remained for thirty-nine days (without eating anything, according to the Spanish account), and, strange to say, without being more favourably disposed towards her royal suitor than before. Scourging was the next mode of ingratiating himself which he tried. In the presence of a great number of the officers of his court, he caused her to be so striped, that her bleeding body was soon beaten into one wound. He had her then thrown back into prison, sure that she must die in a few hours, but he was deceived, for two angels poured into her wounds a balsam which, in a moment, perfectly healed them. Diocletian ascribed this cure to his god Jupiter, who, he thought, was determined that Philomena should be his empress; and he endeavoured now, by the highest promises, to bring her to this view of the case—but all in vain. Then ensued an extraordinary conflict between Diocletian, who was determined to destroy Philomena, and the angels, who were determined to protect her; a conflict in which, wonderful to tell, the emperor obtained the victory. First, he ordered his attendants to tie an anchor round her neck, and to cast her into the Tiber; but the angels cut the cord, let the anchor fall into the river, (where it remains to this day), and bore Philomena, on their wings, dry to the bank. Not moved by this failure of his attempt, Diocletian caused her to be dragged through the streets of Rome, and ordered, that a shower of arrows should be discharged at her; and, then, directed her, bruised and dying, and with blood trickling over all her limbs, to be thrown back into her dungeon; but Philomena had good healing flesh, and, after a refreshing sleep, awoke up perfectly well. The emperor, then, ordered the arrow experiment to be repeated in his presence, but this time the bows and arrows were useless, and could not be got to act. He then caused the arrow-heads to be heated in a furnace, and tried again; but now the fiery arrow-heads recoiled on those who shot them—killing six of them, and wounding others. The persevering tyrant next tried beheading. What the angels were about this time does not appear; one would think that, if they were not resolved to persevere to the end in defeating the tyrant's attempts, it would have been more merciful to allow the saint to die at the first attempt, without putting her to all the torture they reserved her for: but possibly Philomena, like a cat, had a certain number of lives, and when these were exhausted nothing more could be done for her. However this may be, her head was cut off, on Friday, August 10, A.D. 286, about three o'clock in the afternoon.

Our readers need not be shocked, if we cast some contempt upon this story, in our manner of narrating it. We trust, that we should not be guilty of any want of reverence in dealing with the life of a true saint, or in discussing stories of miraculous events, for which there was a scintilla of historical evidence; but, on the present occasion, we are dealing with a pure, religious romance. For where do our readers suppose St. Philomena is first to be heard of, or what is the authority for the legend we have just narrated? We need scarcely say, that it is not to be found in Eusebius, or any of the ancient ecclesiastical histories. Our readers will search, in vain, for it among any of the collections of acts of martyrs; or among the stories of Simeon Metaphrastes; nor does the name of Philomena occur among the saints, whose lives are given in the voluminous collection of Bolland. It is not pretended that the legend we have given, can lay claim to much more than twenty years' antiquity!!

In the year 1805, Francis de Lucia, a priest of the kingdom of Naples, came to Rome, in search of relics, for the use of his church, at Mugnano del Cardinale, about six leagues from Naples, and was supplied with bones from that fertile source, the catacombs of Rome. The Roman Catholic narrators of the life of St. Philomena, tell us that in the place where these bones were found, was the following fragment of an inscription:—

". . . Lumena Pax tecum Fi. . . ."

The bones were removed to Mugnano, and, if we are to believe Mr. Duffy, at once commenced performing miracles, of which he only mentions one, we suppose the most remarkable, "copious showers of rain," which were absolutely necessary (and, perhaps, not very surprising) "after long-continued heats."

But all this time the good priest, Francis de Lucia, had the discomfort that the saint who adorned his church was anonymous, and that he knew nothing of her history. His ingenuity soon overcame the first defect: he remembered that some eastern nations read their letters from right to left; it is true, the inscription we have given does not become more intelligible if read backwards—"If mucet xap anemul." However, a compromise might be made between the eastern and western ways of writing, by putting the last syllable first, and so he got for his saint the pretty name of Filumena, or—as they have it in France—Philomène. Still her history remained a mystery, until we are told a workman, a priest, and a Neapolitan nun had revelations on the subject. The story, as we have given it, is in the form in which it was enlarged in the year 1832, by the nun, who, it should be mentioned, was under the spiritual direction of the same priest. The Irish people are assured by Mr. Duffy that these revelations have undergone a rigorous examination from "the ecclesiastical authorities, who have pronounced them to bear all the marks by which true revelations are distinguished from false!"

Mr. Duffy, however, abstains from entering into details as to the miracles performed by St. Philomena, some account of which we take from the French life.*

Her first miracle was to paralyze the limbs of the priest who accompanied her relics to Naples, and who had seated himself somewhat irreverently on the chest which contained them. She next played a series of somewhat undignified tricks on those who were preparing a shrine for her. As fast as her measure was taken, she got a few inches longer, so that, says the author, they continually mistrusted some new trick on the part of the amiable providence.

This same shrine, when borne in procession shortly afterwards, though too small for the saint's body, was too large for the lanes through which it had to pass. The difficulty was met, not by a shortening of the shrine, but by a miraculous widening of the lanes! A little afterwards, one of her worshippers, having lain-in of a dead child, loaded the saint with insults, and got rid of her image. St. Philomena harboured no resentment, and raised the child to life. Another time, disputing a soul with the demons, she is said to have pleaded with God in the following terms:—"If this person be not restored to life, I shall be no more honoured (on ne me fêtera plus) in this country, and I am jealous of this honour; I do not wish to be deprived of it."

We shall not pursue our quotations further; enough has been said to show that the process of legend-making and miracle-inventing is not confined to the depth of the dark ages; but goes on with full vigour in the Church of Rome at the present day. But we must not omit to add that Mr. Duffy concludes his story with a prayer:—"St. Philomena, thou lover of innocence, pray for me! Above all things, obtain for me purity—inviolate purity! Obtain for me," &c., &c. We think it mournful at any time to see our fellow-countrymen addressing to departed saints the prayers which ought to be offered to our Lord himself, but it is still more shocking to see them taught by their instructors to address their supplications to a being as purely imaginary as Marmion or Don Quixote!

We are favoured occasionally with anonymous letters, in which the writers give us the impracticable direction to send them no more numbers of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN—assigning as their reason their abhorrence of the lies with which our pages are filled. We cannot forbear a melancholy smile, as we imagine the writer of such a letter, after having despatched his angry missive through the post against the lying CATHOLIC LAYMAN, sitting down in simple good faith to study, in the sweet little book enthusiastically recommended to him by the Freeman's Journal, the Tablet, the Nation, and the Telegraph, the veracious story of St. Philomena.

HOW FAR THE REFORMATION IS AFFECTED BY THE CHARACTERS AND MOTIVES OF THE REFORMERS.—No. II.

In our last number we made some remarks on the invalidity of the reasoning by which the characters and motives of the Reformers, presumed to have been bad, are converted into an argument against the Reformation itself. We now proceed to show, as we then proposed, that such reasoning, admitted to be valid, may be retorted, with fatal effect, against the Church of Rome.

But there is a general preliminary observation which we desire to make, in order to avoid any misconception of our real views upon this subject. We do not deny, on the contrary we confess, with sorrow, that the Reformation was attended with many excesses on the part of some of those who really abandoned the communion of the Roman Church. We say really, because, as is well known, some of the most atrocious crimes which are laid to the charge of the earlier Protestants, both in Germany and England, were committed by, or at the instigation of, secret agents of the Church of Rome, who feigned devotion to the Protestant cause; adopting this—we can scarcely forbear from calling it infernal—policy, in order to excite odium against the Reformation. Confining our attention, however, to what we admit to have been genuine Protestant excesses, we assert, fearlessly, that they are not fairly chargeable upon the Reformation, but upon the system against whose corruptions it was the reaction. Every one, who knows anything of human nature and of history, is well aware that it would be impossible, without special miraculous interference, that such a mighty revolution as the Reformation effected, could be brought about without many and lamentable disorders. Men sunk in gross ignorance, intellectual and religious, and degraded by long spiritual slavery, when light suddenly breaks in upon them, and when the pressure of external restraint is abruptly removed, have a natural tendency to rush into the opposite extreme of licentiousness, both of thought and action. The sober and rational enjoyment of liberty, whether of mind or body, is not the work of a day or of an age. It is a thing of slow growth, and requires careful education, and gradual training. As individuals do not attain to the experience and sobriety of manhood, without passing through many preparatory stages, so a people, when suddenly released from the helplessness and dependence of spiritual childhood, do not and cannot at once arrive at spiritual maturity. History teaches us that no great revolution has ever yet been effected without violent excesses on the part of some of those who were engaged in it. And more especially has this been the case in great religious movements, wherein all the strongest feelings and passions of our nature are brought into play. Christianity itself formed no exception to the general rule. Our blessed Lord, foreseeing the social convulsions to which it would give occasion, and with a view to anticipate the offence which would thence arise, distinctly said, "Do not think that I came to send peace upon earth; I came not to send peace but the sword."—Matt. x. 34. And the history of the early church informs us that out of the universal agitation and ferment which men's minds then underwent, there sprang, even during the life-time of the apostles, a multitude of wild and fanatical opinions, which threatened the very existence of the infant religion. Who will venture to assert that these attendant evils cast any imputation on the purity and perfection of the Gospel system? And yet, the argument which concludes against the Reformation, from the excesses and abuses to which it gave occasion, might, with nearly the same force, be employed against Christianity itself. When Luther arose, the characteristic doctrines of the Gospel, viz., the utter inability of man to save himself, and the efficacy of faith in the one, perfect, and sufficient atonement of Christ, were well nigh lost. Morality had all but perished from the earth. This is not our assertion, but that of the most devoted partizans of the Church of Rome. Hear, for example, what Bellarmine says, "For some years before the Lutheran and Calvinistic heresies were propounded, there was not (as contemporary authors testify) any security in ecclesiastical judgments, any discipline with regard to morals, any knowledge of sacred literature, any reverence for divine things; there was not almost any religion remaining."* Is it surprising that men born and brought up under such a system, should not, when released from it, exhibit the moderation

---

* We do not happen to have met with these foreign little books ourselves, but the Spanish tract is translated by Mr. Meyrick in his "Practical working of the Church of Spain," while accounts of the French one are given by De Potter, (Histoire du Christianisme, tom. vi., p. 250), and by Rev. R. Scott, in the appendix to his "Twelve Sermons."

† We notice that the French account makes the saint derive her name "Filia luminis," daughter of light. Mr. Duffy probably saw that the name was obviously Greek, the initial F being only the Italian equivalent for Ph. But what presumption in him to attempt to improve on a divine revelation! At all events our readers will observe that there is precisely the same evidence for these etymological prodigies, as for the other marvels recorded above.

* Vie et miracles de Sainte Philomène, vierge et martyre, surnommée la thaumaturge du dix-neuvième siècle, traduit de l'Italien sur la 15e edition, par M. J. F. B. de la Compagnie de Jesus. Approuvé par Mgr. l'evêque de Fribourg. Paris, 1835. Cited by De Potter, as above.

* Bellarmini Concio. xxviii. Oper. tom. vii., col. 296; Colon, 1617.

and sobriety which characterize those who have long enjoyed the blessings of rational liberty, morality, and pure religion? So far are the occasional excesses, which unhappily disfigured the revival of religion in the 16th century, from being any real reproach to it, that we unhesitatingly assert they are chargeable on the corruptions which disgraced the mediæval system of Papal Rome. Every accusation uttered against the licentiousness of the Reformation recoils with augmented force upon that Church against the intolerable scandals of which outraged humanity at length rose in arms.

So much in reference to the general charges brought against the Reformation, on the score of the heretical opinions and wild excesses of the Anabaptists and other fanatical sectaries. Let us now turn our attention to the special case of the leading Reformers themselves. The principles of the Reformation, it is argued, must be false, because Luther, Calvin, and the rest, were, individually, ungodly men. It is impossible to imagine that God would have permitted such men to be instrumental in reforming his Church, supposing it stood in need of reformation. The scriptural answer to this objection has been already virtually given in our last number. To what was there said we may now add, that the Old Testament furnishes us with a striking example of God's employing, for the reformation of his ancient Church, the agency of a man, who at the very time was committing a great sin, and continued to commit it as long as he lived. We allude to the case of Jehu. He destroyed the worshippers of Baal, and executed the divine vengeance on the house of Ahab. But he still upheld the idolatrous worship of the golden calves; that great abomination which is specially designated the sin of Jeroboam. The following words deserve our best attention, as bearing upon the point before us:—"And the Lord said to Jehu: Because thou hast diligently executed that which was right and pleasing in my eyes, and hast done to the house of Ahab according to all that was in my heart: thy children shall sit upon the throne of Israel to the fourth generation. But Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord the God of Israel with all his heart; for he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, who had made Israel to sin."—4 Kings x. 30, 31. No sin alleged against the Reformers is comparable for enormity to that which Jehu habitually practised. And yet he was a reformer chosen of God. By the special appointment of Jehovah he was anointed king over Israel.—4 Kings ix.1—3.

But let us admit, as we said before, that the purity of the Protestant faith is vitiated by the supposed sinfulness of those who in the sixteenth century promulgated it. This amounts to a virtual recognition of the principle that sanctity of life is an essential note of a true Church. Let us, then, examine the result of this principle when applied to the Church of Rome, carefully bearing in mind that this Church boasts that she, and she alone, possesses one attribute of Deity—the attribute of infallibility. It is important also to remember that while (strange as it certainly is) there is no unanimity respecting the seat and organ of that asserted infallibility, the ultramontane Romanists claim it for the successor of St. Peter. The Pope, then, according to the universally received doctrine of the Church of Rome, is the organ of the faith of Christendom; and, according to the most influential party in that Church, he is the infallible organ. In his case, then, if anywhere, we should surely expect to find purity of life as well as purity of doctrine. If the character of the Reformed Churches must be identified with that of Luther and the other Reformers, who claimed no supernatural exemption from human weaknesses, much more must the character of the Church of Rome be involved in that of its infallible rulers. Any reasoning which would justify us in arguing from the unworthiness of the Reformers to the necessary worthlessness of the Reformation, will apply with tenfold force to the wickedness of Popes viewed in connection with the purity of the Church of Rome. Well, then, what do we learn from the inexorable records of Ecclesiastical History? As early as the fourth century Pope Marcellinus, if Pope Nicholas I. is to be believed, terrified, by the fear of death, apostatized from the faith, and sacrificed to heathen idols! The successor of St. Peter, the vicar of Christ, became—an idolater!* In the same century, somewhat later, Pope Liberius, weary of banishment, subscribed to the Arian heresy! The successor of St. Peter, the vicar of Christ, became—a heretic!† Poor Cranmer has been branded with every vile epithet that could be thought of, because, when threatened with an agonizing death, he, in a moment of weakness, was induced to renounce the reformed faith: an act which, almost immediately after, he bitterly lamented, and testified his abhorrence of at the stake, by the well-known action which even Voltaire has panegyrized as being more intrepid and magnanimous than that of the ancient Roman. Cranmer's momentary apostacy furnishes rather a dangerous triumph to the advocates of the Church of Rome, so long as the cases of Popes Marcellinus and Liberius stand on record. Cranmer, under the fear of death, abandoned—be it so—the Protestant faith, professing still to be a Christian. Pope Marcellinus, under the same fear, abandoned his God, and sacrificed to idols. Cranmer, to avoid the lingering tortures of fire, subscribed a renunciation of the peculiar doctrines of the Reformation, retaining the common doctrines of Christianity. Pope Liberius, to escape the tedium of banishment, subscribed to the deadly heresy of Arius. Passing over the cases of Pope Anastatius II. in the fifth century, and Pope Vigilius in the sixth, who have both been charged with heresy,* we next come to Pope Honorius, in the seventh century, who was condemned as a Monothelite heretic by the sixth and seventh general Councils,† and anathematized as such by at least two Popes—viz., Agatho and Leo II.‡ Leo's words are, "We anathematize also Honorius, who did not enlighten this apostolic church with the doctrine delivered by the Apostles, but attempted to subvert the undefiled faith by profane treachery."

The state of the Roman See during the tenth century, as described by Baronius, the great papal Annalist, is frightful to contemplate. In his preliminary observations§ to the tenth century, he writes thus.—"A new age begins, which, from its asperity and barrenness of good, has been usually called the iron age; from the deformity of its exuberant wickedness, the leaden age; and from its poverty of writers, the dark age. Standing on the threshold of which, we have deemed it necessary to premise something, lest the weak-minded should be at all scandalized if he sometimes should happen to behold the abomination of desolation standing in the temple. Scarcely can any one believe what unworthy, foul, execrable, and abominable things the sacred Apostolic See has been compelled to suffer. . . . Oh shame! Oh grief! how many monsters, horrible to be seen, were intruded into that seat which is to be reverenced even by angels! What tragedies were there enacted! With what filth was it her fate to be besmeared who was herself without spot or wrinkle! With what stench to be infected! With what loathsome impurities to be defiled, and by these to be blackened with eternal infamy!" And, again,‖ "What was then the face of the Holy Roman Church! How unutterably foul! When harlots, at once most infamous and all-powerful, ruled at Rome; at whose will, Sees were changed, bishops presented, and—what is horrible to hear and utter—their paramours intruded into the chair of Peter." During that tenth century alone, thirty Pontiffs occupied the papal chair, each succeeding one, for the most part, surpassing, if possible, his predecessor in abominable crimes. The mind sickens in reviewing the enormities of these monsters of wickedness. John XII., to select one name from the revolting list, who ascended the papal throne in 956, was convicted by a Roman Synod, convened by the Emperor Otho the Great, of almost every enormity to be found in the catalogue of crime—blasphemy, perjury, profanation, impiety, sacrilege, simony, adultery, incest, murder.

Twenty years later, 974, came Boniface VII., whom Baronius brands as a murderer and a robber. One Roman historian, Cardinal Benno, tells us that in the interval between Pope Silvester II. and Gregory VII. (999–1073), five of the popes, including these two, were magicians. Platina, the biographer of the popes, goes farther, and says that magic was practised by all the popes from Silvester to Gregory. The heinousness of this practice must not be estimated by reference to our modern notions. It must be remembered that, in the ages under consideration, magic was universally regarded, even by those who practised it, as connected with satanic agency. Of Silvester, in particular, Platina informs us that, impelled by ambition and a diabolical lust of power, he obtained the pontifical dignity by the assistance of the devil, on the condition of doing homage to the evil spirit, and consigning his soul to everlasting perdition after death. Towards the close of the 15th century, Pope Sixtus IV. occupied the papal chair. He has been charged with unnatural crimes; and it is recorded that he devised a new mode of replenishing the sacred treasury—namely, the establishment of brothels in Rome! It would be superfluous to say a word about Pope Alexander VI. A Romish historian was obliged to combine three of the most atrocious monsters to be found in the annals of Pagan Rome, in order to obtain anything like a parallel to the enormities of Borgia. Nero, Caligula, and Heliogabalus, must be united in order to shadow forth the character of—if it may be said without impiety—this vicar of Christ. His successor, but one, Julius II., scarcely, if at all, fell short of his wickedness. Perjury, poisoning, assassination, drunkenness, unnatural crime, were laid to his charge. He was, moreover, a ferocious and merciless soldier. It was a saying of those times that the earth drank in more blood in a single day, shed through his means, than he himself, and his fellow-revellers, had drunk wine during his whole pontificate. This worthy successor of the Apostles is said, when once leading an army against his enemies, to have flung into the Tiber the keys of St. Peter, with the words—

> Cum Petri nihil efficient ad prœlia claves, > Auxilio Pauli forsitan ensis erit.

To conclude this dismal retrospect. Some of the infallible depositaries of the Roman Catholic faith were, we are informed by credible witnesses, unbelievers, and even Atheists! Picus Mirandula, who wrote towards the end of the 15th century, tells us of one Pope who, denying that there was a God, confirmed his miserable impiety by the vile means through which he obtained possession of the popedom, and the equally execrable manner in which he conducted himself as Pope. The same author speaks of another Pope who, while living, declared to one of his friends that he did not believe in the immortality of the soul. But after his death he appeared to the same person, telling him that he had found, to his endless misery and torment, that the soul which he deemed to be perishable was immortal.*

It is with much reluctance that we sully our pages with particulars of this kind. From such revolting details every right-minded man instinctively recoils. To the Christian, jealous for the honour of his most holy faith, such abominations are a source of mingled indignation, shame, and sorrow; while to the infidel they furnish matter for a triumphant scoff, or a malignant sneer. We would willingly consign such dismal records of the past to the oblivion which is their fitting doom; and we would leave those wretched men who disgraced not only the name of Christian but our common humanity, to the judgment of Him whose honour they have impiously blasphemed, and whose eternal laws they have trodden under foot. But controversialists of the stamp of Mr. Keenan will not permit us to do so. They compel us to drag forth from their foul obscurity these deeds of darkness. When they brand the Reformers as heretics, because they dared to quit a communion in which, from the palace of the Vatican to the cell of the monastery, from the Pope to the mendicant friar, and thence through every fibre of the social and religious system, vice and immorality were practised and unblushingly avowed; and withal arrogate to that communion the august epithet of holy: when they cast in our teeth the invented crimes of a Luther, a Calvin, and a Cranmer, and exclaim in a tone of malicious triumph—"Behold the apostles of Protestantism! Can the religion be true which had such advocates?" we are obliged, when engaged with those who cannot or will not see the invalidity of such an inference, to retort the argument. And to do so, we are compelled to re-open the polluted pages of history—not our historians but their own—and point out to them there, scenes of iniquity perpetrated by the supreme rulers of a Church claiming to be exclusively holy and infallible, before which the vilest accusations which deadly hatred has been able to invent against the Reformers dwindle into utter insignificance.

Let any candid Roman Catholic, of plain common sense, peruse the history of the Popes, and then let him say whether he feels inclined to press the argument against the Reformation from the supposed unworthiness of the Reformers.

THE HEIR OF BALLYMANUS—No. III.

Not long after the meeting with Mr. Oldham, which we recorded in our last chapter, the time of Frank's stay in Rome expired, and he turned his steps homewards. His health and spirits had certainly profited by his travels, but we fear that he had not changed for the better in other respects. He was no longer the sincere and earnest inquirer after truth he once had been. What he had seen on the Continent had convinced him that the religion he there saw developed, contained more of human invention than of revelation from God; yet he sought for nothing purer or better. The disappointment in which his first anxious search for religious truth had ended, had a tendency to give him a distaste for such investigations; while again he was unconsciously influenced by the example of many whom he met abroad, who believed no more than himself, and yet who observed the conformity with the religion of their country, which prudence dictated, only avenging themselves for their compliance by many a bitter jest on it in private. Thus Frank, too, had fallen into a light and careless way of talking on religious subjects; he could enjoy a jest at the expense of the religion he professed; yet, if a serious attack were made on it (by his friend, Graham, for instance), he preferred to turn off the discourse by some sportive answer, rather than encounter the risk of becoming again a prey to those anxious doubts which had once so cruelly disturbed his repose.

When, however, he again set foot on English ground, many slumbering emotions were stirred up. During his year or two of absence, he thought he had taught himself to look calmly back on his acquaintance with Edith, as belonging to a chapter in his life now closed; and when he remembered the tumultuous passions which had then agitated him, it was with such feelings as those with which the traveller, who has escaped one of the fires which sweep over an American prairie, might survey the scene over which the flame had passed, while scarce yet composed from the agitation which he had undergone, and still not fearing that the charred and blackened soil around him could afford materials for such another conflagration. Now, however, as he drew near to London, the feelings which had filled his mind when he had been last there, naturally took possession of it again. While he was abroad, his correspondents had been able to tell him nothing of Edith; and now (useless though, he said to himself, it was to entertain any curiosity regarding one of whom he ought to think no more), he could not refrain from constant speculations—was she then in London? Was it possible he might meet her? How was it likely

---

* Platina, in Marcellin. p. 39.
† Athan. Ep. ad Solet., tom. i., 368. Hieronym. Chronicon. oper. tom. viii., c. 796.

* For Anastasius vid. Damas. Pontif. ap. Labbe, tom. v., c. 403, and for Vigilius vid. Liberat. Brevlar., cap. 22. Galland. Bib. Pat., tom. xii., p. 156.
† Vid. Labbe, tom. vii., c. 977; tom. viii., c. 1205.
‡ Vid. Labbe, tom. vii., c. 600, 1156.
§ Baron. Ann. Eccles. An. 900
‖ Ann. Eccles. Ann. 912.

* Pic. Mirand. de Fid. et Ord. Cred. Theor. 4.

she would behave if they did chance to meet? Had she forgotten him? Had it cost her as severe a struggle as it had done him, to think of each other with indifference? He acknowledged that it must be better for her peace of mind if she had succeeded in such an attempt, and yet much as he deplored her welfare, he felt that it would give him only pain if he found, when he met her, that she had discovered this road to happiness.

On his return to his old quarters in London, he was cordially welcomed by his friend, Cornwall. Strange that two people who seemed to have such pleasure in seeing each other, should have borne their separation with so much equanimity, and that not a letter should have passed between them all the time Frank was away. Cornwall had now a hundred questions to ask him, and made him tell all the history of his travels and of his opinions; and Frank told all without reserve, having now himself fallen into the tone of sceptical indifference, which had, at first, shocked him in Cornwall. They had talked long that evening, when Frank became the questioner, and said, "I suppose it is useless to ask you if you can give me any intelligence of the Hartwells?"

"No," returned Cornwall; "you know that I have no opportunity of hearing anything of them. But, indeed, there is one thing which I fear you will be angry with me for not having told you before, and that is, that Mr. Hartwell himself called here to inquire for you about a month ago."

"Mr. Hartwell called here!" cried Frank, "you surely must mistake."

"Well," said Cornwall, "to speak accurately, an old gentleman called here, for he gave no name; but I opened the door for him myself, and having once seen him with you, and not forgetting faces easily, I know that it was he."

"Tell me all at once," cried Frank impatiently; "really, Cornwall, this was the first thing I should have heard from you on my coming."

"I have nothing to tell, man," returned Cornwall; "he asked for you, and I told him that you were travelling on the Continent. I asked him whether he wished to leave any message for you, though you know that I should have been puzzled to send it to you if he had, for you had not given me any address; however, he said that he had no message to leave, and went away."

"But," said Frank, "did you ask him no questions? did you not find out something for me about Miss Hartwell?"

"What could I ask him," said Cornwall; "he had not even told me his name. Was I to say, I know you are Mr. Hartwell; and I have been informed of all the history of the engagement between your daughter and Mr. MacManus; pray tell me something about her."

Frank did not exactly know what to answer, but he felt more cross and out of humour with Cornwall than he had ever felt in the whole course of their friendship before; nor did he care now to pursue the conversation with him, for he wanted to meditate on the news he had heard, and the more he thought of it the higher his spirits rose. That, after his intercourse with the family had been formally broken off, Mr. Hartwell should have himself taken a step to renew their acquaintance, was a fact of no ordinary significance. What could have been the cause? Had Edith's affection for him triumphed over all other considerations? or was it possible that, on reflection over the arguments with which he had assailed her religion, her views might have changed, and that a difference of religious profession need no longer separate them. Whatever were the origin of this overture, Frank was determined it should end in nothing but good; his ideas, as to the importance of religion, had so far declined in strength, that he condemned himself for having foolishly trifled away his happiness before, when he allowed such a matter to separate between them. Now he would be wiser; he would allow her to enjoy peaceably the religious sentiments which she found necessary to her happiness; she would no less make a good and affectionate wife to him; it was by no means essential that they should think exactly the same; and Mr. Hartwell's visit to him convinced him that he had still such an interest in her heart as would enable him to persuade her to take the same view of the case that he did. And, then, he returned to his former amusement of castle building; arranged in a thousand delightful ways, their meeting, and the welcome he was to receive; smoothed down every difficulty in one manner or another, and invariably conducted his little romance to the orthodox old-fashioned termination. After such agreeable meditations, when he met Cornwall next morning, all his little irritation had vanished, Cornwall himself making full atonement by putting the same favourable interpretation on Mr. Hartwell's visit; and Frank had only one thought to make him uneasy—the feeling, namely, that he could not, with propriety, go out that instant to call on the Hartwells. However, he wrote without delay to Mr. Hartwell, informing him of his return from the Continent, and saying that what he understood of Mr. Hartwell's having lately called on him, encouraged him to ask permission to wait upon them. When he had sent his letter, Frank had great difficulty to restrain his impatience so as to wait quietly for the answer, and not, without further permission, take the well remembered road to Norwood. The answer came, however, as rapidly as could reasonably have been expected, and was even more kind and affectionate in its tone than Frank had ventured to hope; but in other respects very unlike his anticipations. The note it contained was, in short, that Edith had suffered for some time from a heavy cold, which had resulted in inflammation of the lungs, and that there now were hold out no expectations of her recovery. Mr. Hartwell explained that he had called on Frank at a time that Edith had expressed a wish to see him once more, but that she felt on consideration that his seeing her again would only give him needless pain, and, therefore, declined receiving his proposed visit. There were enclosed a few lines traced by Edith's own hand, in which she took as it were a solemn final leave of him. She reminded him how, in his arguments with her, he had asserted that whatever religion one might live in, the Roman Catholic was the only one so free from doubt and uncertainty, as to be able to afford firm support in the hour of death; and, she said, that she had wished to tell him that, now with the full prospect of eternity opening before her, she needed no other stay than the promises of God, which the Scriptures had made known to her, and which she had found fulfilled in her own experience. She had proved it was a God of truth who had spoken the words—"When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and through the floods they shall not overflow thee." Knowing that it would be too painful to him to hear this from her own lips, she had written it to him; and she added, that having constantly prayed for his enlightenment, and for his being brought to a knowledge of the truth, she was convinced her prayers would be heard in God's own time. She concluded with fervent prayers for his temporal and eternal happiness. Frank scarce knew what he read; he felt the paper grow dim before his eyes; so sudden a change from dreams of fancied happiness to a reality of misery was almost more than he could bear. Notwithstanding the kind of refusal his proposal to call on the Hartwells had met with, he flew to their residence with all the speed he could command. On the way, he found it hard to believe the truth of the news he had heard; it was so difficult to connect the idea of death with that of one whom he had left so full of health, and life, and animation. The first sight, however, of Mr. Hartwell, was enough to bring home to him the reality of what he had been told; he looked so perceptibly older, and so bowed down with sorrow. Frank was admitted, without difficulty, to Edith's presence, and was more shocked at the sight of her than he had been at all prepared for. Her form was frightfully wasted away; her blooming complexion had faded, and was replaced by a ground of death-like paleness contrasted with two hectic spots on her cheeks, her strength had visibly departed, while an incessant cough seemed to banish all hope of her restoration to health. We cannot report what passed at this interview. Frank scarcely knew himself. It was, however, the first of several, as he continued in daily attendance on her. But before he had had time to recover from the stunning and bewildering effects of the shock he had received, he proved by experience the truth of the remark, that misfortunes never come single; for he had a letter from Ireland informing him of the alarming illness of his mother, and imploring him to hasten home without delay.

It was, perhaps, the only summons which would have drawn him from Edith's presence at such a crisis; but in obeying it, he had the consolation of having been told by Miss Hartwell's physician, that though his hopes of her ultimate recovery were but faint indeed, she had somewhat rallied, and nothing portended any very speedy termination of her illness. Accordingly, within an hour or two from the time of his having got the letter from home, he was on his road to Holyhead; and, travelling day and night, arrived at Ballymanus. His first eager inquiries were met by the reply, that his mother was still alive, but that this was all which could be said.

He flew to her apartment, but was met at the door by his weeping sisters, who told him that the parish priest and his curate were with her, and that their directions and his mother's own desire were, that the presence of her relatives was not to disturb the tranquillity of her dying moments. Frank disregarding what they said pushed into the room, and found his mother perfectly sensible; her dying features lighted up with a gleam of pleasure as he pressed to her embrace, and she murmured "God bless you Frank—thank God that I have seen you before I die." On Mr. O'Driscoll, however, expostulating warmly with Frank for touching one who had received the last rites of the church, his mother said, "Go Frank, I dare not think of anything earthly now;" and she turned her eyes from him to fix them on a large image of the Virgin and child, which had been placed full in her view, at the foot of the bed. Frank suffered himself to be led out of the room by one of the priests, while the other resumed at his mother's side the suggestion of holy thoughts to her mind. "I cheerfully accept all the pains which thou dost prepare for me in purgatory. It is just that fire should punish in me all the insults I have offered to thee. O, holy prison when shall I find myself shut up in thee, secure of never again being able to lose my God? O, holy fire when wilt thou purify me from so many stains, and render me worthy to enter the land of bliss. Mary, my hope, assist me; pray to Jesus for me; Mary, my mother, assist me at this moment. St. Joseph come to my aid. St. Michael the archangel defend me. My guardian angel assist me. O, Mary, my hope after Jesus, in thee I trust. In thee, O lady, have I trusted, let me never be confounded." Frank knelt by his sisters outside the door, holding in his scarcely conscious hands a book of devotions for the dying, which had been placed in them. He read what was necessary to be done for his mother's welfare, and he was assured everything was attended to. "First, during the agony, the dying should be frequently sprinkled with holy water; secondly, they should be frequently made to kiss the crucifix and an image of Mary; thirdly, they should endeavour to gain as many indulgences as possible, by the use of medals and scapulars; fourthly, it is necessary to suggest to the dying some sentiment of contrition, of resignation, of oblation of his pains to God, of confidence in the passion of Jesus Christ, and in the intercession of Mary; fifthly, the dying should frequently invoke the most holy names of Jesus and Mary, and should frequently repeat the prayer, "Mary, mother of grace, &c.; sixthly, during the agony, the persons who are present should frequently say the litany of the Blessed Virgin for the dying person." At length he heard the louder and louder tones with which Mr. O'Driscoll seemed to pursue the departing soul with the ejaculation "Jesus and Mary to you I give my heart and soul;" and in a moment more he was told that all was over.

When nature's grief had had its course, Mr. O'Driscoll, before leaving the house, wished to say some words to Frank of welcome home, and of comfort for his bereavement. But Frank could not listen to him, and cried "It was cruel of you to separate us from my mother." "It would have been more cruel to her had I permitted you to stay, returned Mr. O'Driscoll. There is nothing on which the blessed St. Lignori insists more than on the exclusion of relatives who might excite emotions in the dying person. What human soul, when taken without proper preparation from this world, is fit to meet its God? Good a woman as your mother was, she needed the preparation I was giving her. She had heard from my voice the pardon of the church. I had cleansed her in the last sacrament from all relics of sin; and it was my business, then, to see that no intrusion of worldly emotion should after that produce a thought which needed pardon." Frank's heart was too full to reply, and he turned away in silence. He passed, in a dreary kind of dull vacuity of thought, the interval between his mother's death and her funeral; his heart seemed chilled to stone, and he found it impossible to collect and fix his thoughts. His sisters, who had been deeply and violently affected at first, yet seemed to feel a different kind of grief from his. His father, again, who had been fondly attached to his wife, bore his loss with a silent dogged resolution, and directed everything with his usual self-possession. He seemed to derive little support from the consolations of religion, and once when Mr. O'Driscoll comforted him by the assurance that his wife would soon be in glory, he turned short away; but Frank heard him mutter, "I hope I have some better reason to think so than your saying so; you promised more than that last week to Tom Connor that was hanged for shooting the agent." Frank heard with satisfaction that, in conformity with his mother's last wishes, considerable sums were to be devoted to charitable objects, and that a large amount was to be expended in masses for the repose of her soul.

After the funeral, Frank, in spite of remonstrances, returned to London almost as rapidly as he had come. Never did he feel more in want of calm and quiet, yet it seemed fated that he was not to enjoy repose. In the carriage in which he sat were two other passengers, one, as it turned out, an Oxford convert to Romanism, the other a missionary employed by a society for the conversion of Roman Catholics; and the two engaged in a loud and angry controversial discussion. The Englishman seemed to take a peculiar pleasure in shocking the prejudices of his opponent, and in avowing his belief in everything which the other thought most monstrous and incredible; nor did the Irish gentleman betray any peculiar tenderness for the feelings of his antagonist. Of all the subjects which they might have chosen for discussion, they selected the one most painful to the feelings of Frank—namely, purgatory, and prayers for the dead; and Frank, though he sunk back in his seat and feigned sleep, was yet obliged to listen. The Oxford man when challenged to produce his proofs of purgatory, told with the gravest face, stories of holy monks who, passing by mount Etna, heard the wails and groans of the spirits there confined; he told of spirits who had appeared to their friends completely enveloped in flames, but who, after an interval, during which they had been prayed for by their friends, had been seen again with flames only reaching to the waist; then again only up to the knees, and so on to their complete liberation: with other tales of the same kind which, effectual as they had been in fastening the belief of purgatory on a dark and credulous age, showed strange in the light of the nineteenth century.

The missioner replied that he knew of but one purgatory—namely, the blood of Christ, which cleanseth from all sin; and he asserted, that Roman Catholic teachers do not believe themselves in the efficacy of the means of cleansing from sin, which they had invented. "First," said he, "you receive from the priest absolution from your sins; then, you purchase remission of them yourself, by the performance of the penances he has appointed, and it may be by austerities of your own besides, and yet still you feel that you are not cleansed from your sins; you daily hear masses, and you believe that you have daily offered up, on your behalf, a repetition of that inestimable sacrifice which was once offered on Calvary; and yet your sins cleave to you still. Well, you purchase, perhaps, from the Pope himself, a full and plenary indulgence for the remission of all your sins, and yet you dare not think you are cleansed from your sins yet. Well, on your deathbed, you have your absolution repeated to you; you receive the sacrament of Extreme Unction, which is said to remove all relics of sin; one would think you had got rid of them now, but no, you have to enter into purgatory, there to endure torments the most intense in degree, continuing you know not how many thousand years; nor can your dearest friend know when he has said masses enough to get you out. Why, I should never have a moment's peace, if I believed in such a religion; if I had to look forward to such sufferings for myself, and if I believed that those of my friends who had departed this life in the Lord, were enduring them now. How I should work to get money! that would be the only consolation I should have; for yours is, indeed, the gospel for the rich. Woe unto you, poor, for you must work out your full time in purgatory. Blessed are you, rich, for you can pay money to get yourselves out of purgatory, and to help your friends out too. Why, sir, your priests themselves do not believe this doctrine. Do you think if they did, and if they had the feelings of men, they would not spend the greater part of their time, in saying masses for the benefit of the souls confined there, instead of waiting until they are paid money for doing so. Sir, money is at the bottom of the whole scheme; and a better engine for raising money never was devised. I remember hearing of a Presbyterian minister who was complaining to the parish priest, with whom he was on good terms, that he could get no money from his flock. 'Why don't you rent an acre of purgatory from me,' said the priest; 'you would find it bring in more than all your gospel sermons?'"

---

* Liguori's Instructions and devotions for the dying, pp. 17, 27. Derby's edition.

To such a tirade as this the Englishman replied in equally unmeasured terms, concluding by recommending his opponent not to trouble his head about purgatory, for that he was sure of going further and faring worse; and denouncing to him, in the most positive manner, the infallible certainty of the eternal damnation of all those who were ontside the pale of the true church.

"Purgatory," said he, "is a matter which you and your friends have nothing at all to do with."

Fortunately, just here, the train stopped, and Frank betook himself to another carriage, leaving the disputants to carry out the controversy between themselves, at their leisure.

From the miserable torpor into which Frank had fallen he was first roused by Edith herself. When next she saw him, ever regardless of herself, she seemed unconscious of the pain her own disease caused her, in her endeavour to comfort Frank for the loss he had sustained; while he found his heart melted by her warm and affectionate sympathy, he felt that he could now think and talk of his sorrows, as he poured his griefs without reserve into her bosom. But still, the more he felt her power to console him for the bereavement he had met with, the more hopeless was he of consolation under that which he feared he was destined to suffer; the deeper his sense of the value of her affection, the greater the pain with which he thought on the treasure which had been shown him, and seemingly placed within his grasp, only, as it appeared, to be snatched from him for ever. When he passionately expressed such feelings to her, she replied—

"I know, dearest Frank, how severely you have been tried, and I know it is only too probable that there may be another trial in store for you; but remember you are in the hands of a God who doth not afflict willingly. Believe me, your chastenings are sent with gracious purposes for your benefit; He knows how to bring good out of seeming evil. No chastening," she added, "for the present, seemeth to be joyful, but grievous; yet, afterwards it bringeth forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness in them who are exercised thereby."

Frank heard without believing, yet his levity on religious subjects had been banished; for he felt that there, if anywhere, was to be found consolation under the trials he was enduring. Yet, he felt no inclination to seek for comfort in the religion in which he had been brought up. It was not merely that such arguments as he had heard in the railway-carriage convinced him that her doctrine as to the state of the dead contained no real comfort for sorrowing friends; but ever since he had been on the Continent his faith in Romanism had received a wound which nothing could heal; the fabric, however sightly, he was convinced had no foundation, and could afford no solid consolation.

Still, he was not more satisfied with the kind of comfort which Cornwall could supply him.

"I cannot understand the mystery of existence," cried Frank to him, one evening, impatiently. "Without Christianity I see no grounds for looking forward to a future state; and yet, without such a state what a mystery are the sufferings of this life! As for my own trials, severe as they are, I dare not say I do not deserve them. But look at the Hartwells; there is a man whose whole life has been spent in acts of most munificent benevolence, and who deserves to be happy as much as any man, and yet, see how his whole happiness has been wrecked, and the object on which he centered all his affections likely to be torn from him. And poor Edith herself, if ever there was an angel of goodness upon this miserable earth, she is one; whose whole happiness seems to consist in adding to the happiness of others, and yet, how much she has suffered! If she endured in our separation the tenth part of what I had to bear, it was enough to destroy her peace of mind; and now I fear she is likely, after much bodily suffering, to be removed from this world without tasting any of its enjoyments. Cornwall, do these things admit of any explanation on your system?"

Cornwall was, at first, reluctant to answer this appeal, but, on being pressed by Frank, at length replied—

"The matter admits of a very simple explanation, though I cannot promise that you will find it satisfactory. The world is governed by general laws, and we have no right to expect those laws to be suspended because their operation in particular cases may be painful to us. In a country where pulmonary diseases carry off so many per cent. of the population, I do not see that the case of an individual being so carried off is one which requires explanation; nor does the matter become more difficult even though she be very beautiful, or very amiable, or though her father be very munificent, or though she be tenderly beloved by you, since these are all circumstances which do not at all affect the matter."

Frank winced a little at this explanation, but replied—

"It is in the existence of these general rules that I find my difficulty. Why is it that no piety or virtue can stay the ravages of the destroyer? Is it not necessary to believe that they whose share of happiness in this world is so much less than that of others who far less deserve it, shall receive some compensation in a future state of existence?"

"That is a very pretty theory," replied Cornwall, "but where is the proof?"

Frank could not deny the force of this question; and it was one which fastened itself on his mind. He was conscious that this subject of "proofs" was one to which he had given no attention at all. As he had at first believed all the doctrines of the church in which he had been brought up without troubling her for proofs, so, when he became convinced that that church was not a trustworthy guide, he rejected all her doctrines indiscriminately; but now the importance which he felt belonged to the subject urged him to sift the matter more closely, and to examine which of her doctrines could be proved, and which not. He began to study books on evidences, and thoroughly examined the reasons which the advocates of Christianity had offered for their belief. In these investigations he met with much help from Mr. Peterson, of whom his opinion had considerably altered since their last meeting. Then he was prejudiced against him as a hot, and not very successful controversialist; now, from constantly meeting him, in attendance on Edith, he had come to know him as a kind and sympathising friend. And, after some time spent in these inquiries, Frank began to find rest for the sole of his foot. He came to see that there was no reason to doubt the veracity of Peter, or to disbelieve the facts to which he bore testimony, whatever fables may have been countenanced by Peter's alleged successors; that, even though a purgatory could be shown to be a vain imagination, heaven and hell would remain substantial realities; that there was reason to believe in the efficacy of prayers offered through Christ, however little ground there might be for hoping for an answer to those addressed to the Virgin Mary, or to St. Philomena. Frank's progress in religious convictions was rapid; the pressure of the trials to which he had been subjected made him as it were live fast; while he was, no doubt, unconsciously influenced by the faith manifested by Edith herself; so calm, so intelligent, so triumphant, that Frank felt it more and more impossible to doubt the reality of that of which she seemed to have so distinct a perception. It was only after the greater part of his scepticism had been thus banished, that he found courage to avow to Edith, what the exact nature of his religious difficulties had been, and that while she had supposed he was erroneously believing too much, in reality he was believing too little. He told her, too, how one of the arguments which had led to his change of opinions, had been the thought how far below her deserts was the portion of happiness which she herself seemed destined to enjoy in this world; and that, therefore, some compensation must be in store for her.

Edith replied, that she hoped he had been influenced by some better arguments; for my own experience is, she said, that even were there no other life I must own that I have been in this world far happier than I deserved; why I have never formed a wish that my father was not anxious to anticipate and to gratify; and as for the disquietude you say you have caused me, do you think, Frank, I wish that I had not known you? Whatever sorrows our acquaintance may have caused me, I would not change even those sorrows for many of this world's pleasures. And, on the other hand (she pursued), I cannot tell you what comfort your presence with me these last few weeks has given me; I own that when I thought how desolate my poor father would feel without me, I had felt it hard to submit to God's chastening hand, to feel that He doeth all things well. But now, since I have seen how my illness has been blessed to you, and how it may be the means of bringing you to live closer to God, I feel overpowered by a sense of His goodness in forgiving my rebellious thoughts, and condescending to let me see part of the reason for His dispensations. I know there may be other gracious purposes which I know not of, and I feel that I can trust to Him for all things. I can trust my whole soul to Him who died for it, and I can trust those I leave behind to Him. If He smiteth He also can bind up, and His hands can heal.

It was but a week after this that, on Mr. Peterson's arranging to administer the Lord's Supper to Edith, on the following day, she had the exquisite gratification of hearing Frank ask whether he might venture to join with them. He expressed a sense of great ignorance, and feared he was unworthy of that holy rite. Yet Mr. Peterson did not repel him, as to his acknowledgments of sin he joined a desire to forsake it, and professed sincere faith in Jesus as his only mediator.

Edith had not, for a long time, appeared so well as on the evening of this day, her spirits were higher, and she seemed filled with a serene and holy joy. Frank, finding the improvement continue for a day or two, began to indulge hopes of the possibility of a rally; so much the greater was the shock three days afterwards, when coming to the house early, he perceived, at the first aspect of the servant who admitted him, that he had come to a house of mourning. Long as he had been preparing for this event it fell upon him now with all the suddenness of an unexpected calamity; nor was he, for some time, able to inquire the particulars of what had taken place. When he could ask for further information, he was told that Edith had retired to rest the night before seemingly as well as she had been for some time previously; the attendant, who lay in the room with her, had slept for a couple of hours, when she heard her mistress call; she rose, but could be of no assistance; there were a few inarticulate sounds, a few faint struggles, and Edith had entered into peace. It need not be told how acutely Frank felt this failure of his hopes of earthly happiness; yet, though the blow was severer than any he yet had suffered, it seemed as if there were no poison in the wound; his grief was without bitterness, while, no doubt, he was supported himself by the efforts he made to support and comfort Mr. Hartwell. There was a time when he would have been shocked and distressed at what he would have thought the unprepared manner of Edith's death; yet now he felt how far surer was the confidence which could be felt in the case of one whose life had been one of communion with God, and constant readiness to enter his presence, than any which would be derived from all the preparation which could be made when the speedy approach of death was announced. And he involuntarily contrasted the death of Edith with the last moments of his mother. As for the latter, while he trusted that her soul was saved through her sincere faith in Christ, imperfect as was her knowledge of him, he yet grieved to think how her faith had been clouded, and her dying moments disquieted through a want of knowledge of the complete efficacy of his sacrifice. Her deathbed was haunted by a sense of sin unatoned for; and charms were sought in vain, to drive the spectre away—holy water, and blessed medals, and scapulars, and indulgences, and crucifixes, and cries to her guardian angel, and to the Blessed Virgin, and to the other saints; still the inexorable justice of God appeared unsatisfied, and threatened to lead her off to regions of torment less dreadful than hell, only because hope was not banished from them. Contrasted with this scene of superstitious gloom how bright appeared the light which shone round Edith's parting-days. Deep as was her conviction of sin, no less firm was her faith that for her sins Christ had, by his one oblation of himself, made a full, perfect, and sufficient atonement; the knowledge of this banished all her doubts and fears, and enabled her to echo the apostle's language—"I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day."

With bleeding heart Frank followed to the grave these remains which were, as it were, the shattered casket where he had vainly stored his treasures of earthly happiness. It was deeply painful to him to be present at that scene, yet, it would have been more painful to him to have remained away; he felt a choking sensation, when the words were read—earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, as he heard the dull sound of the falling clay separate for ever in this life between him and his beloved; yet, his ears drank in the words of peace and hope, from the solemn service then heard for the first time. He had read indeed, before, the lesson (I Cor. xv.), yet never till then, did he feel the full force of the apostle's argument, which binds in indissoluble connection the resurrection of Jesus and that of his people; which assured him that our Lord was but the first fruits of them that slept, and that as surely as Jesus was raised up from the dead, so surely, them which sleep in Jesus, God will bring with him. When he turned away still there lingered about his ears, like a strain of sweet music, those accents which spoke of the "sure and certain hope of the resurrection to eternal life," which forbade us to be sorry, as men without hope, for them which sleep in Jesus; still he seemed to hear the voice which said, "blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord, even so saith the spirit, for they rest from their labours." And ere he had left the cemetery he had forced his lips to utter, and taught his heart, in some measure, to feel, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received a valuable letter on Purgatory from Mr. Collette, which we regret to be obliged to postpone till our next number.

A communication, headed "Talk of the Wall," has been forwarded to us, founded on a pretended letter from one Publius Lentulus to the People and Senate of Rome, a well-known forgery which could not deceive any scholar of ordinary learning. We should feel curious to know in what Roman history the writer found such a letter! If our correspondent should favour us with any future communication in the way of argument, we hope he will do so in his own name, as we fear the insertion of a bad imitation of the Talk of the Road would scarcely be acceptable to our readers, especially in the present crowded state of our pages.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1852.

It is a general doctrine of Christianity, not one peculiar to any section of it, that our present life is a state of probation for a future one.

By a state of probation we do not mean merely, that our future interest is now depending, and depending on ourselves, and that we have scope and opportunities in this life for that good and bad behaviour which God will reward or punish hereafter—we mean further, that we are in this life in a state of discipline designed for our improvement in those characters of virtue and piety, which are admittedly a necessary qualification for the happiness of heaven—that this life is a state where our characters must be put to the proof, and our good qualities confirmed and strengthened, if not formed and produced, and that none but those whose characters are thus fitted for Heaven can ever enter it.

We believe that no Christian of any denomination will deny that one of the surest tests of true religion is, that its doctrines and practices are those best fitted to encourage habits of piety, and the practical principle of virtue. No Christian, or, indeed, any one acquainted with human nature, will deny that vicious indulgence is not only criminal in itself, but that it depraves the inward constitution and character; or can doubt, on the other hand, that the moral principle gains additional strength by exercise, and that virtuous self-government is not only right in itself, but also improves the inward constitution and character of those who use aright the opportunities given them of forming those virtuous habits which alone can fit us for the enjoyment of God's presence in heaven. These, we think, are propositions universally recognized and professed by all Christians, and our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, we doubt not, will be ready enough to assert and believe that they are truths which lie at the basis of all religion, and will, probably, add that they are especially inculcated and provided for in their own.

What we wish at present to call the attention of our readers to is, a practice of the Roman Catholic Church which appears to us to be utterly at variance with these general principles, and which would exalt mere emotions and feelings of a transient character, caused, perhaps, by fear, or some other great and temporary excitement, into the same rank with or even above the excellency of virtuous habits, and a well-spent life.

We are far from saying that such are the views of all Roman Catholics, and are sure that many intelligent and educated Roman Catholics would repudiate any such idea. The question, however, is, whether the natural tendency of Romish teaching is not inevitably, at least in the minds of the uneducated and unenlightened classes, to lead to such conclusions.

Let us try the truth of our statement by a particular case.

It would appear to us from Roman Catholic books of devotion, and their instructions for the dying, that according to their ideas, there is nothing so important to a sinner's salvation as to elicit particular thoughts and emotions in the hour of death, and that a well-managed death is practically of more importance than even a well-spent life.

In speaking of the case of malefactors capitally executed, Dr. John Henry Newman in his eighth lecture,* draws a lively picture of the execution of a culprit in a (Roman) Catholic state, who, up to the last moment is obdurate, and has shown no signs of contrition :—

"The crowd about the scaffold is occupied with but one thought, whether he has shown signs of contrition; various reports are in circulation, that he is obdurate, that he has yielded, that he is obdurate still. The women cry out it is impossible; Jesus and Mary will see to it; they are sure he will submit himself to his God before he enters into His presence. However, it is, perhaps, confirmed, that the unhappy man is still wrestling with his pride, and though he has that illumination of faith which a Catholic cannot but possess, yet he cannot bring himself to hate and abhor sins which, except in their awful consequences, are, as far as their enjoyment, gone from him for ever. He cannot taste again the pleasure of revenge, or of forbidden indulgence, yet he cannot get himself to give it up, though the world is passing from him. The excitement of the crowd is at its height; an hour passes, the suspense is intolerable, when the news is brought of a change, that before the crucifix in the solitude of his cell, at length, not unhappy any longer, the happy criminal has subdued himself; has prayed with real self-abasement; has expressed a charitable thought towards those he has hated; has resigned himself lovingly to his destiny; has supplicated pardon; has confessed with all his heart, and placed himself at the disposal of his priest to make such amends, as he can make, in his last hour to God and man. . . . . The news comes; it is communicated through the vast multitude at once, and I have heard from those who have been present, never shall they forget the shout of joy which burst from every tongue and formed itself into one concordant Ave of thanksgiving, in acknowledgement of the grace vouchsafed to one so near eternity."

Mr. Newman then proceeds :—

"It is not wonderful, then, to find the holy men, who, from time to time, have done the pious office of preparing such criminals for death, so confident of their salvation. So well convinced was Father Claver of the eternal happiness of almost all those whom he assisted, that speaking once of some persons who had delivered a criminal into the hands of justice, he said, 'God forgive them, but they have secured the salvation of this man at the probable risk of their own.'"—Page 213.

We consider the passages, above quoted, as startling in the extreme, and inevitably lead to the conclusions we have stated.

That the crowd of spectators at the terrible ceremonial should rejoice at the news that the criminal had confessed his guilt, and become penitent, even at the last moment, is natural and proper. Anything, of course, is better than obduracy and cherishing the most malignant passions to the last moment; but that Mr. Newman should speak of eternal happiness, or have cited Father Claver's convictions with approbation, would appear to us to be almost incredible, if we had not found the following still more extraordinary passage in the preceding page 212 :—

"It is good for human beings to die as infants, before they have known good or evil, if they have but received the baptism of the Church; but next to them—who are the happiest? who are the safest? for whose departure have we more cause to rejoice and be thankful than for theirs, who, if they live on are so likely to relapse into old habits of sin—but who are taken out of this miserable world in the flower of their contrition, and in the freshness of their preparation—just at the very moment when they have perfected themselves in good dispositions, and from their heart have put off sin and have come humbly for pardon, and have received the grace of absolution, and been fed with the bread of angels, and thus, amid the prayers of all men, have departed to their Maker and their Judge!"

* Lectures on certain difficulties felt by Anglicans in submitting to the Catholic Church—Burns and Lambert, London (second edition), 1850.

We ought not to forget in this place, that according to the established rules of the Church of Rome, one at least of the so called-sacraments, that of Extreme Unction has been withheld from the individual who is "so happy and so safe"—for that rite is only administered to such as are in danger of death by sickness and never either to a criminal about to be executed, or to a soldier going into the field of battle.—(See Catholic Layman, vol. i., p. 130.)

We should almost have believed that Father Newman's imagination and powers of description had got the better of his judgment in the above passages, and that such notions were only prevalent in foreign countries, and did not extend to our own, but for a recent occurrence in Ireland, which we think deserving of notice—we mean the late remarkable execution in Monaghan of the murderers (we should rather say the hired assassins, for so they were proved to be,) of the unfortunate Mr. Thomas Douglas Bateson—Bryan Grant, Neil Quin, and Patrick Coomey, who were convicted on the clearest evidence at the last spring assizes, the two former as the actual perpetrators of the crime, and the latter as an accessory before the fact.

Quin, we are told in the papers of the day, among others, in the Tablet of the 15th of April, had been of a daring, reckless turn of mind, so much so, that it is said he was found playing at ball with his brother, near a house in which an inquest was holding on the body of a man with whose murder the coroner's jury found him guilty. With one single exception, we are told, there was not the slightest exhibition of grief, either on the part of the culprits or their friends. Quin parted from his newly married wife, the evening before his execution, with the utmost apparent indifference; on that morning they partook largely of an excellent breakfast; two of them were found smoking, and all three appeared in the best of spirits. Coomey said, "he never felt so happy as he did at that moment, with the confidence before him in a brief time of meeting with his Savour." Quin said "that if a reprieve should come he would not accept it, as he should never be better prepared to die than he was at that time." "They both expressed their forgiveness of their prosecutors!!"

On Sunday morning they were allowed to converse together for a short time, and the Governor then inquired if they had any declaration to make, which they might wish published after their death. They replied they had not made up their minds on the matter. As the fatal hour approached, they appeared still more elated with the sense of their position. The subsheriff having expressed himself sorry to see three men in their position, "Sorry," said one of them, in a tone of surprise, "why, it is glad you should be, sir!" and each of them shook the narrator by the hand, and expressed "a hope that when he was about to die, he would be as fully prepared for it as they were!" The subsheriff then asked if they had any statement to make to him in relation to the offence for which they were about to die? "No," said Coomey, "Our Saviour said nothing when he was executed!" We shall give the rest verbatim from the Tablet.

"When they arrived in the press-room Quin said—'Hell cannot now scare us.' (When the hangman pinioned his arms), 'He's doing the best job ever was done for us.' (To the reverend gentlemen), 'We return you many thanks, gentlemen; will you not give us your blessing before we go?'

"Both reverend gentlemen then blessed them.

"Rev. Mr. Smith—'Remember the penitent thief on the cross! In one moment you'll be IN HEAVEN. You have eternal happiness within your reach.'

"Quin—'Mary, Mother of God, receive us! Prepare heaven for us!'"

We need go no further with the dreadful narrative. The wretched men were hurled into eternity evidently expecting that Mary could the next moment receive them into heaven, and without, it will be observed, a prayer to JESUS, even in that dreadful moment.

That these unfortunate men sincerely believed what they were taught by Mr. Smith and his brethren, we cannot doubt; but that it was a frightful delusion under which they laboured, and that such delusions, if encouraged, cannot fail to encourage crime, and confound all national sentiments of virtue and vice among the illiterate classes, we think self-evident to every rightly constituted mind. These cold-blooded murderers did not even make the poor amends of a public confession of their guilt, or even a suitable display of contrition for it, which, as far as it went, might have tended to deter others from following their atrocious example. There is not one feature in the case which looks like a change of heart and character; or affords a well-founded foundation for the belief that if they had survived, "they would not have relapsed into their old habits of sin."

We have no doubt that the instructions of Roman Catholic confessors, to condemned malefactors, attain their end with mechanical perfection. When once assured that their portion in this life is closed, (even though they have spent their lives alike regardless of the laws of God and man, and gratified every evil passion and inclination,) the very worst and most degraded men will doubtless gladly enough employ any means which they are assured will obtain for them happiness in the next world too; and will eagerly seek for absolution, which they are assured will wipe away all their guilt, and convert them from criminals into saints and martyrs. But that there is any warrant, in either Scripture or common sense, or even in the peculiar doctrines of Romanism, for holding out such men as the happiest of men, who have Heaven in their grasp, and for whose departure we have most reason to rejoice, does appear to be, not only unsound, but dangerous in the extreme.

Pray does the Rev. Mr. Smith believe in purgatory? and, if so, what did he mean by telling Quin he should be next moment in Heaven? What must have been the teachings of Mr. Smith and his co-adjutors, appears too plainly from the results upon the wretched criminals, whose minds seem to have been wholly relieved from all such notions as that of expiating the temporal consequences of their guilt in purgatorial fires; and yet, if either Mr. Smith or Quin believed in purgatory at all, how could they hope that such a man could escape its ordeal?

We, of course, would not wish to convey an idea that it is not in the power of God to forgive the sins of the greatest criminal at the latest hour of his life, or to deny that such a conversion, however late, may be sincere, and include a real change of heart. The case of the penitent thief on the cross is proof of the reverse. But we would guard our fellow-countrymen from being led away by a misapplication of that case, to others wholly unlike it, as the Rev. Mr. Smith appears to have been. It has been well said that, "there is one such instance given in the Holy Scripture that none might despair; there is but one, that none might presume." We think, however, it is too often overlooked, that the case of the penitent thief was an extreme one; and that the faith manifested by him was of so extraordinary a character that we have more occasion to wonder at its being produced, than that, having been produced, it should be so rewarded. He confessed Christ before men at a moment when no other voice was raised in his behalf; when no other was able to discern the spiritual character of the Messiah's kingdom; when all his disciples had forsaken him and fled. We should remember, too, that the pardon of the penitent thief was pronounced, not by a fallible man, but by one whose eye could pierce the minutest secrets of the heart, and probe the sincerity of his penitence, when he expressed his "fear of God," and acknowledged the "justice of his condemnation," and prayed the Lord to "remember him when he should come into His kingdom."—St. Luke xxiii. 40, 42.—Douay Bible. We think there is a vast difference between that and any other case, and that it is presumptuous in the highest degree for any mere man to promise forgiveness of sins in consideration of confessions, which may have been (and probably were) extorted only by an experience of the judgments that those sins had brought upon him. None can have a right to promise Heaven, but He who could judge, not by the outward appearance, but was able to discern in the humility, and faith, and patience of the thief on the cross, the embryo of those graces which would have developed themselves in a holy life, had he been spared.

It may tend, no doubt, to exalt the powers of the priesthood in the eyes of the ignorant and vulgar, to represent them as able, in a few moments, to exalt the greatest criminals into saints, immediately fit for heaven, by the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist, without even the further sacrament of extreme unction; but we think our readers will agree with us that such assumptions are presumptuous in the extreme, and calculated only to degrade Christianity, and do a grievous injury to society at large.

We feel deeply convinced that no thoughtful and intelligent Christian, of any denomination, can believe that a well-managed death can be, in God's eyes, a substitute for a well-spent life, or doubt that such scenes as we have described are calculated to do infinite injury to the cause of both truth and virtue.

The only preparation for death suitable to Christians placed in a state of probation like this, and which we have any sound warrant for believing will be effectual, is not the having excited any particular feelings and emotions, or even the most unseemly and irrational transports in the hour of death, but a daily life of prayer and watchfulness, acting constantly with reference to God's holy will, and seeking every opportunity to cultivate those virtuous habits of mind which alone can render us meet to be "partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light."

Correspondence.

CARDINAL BELLARMINE AND THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Turn, if you please, to volume i., page 98 of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and candidly say, have you or have you not made an honest use of the passage quoted at the top of column 3, from the writings of Bellarmine, and purporting to contain the real sentiments of that gifted controversialist? You make him to teach that—"If the Pope through mistake should command vice and forbid virtue, the church would be bound to believe that vice is good and virtue evil, unless she would sin against conscience," and then you add, "!!!" by way of expressing your horror at the monstrous assertion. But what, Mr. CATHOLIC LAYMAN, will your readers say, when I tell them that this is a garbled extract, and that, with all the caution and honesty in the matter of quotations for which you pride yourself, you have manifestly committed yourself here (I will not yet say advisedly) to a false one, for which I call upon you to make the amende honorable in your next number. But now to the proof, which I shall give you in the ipsissima verba of Dr. Milner, End of Controversy, Richardson's edition, page 436, note—"The following is a specimen of Barrow's and Tillotson's chicanery, in their Treatise of the Supremacy—Bellarmine, in working up an argument of the Pope's infallibility, says, hypothetically, by way of proving the falsehood of his opponents doctrine, that 'this doctrine would oblige the church to believe vices to be good and virtue to be bad, in case the Pope were to err in teaching this.'—Bell. de Rom. Pont., l. iv., c. 5. Hence these writers take occasion to affirm that Bellarmine positively teaches that—'if the Pope should err by enjoining vices, or forbidding virtues, the church would be bound to believe vices to be good and virtues evil.'—p. 203. This shameful paralogism has been taken up by most subsequent Protestant controvertists!!!"

Should you refuse to publish this letter, or seek to evade the difficulty in which I have placed you, I shall esteem all your past and future professions of honesty and straightforwardness "velut æs sonans aut cymbalum tinniens."—1 Cor. xiii. 1.

I remain, sir, your very humble,
Though watchful servant,
INVESTIGATOR.

Galway, April 21, 1854.

Whatever may be the merits to which "Investigator" can justly lay claim, watchfulness is the very last to which we should have expected him to make any pretensions. The article of which he complains was published in September, 1852. An interval of more than a year and a half, therefore, has elapsed, during which our correspondent's vigilance has slumbered; and now that he has roused himself from his nap, he seems to us to be in the condition of those who are suddenly awakened from sleep, and for some time do not see things very clearly.

Had he been awake, and watching our proceedings, all the intervening time, we think he would have known us better than to suppose that we would "refuse to publish his letter, or seek to evade the difficulty [whatever that may be] in which he has placed us."

We do not at all profess to be infallible, and looking back at the immense number of authorities and references which we have cited since the commencement of our labours, we suppose it not impossible that, notwithstanding all our care and diligence, we may have made occasional mistakes. All that we can do is, to invite our readers, some of whom are "watchful" enough, to call our attention to any inaccuracies they may discover; and when such are pointed out, we shall never be ashamed to make a manly acknowledgement of them. But we hope, before we conclude, to prove to "Investigator" that, in the present instance, we have no occasion for any such acknowledgement.

"Investigator" charges us with making a "garbled and false extract" from Bellarmine, in our number for September, 1852. We there gave the original Latin text, at the foot of the page, accompanied by a reference to the exact paragraph of Bellarmine's works where it was to be found. One would think that before bringing such a grave charge as that of a "false" quotation, "Investigator" must have gone to Bellarmine's works and found we had cited him unfairly. If he consulted Bellarmine, he could not have been very wide awake when he did so, as the proposition which we quoted is clearly maintained by the Cardinal in the place referred to. But the truth, we believe, is, that "Investigator" never went farther than "Milner's End of Controversy;" and we hope that what we have now to say will give him a lesson how he puts any confidence, for the future, in that very dishonest writer.

The charge of "garbling" brought against us, on Milner's authority, appears to be this: that we represented Bellarmine as positively teaching, as his own opinion, that if the Pope should err, by enjoining vices, or forbidding virtues, the church would be bound to believe vices to be good and virtues evil; whereas, in truth (if we are to believe Milner), Bellarmine said of the doctrine of his opponents, "this doctrine would oblige the church to believe vices to be good and virtues to be bad, in case the Pope were to err in teaching this." Now, what will our readers think of Milner's effrontery when we tell them that these words, "this doctrine would oblige," are not to be found in Bellarmine, that there is nothing equivalent to them, that they are not even implied by the sense of the passage, and that Bellarmine's words are literally and exactly as we gave them. This is something far worse than "garbling." A writer may, without intending any dishonesty, accidentally omit, in a hasty quotation, words which affect the meaning of the passage; but, deliberately to insert words which completely alter the sense, is a piece of "chicanery" for which we cannot imagine any excuse.

It is quite true that this passage occurs in a place where Bellarmine is "engaged in proving the falsehood of his opponent's doctrine." The same may be said of almost any sentence in the cardinal's controversial writings. But the sentence quoted by us is no part of the doctrine of his opponents: it is part of his own principles, by the help of which he confutes his adversaries, and if it were denied, his whole argument would fall to the ground.* Why, he not only "positively teaches" the proposition we attributed to him, he also proves it. His proof runs as follows:—The church is bound in doubtful matters to acquiesce in the judgment of the Pope, to do what he commands, and not to do what he forbids: now since she would plainly sin against conscience if she did what she believed to be a vice, or abstained from what she believed to be virtues, therefore, she is bound to believe that to be good which the Pope commands, and evil which he forbids. Consequently, if the Pope should err in commanding vices, and prohibiting virtues, then the church is bound to believe virtues to be bad, and vices good, unless she would sin against conscience.

It seems to us that the cardinal's proof is quite conclu-

* To explain the matter in logical language—Bellarmine asserts a hypothetical proposition, and proceeds to argue from the remotion of the consequent to the remotion of the antecedent. Of course such an argument would break down if the hypothetical proposition itself were not true; yet his defenders suppose that, because he denies the consequent, he denies the hypothetical propositon itself. A want of logical acumen this which would have made Cicero lose his patience.—Vide De off. lib. iii. c. 9.

sive; once admit his principle (a principle clearly his own, not that of his opponents), that the church is bound to acquiesce in the judgment of the Pope, and the conclusion which Milner thinks it better to deny than to defend, follows at once.

But Milner replies, Bellarmine is here speaking hypothetically. To be sure he is speaking hypothetically, and we cited him as speaking hypothetically. We fancy Milner wished his readers to suppose that "speaking hypothetically" means saying something that one does not believe, or is not sure of, and does not wish to "teach positively." For the benefit, then, of our unlearned readers, we beg to explain that a hypothetical proposition means nothing more than a sentence with an if in it; and that one may be as sure of a hypothetical proposition, and teach it as positively as any other. We may be quite sure that, "if there is no rain we shall have a bad harvest," even though we are not at all sure whether it will rain or not, or whether the harvest will be good or not. Now, whatever virtues there may be in the cardinal's "if" we have faithfully preserved.* We do not accuse him of saying that Popes are in the habit of commanding vices, and forbidding virtues: neither do we charge him with maintaining that the church is bound to believe virtues to be good, or vices evil; it is quite beside the question to discuss what his opinion may be on either of these points; but we re-assert, advisedly, that Bellarmine maintains—what we admit to be, in logical language, a "hypothetical proposition," but still a very monstrous one, and worthy of as many notes of exclamation as we may choose to affix to it—viz., that "IF the Pope should so far err as to command vice, and to prohibit virtues, then the church would be bound to believe that vices are good, and virtues evil!!!"

We now call on "Investigator" to refer to Bellarmine himself, and to try whether he can find any trace of the words which Milner has interpolated. We look with some curiosity to see whether he will make us the "amende honorable" for the unfounded charge he has brought against us, or whether he will "seek to evade the difficulty in which he has placed"—himself.

* A curious instance of the reckless manner in which Roman Catholic divines have come to the defence of Bellarmine, is afforded by Dr. Wiseman, or some other writer in the "Dublin Review," edited by him. Dr. Wordsworth having cited this same passage from Bellarmine, the reviewer writes—"What would Dr. Wordsworth say of us if we were to charge him with the following opinion, which we give in his own words—'The infidel might justly assert that all our religion is a bare groundless faith.' We have done with his book only what he has done with that of Bellarmine, suppressed the hypothetical clause." It is quite true that the process by which the reviewer got this doctrine out of Dr. Wordsworth's book was by mutilating a sentence, and leaving out the hypothetical clause; but Dr. Wordsworth does not treat the cardinal in like manner, but copies his if as faithfully as we did ourselves.

ON INFALLIBILITY.

[In our March number, we inserted a letter from Mr. Rourke, so extremely long, that we were obliged to omit several valuable communications from other respected correspondents. As he has now sent us another letter, of almost equal length, we trust he will not be offended, if we break it up into paragraphs, and make a few brief remarks on each, as we go on. Our printer has directions to insert as much of the letter as he can find room for.—ED.]

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

"SIR—I again beg to tender you my meed of thanks for your kindness in giving my last letter a place in your periodical. I read with sorrow and not with anger, your observations on that letter, which clearly showed that you had lost equanimity in replying to it. Now, I would say, let us argue dispassionately, in a Christian spirit, and with that charity which 'is not easily provoked.' Let us 'be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love.'"

[We should be sorry if any of our readers had good reason to suppose that the tone of our comments on Mr. Rourke's former letter exhibited a want of proper equanimity. All we said was—that Mr. Rourke's second letter was very long, and declamatory, and dictatorial, rather than argumentative. We think so still; and hope it was no breach of Christian charity to say so, especially when we, in the same paragraph, praised the ability and clearness of his previous letter. We can hardly regret having said so much, since Mr. Rourke's present letter is considerably more to the purpose.]

"When I entered the field of controversy with you, Mr. Editor, I did so as a simple, unlearned member of the Catholic Church, and not as a logician or a theologian; so if my style of writing be quaint, and my language destitute of rhetorical and argumentative flourishes, your readers, I hope, will not be surprised, nor yourself disappointed."

[To this we have only to say, that we beg, in future, Mr. Rourke will favour us with as many arguments as he pleases, and as little as possible of the "rhetorical flourishes."]

"Having said so much by way of preface, I will, with your permission, resume my subject, by giving, first, a quotation from the Holy Book, which irrefragably proves the infallibility of the Church of Christ. The apostle of nations, in writing to the Ephesians, says 'that God has not only placed in his church, apostles, prophets, and evangelists, but also pastors and teachers'—Eph. iv. 2. For what end? 'For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ."—Eph. v. 12. How long? 'Till we all come to the unity of faith.'—Eph. v. 13. For what end? 'That henceforth we be no more like children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive.'—Eph. v. 14. This is evidently spoken in reference to the people who are here taught—first, that the pastors of the church are appointed by God himself to be their guides in faith; secondly, that these guides shall continue in the Church of Christ without ceasing to the end of the world—'till we all come to the unity of faith;' thirdly, that, in all controversies of religion, it belongs to these guides to fix the wavering judgment of the people, against all the wicked arts of impostors and seducers, and that, by consequence, the faithful ought to rely on their directions with an entire confidence. For the apostle says—'We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth us not. By this we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.'—1 John iv. 6. For unless they may be safely depended on, they would not fully answer the end of their institution; the people, especially the ignorant, upon every new and difficult debate, would be left in uncertainty, and might even suspect their guides to be their seducers."

[We have now, again, to complain that Mr. Rourke mixes up very plain texts of Scripture with very doubtful comments of his own. Every member of the Church of England readily assents to the statement of the apostle, that God has appointed pastors and teachers in his church, and that the office of such teachers is to instruct and edify the people, who are the body of Christ. But what the apostle does not assert is, that such pastors and teachers cannot possibly fall into error, and that in every difficult debate the people may always absolutely depend on them without any uncertainty, or any necessity of inquiring for themselves. Now, a divine of the Church of Rome cannot consistently adopt Mr. Rourke's interpretation of this passage; for the Church of Rome acknowledges the orders of the Greek Church. There are about fifty millions of Christians whose pastors (according to the Romish theory) teach fatal error; whose "guides are their seducers;" and on whose directions the "people cannot rely with an entire confidence." It is plain, therefore, that any texts which merely assert that God has appointed an order of clergy for the teaching of the people, cannot be interpreted to mean, that the directions of such clergy can be followed implicitly without risk of error.

It is scarcely necessary to say, how irrelevant is the text cited from St. John's epistle, from which Mr. Rourke seems to infer that every clergyman of the present day is as divinely inspired as were St. John and his brother apostles.]

"But blessed for ever be the mercy of God who has settled upon earth a visible church, which is the pillar and ground of truth, against which the gates of hell shall never prevail; and to which he has promised the Spirit of Truth for ever. So that I leave any one to judge whether they who refuse to submit their private reason to the authority of this Church, be not in danger of being self-convicted at the great tribunal of God; and I leave it to him to consider whether any man can hope to attain salvation who lives wilfully out of the communion of that church which Christ came to establish for the salvation of mankind, and of which it is said—'The Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved.'—Acts ii. 47. If all men had but faith enough to believe the church established by Christ himself, to be our guide, and humility enough to submit their judgment to her's, there had never been any heresy in the Christian world. Which, as it shows, on the one hand, the excellency of Christ's institution, so, on the other, it is a dreadful instance of the pride and misery of mankind, who had rather lose heaven by presumption, than gain it by following better lights than their own."

[This paragraph is pervaded by Mr. Rourke's old fallacy, that what is said in Scripture of the church must necessarily be understood of the Church of Rome—a church which actually did not exist at the time to which the passage in Acts ii. refers! We are as certain as Mr. Rourke is, that no man can rationally hope to attain salvation who lives wilfully out of the communion of the true Church of Christ—of which, it is said in that chapter—"The Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved."]

"Well, I have given you nearly twenty passages from the Divine Book which clearly, ay, irrefutably prove the infallibility of the Church of Christ. But you cannot see infallibility in those passages. I will tell you why you cannot see it. Because (I do not mean the slightest offence), you are walking in 'the valley of the shadow of death,' and because you are 'blind without sleep.'"

[This passage contains only "rhetorical and argumentative flourishes;" we do not think it necessary to give any reply to it, beyond assuring Mr. R. that it does not disturb our "equanimity" in the least. Whether it be consistent with Christian charity to charge one's opponent with wilful blindness to what is irrefutably proved by the Holy Scriptures, we leave to the judgment of our dispassionate readers.]

"Pardon this digression. To continue, we believe that in the Gospel is recorded a part, and, indeed, a very small part, of what Christ did and preached during his visible existence on earth.—See John xxi. 25.

"We believe the authors of those Gospels to have been inspired by the Holy Ghost, and, therefore, we believe every word contained in them, as proceeding from the fountain of truth. As we believe the Gospel of Christ to be a divine book, so we believe that none but a divine authority can expound the same. We shudder at the idea of bringing that divine book before the tribunal of limited or corrupted reason, and we candidly confess that, although we were provided with a greater share of wisdom and knowledge than Solomon possessed, we should still be unequal of ourselves, to the task of understanding and explaining the Gospel, or other parts of Holy Writ. In this we are confirmed by St. Peter, who says that 'no prophecy of the Scripture is made by private interpretation.'—2 Peter i. 20. As we believe that Holy Scripture is the Word of God, so we believe that Holy Scripture, misrepresented, is not the Word of God, but the word of corrupted man; and that Scripture is often misrepresented, we are obliged to believe, from the assertion of St. Peter, who tells us that the unlearned and unstable wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction.—See 2 Peter iii. 16. And likewise from our own observations. For, as "common sense" tells us, that the Holy Ghost cannot be the author of contradictory doctrines, so it tells us that numbers of doctrines, preached pretendedly from Scripture, must be false, as they stand in contradiction to other doctrines drawn from the same Scripture."

[Mr. Rourke here draws very strange conclusions from the principles which we hold in common with him. We all agree, that the Scriptures were given by the inspiration of God, for the instruction of his people; He knew the extent of man's ability, and He surely had power to express those doctrines which He deemed it needful for man to know, in such language that a man of humble and teachable mind could understand them. But, Mr. Rourke seems to proceed upon the principle that the greater the wisdom of him who speaks, the greater the difficulty of understanding the meaning of what he says; so that while any peasant can understand what a priest speaks or writes, not even "the wisdom of Solomon can understand or explain" what is written by the inspiration of God himself.

Mr. Rourke quotes two passages from the second Epistle of St. Peter, in support of his views. The first of these is plainly irrelevant. According to Mr. Rourke's own translation, the passage states, how prophecy is "made," not how it is to be explained; which meaning appears, to be confirmed by the concluding words of the verse, which Mr. Rourke has omitted to cite—"for holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The second passage is a very favourite one with Roman Catholic controversial writers; but familiar as we are with Mr. Rourke's interpretations of Scripture, we needed no formal proof that it is very possible to wrest texts of the Bible to a sense very different from what the writers intended. But, notwithstanding this, a moment's examination of the text, from 2 Pet. iii. 16, proves two points—one, that in St. Peter's time, the "unlearned and unstable" had the Scriptures in their hands, contrary to the modern practice of the Church of Rome; the other, that the remedy given by St. Peter for such risk of misinterpretation was not to close up the volume of Scripture altogether, and trust to the interpretation of the church, which is the plan Mr. Rourke would suggest, but (see the following verse) "to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ"—a knowledge which can only be acquired by the constant study of those very Scriptures which are able to make us wise unto salvation.

We quite agree with Mr. Rourke in the concluding assertion of the paragraph, that "the Holy Ghost cannot be the author of contradictory doctrines," and this is one of our reasons for believing that either the ancient or modern Church of Rome must have erred grievously from the true faith. If Mr. Rourke will refer to an article in our present number on this subject, he will find it proved, beyond the possibility of contradiction, that, upon several most important points, the ancient and modern Church of Rome do put forward contradictory doctrines. If the ancient Church was right, then the modern Church of Rome is in great error. If, on the other hand, the modern doctrines be true, then the Church of Rome could not always have been infallible. Mr. Rourke is at liberty to select whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases.]

(To be continued in our next).

ON PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD AND THE BURIAL SERVICE.

WE received some time ago a letter from Mr. E. Power, for which we were unable to make room in our last two numbers. Finding that its unmanageable length rendered it uncertain whether it could be inserted in the present number, we have been unwilling to postpone it any longer, and have, therefore, had recourse to the same expedient, as in the case of Mr. Rourke; printing half of it now, and leaving the other half for next month.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—That Mr. Thorndike did not hold the belief of the Church of England on the subject of prayers for the dead, is notorious from the passage which I cited from his writings; and hence the purpose for which I cited that passage (though you could not conceive it), and to which I have so palpably and exclusively applied it, must be self-evident—namely, to show how oddly the doctrine laid down therein contrasts with that of the burial office; for if the doctrine advocated by this learned Protestant be orthodox, that of the burial office cannot be so too, and vice versa. In this respect it is then, I grant, dangerous to quote from Mr. Thorndike's book, and bring forward a passage developing a system of prayers for the dead so manifestly different from that of the Protestant Church, but dangerous to the burial office only. We have here, also, a decided proof of the incongruity of doctrinal opinions, which marks the principles of Protestants; principles which, while their advocates endeavour to apply them to the support of one particular form of belief, are equally available in defence of every other system, how contradictory soever. You assert that, with regard to the burial of impenitent sinners, there is no material difference between the Churches of England and Rome; but you are compelled to defend your practice, in this respect, by the saving interrogatory, "how are we to know that a sinner died incorrigible and impenitent?" This may be considered a very rational query regarding your Church, which is utterly deficient of the discipline established by Christ and his apostles, for punishing notorious sinners, but it does not establish on this head (the burial of impenitent sinners) the uniformity of the two Churches. You allege, "we never heard of any priest refusing money when asked to pray for one who died in his communion;" but as this is an expedient to throw dust in the eyes of your readers, and in no respect applicable to the subject of debate, permit me to set the matter right, by asking, have you ever heard of a priest accepting money for praying for incorrigible, impenitent sinners, who, by their notoriously wicked lives, separated themselves from his communion? I could, if necessary, supply instances of the refusal of Christian burial to the remains of persons excluded from the Catholic Church, on account of their impious lives, when conscience could not nor would not be sacrificed to mammon.

Following your example, I now maintain, on the contrary, I have never known a minister to refuse to read the Burial office over the remains of any one offered for interment. I never heard of him alleging "it is a bad case;" "I could not, with a safe conscience, read this office over the remains of N—. L—., who lived in a state of concubinage fully thirty years, and up to the day of his death, I could not, under such circumstances, prostitute religion to so vile a purpose; to the encouragement of vice; to the pardoning of lukewarm sinners, and to the disedification of the good and the virtuous." No; but with an affectation of religious solemnity, he recites, "For as much as it hath pleased Almighty God of his great mercy, to take unto himself the soul of our dear brother departed," &c.; and "we give thee hearty thanks, for that it hath pleased thee to deliver this our brother," &c.; and "that when we depart this life we may rest in him as our hope as this our brother doth," &c. These words you read over all that are buried, incorrigible, impenitent sinners included: the law compels you, and the terrors of a prosecution are an argumentum ad hominem too powerful to be resisted.

In CATHOLIC LAYMAN, Vol. ii., No. 20, page 93, you assert, "prayers for the dead are never countenanced nor vindicated further than as they may rely on the promise and Word of God; and as we do not go beyond this, how can we be taunted with admitting prayers for the dead not warranted by Scripture?" I confess I have no desire to disturb your equanimity again, yet, I cannot forbear asking what warrant of Scripture have you for these prayers, in cases such as this I have now stated? a case to which, when I fill up the blanks, I can fearlessly challenge contradiction. I have already alluded to the want of discipline in the Church of England; your annual wishes (Commination office) although of about 300 years' standing, have not yet attained the object wished for. Thus the Protestant Liturgy affords prima facie and incontestable evidence of a total want, in the Church of England, of that godly discipline so strictly enforced in the primitive Church. You cannot subject sinners to "open penance;" you cannot reprove an unworthy member, and dismiss him from the Christians' community; and hence, I agree with you, that it is impossible to know whether notorious sinners in your Church become truly penitent or not before their death.

This want of discipline is admitted by Dr. Wake, in a sermon at Whitehall, 1690, on 1 Tim. v. He says—"The great temper and moderation of our present discipline, that I do not say some defect in it permits not us (the clergy) to make a severe inquiry into sin, and punish it, as St. Paul commanded Timothy to do. We cannot call sinners publicly into the Church, and lay open their crimes to them, and rebuke them before all, that others also may fear. But the civil magistrate hath great opportunities of supplying this defect; and, no doubt, God will require it so much the more at their hands, in that it is now no longer in ours." Hence the Church of England, independently as a Church, having no authority to rebuke notorious sinners, or to separate them from her communion, cannot pretend to exclude the remains of such from the rites of burial prescribed by law. Another Protestant authority complains thus of this want of discipline—"The Church of England hath, for 200 years, wished for the restoration of discipline, and yet it is but an ineffective wish. For nothing has been done towards introducing it, but rather things are gone backward."—Bingham's Antiq. sub Ann, 1719, b. 15, cap. 9. sec. 8.

I could adduce innumerable quotations to the same purpose, and all of them from Protestants whose zeal for the Reformed Church places them beyond the reach of suspicion; yet I shall only add one more—"The restoring of the ancient discipline is earnestly desired by the Church of England in her office of Commination—but with due submission be it spoken, methinks it looketh too much like dissembling with God, and imposing on the people, to have this passage stand in our public Liturgy, and read solemnly once a year, and yet no attempt made towards the restoring of this godly and much wished-for, but still neglected discipline."—Ellesley's Caution against ill company, 1705, pref. pages 2, 3. Thus, we have corroborating evidence, the most satisfactory and conclusive, that the Church of England has not now, nor had not at any period since the Reformation, that true Christian discipline which our Lord himself ordained, to preserve his Church, pure and free, from corruption; and which is as evidently an essential principle of the true Church, and an ordinance of Christ, as any other portion of his religion.

St. Paul says (Heb. xiii. 17), that pastors must account for the souls of their flocks, but Bishop Wake tells us God will require this account at the hands of the civil magistrate; yet, taking Timothy as an exemplar of all true Christian bishops, and admitting the Scripture as the infallible Word of God, it must be confessed that the discipline of the Church of Christ, with respect to notorious sinners, is as irrevocably the same to day as in the days of Timothy, and that the clergy have the same or equal authority to rebuke, to exhort, and to chastise, by penitential discipline. In this conclusion I am supported by the authority of the Church of England, which defines the Church of Christ thus:—"The true Church hath always three notes or marks, whereby it is known—pure and sound doctrine, the sacraments ministered according to Christ's holy institution, and the right use of ecclesiastical discipline."—Hom. on Whitsunday, part 2, page 393.

From these observations I am incidentally led to notice another peculiarity of the Church of England. By her own definition of the true Church, it appears that three essential properties are required as constituent and inherent principles so intimately and inseparably connected with its very nature and institution, that, without them, it cannot continue to be the Church of Christ; and I have shown, from unexceptionable authority, the Protestant Liturgy and the testimony of Protestant divines, that one essential property of the true Church is wanting in the Church of England; therefore, by her own doctrine, she cannot be the true Church of Christ.

Thus, have I given you another instance of my knowledge of Protestant principles, with which, I venture to affirm, ninetynine ont of every hundred Protestants are as little acquainted as they are with the affairs passing in the moon. I presume I have satisfied you as to the object for which I quoted from Mr. Thorndike's work; not that I fancied I could find prayers for the dead and purgatory proved thereby; but to show that learned Protestants cannot be satisfied as to the orthodoxy of the burial office, and therefore, they advocate other systems of prayers for the dead.

(To be continued.)

[We must commence by explaining the allusion to Mr. Thorndike, for the benefit of our new subscribers. In our last volume, Mr. Power discussed with us, in several letters, the question, what evidence could be adduced in support of the doctrine of purgatory. And among other authorities he brought forward first, a passage from Mr. Johnson's "Unbloody Sacrifice;" and more recently, another from the writing of Mr. Thorndike. Now, when we referred to the places cited by Mr. Power, we felt bound, in charity, to believe that he had taken his quotations secondhand, without once turning to the original of the passages quoted. Both the one writer and the other were engaged (in the very passages which Mr. Power says, "vividly set forth the belief of his church") in proving that the ancients did not hold the doctrine of purgatory, and in explaining the object of the prayers for the dead which they admit, were used in the church, at an early period. As we have had often occasion to do the same thing ourselves, we expect, at some future time, to see garbled extracts from our pages, introduced into Roman Catholic manuals of controversy, and to find the CATHOLIC LAYMAN cited among other Protestant testimonies to the truth of the doctrine of purgatory. On our pointing out the way in which Mr. Power had been misled as to Mr. Thorndike, our correspondent has not acted with the candour we had hoped for; and instead of plainly confessing that he had been deceived by an unfaithful quotation, he shifts his ground and tells us that he cited Mr. Thorndike only for the purpose of showing how opposed his views were to those of the burial service!

Strange, if this were the case. Mr. Thorndike lived and died a clergyman of the Church of England; and if he had occasion to bury any one, we have no reason to suppose that he ever used any other ritual. We may say, too, for ourselves, that we cannot discover any contradiction between the sentiments cited from him, and the doctrine of the Church of England, expressed in the burial service. But whether there be or not, is a controversy with which we certainly shall not occupy our pages. For what is Mr. Thorndike to us? Supposing that it were true, that while holding the office of clergyman of the Church of England, he in reality believed the doctrines of the Quakers, or of the Socinians, or of the Church of Rome, how does it affect our position? Is Mr. Thorndike the founder of our religion? Supposing we could show that Cardinal Wiseman was a Mahometan in disguise, would Mr. Power think it necessary to turn Turk? It may be an interesting subject of inquiry to ascertain the exact private opinions of individual modern divines; but we cannot give up any of the space of this journal to topics of mere literary curiosity; and we would desire all our correspondents to confine themselves to the points really at issue between the Church of England and the Church of Rome.

Mr. Power proceeds next to a topic, which is nearly as irrelevant to the question of purgatory as the opinions of Mr. Thorndike—viz., the general question of church discipline. We beg to remind our correspondent that this journal was established for the purpose of discussing those important doctrines, upon which the Church of England differs from the Church of Rome, and not those upon which honest members of the Church of England may lawfully differ among themselves. It is obvious, from Mr. Power's quotations from Church of England writers, that the question which he raises is one of the latter class. We had some doubts whether it would not have been better to have, at once, reduced his letter to limits more suited to the size of our journal, by the omission of all his remarks on this subject; and the only reason which deterred us from adopting this course was the fact, that he seemed to attach considerable importance to them, and we were, therefore, unwilling that any of our correspondents should have reason to charge us with even the semblance of unfairness or partiality. While we are willing to admit, that the discipline of the Church of England might be made more strict than it is, we deny altogether the justice of Mr. Power's sweeping censures against her on this point. Before we are obliged, however, to inquire what portion of truth there may be in these censures, we must ask our correspondent does he seriously maintain, that "true Christian discipline is evidently an essential principle of the true church;" or, in other words, that if Christian discipline be wanting, or inefficiently exercised, the church necessarily ceases to exist? To us such a course of argument, in an advocate of the Church of Rome, appears absolutely suicidal.

In the very first page of that well-known Roman Catholic work, "Bossuet's Variations," what do we read? Speaking of the beginning of the sixteenth century, he says—"A reform of ecclesiastical discipline had been wanted several centuries before. 'Who will grant me,' says St. Bernard, 'before I die, to see the Church of God such as she had been in the primitive times?'" Disorders had still increased since that time. The disorders of the clergy were represented in this manner to Eugenius IV. by Cardinal Julian. "These disorders," said he, "excite the hatred of the people against the whole ecclesiastical order; and should they not be corrected, it is to be feared lest the laity should rise against the clergy; . . . for it will be said," proceeded he, "that the clergy are incorrigible, and will apply no remedy to their disorders." Mr. Power sneers at the Church of England for her annual wishes for reformation of about 300 years' standing; but here we see that the Church of Rome, according to the acknowledgement of one of the ablest of her own controversial writers, needed a reformation of ecclesiastical discipline for several centuries. From a period of time long anterior to St. Bernard, down to the sixteenth century, the state of the church of Rome was getting worse and worse, until, at last, according to the confession of one of her own cardinals, there was much risk that the people would consider the clergy quite incorrigible. Or, if the authority of Bossuet be considered insufficient, let our readers turn to the extracts from the ecclesiastical annals of Cardinal Baronius, under the dates A.D. 900 and 912, which we had occasion to quote in another article in our present number, p. 58.*

Other citations to the same effect have been given, vol. 2, p. 121. For example, the declaration of Pope Adrian VI.:—"For a long time there have existed many abominators in this holy see, abuses of spiritual things, excesses in the exercises of jurisdiction; all things have been changed and perverted. Corruption has descended from the head to the members, from the supreme pontiff to the inferior prelates." And still more to the point, is the confession of Bellarmine, which we cited in the same place:—"Some years before the rise of the Lutheran and Calvinistic heresy, according to the testimony of those who were then alive, there was almost an entire abandonment of equity in the ecclesiastical judgments: in morals, no discipline; in sacred literature, no erudition; in divine things, no reverence—religion was almost extinct."—Supra, p. 57.

May we not now retort upon Mr. Power his own argument, which he advances so triumphantly? and may we not say, that we "have shown, from unexceptionable authority, and the testimony of [Roman Catholic] divines, that one essential property of the true church is wanting in the Church of [Rome]. Therefore, by her own doctrine, she cannot be the true Church of Christ."

But enough of such painful pictures, which Mr. Power's argument has compelled us to bring forward. We should be unwilling to close these remarks without pointing ont to Mr. Power, and to our other readers, what we believe to be the true state of the case, as regards this difficult question of church discipline. Our Lord's parable of the tares and the wheat has always foreshadowed the state of the church in each successive age—the evil ever mingled with the good. All human devices to effect an entire separation between these two opposing elements must of necessity prove inefficacious; and the important practical question is, whether the system of the Church of Rome, which professes to effect this separation, does not in reality produce more moral injury upon the minds of hypocrites and others, whom no discipline can reach, and whom she allows to remain within the pale of the church, than the course adopted by the Church of England, of throwing the responsibility of the state of each individual Christian more directly and immediately upon himself. A member of the Church of England is under no temptation to harden himself in sin by the knowledge that the clergyman who reads the church service over his grave may, in accordance with the ritual, express a charitable hope of his future state. He knows that such an expression can exercise no influence whatever upon his condition in the unseen world. Very different, however, is the effect of the practical working of the Romish system, as we see it constantly before our eyes. The most pious saint that ever lived could not express a more confident hope of eternal happiness and salvation than is put forth continually by blood-stained criminals of the Romish faith, as they stand on the scaffold to pay the penalty of their evil deeds. We ask, can that system be true which enjoins and authorizes vice thus to claim the blessings which should belong only to virtue?

* The original Latin text of these extracts from Baronius is given at length in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, for October, 1852, vol. i., p. 109.

FLOWERS FOR MAY.

Happy, joyous May! loveliest and cheeriest month of the year, with its gleams of bright sunshine and shadows of soft green light, its thousand commingling voices above and around, calling upon all nature to join in the chorus of praise and thanksgiving to him "who maketh his sun to shine upon the good and the bad, and raineth upon the just and the unjust."—Matt. v. 4, 5 (Douay Bible). Is there one so dull and thankless as not to respond to the call?

"Wake! for shame! thou sluggard heart,
Wake! and gladly sing thy part,
Learn of birds, and streams, and flowers,
How to use thy nobler powers."

As we saunter out on a May morning to welcome the approaching summer, it is not to the cultivated parterre or the formal flower garden that our steps incline, but to the open fields and meadows. At all times agreeable to the eyes, and refreshing in the dreariest months of winter, they are now invested with richer and peculiar attractions. Daisies, and buttercups, and cowslips overspread the grass, and the hedges are whitening with the hawthorn. The DAISY, however, claims the first place in our attention in a May meadow; on entering which, we are sure to meet the "wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower" in myriads around our feet, in starlike spangles on the green carpet of nature. Some one has called it the Robin red-breast of flowers.

The term daisy, as spelt in old English (day's-eye), wrapped up in a word, a piece of simple, natural poetry. It expressed that the flower, like the eyes of other wee and pretty things, grows sleepy at the decline of day, and closes at the evening fall. The peasant who first gave this descriptive appellation to the "bonny gem," had the fancy of a poet, as much as a Chaucer, of whom it is said that he used to lie in the fields all day long to watch the daisy open its round eyes in the morning and close them in the evening.

The botanical name of the daisy is Bellis perennis, or pretty perennial. The French call it Petite Marguerite (little pearl), and Paquerette (Easter flower). The Italians call it Pratolina (meadow flower), and fiore di primavera (spring-tide flower). It was once a flower of great renown, and worn by valiant knights and gentlemen. It was the device of the unhappy Margaret of Anjou, and afterwards of the celebrated Margaret of Valois, the sister of Francis the First, and friend of Erasmus and Calvin. So that, however humble may be its birth and estimation with those who regard nothing as rich but what is rare, the common daisy flower has been valued highly by those who could associate true nobility with simplicity of nature. Were we to attempt a description of it, our readers would imagine we were undertaking a very superfluous task; but familiar as it is, there are many who have never stooped to examine a daisy just before it has opened and scattered its leaves, and while its florets, each tipped with a delicate rose-colour, are clustered into one group, forming a cynosure of beauty that might compete with anything to be found in the garden or greenhouse. Examined through a microscope, nothing more perfect can be seen, and its exquisite beauty and symmetry can then only be appreciated.

"Who but he who arched the skies,
And pours the day-springs living flood,
Wondrous alike in all he tries,
Could rear the daisy's purple bud.

Mould its green cup, its wiry stem,
Its fringed border nicely spin,
And cap the gold-emtossed gem
That, set in silver, gleams within.

And fling it, unrestrained and free,
O'er hill and dale, and desert sod,
That man, where'er he walks, may see
In every step, the stamp of God."

But, surely, we need not appeal to the appliances of science to create an interest in favour of the daisy—

"'Tis Flora's page, in every place,
In every season fresh and fair,
It opens with perennial grace,
And blossoms everywhere.

On waste and woodland, rock and plain,
Its humble buds unheeded rise—
The rose has but a summer reign,
The daisy never dies."

So sung a Christian poet,* who, within the last few days has been summoned hence, to join his sweet harp with those around the throne of God, where no doubt he is singing with a loud voice continually, "Worthy is the lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing."—Apocalypse v. 12. The daisy was no unworthy theme for a Christian poet in his passing pilgrimage on earth. Its very name was fraught with recollections of happy childhood; it leads him back to his early days of innocence and simplicity, when he roamed through fields and meadows in search of daisies, and buttercups, and cowslips. It is emphatically the child's own flower; and, with propriety, has been made the emblem of that pure and happy innocence which belongs to a child:—

"Type and emblem thou may'st be
Of that rare simplicity
Which, in every Christian mind
Should its place of resting find;
Mingling, with its scorn of state,
Meekness to the rich and great,
Faith to rest on in the way,
Hope to lend its cheering ray;
Conscious that the hand which tries
All its latent energies,
Can, with more than equal power,
Bear it through temptation's hour,
Still the conflict, soothe its sighs,
And plant it 'neath congenial skies.
Such the lesson thou may'st meet
In the daisy at thy feet."

Our blessed Lord told his disciples that except they were converted and became as little children, they should not enter into the kingdom of God.—Matt. xviii. 3. For of such is the kingdom of God.—Mark ix. 14, 15. He told Nicodemus that except a man be born again, of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot see the kingdom of God.—John iii. 5. He did not mean merely that they were to become pure, and simple, and innocent as children, although this may also be true metaphorically, but he plainly, and over and over again, taught them, that they must experience a new birth, actual and literal, not by entering the second time into their mother's womb, but by being born again of the Spirit of God—the Holy Ghost. This may read strange in the eyes of our Roman Catholic readers, as it sounded strange in the ears of Nicodemus, until he was taught by his blessed Master not to marvel at the saying.

As the month advances, the fields are in a blaze of buttercups and cowslips, reminding us, as somebody has said, of the descent of Jupiter in a shower of gold. The BUTTERCUP or king-cup (French, Pied de coq, cocksfoot, and bouton d'or, gold-button) is a species of ranunculus or crowfoot (Ranunculus bulbosus). It derives its name of buttercup or butter-flower, from its being supposed that its flower imparts the yellow colour to the butter at this period of the year, being taken as fodder by the cows. This, however, is a popular error, the buttercup, like all the ranunculus family, being very acrid and pungent in its taste, so much so, that neither cows nor horses will touch it for food. This general supposition is just about as true as that the fairies use the flower of the buttercup for their goblets, which, doubtless, many good people once believed.

"And fairies now, no doubt, unseen,
At silent revels sup,
With dew-drop bumpers toast their queen,
From crow-flowers' golden cup.

The COWSLIP (primula veris) is now also in rich profusion in our meadows. This "fragrant dweller of the lea" is distinguished from the primrose by the smaller size of its tall and pensile flowers. A line of Ben Jonson betrays the homely derivation of its name, when he speaks of "Bright day's-eyes, and the lips of cows."

The oxslip is another species of the same family; but with somewhat larger flowers, and, no doubt, has its name from a similar association.

The HAWTHORN, or white-thorn, was called, in old Saxon, the hedge-thorn. Before the change in the calendar, May-day did not happen till about the 12th of our present month, and then the hedges were white with the pearly blossoms of the hawthorn, which was thence called "the May." It was a custom of the olden times, on a May morning, to go to the woods at break of day, and bring away boughs of the hawthorn, and hang them on every door. This was supposed to have been a remnant of Druidical superstition; but, apart from that, it was a natural and interesting custom. We believe some such custom still lingers in Greece.

Though we must pass many flowers unnoticed, yet must we say a word respecting the LILY OF THE VALLEY (Convallaria magalis). What can surpass the beauty of its delicate bells, as they hang, half-hidden in the shade of its broad, green leaves! This sweet-scented, modest little flower is sometimes associated with our Lord's comparison of the lilies of the field and Solomon's splendour. This, however, is a mistake, as the lily which suggested the comparison is generally acknowledged to be the scarlet martagon lily, which is very plentiful in the fields in Syria.

"But not the less, sweet spring-tide flower,
Dost thou display thy Maker's power,
His skill and handy-work.
Our western valley's humble child,
Where in green nook of woodland wild,
Thy modest blossoms lurk.

What though nor rare, nor art be thine,
The lea's to pie, the thread to twine,
Yet born to bloom and fade,
Still, love, a lovelier robe arrays,
Than o'er in Israel's brightest days,
Her wealthiest kings arrayed."

* The poet, James Montgomery, who died on 30th April last.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR MAY.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

This being the month most appropriate for general green cropping, it will be of most importance, in order to get them sown in proper time, that all other routine work should be previously disposed of.

Barley.—Sowing should, therefore, be finished without delay. The surface should be worked very fine for this grain to insure an even braird; it may be sown broadcast under the plough, or ribbed or drilled in—in whatever way it may be deposited, no time should be lost in this dry weather in covering, and immediately rolling, so as to prevent evaporation and preserve as much of the natural moisture in the land as possible; steeping the seed from 24 to 36 hours in soft water, to forward germination, will be of much benefit, but it will require careful watching in the steep, as in warm close weather, it will vegetate much quicker than when it is cold and harsh; as soon as it shows symptoms of sprouting it should be sown, and carefully covered without delay.

Grass and Clover Seeds.—Barley is the best grain crop to sow grass and clover seeds with, which should be sown immediately after the barley is covered, then bush harrowed and rolled, all small seeds are more equally dispersed, and covered by having the land rolled previous to sowing, but should be finished with the roller.

Mangel-wurzel.—This crop, which is of the greatest possible value with carrots, to those who would have plenty of good milk and butter during the winter, without that offensive taste which all the turnip tribe invariably communicate, requires a deep, rich, friable loam, or a moory soil, and cannot be grown to perfection without the aid of a plentiful supply of farm-yard manure. After the drills are formed and well rolled, the seeds may be dibbled in, two or three seeds in each hole, at from fifteen to eighteen inches apart, in rich and sheltered soils; and at from twelve to fifteen inches apart, in soils not so rich, or more exposed, or sown in a continuous line by the turnip-harrow, adjusting the holes to allow the seed to pass. The seeds should be steeped in soft water for at least forty-eight hours; set to drain; and dried with wood or other ashes, or fine, dry rabbit-sand; the dibble-holes should not exceed 1½ inches deep. A very expeditious sort of dibble has been figured repeatedly in the GAZETTE; it will be found at page 159, of volume lii. It is usual with some to sow the mangels at half the above distances, with the intention of removing every second plant, when they begin to touch or incommode each other, and which gives an abundant supply of green feeding. When sown in a continuous line the plants are afterwards singled out to the above distances. The best time to sow mangels is between the last week in April and the 20th of May. The ordinary quantity of seed required is about 4 lbs. per Irish acre; the long red gives the heaviest crop in good, deep ground; the globe varieties are the best for ordinary soils: and the best for keeping is the orange globe. Mangels may also be sown in raised drills in beds; we prefer making the drills across the beds to making them lengthways, as by having them across, all the necessary operations of forming, manuring, sowing, thinning, hoeing, weeding, &c., can be performed from the furrows, between the beds, without putting the foot upon the bed.

White Globe or Norfolk Turnips.—When required for early sheep feeding, a breadth of white turnips may be sown by the middle of the month, which will come in by September, and be of great service.

Dale's Hybrid and Aberdeen Turnips may be sown from the middle to the end of the month.

Carrots and Parsnips will now require much careful attention, in hoeing and weeding; if sown early, and their progress strong, they will require thinning by the end of the month.

Chicory may still be sown till the tenth of the month, in drills prepared as if for turnips.

Spring Vetches.—Breadths suitable to the consumption of the above valuable soiling crop should be sown once a fortnight. Mix the vetches with about one-fourth of oats, and about 4 lb. of rape, it adds considerably to the bulk of the provender, and serves to keep the vetches off the ground.

Rye and Winter Vetches.—The former will be coming into use early in the month; the latter at later periods. As fast as they are consumed the land should be turned up and prepared for turnips.

Pigs.—Fat pigs should be disposed of before the month commences, and all others kept in store condition. Green clover, vetches, &c., may be given them in their yard, or if a clover field can be exclusively devoted to this stock, they will be maintained in health, strength, and good growing condition, till the end of the season, when food, more adapted for fattening, comes in plentifully. This is a good month to admit sows to the boar, that farrowing may take place in time for the young ones to get a good size and hardy before cold weather sets in.

New and Recent Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

RUSSIA AND THE RUSSIANS; comprising an account of the Czar Nicholas, and the House of Romanoff, with a sketch of the Encroachments of Russia from the reign of the Empress Catherine. By J. H. Cole, 21st Fusileers. 2s. 6d.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAMPAIGN OF 1828-29; with a View of the present State of the Eastern Question. By Colonel Chesney. 12s.

THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANT REFUGEES, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Charles Weiss. 8vo. 14s.

HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN HUNGARY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REFORMATION TO 1850, with reference also to Transylvania. With an Introduction by Dr. D'Aubigne. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

ALISON'S HISTORY of EUROPE, from the fall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the Establishment of Military Government in France, in 1852; being a continuation of his former celebrated Work. Vols. I., II., and III. 8vo. 15s. each.

CHRISTOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, and a Commentary on the Messianic Predictions. By E. W. Hengstenberg, D.D. Vol. I. 10s. 6d.

THE EARLY PROPHECIES OF A REDEEMER; from the first Promise to the Prophecy of Moses. Considered in Six Discourses. By Rev. W. De Burgh, B.D. 8vo. 5s.

EXAMINATION OF MR. MAURICE'S THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS. By Robert S. Candlish, D.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

OUTLINES OF SACRED PROPHECY. By Rev. T. R. Birks. New Edition. 5s.

THE SCARLET MYSTERY; or, Rome Unmasked. By J. G. MacWalter. 3s. 6d.

THE LIFE OF MRS. SHERWOOD. Edited by her Daughter. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

HOPE DEFERRED, NOT LOST; a Narrative of Missionary effort in South America. With Journals of Captain Gardiner, &c. 5s.

CAUTIONS FOR THE TIMES. Edited by the Archbishop of Dublin. 8vo. 7s.

MEMOIR OF RICHARD WILLIAMS, Catechist to the Patagonian Mission. By the Rev. Dr. James Hamilton. 12mo. 5s.

A MEMOIR OF THE REV. W. B. JOHNSTON, Missionary at Regent's Town, Sierra Leone. 5s.

OF THE PLURALITY OF WORLDS. An Essay. 8vo. 8s.

FRIENDS IN COUNCIL. A Series of Readings and Discourses thereon. 2 vols. Cheaper Edition. 9s.

COMPANIONS OF MY SOLITUDE. Cheaper Edition. 3s. 6d.

THE CHEMISTRY OF COMMON LIFE. By James F. W. Johnston. Vol. I. 5s.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE, from the French Revolution in 1789 to 1815. Cheaper Edition. Vols. I. to V. 4s. each.

DISCOURSES ON THE CHRISTIAN REVELATION, viewed in connection with Modern Astronomy. By the late Thomas Chalmers, D.D. Fcp. 2s. 6d.

THE BIBLE IN THE COUNTING HOUSE: a course of Lectures to Merchants. By the Rev. H. A. Broadman, D.D. 8vo. 5s.

STORR'S FAMILY PREACHER. Short practical Sermons for Home. 4s. 6d.

CHALMERS'S DAILY SCRIPTURE READINGS. 2 vols. 10s.

CHALMERS'S SABBATH SCRIPTURE READINGS. 2 vols. 10s.

MEMOIRS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his Son-in-Law, the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D. 2 vols., 12s.

BRADLEY'S PRACTICAL SERMONS for every Sunday and Principal Holiday in the Year. 8vo. 12s.

BRADLEY'S SERMONS on some of the Trials, Duties, and Encouragements of the Christian Life. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

ROBERTS' PLAIN SERMONS for all the Sundays and Chief Holidays of the Year. 2 vols. 10s.

ROBERTS' PLAIN SERMONS for all the Sundays and Chief Holidays of the Year. Second Series. 2 vols. 18s.

THE DOMESTIC COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY SCRIPTURES. By a Clergyman of the Church of England. 4 vols. Imp. 8vo. £2 14s.

MATTHEW HENRY'S EXPOSITION ON THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT; with numerous Maps and Illustrations. 3 vols. 4to. Whole calf. £3 17s. 6d.

WORK: PLENTY TO DO AND HOW TO DO IT. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 4s.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF UNIVERSAL BIOGRAPHY; with numerous Illustrations. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

GRATITUDE: an Exposition of the Hundred and Third Psalm. By the Rev. John Stevenson. 8vo. 6s.

CHRIST IS ALL; a series of tracts. By the Venerable Archdeacon Law. No. 1—8. 1d. each.

MY SCHOOLS AND MY SCHOOLMASTERS; or, the Story of my Education. By Hugh Miller. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND AND ITS PEOPLE. By Hugh Miller. 7s. 6d.

THE LONDON PULPIT. By James Ewing Ritchie. 4s. 6d.

THE NEW IRISH PULPIT; or Gospel Preacher. New series. 3s. 6d.

The PSALMS Restored to MESSIAH; a brief Commentary. By the Rev. R. H. Ryland. With Preface, by Bishop of Cashel. 6s.

LESSONS and TRIALS OF LIFE. By the Author of "Bertha's Journal." 6s.

MEMOIR OF THE LIVES OF ROBERT AND JAMES A. HALDANE. By Alexander Haldane, Esq. 8vo. 12s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. W. H. KRAUSE, A.M., Bethesda Chapel, Dublin, with selections from his Correspondence. By Rev. C. S. Stanford. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE REV. EDWARD BICKERSTETH. By the Rev. T. R. Birks. Cheaper Edition. 2 vols. Fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE BUD OF PROMISE: a Memoir of Eliza H. M. Græme. By the Rev. D. Pitcairn. 3s. 6d.

THE NET IN THE BAY; or Journal of a Visit to Moose and Albany. By the Bishop of Rupert's Land. 4s. 6d.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES; THE MOSLEM, AND HIS END; THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS HOPE. By the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. 1s. 6d.

LEILA ADA, THE JEWISH CONVERT: an authentic Memoir. By Osborne W. Trenery Heighway. 3s. 6d.

SELECT EXTRACTS FROM THE DIARY, CORRESPONDENCE, ETC., OF LEILA ADA. By Osborne W. Trenery Heighway. 3s. 6d.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY: a Narrative for the Young, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. With an Introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

A PORTRAITURE OF THE LATE REV. WILLIAM JAY, of Bath; an outline of his mind, character, and pulpit eloquence, &c. By the Rev. Thomas Wallace. 3s. 6d.

AN APPEAL TO THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, ON THE UNCONDEMNED HERESIES OF ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE'S BOOK, entitled, "The Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist." By the Rev. J. Taylor, M.A. 2s.

PLAIN SPEAKING. First series. Being forty short, Large-type Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle, B.A. In packet. 1s.

HOME TRUTHS. First, Second, and Third Series. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle. 3s. 6d. each.

THE BISHOP, the PASTOR, and the PREACHER. Three Biographical Lectures on Latimer, Baxter, and Whitfield; with introductory preface, on some Wants of the present Day. By Rev. J. C. Ryle. (In the Press.)

TRACTS FOR CHURCHMEN. Seventeen Numbers. In packet. 1s.

THE GLORIES OF MARY, from the Italian of Alphonsus Liguori; with the approbation of Cardinal Wiseman. 2s.

THE POLISH LANCER; or 1812. A Tale of Napoleon's Invasion of Russia. By Louis Rellstab. 1s. 6d.

JOHNSTON'S CHART OF THE NORTH SEA, and the BALTIC, with the Countries adjoining; and Enlarged Plans of Cronstadt and Revel. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR, in the Danubian Principalities. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S NEW MAP OF THE BLACK SEA, CAUCASUS, CRIMEA, ETC., with enlarged plans of Sevastopol and the Bosphorus. 1s.

Lately Published,

WILLET'S "SYNOPSIS PAPISMI." New Edition. Edited by the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. Ten vols. 8vo. Price £3.

London: JAMES MILLER, 17, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, and all Booksellers.

Just Published, Fcap. 8vo., Price 2s. 6d.

I.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION: Being Comments on First Corinthians, chapter xv. By the Rev. Robert Noble, A.M., Vicar of Athboy.

II.

Fcap. 8vo., cloth, price 1s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ELOCUTION: Compiled from "The Elements of Rhetoric, by Archbishop Whately." With considerable additions and alterations.

III.

New Edition, Fcap. 8vo., cloth, Price 2s. 6d.

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND,

Catechetically Explained, Compared with Scripture, and Briefly Commented upon, with the Date and Origin of each Collect annexed. For the use of Families and Sunday Schools.

By the Rev. Charles Miller, A.B.,

With Recommendatory Preface by the Bishop of Meath.

IV.

Fcap. 8vo., Neat Cover, Price 1s.

Cloth, 1s. 6d.; Cloth, Gilt Edges, 2s.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD: Showing how Irish people talk about Irish doings, when they get a quiet place, at the back of a ditch, or under a hedge.

V.

Royal 32mo., Price One Halfpenny each.

Stories about the Mission Work in Ireland.

I. The Bright side of a Dark Cloud.. II. Biddy Lacey. (The Series to be Continued.)

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

Just Published,

Third Edition, Price 1s. 6d.; or in full cloth, Price 2s. 6d

POOR PADDY'S CABIN; or, SLAVERY IN IRELAND. A true Representation of Facts and Characters. By an Irishman.

London: WERTHEIM and MACINTOSH. Dublin: WM. CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.

New Cheap Edition of the WAVERLEY NOVELS.

12mo. Fancy Boards, Price 1s. 6d. each.

This Series of the highly popular Works of Sir Walter Scott, is in preparation, and will be printed from a new, clear type; each Volume containing a complete Novel. The issue will commence on the First of June, with "WAVERLEY; or 'Tis sixty years since," and be continued in every alternate month.

Subscriber's names for the Series received by

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY, 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, Dublin.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

MAY, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Ɖlóir do Dhia añ pna háṙouiḃ, agur píoḃcáin air an ḃealaiṁ deaġċoil do na ḋáoiniḃ.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 30. JUNE, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 2s. 6d Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

PAGE.

Modern Worship in Rome—No. II.—St. Andrew Bobola . . 67
Decretal Epistles—No. V.—How Genuine Documents have been cooked and altered 68
The Variations and Revelations of Romanism—Faber's "All for Jesus" 69
The Invocation of Saints—No. I. 70
What is the Evidence on which Purgatory is believed? . . . 71
Toleration and flexibility of the Church of Rome 73

CORRESPONDENCE:

Mr. W. Rourke on Infallibility and the Rule of Faith . . 74
On Purgatory—by Mr. E. Power 75
Flowers for June 76
Farming Operations for June 77

MODERN WORSHIP IN ROME.—No. II.

SAINT ANDREW BOBÒLA.

On the 30th of October, 1853, the Metropolitan Cathedral of St. Peter's, at Rome, was the scene of a grand and imposing ceremonial. On that day, as we learn from the Tablet newspaper, of the 17th of December last, "upwards of six thousand tapers studded the vast surface of the apse of St. Peter's, like so many stars, or rather constellations; for multitudes of them, in that vast expanse, had the appearance of but single lights. The form which the illumination took, was that of a monstrance, or reliquary, the centre of which was reserved for a picture." There is, perhaps, no religious body of ancient or modern times which understands the art of producing a scenic effect, or exciting strong emotion amongst large masses of people, so well as the Church of Rome. The picture, of which the writer in the Tablet speaks, was kept judiciously concealed from public view, until a particular period of the ceremonial, doubtless for the purpose of stimulating the curiosity of the spectators, and adding to the interest of the scene. At length, the covering of the picture was suddenly withdrawn; and, in an instant, we are told, "the vast assemblage, who assisted at the ceremonial, were on their knees. At the same moment, a double choir pealed forth the 'Te Deum,' which was accompanied by a discharge of cannon from the neighbouring fortress of St. Angelo." One circumstance alone was wanting to crown the events of the day, and to stamp upon them the solemn sanction and approval of Romish infallible authority—namely, the presence of Pope Pius IX. But this defect was but momentary; for the writer in the Tablet takes care to inform us, that "in the afternoon there entered the Church the Holy Father, accompanied by his cardinals and chamberlains, to pray before the picture."

But what was the cause of all this state and ceremony? Whom, or what, did the picture represent? Whence arose the necessity for this vast expenditure of wax-light and gunpowder? The Russians we know, sang a "Te Deum" after blowing up the Turkish ships at Sinope; but to ordinary people, the admixture of double choirs and "brazen-mouthed" cannons (as they are called by the Tablet) appears somewhat incongruous. In the ancient, pure, and apostolic times, we know that St. Paul was very anxious that "all things should be done decently and according to order" (1 Cor. xiv. 40); but we think that, had he seen the six thousand tapers, and heard the roar of the cannons, he would have rubbed his eyes and said—"Is this the 'reasonable service' which I enjoined eighteen centuries ago, in my Epistle to the Church of Rome?"

We fear our readers would be a long time in guessing the cause of all the strange demonstrations to which we have alluded; and we do not like to keep them any longer in suspense. Be it known then, that on the day aforesaid, according to the Tablet, "a new member was added to the celestial company—a new patron, friend, and intercessor was given to the Church on earth." In short, the ceremony in question was "the Beatification of Saint Andrew Bobòla."

But here a new difficulty starts up. Some of our readers, who are innocent of any deep acquaintance with the mysteries of the Romish martyrology, may be tempted, in their ignorant simplicity, to ask, What is a Beatification? On this point, it must be confessed that the writer in the Tablet does not speak with the accuracy and precision that might be desired. He tells us, indeed, that the Beatification of a Saint is "the climax of an anxious process, and the beginning of a new devotion;" but he leaves us altogether in the dark upon the nature or origin of this "anxious process;" nor does he condescend to inform us why the devotion to be offerred to a newly-made saint should be ushered in with thousands of wax-lights, and the roar of the cannon of St. Angelo.

For ourselves, we will candidly confess, that when we were informed, on such unquestionable authority, that a Beatification was "the climax of an anxious process," we felt a lively interest to learn something more upon a subject so strange and mysterious. The writer in the Tablet tells us that he was an eye-witness of the whole proceeding; and, therefore, we expected some clear and accurate information from such a trustworthy source; but, as we went on, our expectations were sadly disappointed. "The ceremonial of a Beatification," he writes, "is as Impressive as it is simple and natural. It just embodies one's scattered ideas of what it ought to be." What the ceremonial ought to be, however, this writer does not think fit to tell us. It appears to have embodied his own "scattered ideas;" and, indeed, we do not wonder that the noise of the cannon and the glare of the wax-lights should have scattered the ideas of most of the spectators. Whether such accompaniments can be properly described as "simple and natural" in a solemn religious ceremony, is more than we will take upon ourselves to affirm, although we are willing to admit, upon the testimony of the Tablet, that this appears to be the modern fashion of performing sacred ceremonies in Rome.

Leaving, therefore, the writer, whose remarks we have quoted, to collect his "scattered thoughts" as he best can, we proceed to give our readers all the information within our reach, with regard to the new saint, Andrew Bobòla, accompanied by a few remarks on the origin of saintly beatification, and the objections to which such a practice is liable.

After a careful examination, we cannot discover any trace of the canonization of saints until the beginning of the ninth century. Eight hundred years ran their ample round, and left the Christian Church ignorant of the imposing ceremonial which now stamps the impress of Papal infallible authority upon the supposed intercessory powers of a new saint. "It is not certain," says the Roman Catholic writer, Ferraris, "who was the first Pope who canonized saints. Many hold that the first canonization, solemnly celebrated, was by Leo. III., in the year 804."* The Church of Rome claims to be immutable, as well as infallible; but how far the introduction of a new and solemn act of saintly canonization, which, according to her own authors, was unknown for eight hundred years, is consistent with such claims, we leave our impartial Roman Catholic readers to determine.

Let us now come to Father Bobòla. From the account in the Tablet, he appears to have been a Polish Jesuit, who fell a victim to the fury of some members of the Greek Church, in 1657. The object of his murderers was to wring from him a renunciation, not of Christianity, but "of the Holy See." Failing in this attempt, they put him to death, with circumstances of great cruelty.

It is far from our wish or intention to cast the slightest disrespect on the memory of any person who lays down his life in defence of what he conceives, however erroneously, to be an essential doctrine of the Christian faith. We know, however, that false religions have had their martyrs, as well as Christianity; and, unless we are prepared to pass a verdict of indiscriminate eulogy upon the Hindoo or Mahomedan, as well as the Christian martyr, we must consider the truth of the doctrine for which the supposed martyr lays down his life. This is the only test which can be applied to such cases, if we wish to arrive at a sound and impartial conclusion.

Now, even according to the account of the Tablet, Bobòla was not asked to deny any of the essential tenets of the Christian faith. He died, it would appear, in defence of the honour of the See of Rome. This may be a very natural reason why the Pope and cardinals should now be anxious to confer upon his memory all the honour in their power to bestow; but it is no reason whatsoever why Christians, all over the world, should be called upon to address their prayers to this new-found mediator. The honour of any See is closely connected with the character of the individual who occupies it; and, if we remember right, the name of the Pope, in 1657, was Alexander VII., an arbitrary and overbearing pontiff, of the stamp of Hildebrand. Had the Pope been Alexander VI., would Bobòla have deserved credit for defending the honour of a See filled by such a monster of iniquity?

But when we examine more closely into the account given of the death of Bobòla, it would appear that no small share of doubt rests on the whole transaction. We are informed by the Tablet that a few years ago an honest Dominican friar was sent by the Pope into Poland, to pick up what stray facts he could learn with regard to the history of the so-called martyr. He must have been a bold man to have ventured into the jaws of the ferocious Emperor Nicholas, in defence of the character of a democratic Polish saint. He did not escape unpunished, however, for the Emperor sent him into exile for life. We hope, that when the proper time arrives, the worthy Dominican father will himself receive the honours of canonization, which he was the means of procuring for Andrew Bobòla.

Nothing daunted by the dangers before him, the Dominican set to work vigorously, in the execution of the task assigned to him, and took down the depositions of two hundred witnesses, on which the Beatification was to be founded. But what was the result of his researches? Let us hear the frank confession of the writer in the Tablet. "No cause ever triumphed over greater obstacles. It was all that the most anxious search could do, to scrape together the requisite materials." This, then, is the kind of evidence, collected from hearsay, after the lapse of a couple of centuries, on the authority of which the Pope and Church of Rome now think fit to add a new saint to the long muster-roll of canonized intercessors!

Let us test the value of such evidence, by an example from ordinary life. Suppose that the Pope and cardinals were to take it into their heads to make a saint of Shakspeare (we shall presently see that worse saints have been prayed to), and that they decided on sending a Dominican friar to Stratford-on-Avon, to take the depositions of two hundred witnesses, respecting the chief events of the life of that illustrious author—we ask, what would such evidence be worth? Yet the only difference in the two cases is, that Shakspeare lived in the beginning, and Bobòla in the middle, of the seventeenth century.

A popular manual of Roman Catholic devotion is now open before us; and in reading over the long list of saints to which prayers are directed to be offered, we are irresistibly reminded of the complaint which the heathen writer, Lucian, in the second century, puts into the mouth of one of the pagan deities, respecting the vast increase in the number of gods and goddesses in his time. "A great number of foreigners," saith he, "as well Greeks as barbarians, who, without being in any wise qualified for our civic privileges, have found means clandestinely to get themselves enrolled in our register-book, and to arrogate to themselves the divine dignity, have so crowded heaven, that we are overstocked with a tumultuous rabble of people, collected from all quarters, of every nation, language, and tongue. And these intruders have insolently presumed to shove out the ancient and true deities from the first seats, and to seat themselves, contrary to all propriety and ancient usage, in their places, and claim precedency of adoration on the earth."† When a simple-minded Roman Catholic is directed to address his prayers to Saint Fabian, Saint Pantaleon, Saint Hermenegildus, Saint Apollonia, Saint Anastasia, Saint Scholastica, in what respect is he much the wiser, than if he were told to pray to the man in the moon? And yet, the saints we have mentioned are by no means the most obscure in the voluminous records of the lives of the saints.

In the seventeenth century, the number of Roman Catholic saints was estimated, by one of their own authors, at between forty and fifty thousand.† How many of these saints are genuine, and how many fictitious, we have, of course, no means of determining. That some of these so-called saints never existed at all, can be proved from the testimony of Roman Catholic writers; we content ourselves, for the present, with the following extract from the eminent Romish ritualist, Cassander—"There is," saith he, "another error, not uncommon; that neglecting, in a manner, the ancient and known saints, the common people worship more ardently and diligently the new and unknown [is not this the very complaint that Lucian makes?], of whose holiness we have but little assurance; and some of whom are known to us only by revelation, insomuch that of several of them it is justly doubted, whether ever there were any such persons in the world."* Those of our readers who remember the remarks which we made in our last number, on the history of St. Philomena, will readily perceive that the censures of the learned Cassander are just as applicable in the nineteenth century as they were in the sixteenth.

* Non certo constat, quisnam fuerit primus Summus Pontifex, qui solemniter Canonizationem Sanctorum celebraverit. Nam multi tenent, quod prima Canonizatio solemniter celebrata fuerit a Leone III., A.D. 804.—Ferraris Bibl. Prompt. Veneratio Sanctorum, Tom. vii., § 19, p. 269. Bonon., 1758.

† Vide Lucian Opera. Tom iii., page 536. Amstel, 1743.

† Vide Calendarium Benedictinum, ad Dec. 26, apud Gibbon, vol iii., p. 219. London, 1788. See also the testimony of Dr. Jackson—"The order of St. Bennet (as may appear by a begging brief sent some few years out of Spain here into England by the provincial or general of that order) doth brag of fifty thousand saints, all Bennet's disciples." Jackson's works, vol. i., p. 235. London, 1673.

But even granting that any supposed saint was a real man or woman, and not a fabulous myth, every earnest, honest-minded Roman Catholic, who is anxious that his prayers should not go astray, may naturally expect some answer to the further question—what assurance have we that this canonized mortal really is a saint? Is it not possible that very awkward mistakes may occasionally happen? May not a Roman Catholic congregation address their prayers to a saint, as if he were in heaven, who, in reality, occupies a very different place in the world of spirits?

It is obvious that this uncertainty, if it be not removed, must considerably impair the zeal of all rational worshippers. We are sorry that we can promise our Roman Catholic readers no help in this difficulty. We once read a story of a certain individual who was about to pray to St. Cuthbert, when he suddenly bethought himself that, perhaps, St. Cuthbert was no true saint. This doubt sorely perplexed his mind for a while; and, at length, he settled the matter by offering up his prayer hypothetically—"O Saint Cuthbert, if thou be a saint, pray for me" (si sanctus sis, ora pro me). Ferraris, indeed, tells us that many choice doctors hold that it is an article of faith that a Pope cannot err in the canonization of saints.† But it is obvious, from the way in which he makes this statement, that many other choice doctors think differently; and thus it is quite clear that, in this so-called infallible Church, there is no certainty to be had in a matter of such daily practical importance.

When Cardinal Bellarmine was once asked how it happened that there were so few cardinals in the catalogue of saints (santi), he wittily replied, "perche vogliono esser santissimi"—i.e., "because they wish to be most holy."‡ The elegance of the repartee can only be appreciated by an Italian scholar; but the meaning is, that the desire of being Popes (that is, of bearing the title of Most Holy Father) prevents the cardinals (out of whom alone the Popes can be elected) from aiming at true holiness. The remark of Bellarmine contained a severe satire upon the low intrigues and disgraceful cabals which the cardinals employed in order to be made Popes. But Bellarmine's uncle, Pope Marcellus II., went a good deal farther than this; for he is said to have remarked one day, as he sat at table, "I do not see how those who sit in St. Peter's chair, can be saved."§ Matters, it is to be hoped, have mended since the time of Pope Marcellus II.; but it does not seem very likely, to say the least of it, that these men who, according to the opinion of one of their own members, are almost past the hope of salvation, can possess a very critical power of discriminating the merits or demerits of a candidate for the honours of canonization.

The danger we are considering is by no means an imaginary one. We have the authority of Bellarmine himself that very unpleasant accidents have sometimes occurred in this very matter of saint-worship. He tells us, on the testimony of Sulpicius, of the following remarkable occurrence which happened to St. Martin:—This latter individual had long entertained strong doubts of the propriety of the devotions offered by the people in his neighbourhood to a supposed saint. One day, when St. Martin was at his prayers, the ghost of this personage appeared to him, and frankly confessed "that he was a damned spirit; that when alive, he had been a robber, and that he had suffered death for his crimes by the hand of the public executioner."‖ Nor was this a solitary instance; for Bellarmine goes on to tell us that a similar occurrence happened in the time of Pope Alexander III. We by no means pledge ourselves to the truth of these stories; but we should like to know can the Church of Rome give any proof, beyond her own bare word, that all the fifty thousand saints, now on her catalogue, are really in heaven?

But, lastly, supposing that Saint Andrew Bobòla, and his brethren, are actually where the Church of Rome says they are, the most important question of all arises, can they really hear the prayers that are offered up to them? If they do not, then the prayers might just as well be addressed to Jupiter, or Hercules, or any other of the fabulous gods of antiquity. The Church of Rome, indeed, says, that the saints hear the prayers of mankind, and the Council of Trent, as usual, pronounces a sweeping curse on all who presume to assert the contrary: but the point is, can the Church of Rome prove what she says? Can she adduce any Scripture command or authority for her doctrine? Alas! nothing of the kind. How, then, do Romish divines get over this difficulty? By a very ingenious theory, which would be amusing, if the subject were not of such awful and momentous importance. Their theory is this. Some devout Roman Catholic, Paddy Murphy for instance, addresses a prayer to Saint Lawrence O'Toole for some blessing that he wants. Saint Lawrence cannot hear a word of the prayer; but, in some time after (how long, the Romish doctors do not state), God informs the saint, that Paddy Murphy has been praying to him; and tells him, at the same time, the substance of the prayer. And thereupon Saint Lawrence intercedes with God on behalf of Paddy Murphy. Such is, without any exaggeration, the theory of Bishop Milner, and other eminent Roman Catholic writers upon this question.* We do not presume to set bounds to the omnipotence of God; but, at the same time, we can have no reason for believing that God will exert his power, unless He has told us that he will do so; much less ought we to make a bare possibility the groundwork of our prayers.

That sinful man cannot draw near to a pure and holy God, without the intervention of a mediator, is a doctrine in which Protestants and Roman Catholics, the Church of England and the Church of Rome, are fully and cordially agreed. But when the question arises, who this mediator is, then our differences begin. The Church of England takes her stand on the inspired authority of St. Paul, "There is one God, and one Mediator of God and man—the man Christ Jesus."—1 Tim. ii. 5. The Church of Rome, without any authority from Scripture, has interposed angels, saints, and the Virgin Mary, between man and God. Now, if a man had to cross a broad and rapid river, we ask our readers, would it be wiser for him to make use of one solid stone bridge, which has stood for hundreds of years, or to trust himself to the frail and insecure support of thousands of reeds and rushes?

Is there any blessing which a Roman Catholic hopes to receive from saintly intercession, which the Lord Jesus Christ has not promised to give to those who come to Him? Has he not said in the Gospel, "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, that will I do?"—John xiv. 13. Do we distrust the love and compassion of the Lord Jesus? But are we not bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh?—Ephes. v. 30. Has not St. Paul assured us, as if for the very purpose of removing all such doubts, "We have not an High Priest, who cannot have compassion on our infirmities, but one tempted in all things like as we are, without sin. Let us go, therefore, with confidence to the throne of grace."—Heb. iv. 15.

If we dare not say, in the face of such plain testimonies of Scripture, that any saint in heaven can prevail when Christ alone cannot; if we would be ashamed to own that we think any one can love us more dearly than He who gave himself for us, and redeemed us with His own most precious blood; we ask again, what profit is it, that leaving this fountain of living water, we should run to the broken cisterns of the merits and intercession of our fellow-creatures, which can hold no water?

We invite our Roman Catholic readers seriously to ask themselves, what notions they have of God, or what is their idea of prayer? Must they not acknowledge, if they think on the subject at all, that prayer is a solemn outpouring of the heart to a superior being, from whose hand we expect the highest blessings; and whatever being is so addressed in prayer by any man, is, practically speaking, that man's god. It is useless to invent refined distinctions on this question. If a man had a hundred hearts, indeed, he might, perhaps, bestow one upon God, another on the Virgin Mary, and so on; but this is not the case. Each man has but one heart, the whole of which God claims for himself. "My son, give me thine heart," is the solemn demand of Holy Scripture—Prov. xxiii. 26. The best and highest affections of man's nature are all too poor for our heavenly Father; but whoever bestows a portion of his religious worship upon any created being whatever, be it saint or angel, or the Blessed Virgin, robs God of that honour which is due to him alone. "Offer to God the sacrifice of praise, and pay thy vows to the most high, and call upon ME in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify me."—Ps. xlix. 14, 15. In the face of such a solemn command as this, it is at our own deep and awful peril, if we venture to address our prayers to any created being whatever.

Our remarks on this deeply-interesting subject have already, we fear, run on to an undue length; but as we are anxious to show that the views we have stated are no novelties, but that they were held by the Church from the earliest times, we beg to refer our readers to a distinct article, in our present number, on the Invocation of Saints.

---

* Est et hic error haud infrequens, quòd veteribus et compertis sanctis propemodum neglectis, novos et incognitos vulgus hominum ardentius et impensius colat, de quorum sanctitate obscurius constat, et nonnulli per revelationes tantùm innotuerunt, atque adeò de quibusdam an unquam in rerum naturâ fuerint, meritò dubitetur.—Cassander, Consult, p. 971. Paris, 1616.

† "Hinc plurimi classici Doctores tenent quod sit de fide, quod Papa non possit errare non solum in canonizatione, sed etiam in beatificatione."—Ferraris ut supra, § 15.

‡ Vide Bayle's Dictionary, vol. iii., p. 171. London, 1735.

§ "Non video quomodo qui locum hunc altissimum tenent salvari possunt."—Onuphrius, in Marcello II., apud Ancillon, Mélange Critique de Literature, tom. i., p. 329. Bayle ut supra.

‖ Orante Martino, apparuit anima ejus qui ibi celebrabatur, et confessa est, se animam damnatam esse latronis cujusdam, qui pro suis sceleribus extremi supplicii pœnas luerat."—Bellarm. de Sanct. Beatit., lib. i., c. vii., tom. ii., p. 284. Col. Ag., 1615.

* God is able to reveal to the saints the prayers of Christians who address them here on earth."—End of Controversy, p. 337, London, 1842.

DECRETAL EPISTLES.—No. V.

SHOWING HOW GENUINE DOCUMENTS HAVE BEEN COOKED AND ALTERED.

In our late numbers, we have shown what multitudes of forged epistles have been imposed upon the world, under the names of ancient Popes, and vouched for as true by Popes in after ages. We showed also the ruling object of all those forgeries—to establish the antiquity of the supremacy of Rome.

We propose, now, to show, very briefly, another and a more dangerous kind of deception which has been practised on the world, from the same source, and for the same purpose—viz., the manner in which genuine documents of antiquity have been altered and "cooked," to serve the purposes of the forgers.

Every one who knows the history of railway accounts, in the present days, knows what "cooking" means. It consists in putting into genuine documents and accounts various items which are false; and putting them in in such a way that the generality of men cannot distinguish which are false and which true; so that, seeing the greater part true, they are gulled into believing that the whole is true; by which wicked practices multitudes of persons have been ruined. This is the way that the genuine documents of antiquity have been dealt with by the Church of Rome for her own purposes. We call this more dangerous than forging whole documents, and whole bundles of documents; for this reason:—Few men are capable of forging a whole document, from end to end, so that it shall escape detection. Something always creeps in which enables an acute examiner to detect the forgery. But it is very much easier, in copying out an ancient document, to put in some title, or sentence, or phrase, which serves a forger's purpose as well, and yet gives no such handle for detection of the fraud.

Every one knows that the oldest copies we now have in the world of ancient writings, are generally but copies made in the ninth century (that fruitful age of forgery) of the original writings themselves. Many of these copies were made in the Pope's own library, or in those monasteries and churches in which the art of forgery was then so extensively cultivated.

Of course those who forged whole documents, would not scruple to alter true and genuine documents (when they were copying them) to serve the same purpose of forgery. There are now in the world very few documents written before the ninth century, excepting ancient copies of the Scriptures; of most other writings we have only copies made in that great age of forgery.

All scholars who have studied these documents know that the copies we now have are full of alterations and passages put into them by dishonest copiers, which it is now most difficult and often impossible to detect.

Our business is to show some instances of this; and to show the purpose for which it was done; and to put men on their guard against supposing that everything they meet with in a copy, made in the ninth century, of an ancient writing, must needs be true and genuine.

Here is our first instance:—In the fourth general council—the Council of Chalcedon—held in the year 451, a famous case was tried and decided. An Archbishop of Alexandria, named Dioscorus, one of the chief patriarchs of the Church at that time, was accused of heresy, and was condemned and deprived of his archbishopric; Pope Leo I. being one of his accusers.

Among the epistles of Pope Leo I., we find a letter, professing to have been written by Pope Leo to the bishops of France, after this trial took place; to which epistle is subjoined a copy of the sentence on Dioscorus,* sent to those bishops by that Pope for their information. This letter and sentence is given by Pithœus, from a copy which he got in the Abbey of Corbey, in France, a place rather noted for the manufactory of forgeries for advancing the interests of the Church of Rome.†

Now, it happens that we have also a copy of this same sentence in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon itself; and it is very interesting to compare that sentence, which we find in the acts of the council, with that copy which Pope Leo I. is said to have sent to the bishops of France.

There are important differences between them.

In the sentence as it stands in the acts of the council, Dioscorus is described as ανθενησας, or, as it is translated in Labbe and Cossart, "præsumens sibi primatum;"—that is, claiming primacy to himself; which words are omitted in Pope Leo's copy of the sentence.

Again, in this sentence against Dioscorus, as it stands in the acts of the council, we find this laid to the charge of Dioscorus, that "he also ventured to pronounce an excommunication against the most holy and most blessed Leo, Archbishop of great Rome."‡

Now, in the copy of the sentence which Pope Leo I. is said to have sent to the bishops of France, there is not one word of all this; nothing there to show that Dioscorus, of Alexandria, claimed primacy for himself; nothing

---

* Labbe and Coss., vol. iii., p. 1,418, ep. 94.

† Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 424.

‡ στολμησε δε και ακοινωνησιαν επαγορευσαι κατα τον αγιωτατου και οσιωτατου Αρχιεπισκοπου της μεγαλης Ρωμης Λεοντος.

Præsumpsit enim at excommunicationem dictare adversus sanctissimum et beatissimum archiepiscopum magnæ Romæ Leonem.—Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 425.

there to show that Dioscorus pronounced a sentence of excommunication against Pope Leo.

We will show further on, that the copy, in the acts of the councils, is the true and genuine one. We ask now, what was the motive for omitting in the copy, which Pope Leo is said to have sent to France, all mention of these things?

The reason is plain. The Pope of Rome now claims the primacy over the whole Church; and it is awkward to let it appear that, in claiming this primacy, the Pope of Rome is only doing what the worst and most vicious of the archbishops of the other patriarchal sees did also. So the well-skilled forger, who made the copy, struck that out, because it looked ill. Again, the Pope now claims power to excommunicate all other bishops and archbishops, but no archbishop is to have power to excommunicate the Pope; but in this sentence it does appear that Dioscorus, of Alexandria, did excommunicate the Pope. In fact, this was a common thing in the ancient Church; if two worldly-minded and ill-tempered bishops quarrelled, they excommunicated each other; and it made no manner of difference in this proceeding, if one of them was Bishop of Rome. But in after ages it was thought a very ugly thing, to let it be seen, that in ancient times other bishops did take as much liberty in excommunicating the Pope, as the Pope took in excommunicating them; and it was a very ugly thing, if the Pope's claim to supremacy be true. So, of course, the fact that Dioscorus excommunicated the Pope was to be cut out of the sentence passed on him; so the forger who made the copy cut it out accordingly.

But if you cut something out of a sentence, it is only fair to put something else in, to make up the difference. The forger felt this, and he acted accordingly; for in that "cooked" copy we find things that are not in the original sentence, in the acts of the council. In the copy of Pope Leo we find the Pope declared to be "the head of the Universal Church," and the "door keeper of the kingdom of heaven;"* of which things there is not one word in the genuine copy of the sentence in the acts of the council.

But, now, our readers may ask us, how do we know which copy of this sentence on Dioscorus, of Alexandria, is the true and genuine one? How do we know that the copy, which Pope Leo I. sent to France, is not really the true one?

We are prepared to answer this question. Pope Nicolas I., who lived in the ninth century, in his 8th epistle (which we have so often quoted before) quotes that sentence passed on Dioscorus; and he quotes from it the very words which are not in the copy sent by Pope Leo I. to France. "He pronounced an excommunication against the holy Pope Leo."† And Pope Adrian, who succeeded Nicolas in that ninth century, in his letter to Ignatius, Patriarch of Constantinople, quotes the same thing from that sentence in the very same words in which it is now found in the Latin translation of the sentence, as it stands in the acts of the council. "He also presumed to pronounce an excommunication against the most holy and blessed Leo, Archbishop of great Rome."‡

So it is past all question that the sentence as it stands, in the acts of the council, with the mention of this excommunication in it, is the true and genuine sentence passed on Dioscorus, who, it is clear, did excommunicate Pope Leo, and, therefore, the copy of this sentence, which Pope Leo I. is said to have sent the bishops of France, is a false copy, altered by some forger. It is falsified in leaving out the mention of this excommunication, and it is falsified also in bringing in the Pope as the head of the Universal Church, and the doorkeeper of the kingdom of heaven.

Who falsified and "cooked" that copy? Was it Pope Leo I. in the fifth century? We do not think it was. It is true, the Popes took to forging very early. Pope Zozimus, and Pope Boniface, and Pope Celestine, in the beginning of the fifth century, were all concerned in a forgery plot. But many of the early Popes were free from such wicked practices; and none, perhaps, was less likely to be guilty of such a thing than Pope Leo I. It is clear that the copy of the sentence which Pope Nicolas and Pope Adrian had at Rome, in the ninth century, was the true one, having all about the excommunication in it; and, therefore, it is plain that Pope Leo had not cut the excommunication out of the copy belonging to the popes at Rome. What then are we to think of that copy which Pope Leo I. is said to have sent to the bishops of France, which has not the excommunication in it? Why, simply this, that since the ninth century, some one has made free with the epistles of Pope Leo, and "cooked" them. Some one who copied out Pope Leo's epistles since, the ninth century, has cut out all about the excommunication, and put in all about the Pope being head of the Universal Church. This is a great fact to know, for it is one which throws light on a great many other facts of the same kind. When we read other epistles of Pope Leo, and find in them other mentions of the Pope being the head of the Church, we are to remember that we have not the actual letters which Pope Leo wrote; we have only copies which some one else made of those letters, 400 or 500 years after Pope Leo was dead; and we have proof above, that the person who made those copies had a trick of sticking into Pope Leo's letters, that the Pope was head of the Church, when Pope Leo himself, had written no such thing; and, therefore, whenever we find any such thing in Pope Leo's letters as we now have them, it is but a piece of ordinary prudence to suspect that it was the forger who put that in, and not Pope Leo. And this is what every one should keep in mind who reads the writings of the early Popes, as we now have them. All these writings have come to us through the hands of unscrupulous forgers; all the oldest copies that we have of those writings, were made in ages when forgery was thought to be good service to God; and we must read and examine them with due caution accordingly.

Now for another letter of the same Pope Leo (19th Labbe and Coss. vol. iv., p. 38.), written to the Emperor Theodosius. We have two copies of this letter also, the second being at page 43. By a happy mistake, these two copies were formerly mistaken for two different letters; and, therefore, both have been preserved, so that we can compare them. But they are clearly two different copies of the same letter, as Labbe and Cossart admit;* and the latter, they say, does not agree with itself, so we take it to be the cooked one: the first and genuine one begins thus:—"From the letters of your excellency, which long since you sent to the See of the blessed Apostle Peter, for your love of the Catholic faith, we have received so great confidence that truth and peace will be defended by you. . ."†

Now, mark how the forger transformed this in the other copy:—"In councils celebrated formerly and from the beginning, we have received such confidence from the blessed Peter, chief of the Apostles, that we have authority for defending the truth by our peace. . . . ."‡

Observe that in the genuine letter the Pope, derives his confidence from the emperor, and it is the emperor who defends the truth. This was a most common and usual way for the early Popes to write to the emperors, of which we have many instances in their genuine letters; but this would not serve the forger; so he altered it to say, that the Pope derived his authority from Peter, the prince of Apostles, and that the Pope was the defender of the truth.

It is worth observing that this forged passage, beginning "olim et ab initio," was a favourite one with the forgers. We meet it in several of the forged decretal epistles; and we have now good reason to suspect it when we meet it in Popes' epistles, which have hitherto passed for pure and uncorrupted.

But it is not only Popes' epistles that have been thus cooked. General councils have been treated in the same way. Cardinal Baronius and Binius have put into the General Council of Chalcedon a whole act about Domnus, a deprived bishop, all of which is forged. This act is not found in the original Greek copies; and it provides for the maintainance of this Domnus, whereas the 5th general council has actually put it on record that this Domnus was dead years before that Council of Chalcedon was held! Where did they get this act? They got it where plenty of such things have been got. "This act is written in an old Latin copy in the Vatican." Such old copies have been fitly called "true Gibeonites, who come to impose on us with mouldy bread and tattered shoes."

In like manner have the canons of the great Council of Nice, which all true Christians reverence, been forged and corrupted at Rome. This we may return to some other time.

We have said enough to put our readers on their guard, about authorities produced in favour of Rome from these ancient writings. But nothing we can say in so short a compass can give any idea of the vast extent to which this system of corrupting and "cooking" the genuine writings of antiquity has been carried; or of the necessity which yet exists for the learned directing their attention to this. Forged writings have, to a great extent, been detected; though even here something certainly remains to be done. But in detecting the forged passages which have been inserted into genuine writings, comparatively little has yet been done. This task, indeed, can never be perfectly performed; but each additional step that can be made in it, puts us more upon our guard against being deceived by such wicked arts.

We have ourselves spent much time and labour in this examination; and we have reason to believe that we shall be able to show, that all the passages in favour of the Pope's supremacy, which are found in even those epistles of the early Popes, which yet pass for genuine, were either put therein by the forgers, or stand in so great suspicion of having been so put there, that no reasonable man can put any confidence in them. What we have thus collected is too long for a journal like ours; but if these papers should come to be published in a separate form, the proof of what we now say may be given to the world.

Again we call on our readers to remember the prophetic words of St. Clement in his genuine epistle, "Search into the Holy Scriptures, which are the true words of the Holy Ghost; ye know that there is nothing wicked or forged written in them."

* Sanctus ac Beatissimus papa caput universalis Ecclesiæ Leo. . . ecclesiæ regni janitor nuncupatur.—Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 1,419.

† Excommunicationem in sanctum Leonem papam dictavit.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 308.

‡ Præsumpsit enim et excommunicationem dictare adversus sanctissimum et beatissimum magnæ Romæ Leonem.—Labbe and Coss., vol. viii., p. 1,014.

* Marginal note, p. 43, Labbe and Coss., vol. iv.

† Literis Clementiæ vestræ, quas dudum ad beati Petri Apostoli sedem pro Catholicæ fidei amore misistis, tantam fiduciam sumpsimus defendendæ per vos veritatis et pacis. . . . Labbe and Coss., vol. iv., p. 38.

‡ Olim et ab initio in concilis celebratis tantam nos percipimus a beatissimo Petro Apostolorum principe fiduciam, ut auctoritatem habeamus ad veritatem pro nostra pace defendendam. . . . —Labbe and Coss., vol iv., p. 43.

THE VARIATIONS OF ROMANISM.

It is a favourite boast of Roman Catholic controversial writers, that their Church is "one and unchangeable," and they are fond of contrasting the immutability of her doctrine with the variations which they say have taken place in the opinions of rival communions. It becomes, then, an important question to ask, are there grounds for this boast? Is it a fact that the Church of Rome has never varied in her doctrines or teaching?

In the first article of our last number, we took some pains to compare the doctrines of the Council of Trent with those taught by the Church of Rome in earlier times; and we there named several subjects with reference to which it can be proved that a marked change has taken place in her teaching. We could easily add to the list there given, but we wish now to speak of the change that has taken place in Romish teaching since the Council of Trent; and which is steadily going on in our own day, and before our very eyes. Some of our Roman Catholic readers may be surprised at being told, not only that the doctrines of their Church have changed, but that they are still in process of changing; and people in general find it hard to understand that a change has taken place in the opinions of any body, if they do not hear of any violent schism in it. But the case is just like that of a man whom we are in the habit of meeting every day; his personal appearance seems the same one day as it did the day before, and we take no notice of any alteration; while yet, probably, another person, who should meet the same man after the absence of a few years, would at once be struck by a visible and marked change in his appearance. Now, we assert that, just in the same manner, there has been a progressive change—silent and gradual, but steady—in the doctrinal teaching of the Church of Rome; and that this change is going on now as steadily and as rapidly as ever. The Fathers of Trent taught and believed many things for which we can find no warrant, either in Scripture or in the writings of the early Fathers; but, then, again, there are many things taught and believed in the Church of Rome at present, for which there is just as little warrant in the Council of Trent. We are sure that any one who will take up any of the popular books of devotion in use among Roman Catholics, will find in them a number of statements of facts and doctrines for which it is just as hard to find any foundation in the teaching of the Council of Trent, as it is for the Tridentine doctors to find a foundation in Scripture for their decrees. Nor is the change which has taken place confined to single doctrines merely—such as that of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin; a doctrine which the Council of Trent did not venture to assert, but which is now generally believed by Roman Catholics. There is a far more fundamental difference—one touching the very question of the rule of faith. We assert, and hope to prove to the satisfaction of our readers, that there is not a greater difference on the subject of the rule of faith between the teaching of the Church of England and that of the Council of Trent, than there is between that of the Council of Trent and of modern Roman Catholic divines.

We have now lying before us the third edition of a Roman Catholic book of devotion, called "All for Jesus, or the Easy Ways of Divine Love," by the Very Rev. F. Faber, superior of the London Oratory. As this Mr. Faber was originally a member of the Church of England, it may, perhaps, be imagined that he may not be accurately acquainted with the doctrines of his new Church, and that the sentiments he expresses may not be fully in accordance with her teaching. We think it well, then, to begin by telling our readers how our attention was drawn to the book; and when we add, that it appears from the preface to this third edition that it has received the revision of one of the Roman Catholic bishops, no doubt can remain that it is in accordance with the belief of a large number, if not of the majority, of Roman Catholics of the present day.

It was in preparing another article for our present number, that we had occasion (see page 67) to refer to the Tablet, of last 17th December; and, in glancing through its columns, we chanced to meet with an article containing bitter complaints of the silence observed by Protestants with regard to Roman Catholic books of theology.

"The Oratorians write books of the most splendid genius, and commanding power; books, for instance, like Father Faber's 'All for Jesus,' of which two large editions were exhausted in one month; but not a hint is whispered of it in the Anglican journals. They dare not review it; dare not even allude to it. They do what they can; and try to ignore what all the world is telling about. A feeble sneer at oratorian devotions, in the Guardian, or English Churchman, is all the opposition they venture to make; because to say more would excite curiosity and be dangerous."

On reading the above, it struck us, that we had been as guilty as the Times, or the Guardian, or the English Churchman, in omitting to give our readers any account of the work of Father Faber, here alluded to; but the cause of our silence was certainly not want of courage to review the book, but (shall we confess it?) sheer ignorance of its existence. It was certainly shameful in us to be ignorant of what "all the world was talking about;" and, yet, we think "all the world" must bear some share of the blame for not having talked a little louder.

We have, then, accordingly, made ourselves acquainted with Father Faber's book, and have found in it a number of curious things, some of which we hope to lay before our readers hereafter. Any one who turns over its pages will find in it a number of statements of doctrines and facts, which would have been as new to the Fathers of Trent as they are to ourselves. But we must reserve to another occasion an examination of the particular facts and doctrines to which we allude; what we have at present to do with, is the authority on which they rest.

Any question as to particular doctrines, is subordinate to the grand question concerning the rule of faith; for any difference on this subject will be sure to give rise to differences respecting particular doctrines. Thus, most of the differences between the Church of England and the Church of Rome, take their rise in their differences as to the rule of faith. The Church of England and the Council of Trent agree in taking for their rule the Word of God, whether as communicated by our Lord himself to the Apostles, or as written by them under the dictation of the Holy Ghost. But they differ on the point where this Word of God is to be found. The Church of England asserts, that it is all contained in Scripture; the Council of Trent asserts, that the teaching of our Lord and his Apostles has been also handed down in the tradition of the Church. And so it is very natural that the Church of Rome should believe many things, which the Church of England does not believe; for the fundamental principle of the former is, that there are some parts of our Saviour's teaching handed down by tradition, which are not recorded in Scripture; and such things the Church of Rome is bound to believe, while the Church of England denies their existence.

But, now, Mr. Faber, and those Roman Catholics who agree with him, are not satisfied with the double rule of faith adopted by the Council of Trent. He teaches many doctrines, of which the Council of Trent makes no mention; and the reason is, that he not only takes for his rule of faith the Word of God, as communicated by our Lord to the Apostles, and handed down in the Church by Scripture or tradition, but he further receives, as having a right to govern his belief, revelations, asserted to be made by our Lord, to different individuals, from time to time. We copy, almost at random, a few specimens of the proofs Mr. Faber advances for his assertions; but there are scarcely half a dozen consecutive pages in the book which would not furnish us with quotations as much to our purpose.

"Our Lord told St. Gertrude, that as often as any one says to God—my love, or my sweetest, or my best beloved, and the like, with a devout intention, he receives a pledge of his salvation, in virtue of which, if he perseveres, he shall receive in heaven a special privilege of the same sort, as the special grace which St. John the Evangelist, the beloved disciple, had on earth."—Page 60.

"Our Lord said to St. Teresa, that one soul, not a saint, but seeking perfection, was more precious to him than thousands living common lives."—Page 117.

"St. Gertrude was divinely instructed, that as often as the angelic salutation is devoutly recited by the faithful on earth, three efficacious streamlets proceed from the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, most sweetly penetrating the Blessed Virgin's heart. Then, from her heart gain," &c.—Page 104.

"St. Matilda ventured to say to Jesus, 'Lord, if Gertrude's life is so perfect, how is it she cannot bear the defects of others, and exaggerates them so much?' Our Lord, with admirable sweetness, replied—'It is because she cannot bear the least stain on her own heart, that she feels so keenly the failings of her neighbours.'"—P. 323.

"Once more, let us listen to the testimony of God himself. [!] A holy man pressed God, in prayer, to reveal to him what it was in which His Divine Majesty took so much pleasure in His beloved Gertrude. God vouchsafed to reply," &c.—P. 323.

"On another occasion, when St. Gertrude was suffering one night from weakness, she ate some grapes, with the mental intention of refreshing our Lord in herself. He, on his part, took this as a royal gift, and said to her—In this I confess that you have recompensed me for the bitter potion which I, for your sake, took upon the cross; for now I suck unspeakable sweetness out of your heart; for with how much greater purity of intention you recreate your body for my glory, with so much the more sweetness do I acknowledge myself recreated in your soul."—P. 174.

"Among the revelations made to Sister Francesca, it was told her that immense numbers of souls issued from Purgatory on the evening of All Souls Day; and that they were mostly those who were near to glory among whom God distributed the suffrages of the Universal Church on that day."—P. 44.

"We find, from the revelations of St. Francesca, that among some hundreds of cases, by far the greater majority suffered [in Purgatory] thirty, forty, or sixty years. Here are some of the examples:—A holy bishop, for some negligence in his high office, had been in Purgatory fifty-nine years before he appeared to the servant of God; another bishop, so generous of his revenues that he was named the alms-giver, had been there five years, because he wished for the dignity; another bishop had been forty; a priest, forty years, because through his negligence some sick persons had died without the sacraments; another, forty-five years, for inconsiderateness in his ministerial duties; a gentleman, fifty-nine years, for worldliness; another, sixty-four, for fondness for playing at cards for money* ; another, thirty-five years, for worldliness. Bishops seem, upon the whole, according to her revelations, to remain longest there, and to be visited with the extreme of rigour."—P. 367.

At pp. 356, &c., there is a passage too long to extract, from which it appears that the true nature of the sufferings of Purgatory was first made known, by revelations, to St. Catherine of Genoa, in, we believe, the sixteenth century.

The quotations we have given, and which could be multiplied indefinitely, are enough to show that Mr. Faber is not content with the Council of Trent's double rule of faith; but that he regulates his belief by a triple standard—Scripture, and tradition, and modern revelations. These last, it will be perceived, he cites as decisive arguments; nay, calls on his readers to listen to them as the testimony of God himself. And it is certain that Mr. Faber is not singular in this, for most Roman Catholic books of devotion, not intended to be placed in Protestant hands, act in precisely the same manner. But, perhaps, it will be said, the belief in these revelations is optional; the Church has not decided; and one may be a loyal member of the Roman Catholic Church, and yet refuse to give credence to the dreams of Francesca or of Gertrude. But this is not a subject on which the Church of Rome can, with any consistency, allow of a difference of opinion among her members. Her controversialists correctly remind us that it is the prime duty of every Christian to give implicit assent to the Word of God, no matter by what channel made known to him. He must, of course, receive everything contained in Scripture; but if any part of the Divine teaching has been conveyed by tradition, he is equally bound to make himself acquainted with it, and to give his assent to it. And, just in like manner, if God has made any new revelations to St. Gertrude or St. Francesca, in the same manner as He did to St. John or St. Paul, it is no longer a matter of indifference whether Christians receive them or not; they are bound to receive them with precisely the same affection and reverence with which they receive the books of Scripture. The Church of Rome need be at no loss (if her pretensions be well founded) to distinguish true from false revelations: for what is the use of an infallible guide, if this guide is unable to distinguish the revelations of God from the doting of silly old women? When, then, we see some members of the Church of Rome rejecting such tales as we have quoted from Mr. Faber, and others governing their belief by them, it is manifest that that Church is only dissembling a schism, when she tolerates difference of opinion within her communion, on a question so momentous as that of the rule of faith. There is not a greater difference between the Church of England rule (Scripture alone) and the Tridentine rule (Scripture and tradition) than there is between this latter rule and the new Oxford rule—Scripture, and tradition, and modern revelations.

When once this new rule is adopted, there is an end of the boast that the Church of Rome is the old Church and teaches the old doctrines. Now, while the Church of England is simple enough to be satisfied with the old religion, such as Peter and Paul taught it, and their hearers received, the modern Church of Rome boasts of a religion, with the latest improvements, by Teresa, and Catherine, of Genoa; and, no doubt, still further additions may be expected to be made to their creed by further revelations, from time to time. We have said that all parties in the Church of Rome do not equally assent to the stories we are speaking of.† The party, however, who hold views so fatal to their Church's claims of unity of doctrine, has gained great predominance of late years, chiefly through the exertions of the Oxford converts to Romanism, who have almost all embraced the most extreme views in their new communion; and to whom it is owing that a great change has taken place in our time in the tone of doctrine held by Roman Catholics in these kingdoms. This may be accounted for by the manner in which these conversions were generally made. The persons alluded to had been principally influenced by the use of arguments borrowed from infidels, and had been brought to believe that if they used their reason and private judgment in religious matters, the inevitable result would be hopeless scepticism. Startled at such a result, they hastily threw themselves blindfold into the arms of the guide who promised to conduct them to truth; ready to receive, with indiscriminating credulity, all that this guide might be pleased to set before them; nay, persuaded that the greater their readiness to believe without or against evidence, the higher their faith. We are bound to believe these gentlemen, or, at least, the majority of them, to be sincere in their profession; and, yet, if there were any of them who remained infidels at heart, we can imagine no more subtle or more effectual way for leading others into infidelity than that which they have adopted; yielding equally ready assent to the miracles of Scripture, and the legends of mediæval saints; accepting with equal reverence the revelations made to Paul and John, and those made to St. Francesca or St. Catherine.

There was only one point which their faith hesitated to embrace. Some of them were acquainted with the writings of the primitive Fathers; accordingly, they said to their new spiritual guide, propound to us authoritatively any doctrine you please, and we are prepared to accept it; only you will do us a favour if you will not oblige us to assert that the primitive Church taught the same. We will submit if you insist on it; but we confess we find this a little too strong. Do us the favour of permitting us to call your doctrines a development* of primitive Christianity; if you will only grant this, ecclesiastical history will present no difficulties to us; it will be easy to believe that your doctrines resemble those of the early Church as much as an oak resembles an acorn, or a butterfly resembles a caterpillar.

The prayer was granted—the converts were admitted on their own terms; yet, we are sure many of the old Roman Catholic divines must see with consternation the revolution which their new allies are making in their theology. We notice, for example, that Professor Murray, of Maynooth, in the preface to the last volume of his Theological Essays, seems not a little discontented with the extreme views of his new converts, who suddenly became wiser than their teachers.

"I shall not be at all surprised to find myself denounced by certain doctors of the new theology as a heretic, for some expressions in the preceding paragraph; just as one of my learned colleagues (a professor of the old theology) was denounced as a Protestant, for saying, of Lord Jeffrey, in the 'Dublin Review,' for last July, that he was not only a great, but a good man. Now-a-days there are a few individuals who, with their heads hardly dry from the waters of baptism, come out with their frantic and infallible theories, and denounce every man as unsound in the faith who does not square his language to their consecrated standard of speech."—Vol. iv., page 9.

We pity poor Dr. Murray, for we greatly fear his lamentations are in vain; and that his "old theology" is in a fair way of being superseded by the "new theology" of his dangerous associates.

We call, then, on our Roman Catholic readers to make their choice between the old religion and the new. Will they be satisfied with the doctrine of the Council of Trent, that the Word of God was completed in the teaching of our Lord and his Apostles? Will they be content to believe as Peter and Paul taught, and as the early Church believed? or will they embrace the new Oxford Divinity, that the doctrine of the primitive Church requires to be developed; and that to the revelation of St. John, which closed the canon of Scripture, must be added the revelations of St. Francesca, St. Gertrude, and St. Catherine?

THE INVOCATION OF SAINTS.

THOUGH we have, from time to time, alluded to the important subject which stands at the head of this article, we believe we have not yet considered it fully in our pages, either in a theological or a historical point of view; both of which are, we think, well deserving of attention; forming, as this doctrine undoubtedly does, one of the most striking points of distinction between the two Churches of England and Rome.

We must begin by saying a word upon the true nature and limit of the controversy between them.

The real point at issue is not, whether it be right or wrong to honour or commemorate the saints; but whether Roman Catholics are right or wrong in invoking their aid in the solemn offices of prayer—which Protestants call saint-worship.

So far is it from being true that the Church of England disregards or dishonours the true saints of the primitive Church, that any one who will take the trouble to look through the Book of Common Prayer, according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, will find not only special offices (collects, lessons, epistles, and gospels) for St. Stephen, St. John the Evangelist, St. Andrew, St. Thomas, St. Matthias, St. Mark, St. Philip and St. James, St. John the Baptist, St. Peter, St. James the Apostle, St. Bartholomew, St. Matthew, St. Michael and all Angels, St. Luke, St. Simon and St. Jude, and the Conversion of St. Paul, but days actually set apart to commemorate the Annunciation, and also the Purification, of the Blessed Virgin Mary—enough, one would think, to refute the calumny, so often reiterated by Romish controversialists against Protestants, that they revile the Blessed Virgin, and treat her as an ordinary woman.

They will also find, if they examine the order for evening prayer, in the same book, that the "Magnificat," or

* Could this have been St. Vincent de Paul, who is recorded by his contemporaries to have been a very agreeable man, only that he cheated at cards?

† How little credence is given to such stories by the old Roman Catholics, appears from the quotation we have already made from Cassander (see page 68). He pronounces the existence of several popular saints uncertain, because they are known to us only by revelation! But if he thought these alleged revelations to be authentic, what greater certainty could he, or any one else, have than the Word of God himself?

* The following curious passage from Mr. Faber, p. 180, is a good illustration of the diversity of opinions, in the Church of Rome, and of the notion now prevalent, 'that the farther we come away from the Apostles' times the nearer we get to true Christianity. "In like manner, Schram, in his Mystical Theology, censures, as almost heretical, ejaculations which St. Francis, of Sales, quotes with tenderness and relish. Yet, in doctrinal matters, it may be safer for us to follow the colder and more cautious author. Besides he wrote later."

Song of the Virgin, taken from the 1st chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, is one of the appointed hymns directed to be read or sung immediately after the 1st lesson, in which it is expressly stated that "all generations shall call her blessed."

It is, therefore, obvious that the Church of England honours the Blessed Virgin and other undoubted saints of the primitive Church; and that the point of difference between her and the Church of Rome is, whether the latter does not err as to the kind of honour due to her and them.

The Church of Rome is not satisfied with giving honour to the saints, according to their dignity, but she suppliantly invokes their aid; and the question which remains is, what does this invocation mean or imply? and is it warranted by either Scripture, or reason, or the practice of that comparatively pure age of the Church, by which we have tried so many other peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome—the first three centuries?

The Council of Trent (sess. xxv., de Invoc.) expressly asserts that "it is good and useful suppliantly to invoke the saints, and to resort to their prayers, aid, and help, for obtaining benefits from God."*

Now, what does this invocation mean or imply? Mr. Keenan, whose controversial catechism we have before alluded to, asserts, roundly, that "(Roman) Catholics do not ask grace from the saints; they merely ask the saints to pray that God may grant them all necessary graces, through Christ." They say, when addressing God, "Have mercy on us; forgive our sins;" but, when addressing the Blessed Virgin, or the saints, "Pray for us." Whether this be practically true, we shall see presently; but we would first inquire, what invocation means?

"To invoke the saints suppliantly," as recommended or enjoined by the Council of Trent, is, in plain English, to call on the saints in our prayers, or to pray to them; and that prayer to any unseen being involves religious worship, we think will scarcely be controverted by the most zealous advocate of the Church of Rome. Whether the prayers be to them as intercessors merely, or as the direct dispensers of grace, assistance, and safety, or whether they amount to what the Church of Rome attempts to distinguish as Latria or not, without doubt such prayers are an act of religious worship, very different in kind from any mere honour, or petition offered to any fellow-creature on earth, however elevated in power or rank.

That the Fathers thought prayer a mode of addressing God alone, is proved by numberless passages in which they uniformly define it with express reference to God and no other.

Tertullian, A.D. 190, says in his apology for the Christians of his time—"Those things I may not pray for from any other, but from Him of whom I know I shall obtain them; because, both it is He who is alone able to give, and I am he unto whom it appertaineth to obtain that which is requested, being His servant, who observe Him alone."†

Clemens Alexandrinus, A.D. 200, defines prayer by its relation to God.

"Since there is but one good God, both we and angels pray to Him alone, that those good things may be given us which we want, and those continued which we have."‡

So Origen, A.D. 230, in his writings against Celsus, (who had said of the dæmons that they belong to God, and in that respect were to be prayed to, that they may be favourable to us), thus replies—"Away with Celsus's counsel, saying, that we must pray to dæmons; for we must pray to him who is God over all; and we must pray to the Word of God, his only begotten Son, and the first-born of all creatures; and we must entreat him, that he, as High Priest, would present our prayer to his God and our God."§

"Prayer," says St. Basil, A.D. 370, "is a request of some good thing, which is made by pious men unto God."‖

"Prayer," says Gregory Nyssen, A.D. 380, "is a conversing, or a conference with God."¶

"Prayer," says St. Chrysostom, A.D. 400, "Is a colloquy, or discourse with God."

"Prayer," says John Damascen, A.D. 780, "Is an ascension of the mind unto God, or a request of things that are fit from God."††

Now, as the Holy Scriptures assuredly do not teach us, any more than the early Fathers, to pray to saints, either as benefactors or intercessors, the next question is, what did the early Fathers think of invocation? did they distinguish it from prayer? and did they, or not, consider it a form of worship properly due to God only?

We need not here go back even so far as the third century, for the great St. Athanasius, in the fourth century, is conclusive on the matter. "We are," says he, "truly worshippers of God; because we invocate no one of the creatures, nor any mere man, but the Son, who is, by nature, from God, and true God; made man, indeed, yet not the less, therefore, the Lord himself, and God, and Saviour."*

So Novatian, a presbyter of the Roman Church, in the third century, argues that Christ is God, because he is everywhere invoked. "If Christ was only a man, how, when invocated, is he everywhere present; for omnipresence is the nature not of man, but of God?"†

So St. Ambrose, A.D. 390, in his funeral oration on the Emperor Theodosius, says—"Thou alone art to be invocated, O Lord; thou are to be requested to supply the want of him in his son."‡

Irenæus,§ A.D. 180, in his second book against heretics, says—"As the Church has freely received from the Lord, so does she freely minister; nor does she do anything by invocation of angels, nor by incantations, but purely and manifestly directs her prayers to God, who made all, and calls upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."

So Origen (cont. Cels. lib. v., p. 580, opera. Benedict. Ed. Paris, 1733) says—"All supplications, and prayer, and intercession, and thanksgiving, we must offer up to God, who is above all, through the living Word of God, who is a High Priest, superior to all angels. To invocate angels, indeed, when men know so little about them, were itself irrational; but, even on the supposition that we were ever so well acquainted with such mysterious wonders, still this very supposed knowledge, while it was setting forth their nature and their respective offices, would forbid us presumptuously to pray to any other than the all-sufficient Deity, through the Son of God our Saviour."

We shall merely add here the canon of the Council of Laodicea, A.D. 361, the decrees of which were received and approved of by the whole Church (cap. 35)—"That Christians ought not to forsake the Church of God, and depart aside and invocate angels; therefore, if any man be found using this secret idolatry, let him be accursed, because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ."‖

In the epitome of the canons which Pope Adrian delivered to Charles the Great, this decree is thus abridged—"Ut anathema sit, quicumque relicta ecclesia angelos colere, vel congregationes facere præsumpserit." "That whosoever, leaving the Church, did presume to worship angels, or to make meetings, should be accursed."

This condemnation of prayers to angels as idolatrous was occasioned by a sect of heretics in the fourth century, who, for the purpose of exercising this unlawful worship of praying to angels, held private meetings, separate from those of the Church, in which it was not permitted; and no one ever doubted that the Council would have equally condemned, on the same principle, prayers to saints, if such had been practised in their time.

In all these passages the essential identity of religious invocation and prayer is clearly implied; and it clearly never entered into the conception of any of these ancient Fathers, that we could pray to any being without worshipping them.

The very word adoration is obviously taken from adorare, which literally is to pray to.

Now, would it be possible to show more strongly that it was deemed by the Church of the first, second, third, and fourth centuries, that invocation was a thing proper to God only; and that it necessarily implied the omnipresence of the Being invocated? which would be obviously to ascribe one of the attributes of Deity to a creature, a thing which could not be done without impiety, or, indeed, idolatry.

Let us next hear the great St. Augustine, A.D. 400—"Let not our point of religion be the worship of dead men; for though they lived piously, still they are not to be so accounted of, as seeking from us any such honours; but they rather wish us to worship Him, through whose illumination they rejoice that we should be associates of their merit. They are to be honoured, therefore, on account of imitation; not to be prayed to, on account of religion."¶

A further reason for not praying to them might be mentioned, which no less a writer than Cardinal Cajetan candidly acknowledges, viz:—"That we have no means of certainly knowing whether the saints hear our prayers" (which would destroy, at one blow, the whole system of invoking them), "though," adds the cardinal, "we piously believe this to be the case." Why there should be any piety in believing a thing without any proof either from the Holy Scriptures, or the ancient Fathers of the Church, we are at a loss to imagine, unless piety and credulity are to be deemed identical!

We would add one more out of many early authorities, that of St. Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, in the Island of Cyprus, in the fourth century (A.D. 370), who, after censuring, at great length, the Collyridian heretics, for inventing the Blessed Virgin as a sort of goddess, and declaring that Christians ought not indecorously to venerate the saints, but rather Him who is their Sovereign Lord and Master, sums up the whole with the following admonition, which is perhaps scarcely less needed in the present day than it was in the days of the nascent Collyridian heresy:—"Let Mary be held in honour; but let the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost be worshipped. As for Mary, let no one worship her."††

We think we are now in a position to assert, that the invocation of saints was not the practice of the ancient Church in primitive times, unless some of our learned Roman Catholic correspondents are able to overthrow the authorities we have quoted (which, of course, they will do, if they can), either by proving that we have misrepresented or mistaken them, or by showing from other writers of the same or earlier dates, that such writers as Irenæus, St. Athanasius, St. Epiphanius, St. Ambrose, and St. Augustine do not truly represent the opinions of the primitive Church on the subject. It is difficult, indeed, to imagine how any men, who have sworn to abide by the unanimous consent of the Fathers, can dare to appeal to Catholic antiquity in justification of praying to any created beings, in the face of such authorities as we have above cited.

We propose in our next number to proceed to consider what has been said by the principal controversial writers of the Church of Rome, which we think will corroborate, instead of countervailing, what we have above written, when we find to what shifts they are driven in their attempt to trace back the present practices of their Church to the times of our Lord and his Apostles; and we shall also endeavour to show in what manner the corrupt practice of saint-worship gradually was introduced, and to what lengths it has led its votaries even in the present day.

WHAT IS THE EVIDENCE ON WHICH PURGATORY IS BELIEVED?

The very important question, which we have put at the head of our present article, is one which has been so frequently discussed in our pages, that it is now time to examine what is the result of our inquiries. And first let us see—Is Purgatory believed on the evidence of Scripture? Only one of our correspondents (vol i., p. 45) has attempted to bring forward any Scriptural authorities for the existence of such a place. We found it easy to show, however, that the texts that he alleged were quite irrelevant; and, in order not to be suspected of urging weak objections to his proofs, we stated our arguments in the words of Natalis Alexander, an able and learned Roman Catholic divine. We may state, then, as the result of our inquiries, that there is not a single mention of Purgatory in the whole of the New Testament. Now, could this be so, if the writers of the New Testament knew of the existence of such a place? If the pains of Purgatory can be shortened by men's prayers and penances in this life, how is it that the Apostles never appear to have given their converts a word of instruction, as to the means of escaping these sufferings hereafter? They wrote also, to men suffering severe persecutions; and, yet, among all the consolations they offered them, they never seem to have thought of reminding them how their sufferings in this life would abridge the time of their punishment in Purgatory.

Well, but, perhaps, the silence of Scripture may be supplied by tradition. Let us examine then,

Is Purgatory believed on the evidence of any of the orthodox writers of the first three centuries? Here, again, we have to answer that not a single quotation in proof of Purgatory has been established; and that certainly not for want of pains on the part of our Roman Catholic correspondents. They have given us quotations from later writers; they have given us quotations from heretical writers of the first three centuries; they have proved from orthodox writers that prayers for the dead were used at an early time, in the primitive Church; but of Purgatory, not a word. We feel, then, that we are justified in concluding, that in whatever manner the belief in Purgatory came into the Church,

---

* "Bonum atque utile suppliciter eos invocare et ob beneficia impetranda a Deo, ad eorum orationes, opem, auxiliumque confugere."

† Apologeticus adversus Gentes, cap. 30, p. 67, ed. Rigalt. Paris, 1635.

‡ ὅθεν εἰκότως ἑνὸς ὄντος τῇ ἀγαθῇ θεοῦ παρ᾽ αὐτῇ μόνη τῶν ἀγαθῶν τὰ μὲν δοθῆναι τὰ δὲ παραμεῖναι εὐχόμεθα ἡμεῖς τε καὶ οἱ ἄγγελοι.—Strom. l. 7, p. 853, Opera. Ed. Potteri. Oxon. 1715.

§ Origen Cont. Cels., lib. 8., oper. tom. i, Bened. ed., p. 761. Paris, 1733.

‖ Basil. Orat. in Julittam Martyr., Op. tom. ii., p. 35.

¶ Greg. Nyssen, Orat. i., de oratione.

 Chrysost. in Genes., homil. 30, Op. tom. i., p. 301—vide same, lib. i., De orando Dem. Op. tom. ii., p. 778.

†† Damascen de fide orthodox, lib. iii., c. 24.

* Ἀλλα ἀληθως θεοσεβεις, ὁτι μηδενα των γεννητων, μη δε κοινον τινα ανθρωπον, αλλα τον εκ Θεου φυσει και αληθινον Θεου υιον επικαλουμεθα. Athan. Contr. Ar. Orat. iii., Op. Tom. i., p. 582. Ben. Ed. Paris, 1698.

† Si homo tantummodo Christus, quomodo adest ubique locus atus, cum hæc hominis natura non sit sed Dei, ut adesse omni loco possit. Si homo tantummodo Christus, cur homo in orationibus mediator invocatur, cum invocatio hominis ad præstandam salutem ineficax judicetur. —Novat. de Trin. c. xiv., Page 747, Oper. Tertull. Rigalt. Paris, 1635. This treatise was frequently attributed to Tertullian or Cyprian, even in the time of St. Jerome, as he remarks, Catalog. Script. Eccl., c. 81, and Apolog. Cont. Ruffin. lib. ii. Natalis Alexander has shown that the doctrine of this treatise is sound.—Hist. Eccl., sæc. ii., Dissert. ix., art. iv. Tom. iii. p. 411. Paris, 1714.

‡ Sed tamen in solus, Deoque, invocandus es; tu rogandus, ut omni in filiis repræsentes.—Ambrose, op. tom. ii., p. 1207, Bened. ed. Paris, 16.0.

§ Nec invocationibus angelicis facit aliquid, nec incantationibus, nec reliquâ prava curiositate, sed mundè et pure et manifeste orationes dirigens ad Dominum, qui omnia fecit, et nomen Domini nostri Jesu Christi invocans.—Advers. Hæres. lib. 2 (c. 57), c. xxxii, ed. Bened., p. 166. Paris, 1710.

‖ Ὁτι ὀυ δεῖ Χριστιανους ἐγκαταλειπειν τὴν ἐκκλησιάν τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ ἀπιέναι καὶ ἀγγέλους ονόμαζειν ἐπισυναξεις ποιεῖν, ἅπερ ἀπηγόρευται. Εἰτίς οὖν ευρεθη ταύτην τὴν κεκρυμμενην εἰδωλολατρείαν σχολάζων ἔστω ἀνάθεμα· ὁτι ἐγκατέλιπε τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστον, τον υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ εἰδωλολατρείᾳ προσῆλθεν.—Concil. Laod. Can. 35. Pandectæ Canonum Apostol. Oxon., 1672. p. 468.

¶ Non sit nobis religio cultus hominum mortuorum. Quia, si pie vixerunt, non sic habentur, ut tales quærant honores: sed illum a nobis coli volunt, quo illuminante lætantur meriti sui nos esse consortes. Honorandi sunt ergo propter imitationem, non adorandi propter religionem."—August. de ver relig. c. lv., Oper. vol. i. p. 786. Bened. Ed. Paris, 1679.

 Certa ratione nescimus, an Sancti nostra vota cognoscant, quamvis pie hoc credamus. Cajetan in secundam secundæ Quæst., lxxxviii., art. 8. Aug. Taur. 1541, p. 411.

†† Ἐν τῳ ὄντι Μάρια· ὁ εἷς Πατήρ, καὶ Υἱὸς, καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα, προσκυνεῖσθω· τὴν Μάριαν μηδεὶς προσκυνειτω.—Epiph. Cont. Hær., lib. iii., tom. ii., hær 79, p. 1061. Paris ed., 1622; Colon, 1682—"Honoretur sanè Maria: Pater vero, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus adorantur—Mariam adorare nemo velit."

it was not derived by tradition from Christ and his Apostles.

Is there no mention of Purgatory prior to the fourth century? Certainly there is. The heathens had a doctrine very much resembling it. We have quoted a statement from Plato (vol. i., p. 16); and a correspondent (vol. ii., p. 58) has sent us Virgil's description of his Purgatory, which corresponds almost exactly with the notions as to the state of the dead now entertained in the Roman Catholic Church. Here, then, we begin to get an answer to the question—If the notion of Purgatory was not derived from Christ and his Apostles, where did it come from? We find reason to suspect that this doctrine was one of the importations from a heathen philosophy, with which the simplicity of the Gospel was corrupted.

But who imported this heathen doctrine into Christianity? Our correspondents have enabled us to answer this question, too. They have pointed to some writers, notorious for their heretical opinions, as the earliest Christian authorities, which can be adduced in support of this doctrine. Origen, who was well learned in heathen systems of philosophy, had speculations concerning the state of the dead, which, in some measure, resemble those now held in the Roman Catholic Church. He believed in a Purgatory, but one of far greater efficiency than hers; he thought there was no sin too great for the fires of his Purgatory to purge out, and that even the devil himself would, in process of time, be rendered pure enough for admission into the kingdom of heaven. In short, Origen's Purgatory was what we call hell, only that he believed there would be an end to its duration. Another Christian writer, notorious for the unsoundness of his views on some subjects, has been brought forward in support of Purgatory—we mean Tertullian. But Tertullian expressly tells us that he learned this notion, not from the Church, but from a wretched fanatic, named Montanus, by whose pretensions to inspiration, Tertullian was unfortunately deceived.

The conclusion, then, to which the labours of our correspondents have led us is, that writers notorious for the unsoundness of their doctrines, are responsible for the introduction of this notion into the Christian Church.

So much for the first three centuries; but what as to those succeeding? Well, we maintain that after this time notions resembling Purgatory may be found in the speculations of individual writers, but that Purgatory was no part of the doctrine of the Church during the fourth and fifth centuries.

It was natural that the curiosity of man should busy itself with speculations as to the state of the soul after death; and it was not wonderful that the notions entertained by a writer of so much learning and ingenuity as Origen should obtain considerable circulation; but we hold that whatever may have been the private opinions of individual writers, their notions did not receive the sanction of the Church. We can prove this, first, by negative evidence: the absence—namely, of all mention of Purgatory from the creeds, and from the canons of councils of the Church, for many centuries. We prove it further from the vagueness and the uncertainty of the language of those who express any opinion at all resembling those held in modern times concerning Purgatory. We have already alluded to the embarrassment of Epiphanius (see vol. ii., p. 68), when asked why he prayed for the dead. Instead of answering plainly, "to get their souls out of Purgatory," as any one would who believed in the existence of such a place, he makes a far less satisfactory defence, and takes his stand principally on the impropriety of deviating from a custom established in the Church. We could show, also, how unsettled the views of these writers were as to the efficacy of these prayers; some even holding that the pains of the damned were alleviated by the prayers of the Church. But we shall not need to go farther than Augustine. This eminent Father lived at the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century. If the doctrine of Purgatory formed part of the doctrine of the Church in his day, he could not have failed to have known and believed it. If, therefore, we can show that he had nothing to offer on this subject, but guesses and probable conjectures, the conclusion is inevitable that the doctrines of Purgatory formed no part of the system of Christian truth which had been handed down to him by his predecessors. How far this is the case, our readers will judge from the following extracts:—

Augustine takes pains to argue against those who held Origen's notions of a Purgatory which should, in time, remove all men's sins, and who defended themselves by appealing to 1 Cor. iii. 13. Augustine, in reply, interprets the wood, hay, stubble, spoken of, as representing the over-great love which the faithful bear to the things of life; and the fire as representing that temporal tribulation which causes them grief by the loss of those things whereupon they had fixed their affections. "But," he proceeds, "whether in this life only men suffer such things, or whether some such judgments also do follow after this life, the meaning which I have given of this sentence is, as I suppose, not inconsistent with the truth.'*

Again, he writes, "That some such thing should take place after this life is not incredible, and whether it be so may be a subject for inquiry, and may be either found or may remain hidden: that some of the faithful, through a certain Purgatorial fire, are so much the more slowly or sooner saved by how much more or less they have loved these perishing goods."*

We give one more quotation to the same effect. "If it be said that in the interval between death and the day of judgment the spirits of the departed suffer a fire—not felt by those who have not had such dispositions and affections in their mortal life, that their wood, hay, and stubble shall be consumed, but felt by those who have carried with them buildings of this kind; whether they feel the fire of transitory tribulation burning those secular affections (which are pardoned from damnation) in this world only, or both here and there, or, therefore here that they may not feel it there—I do not contradict it, for, perhaps, it is true."†

PERHAPS it is true!! So, then, in Augustine's time, so late as the beginning of the fifth century, notions akin to Purgatory had not got beyond "perhaps." This is an argument so decisive against the claims of Purgatory to rank among articles of faith, as to outweigh dozens of quotations on the other side, if it were possible to produce them. All that such quotations could prove, would be that there was such a place as Purgatory, in the private opinion of the writer cited; but if the Church had any tradition on the subject, Augustine would not have needed to speak with a "perhaps" on the matter.

But how, then, did Purgatory attain the rank of an article of faith? Is theology a science which admits of discoveries? and is it possible to obtain in the sixth century a knowledge of truths which those who were taught by the Apostles were ignorant of? There is no evidence for Purgatory unless it be asserted that it is possible for late ages to find out something which the first centuries were ignorant of; and, accordingly, some Roman Catholic divines have been bold enough to make this assertion. We quoted (vol. ii., p. 68) the honest confession of Cardinal Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, "Whoever reads the commentaries of the ancient Greeks, will find no mention, as far as I can see, or the slightest possible concerning Purgatory. Nay, even the Latins did not all at once, but gradually enter into the truth of this matter. . . . For a while it was unknown; at a later date it was known to the Church universal; then it was believed by some, by little and little, partly from Scripture, partly from revelations." Assert. Luther. Confut. 18.

When we quoted this passage before, we added that the revelations here spoken of, by which Purgatory is proved, were, in plain English, neither more nor less than ghost stories. As this explanation has not been relished by some of our Roman Catholic readers, we proceed to establish our assertions, although in order to do so we must come down as low as the sixth century.

To prove, however, that we are going to the right place, we cite the following from Mr. Faber's work elsewhere referred to:—

"The dialogue of St. Gregory the Great may be considered as the chief fountain of the devotion to the holy souls in all succeeding ages; and Father Peter Faber used to say that, although St. Gregory was a saint, who should be loved and honoured, on many accounts, yet on none more than this, because he had so lucidly and transparently handed down to us the doctrine of the purgatorial fire. For he thought that if St. Gregory had not told us so many things of the holy souls, the devotion of subsequent ages would have been much colder in their behalf."—Page 385.

Now, Pope Gregory founds his doctrine of Purgatory, as Cardinal Fisher has it, on Scripture and revelation; only that there is very little of Scripture and a great deal of revelation. What he quotes from Scripture tells rather against than for Purgatory. When asked whether we are to believe in the existence of a purgatorial fire after death, he replies—"The Lord says in the Gospel, 'Walk while ye have the light.' He says, also, by the prophet, 'I have heard thee in the accepted time, and have called thee in the day of salvation;' in explanation of which text, the Apostle Paul says, 'Behold, now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.' Solomon, likewise, says, 'Whatever thy hand can do, work with all thy might; for there is neither work, nor knowledge, nor understanding, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou art hastening." . . From which sentences we must infer that such as any one departs hence, such shall he appear in the day of judgment." So far Pope Gregory's Scripture arguments conclude against Purgatory; but he goes on—"However, we must believe that there is a purgatorial fire for some trifling faults, inasmuch as the Truth says, that 'if any man speak blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, it shall be forgiven him neither in this world nor in the world to come;' from which sentence we are given to understand that some sins may be remitted in this world and some in the next. . . . But, yet, as I said, this last can only be believed of some very small and trifling sins, such as idle words, immoderate laughter, &c., which do not seem grievous faults, but will become grievous matters after death if any one neglect them while yet in this life. For when St. Paul says that Christ is the foundation, he adds, 'If any man build on this foundation,' &c. (see 1 Cor. iii.) Now, though this may be understood of the fire of tribulation in this life, yet if any one understand it of a fire of future purgation, he ought to consider carefully that he is saved by fire, not who builds on it lead or iron—that is, heavy and grievous sins; but wood, hay, stubble—that is, small sins, such as the fire can easily consume. You should know, too, that no one shall obtain any purgation by fire for his small sins, unless he has merited, by his good actions in this life, that he shall obtain it there."* —Dialog., lib. iv., c. 39.

Such is Gregory's Scripture proof of Purgatory. It will be perceived that the general tenor of Scripture is pronounced by him unfavourable to the doctrine; that he is induced to admit it by a very illogical inference from the text which says that the sin against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven in the next world, from which he gathers that some other sins shall; and, lastly, that he thinks the celebrated passage of St. Paul, in 1 Cor., may be understood of Purgatory, though it admits of another interpretation.

The kind of Purgatory which Pope Gregory admits of, falls very far short of what is now commonly believed in the Church of Rome, being only adapted to the purgation of the very smallest sins of those who have earned a claim for admission by their good actions in this life. There are a great many of those for whom Masses are now said and paid for, who would not be thought good enough for admission into Pope Gregory's Purgatory.

But the chief stress of Gregory's proof of Purgatory lies on revelations. He admits the novelty of his teaching on this head. His collocutor, Peter, asks him, ch. 40—"What is the reason that in these last times so many things are known about souls, which were before concealed, so that the future world appears to disclose itself by open revelations and visions?" To which Gregory answers—"Just so; for as this present world is approaching to an end, so much is the next world touched by our very nearness to it, and is disclosed by more manifest signs."

As, however, we find that Pope Gregory, who died A.D. 604, 1250 years ago, was mistaken in supposing himself near to the end of the world, it is possible that he may have been also mistaken in the credence which he gave to ghost stories on that supposition; and any one who will take the trouble to look over his Dialogues, will find the good Father more remarkable for simple credulity than for wise discrimination. We shall give a couple of specimens of his stories. The reader will observe that he does not speak of Purgatory as a place; but he describes the souls as suffering in parts of this earth. We suppose that Purgatory being newly opened in his time, it had not then become worth while to set up a separate establishment, and the souls were like prisoners out on tickets-of-leave before it had become worth while to build a prison for them.

The first story we cite is of one Paschasius, a deacon of the Church of Rome, a man of wonderful sanctity, bountiful in alms-giving, and remarkable for self-denial. However, in a contested election for the bishopric of Rome, he voted on the wrong side—for Laurentius against Symmachus—and persisted in his preference to his dying day. He worked a miracle at his funeral—a demoniac touched the "dalmatic" placed on his bier, and immediately recovered. Notwithstanding, some time after, Bishop Germanus having been ordered by his physicians to use the hot baths of St. Angelo, when he went into the baths, found the said Paschasius standing there. So he was greatly surprised, and asked him what so great a man was doing there? To which Paschasius replied, that he was in that place of punishment for no other reason than because he took the side of Laurentius against Symmachus. But he begged Germanus to pray for him, telling him that he would know that he had been successful, if he did not find him there on his next visit. And, accordingly, Germanus did not find him there when he came again.

Hot baths seem to have been the favourite substitute for Purgatory in Pope Gregory's time. He tells another story about a Presbyter, who lived near Civita Vecchia, and was in the habit of using hot baths; and who one day on going in found a certain unknown person prepared to wait on him, who took off his shoes, took his clothes from him, brought him towels when he came out, &c. This went on so often that the Presbyter said to himself one day, I must not behave shabbily to that man who waits on me so devotedly at the baths; but I must take

* Sive ergo in hac vita tantum homines ista patiantur, sive etiam post hanc vitam talia quædam judicia subsequantur: non abhorret, quantum arbitror a ratione veritatis iste intellectus hujus sententiæ."—De Octo Dulcitii Quæstionibus, Quæst i. See also De Fide and Operibus, cap. 16.

* Tale aliquid etiam post hanc vitam fieri incredibile non est, et utrum ita sit quæri potest, et aut inveniri aut latere; nonnullos fideles per ignem quendam purgatorium, quanto magis minusve bona præcuntia dilexerunt, tanto tardius citiusve salvari."—Enchirid, cap. 69.

† Post istius sane corporis mortem donec ad illum veniatur, qui post resurrectionem corporum futurus est damnationis et remunerationis ultimus dies, si hoc temporis intervallo spiritus defunctorum ejusmodi ignem dicuntur perpeti, quem non sentiant illi qui non habuerunt tales mores et amores in hujus corporis vita ut eorum lignum fœnum et stipula consumantur; alii vero sentiant qui ejusmodi secum ædificia portaverunt, sive ibi tantum, sive hic et ibi, sive ideo hic et non ibi, sæcularia, quamis a damnatione venialia, concremantem ignem transitoriæ tribulationis inveniant, non redarguo, quia forsitan rerum est.—De Civ. Dei., lib xxi., c. 25.

him a present. So he took him two of the offertory cakes. He found the man there as usual, and was waited on by him as before. And when he was dressed and going out he gave the man the present he had brought, by way of thanking him, begging him to take it kindly in token of charity. But the man, sorrowing, said, why do you give me this, Father? It is holy bread, I cannot eat it. I was once the master of this place, and have been sent here for my sins. If you wish to do me any good, offer it to God for me, and you will know your prayers are heard, if, when you come to bathe next, you do not find me here. Then he vanished, and the Presbyter saw by his vanishing that he who he thought was a man, really was a ghost. And when he came back after a week's prayer and Masses the man was no longer to be seen.

Now, we shall not discuss here what credit is due to these stories; our object in bringing them forward here is to show exactly on what foundation Purgatory rests, and at what a late period the belief of it was introduced into the Church. We have said elsewhere, that some modern Romanists have forsaken the Tridentine standard for a triple rule of faith—Scripture, tradition, and revelation. Now, the proof for Purgatory from Scripture and tradition altogether breaks down; and we wish it to be clearly seen that asserted revelations formed the ground on which the doctrine was first received, and by means of which its belief was fastened on the Christian Church for a number of years.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been obliged to postpone several articles and letters from want of room.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1854.

The intolerance with which the Church of Rome is often charged by her opponents has not unfrequently been defended as necessary to uphold her unity and immutability, which unity her advocates say could not be maintained were she to tolerate differences within her pale, as other Churches, not endowed with the same Divine authority, are compelled to do.

We have little doubt that the principal attraction which has drawn some men of respectable attainments from the Church of England to that of Rome, has been the idea of the much-boasted unity and immutability of the latter, with the stricter discipline exercised in upholding them.

That the Church of Rome, however, is tolerant enough, and even flexible enough, towards all who will even nominally submit to the all-important doctrine of her supremacy, appears to be pretty well practically understood in the present day, as, indeed, in all ages.

Great as her power has been and still is, there is always a wary prudence used in its exercise.

Of this we might give many instances, but let a few suffice—some of which we shall take from the conduct of the Holy See towards large classes, the rest from the conduct of the hierarchy towards individuals.

Those who have read the Catholic Layman since its commencement, will remember the signal toleration shown by the See of Rome towards the protracted and angry combat between the Franciscan and Dominican orders, touching the much-disputed doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary—which, after 300 years' discussion, with all the acknowledged prepossessions of the Holy See in its favour, has never yet, we believe, been definitively determined by the Church of Rome.

A similar toleration has been evinced by the Holy See towards the order of the Jesuits, who have, from time to time, published books containing the most dangerous and indefensible doctrines, not one of which has ever been prohibited by the Church of Rome, though she professes to condemn and prohibit the use of all bad books, and publishes, from time to time, such prohibitions in her Index Prohibitorius.

How are we to account for such toleration; and how is it consistent with her intolerance and persecution towards every attempt at reformation? Simply because she does not feel powerful enough to measure her strength with large and influential bodies within her own pale; and, therefore, could not prudently venture on what she knew would have been a vain attempt to put down a schism between two angry and powerful parties, both of which were willing to acknowledge her nominal supremacy, as long as she did not venture to exercise it against themselves; and because, in like manner, the Jesuit order is willing to give cordial support to all her pretensions, so long as she does not interfere with the doctrines and principles on which their system is founded.

Let us glance now at her dealing with individuals. The last week has witnessed the solemn inaugural profession of faith of the Very Rev. Dr. John Henry Newman, as rector of the newly-founded Roman Catholic University of Ireland. On this occasion the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen, titular Archbishop of Dublin, pronounced a discourse, in which, in the same breath, he proclaimed the unchangeable character of the doctrines of his Church, and held forth Dr. Newman as a man distinguished for his profound learning, as well as for his virtues and piety; while it is notorious, from Dr. Newman's own works, that he ventures to differ most widely from the Church of Rome on, at least, one cardinal point of the gravest importance to her theory and pretensions—her much-boasted immutability. In his celebrated essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, Dr. Newman maintains that God did not intend that the form of doctrine, received in the Church, should be at all times the same; that He left in his Church an authority of developing new truths from those known before; so that it is not needful that Romish Christianity and Apostolic Christianity should be one and the same thing—that, in point of fact, they are two different things; thus throwing overboard the whole theory of Apostolic tradition as constituting, together with the Scriptures, the rule of faith, and resting everything on the inherent power of the Church to declare authoritatively what she thinks right, independently of both Scripture and tradition.

All Romish controversialists, except Dr. Newman, have contended that the Church of Rome has been immutably the same in doctrine in all ages, and that whatever she holds at this day is identical with what she derived in the earliest times from our Lord and his Apostles, either through the written Word, or oral tradition from the Apostles themselves.

Now, how comes the Church of Rome, through one of her highest officials in Ireland, to adopt this new-light theologian (converted, after a fashion of his own, to the Church of Rome) as a profound divine, worthy of being placed at the head of an establishment for the education of the Catholic youth of Ireland? Is it possible that the Roman Catholic authorities in this country can approve of, and intend to adopt, Dr. Newman's novel views? In America, Roman Catholic writers have seen very plainly that Dr. Newman's views are quite inconsistent with those which represent Catholic truth as always the same, and as handed down unchanged, by tradition, from the earliest ages; but in this country, he is the selected instructor of the Catholic youths of Ireland notwithstanding, and publicly vaunted as a man of the most profound wisdom and learning.

Is not this a proof how far toleration may be carried in the Church of Rome, where it suits her purpose, and when it is thought wise to conciliate an individual who is likely to be influential or useful in the maintenance of her system, on the terms merely that he is willing to "recognise the Church of Rome to be the mother and mistress of all Churches, and vow obedience, absolute and entire, to the Roman Pontiff, and confess as faith all that the Catholic Church teaches?"

Had the principles set forth in the essay on Development been published by a Protestant, the book would, doubtless, have been placed long since in the Index Prohibitorius; but, being written by one willing to acknowledge himself an obedient son of the Mother Church, he is vaunted as a profound divine, and inaugurated as the principal of a Catholic University.

Another instance will be in the minds of such of our readers as happened to peruse the observations of the Rambler on Dr. Cahill, copied by us in our February number.

Dr. Cahill had written on the doctrine of transubstantiation in a manner utterly heterodox and inconsistent with the teaching of the Council of Trent. The Rambler exposed his erroneous teaching in the strongest and clearest manner, and assured the world that a very large proportion of the Catholic clergy and laity regard much of what he says as pernicious and untrue! "Why, then, it will be said," continues the Rambler, "is Dr. Cahill allowed thus to compromise the whole community of which he is a member? Why do the bishops and clergy permit him to write and lecture as he does? Why do not those who disapprove come forward and protest against his being accepted as a model of a Catholic controversialist?"

The explanation of the Rambler is worthy of attention. It is as follows (p. 176):—

"We reply, that the common idea that Catholics are like a regiment of soldiers on the field of battle, every one of them acting in obedience to orders, is a pure figment of the Protestant imagination. Knowing that we have a discipline and code of law, that we do regard our bishops as the successors of the Apostles, and that we profess the utmost unity in matters of faith, the world jumps to the conclusion that every bishop is invested with power equivalent to the very highest which ultramontane theology ever attributed to the Pope himself. A Catholic bishop is not an autocrat with uncontrolled power over the actions of his spiritual subjects. He administers and enforces the laws of the Church, and beyond these, whatever power he has, is a species of moral influence, arising from the weight justly due to his sacred office and character. At the same time, the fact that it is a moral influence, and not a legal right (by the word legal, meaning a right secured by the laws of the Catholic Church), makes it necessary that it should be employed with great care and prudence, and not pushed too far, lest an unwilling subject recalcitrate hopelessly. Accordingly, as a matter of history, we find that Catholic prelates—imitating the wisdom of the Holy See—are often backward to interposing in cases where Protestants expect their instant interference with the strong arm of authority, and if the future be like the past, this rule will continue to be observed to the end of all things."

Now, what is this, but simply that the Church is so tolerant, or rather so prudent, that she is ready to overlook anything in an unruly and unmanageable subject, even when confessedly propagating things, "pernicious and untrue," if he be only, willing, nominally, to submit himself to the unexercised authority of the Church and the Holy See.

The toleration, however, of the Church of Rome extends much farther than omitting to put in the Index Prohibitorius, books of an evil or erroneous tendency; it permits both bodies of men and individuals to teach, and inculcate in practice, many things quite at variance with her authorized dogmas and formularies.

We may instance the vast difference which she tolerates and connives at, between the theoretical and practical modes of invoking the saints. The former is laid down distinctly by the Catechism of the Council of Trent, part iv., chapter vi., question 3.—Aliter Deum, aliter sanctos implo-ramus—"For we do not implore God and the saints in the same manner. We pray to God that He would either give us good things or deliver us from evil things; but from the saints, because they are in favour with God, we ask that they would undertake to be our advocates, to obtain for us those things from God which we stand in need of. Hence, we use two forms of praying, different in kind; for to God we properly say—"Have mercy upon us; hear us;" but to the saints—"Pray for us."

That this distinction is not followed in practice is notorious. Take the following specimens from the devotional works of St. Bonaventure, a saint canonized in 1482:—

"O, thou blessed Virgin, our salvation is placed in thy hands. Remember our poverty, O thou pious one! Whom thou willest, he shall be saved; and he from whom thou turnest away thy countenance, goeth into destruction."—S. Bonav. Op., Tom. vi.; Cantica ad B. Virg. instar Hab. 3, p. 480 (correctly 492). Ed. Lugd., 1668.

Again:—

"Therefore, O empress, and our most benign Lady, by the right of a mother command thy most beloved son, our Lord Jesus Christ, that he vouchsafe to raise our minds from the love of earthly things to heavenly desires, who liveth and reigneth—JURE MATRIS IMPERA tuo dilectissimo filio."—Opera, Tom. vi., p. 466. Lugd. 1668.

We notice another sample of saint-worship, from a French life of St. Philomena, published at Avignon, in 1836, and received since the publication of her life, in our last number (for which we are indebted to the kindness of a friend):—

"Faithful and glorious martyr, have pity on me, exercise on both my soul and my body the ministry of salvation, of which God has judged you worthy more than me; you know the number and diversity of my wants; behold me at your feet, full of misery and hope. I solicit your charity, great saint! Grant me my prayers, bless me," &c., &c.

Is this nothing more than the "Ora pro nobis?"

It would be easy to multiply instances of the wide difference between the practice and the theory of the Roman Catholic Church with reference both to doctrinal and devotional teaching.

For the present we cannot proceed with the subject further, but propose returning to it again; and, in the meantime, beg to call attention to the article, in our present number, on the Variations of Romanism.

REPRINT OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN—VOL. I.

We are happy to be able to announce to such of our friends as have hitherto been disappointed in completing their sets, that we have reprinted (at very considerable expense) the first volume of our periodical, in consequence of the numerous applications for it, which we were unable to meet. In a few days Vols. I. and II., or either of them, may be had, neatly bound and lettered, on application to the publishers, Messrs. Curry, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin; or, Messrs. Wertheim and Macintosh, Paternoster Row, London.

Correspondence.

MR. ROURKE ON THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH AND THE RULE OF FAITH.

(Continued from page 63.)

We believe that true faith is indispensably necessary for salvation—"He that believeth not, shall be condemned" (Mark xvi. 16); and "Without faith it is impossible to please God."—Heb. xi. 6.

We believe that Jesus Christ, requiring faith as necessary for salvation, must have provided us with adequate means to obtain faith—that is, to believe, without doubting, all those things which he has taught and instituted as necessary for salvation. If Jesus Christ has not provided us with such means, he must be a hard master indeed, as he would require of us what we could not otherwise perform.

We believe that Jesus Christ has established his Church for the above purpose—namely, as the supreme tribunal to regulate our faith; or, in other words, to keep the precious deposit of revelation unaltered, to explain to us (without any possibility of error) the meaning of every part of Holy Writ necessary for salvation, and, likewise, to preserve and transmit to posterity undefiled all that part of Christ's divine doctrine, which was only delivered by word of mouth, either by Christ or by his apostles, according to these words of St. Paul—"Therefore, brethren, stand firm, and hold the traditions which you have learned, whether by word or by our epistles."—2 Thess. ii. 14 (it is the fifteenth verse in your Bible). By this text we see that the unwritten Word of God, transmitted to us by tradition, is entitled to the very same respect as the written word.

We think it absurd to assert that Jesus Christ has taught or preached nothing essential but what is written in a few pages of the Gospel. We do not find in the Gospel the instructions which our Lord gave his apostles during the forty days that he appeared to them after his resurrection; and yet it is beyond all doubt, that during these forty days—the last spent with his apostles—he instructed them particularly in all the mysteries of his kingdom and of his Church.—See Acts i. 3. These last instructions which Christ gave his apostles before parting, and when they were about entering on the arduous duties of the ministry—these last instructions, I say, were not lost, although not recorded in the Gospel; they form a part of that precious deposit entrusted to the Church, and have, by an uninterrupted succession of pastors, been transmitted, undefiled, to our present days, and will be thus transmitted to the most remote generations, even to the consummation of time. We believe, then, that the Church of Christ is the supreme judge in matters of faith, both to determine the true sense of Scripture, and to settle our belief with regard to that part of Christ's doctrine delivered by word of mouth. Whenever the Church has pronounced, the controversy is settled, doubts vanish, and we are as certain as if our Lord himself had spoken.

Common sense tells us, sir, that the Gospel could not have been intended as the supreme judge to fix our belief in matters of faith. First, because it may be misunderstood. The many contradictory doctrines drawn from Scripture prove that it is often misunderstood, and even in matters which Christ declares as an indispensable condition of salvation. Witness the following—"Except a man be born again, of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter the kingdom of God."—John iii. 5. "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you."—John vi. 54. "Without faith it is impossible to please God."—Heb. xi. 6.

You will readily acknowledge that these several texts, although directing us to certain things, as an indispensable condition of salvation, are interpreted in contradictory ways, and, of course, misunderstood. Some find in the Gospel the necessity of baptism for salvation; others find in it salvation without baptism; some find in it the necessity of receiving the flesh and blood of Christ; others find that Christ gave us nothing but bread and wine as memorials of his death; some find in the Gospel that faith alone will save; others discover in the Gospel the insufficiency of faith alone; some find in the Gospel absolute and unconditional predestination; others reject it, as impious and blasphemous.

Now, sir, are all these right? Or will it be said that it is immaterial which of these contradictory opinions we embrace? No, sir; common sense tells us that Holy Writ was not given us to be misunderstood, that when misunderstood it leads us astray; whereas it was intended to guard us against the misfortune of being led astray. Common sense tells us, then, that Scripture, being a dead letter, a dumb book, which cannot explain itself, Christ must have provided some visible and living authority, some supreme and unerring tribunal to explain Scripture, and that this is, and can be no other than the Church.

A second reason why Scripture cannot be our supreme judge in matters of faith is, because there are many that cannot read.

A third reason—The gospels and epistles were not written for many years after the Church of Christ was established, and spread among many nations. For many hundred years after that, the art of printing, not having been discovered, the Holy Scripture could not be in many persons' hands; and yet, during that time, the precious deposit of faith was as well kept as it has been since Holy Writ is in the hands of everybody. Yes, sir, and better; everybody cannot read, but everybody, learned or unlearned, can submit to the Church, transmitting to both, by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, the doctrine of Christ, uncorrupted, and in its primitive purity. Here, sir, is a mode of instruction adapted to everybody's capacity.

A fourth reason—If I must take up my creed by reading Scripture, I must be satisfied that the book which is put into my hands, and called the Holy Scripture, is really the genuine Scripture, as written by the apostles. I, a poor, illiterate man, not having enjoyed the benefit of a liberal education, hardly acquainted with my own language, how shall I know whether the English Bible you put into my hands is a faithful translation of the original Hebrew and Greek or not? I shall have to take your word for it!! If I do, my faith then, to use a homely phrase, is pinned to your sleeve. But no, sir, I cannot submit to do so, because I find material differences in different translations of the Scriptures; of course, I am kept in suspense, if I know of none but a barely human authority in support of each of the different translations.

These are sufficient reasons to induce us to believe that Holy Writ was not intended to be our supreme judge in matters of faith, and to convince us that Christ, our Lord and Saviour, has provided us with a living, visible, and supreme authority, to settle all our doubts, with regard to the true translation of Scripture, the true sense of it, and, likewise, with regard to many other essential matters not to be found in Holy Writ, but delivered by tradition. It is plain then, that the Church which our Lord established on earth, is this living, visible, and supreme authority; and if it be asked where this authority resides, we answer, in the body of Christ's ministers, the pastors of his Church, and the lawful successors of those pastors whom he appointed, and invested with full authority to discharge the functions of his ministry. To that body of pastors we look for heavenly instructions; in them we see the successors of Jesus Christ, invested by him with the same authority which he had received from his heavenly Father—"As the Father hath sent me, I also send you."—John xx. 21. Can you, sir, or "Bedale," or the "Kildare Churchman," or Mr. O'Mara, prove me to be in error for putting full confidence in the assertions and promises of our Lord, and in thus believing that the Spirit of Truth never has departed, and never will depart, from the pastors of Christ's Church? No; you will never be able to do so, because all things shall pass away, but Christ's Word will remain: Jesus Christ yesterday, to-day, and the same for ever.

The true minister of Christ, speaking of the name of his divine master, must speak with authority, with certainty, without any hesitation, on all the different mysteries of religion on which he is obliged to instruct his flock.

The apostles of Christ, scattered over the globe, preached one and the same doctrine, because Christ was with them.—Matt. xxviii. 18-20. The ministers of Christ, in 1854, scattered over the globe, preach, likewise, one and the same doctrine, because Christ is still with them. "I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world."—St. Matt.

The apostles of Christ received the confessions of the faithful—see Acts xix. 18. They had received from Jesus Christ the power of forgiving and retaining sins—see John xx. 22, 23. The ministers of Christ, in 1854, likewise hear the confessions of the faithful, because they have no idea that Christ ever deprived them of that power. The apostles of Christ submitted to the decisions of the whole Church, because they knew the Church to be guided by the Holy Ghost.—Acts xv. 23. The ministers of Christ, in 1854, likewise submit to the decision of the general councils of the Church, because they know that the Holy Ghost is as much with the Church now as he was immediately after her institution. In short, we do not conceive why less spiritual powers should be attributed to the ministry of Christ in 1854 than in the year 100 or 300, &c., for at all times, and in all ages, the ministry is, most assuredly, intended for the same functions.

Is it not a pity, sir, that things on which our salvation depends should be only matters of opinion? It is my opinion, says one, that children may be saved without baptism; it is my opinion, says another, that God is too merciful to damn souls for ever; I think, says a third, that it is immaterial what a person believes, or what religious creed he adopts, so he leads a good life. It is your opinion, and you think! Pray, are you certain? and if you are not certain in matters of such weight, how can you be happy? Oh! will you leave it to the day of judgment to disclose whether you were right or wrong? Or, will you not rather renounce that fallible guide—your limited and corrupted reason—which never can give you certainty in matters of revelation, and apply for spiritual knowledge to the fountain of eternal truth, the holy Catholic Church, guided by the Holy Ghost, that you may no longer feed on opinions and uncertainties, but repose in the bosom of certainty.

I now must conclude, as I fear I have already disregarded your request to be brief.

Hoping you will have the kindness to insert this "misty cloud of words" in the next number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, I bid you farewell for a month.

I remain, sir, in sincere charity, your Christian friend,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

The important question raised by Mr. Rourke in this part of his letter, and on which his remarks, for the most part, turn, is briefly this—Is, or is not, Holy Scripture the supreme and sufficient rule in matters of faith? If this question be decided in the affirmative, it is obvious that all Mr. Rourke's arguments fall, at once, to the ground. We have discussed this question before, on more than one occasion; and we are now obliged, in reply to our correspondent's letter, to enter upon it again at some length.

Mr. Rourke's argument involves this fundamental assumption, that God, in giving a revelation to mankind, must necessarily have taken measures to guard it from all possible misconception or perversion, at least in essential points. This assumption we must explicitly deny. It is refuted by the analogies of the patriarchal and Jewish revelations, and it is also contradicted by the general analogy of God's dealings with us in the most important matters connected with our temporal well-being. In the case of the patriarchs, we do not find that any provision was made for the necessary and infallible understanding of the few and essential truths then communicated to mankind. On the contrary, though God kept up the memory of Himself by repeated revelations—to Adam, to Enoch, to Noah—we find that so universally was religion corrupted in the age of Abraham (only a few centuries after the Flood), that it became necessary to make a new revelation to him; his father and ancestors having lapsed into idolatry—Joshua xxiv. 2. For a period of, at least, 2,000 years, the world was left—not without divine revelation—but without permanent miraculous interposition to prevent men from misunderstanding and abusing it. Was such interposition less necessary then than now? Were men's souls of less value in the earlier than in the later ages of the world? We must have some better reason than an à priori assumption to assure us of this.

But, perhaps, an essentially new state of things was introduced by the Jewish dispensation. Here, at least, perhaps, a permanent, infallible guardian was vouchsafed to the Church. Far otherwise. And, yet, surely, if ever there was a Church upon earth, that might appear to have good grounds for asserting its claim to the privilege of infallibility, it was the Jewish. It had a divinely-instituted ordinary ministry. It had divinely-commissioned extraordinary teachers—the prophets. It enjoyed, in the Shekinah, the visible presence of God. And, yet, so far was this highly-favoured Church from being infallible, that when our Lord Jesus Christ came, to whom Moses and all the prophets gave testimony, the supreme ecclesiastical tribunal deliberately rejected him, and condemned him to death. Their authoritive exposition of the Scriptures was this.—"We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God."—John xix. 7.

The Jewish Church did not then possess the attribute of infallibility, although it was, no less than the Christian Church, chosen and founded by God, and charged with the custody of His sacred oracles. Was it because the Jewish Church needed this attribute less than the Christian? Surely not. If the Gospel revelation, by which life and immortality have been fully brought to light, requires an infallible interpreter, much more must the dark and imperfect revelations of the Old Testament have required one.

The natural capacities of men for understanding the things of God were, at least, as feeble before the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, as they are now, with the aid of that Divine Spirit illuminating their minds and hearts. Accordingly, if infallible guidance be needed now, so it was then. But it was not then vouchsafed. Therefore, the powerful argument of analogy is against the a priori assumption that God must have granted an infallible guide to the Christian Church.

But besides the special analogies derived from the preceding revelations, against the notion of an infallible preservative against the risk of falling into religious error, there is also, as we have said, the general analogy of God's natural government of the world. We find by daily experience that in the most essential matters relating to our temporal welfare—matters involving, not only our comfort and prosperity, but our very life itself—God has not seen fit to protect us from the risk of falling into dangerous and even fatal errors; and that prudence, and caution, and painstaking, are, generally speaking, absolutely indispensable, in order to insure our worldly welfare. The analogy of nature, therefore, shows us, that if the Scriptures could be properly understood without any trouble or risk of mistake upon man's part, and were rendered incapable of being perverted to bad purposes, they would be extremely unlike the rest of God's gifts to man, and so would give rise to a doubt very difficult to satisfy—namely, whether they came from God at all.

We most freely admit that Holy Scripture contains many things obscure and difficult, and that unless it be studied in a spirit of sobriety and caution, and, above all, of humble docility and earnest prayerfulness, it may lead, as it unfortunately has too often led, to dangerous and even fatal errors. We also freely allow that the exposure of mankind to these dangers, in a matter so momentous as their eternal salvation, and the necessity of constant and even painful vigilance to escape them, is far from what we should naturally desire, and far from what, judging merely upon principles of human wisdom, we might expect in a revelation from God. But when we reflect upon what experience naturally tells us of God's dealings with us in His ordinary government of the world, and upon the nature of His former revelations to mankind, we perceive at once, that His ways are not our ways, nor His thoughts our thoughts.—Isaiah lv. 8. We shall merely observe, that the very same line of argument which would prove the necessity of an infallible expounder of all the difficulties of Scripture, would equally prove that no such difficulties should exist at all; just as the assumed necessity of a universal infallible remedy for all diseases would lead inevitably to the conclusion that no such thing as disease could have any existence in the world. If, instead of acquiescing in what God has done, we presume to speculate upon what He might have done, according to our shortsighted notions of fitness and propriety, we shall end by denying that the world is governed by God at all, if we do not proceed to the length of sheer Atheism. Protestants do not profess to be wiser than God. They accept with humble thankfulness the revelation which He has vouchsafed to grant them, whatever the difficulties may be with which it is or seems to be encumbered.

We may now proceed to apply what has been said above, to some of the particular points noticed in Mr. Rourke's letter. If we pass over such of his statements as relate to tradition, considered as a rule of faith, it is not because we feel any difficulty in replying to them; but because they constitute an independent topic of discussion, and, therefore, require to be treated distinctly, as they have been already at large in this journal. On the present occasion, we will confine ourselves to what he says concerning the written Word, and the office of the Church relative to it.

We agree with Mr. Rourke that one purpose for which our Lord established the Church, was to "keep the precious deposit of revelation unaltered," and to transmit it to posterity. The Church of England declares, in her 20th Article, that "the Church is a witness and keeper of Holy Writ." We deny, however, that the Church is invested with the attributes of infallibility, in interpreting Scripture. Firstly, because it is not necessary that she should possess it. Secondly, because no one can infallibly determine that infallibility does exist; and, even admitting its existence, it is still a disputed question among Romanists themselves where it is to be found, and what is its organ. Thirdly, because it would be practically useless, unless every individual Christian was himself infallible.

1. Infallibility is unnecessary. Mr. Rourke, following the mass of the writers of his Church, says, that "Scripture being a dead letter, a dumb book, that cannot explain itself, Christ must have provided some visible and living authority, some supreme and unerring tribunal, to explain Scripture, and that this is, and can be no other than the Church." And, as a proof of this assertion, he notices the contradictory interpretations which have been given of three texts, relating to the necessity of baptism (John iii. 5), to the necessity of receiving the flesh and blood of Christ (John vi. 54), and the necessity of faith, in order to please God (Heb. xi. 6).

Now, in the first place, with regard to any doubts, difficulties, or obscurities, which may embarrass the essentials of salvation (and with these alone, even according to the Romanist view of the matter, we are concerned), we find, upon careful examination, that they are not of such a nature as to concern our practice, or the duties which we owe, either to God or to each other. The side of Christianity which looks towards us, and with which alone we are properly concerned, is sufficiently plain and easy of comprehension to every honest, humble, and patient inquirer after truth. Love to God; faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, as the one perfect and sufficient atonement for the sins of the world; and in the eternal Spirit, as the sanctifier of all that believe in Jesus—all this, with purity of life, and love and charity to our neighbour, stands inscribed upon the pages of Scripture, in characters that all may read and understand. The writings of the Fathers are full of passages in which the plainness and simplicity of Scripture, under this aspect, are declared. Thus, St. Augustine says—"God has made the Scripture to stoop to the capacity of babes and sucklings."—Enarr. in Psal., viii. 8. And, again—"In these things that are plainly delivered in the Scriptures, are found all those things that concern faith and practice."—De Doctr. Christ., book 2, cap. 9. St. Chrysostom also says—"What necessity is there for discussion? All things are plain and simple in the Holy Scriptures; all things necessary are evident."—Hom. ii. in 2 Thess. And, again, after observing that the heathen philosophers sought their own glory, and, therefore, spoke obscurely, he adds—"But the Apostles and prophets did everything the reverse of this; for, being the common teachers of the whole world, they set before all, the things that they delivered, in clear and plain terms, to the intent, 'that every one might be able, even by himself, to learn what is said, from the bare reading.'"—De Lazar., conc. iii., sec. 2, 3. And, to cite no more, St. Basil says—"Whatever seems to be spoken ambiguously or obscurely, in some places of Holy Scripture, is cleared up by what is universally acknowledged in other places."—Ascet. Quæst., 267.

Such is the testimony of some of the greatest of the Christian Fathers. They knew, and we know too, that there are speculative difficulties in Scripture, and in the aspect of it which regards the nature and councils of the Most High, which no finite intelligence can ever comprehend; and which, therefore, no interpreter of Scripture, however infallible, could possibly remove. These are among the "secret things [which belong] to the Lord our God."—Deut. xxix. 29.

But, secondly, in reference to the particular instances cited by Mr. Rourke, we answer, that with respect to the first of these—the general necessity of baptism to salvation—our Church acknowledges it quite as fully as the Church of Rome; and that, not because of any infallible interpretation of the passages in which the ordinance is commanded, but because the testimony of Scripture itself is perfectly clear and explicit. If some sectaries have rashly presumed to interpret the words in senses different from, or contradictory to, their obvious import, this no more proves the necessity of an infallible interpreter to ascertain the true sense, than an arbitrary and ungrammatical interpretation of some passage in a Greek or Latin author, proves that it is impossible for a sober and sound scholar to determine the true meaning, unless he is supernaturally assisted to do so.

Again, with respect to the Eucharist, we need not now discuss the question, whether the passage quoted by Mr. Rourke (John vi. 54) refers to it at all or not (as some Roman Catholic divines, including Cardinal Cajetan, have maintained); for whatever difficulties there may be in the passage are felt as much by Roman Catholics, who profess to have an infallible guide, as by Protestants. For there are just the same differences among Roman Catholics as to the meaning of this text as among Protestants. But waving this question, we reply, as before, that the Church of England holds, that it is generally necessary to salvation, that each professing Christian should receive the sacrament of Christ's body and blood; and this necessity she infers from what she concludes, without any pretence to infallibility, to be the clear and express command of Holy Scripture, contained in the words of our Lord's institution, recorded by the Evangelists and by St. Paul; and by the comments of St. Paul upon the institution itself. The great question on which she is at issue with the modern Roman Church, relates not to the reality of Christ's presence in the sacrament (which she admits as fully as the most devoted Roman Catholic), but to the nature of that presence. She holds with the ancient Church that the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper, only after a heavenly and spiritual manner; and that the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith—Art. xxviii. The mediæval doctrine of transubstantiation she rejects as "repugnant to the sense of Scripture, and subversive of the nature of a sacrament." Here, as in the case of baptism, before noticed, the false explanation given by some individuals or sects of the nature of the Lord's Supper, only proves their want of reverence for the plain statements of Scripture, but by no means implies that the true sense cannot be elicited without an infallible tribunal to pronounce upon it.

Lastly, with reference to the statement in Heb. xi. 6, "without faith it is impossible to please God;" every one who believes the Scripture to be God's Word admits this. The Church of Rome, infallibly-guided, as she says, maintains that works, along with faith, are necessary as the means whereby a sinner may be justified, or have his sins forgiven. The Reformers deem St. Paul's assertion—"we account a man to be justified by faith, without the works of the law" (Rom. iii. 28), a sufficient warrant upon which to base their fundamental doctrine of justification by faith only in the atonement of Christ, without works, as a meritorious ground of acceptance with God. They regard works as the necessary fruits of faith, and as an indispensable evidence that the sinner has been justified or pardoned through the merits of Christ, and is now being sanctified by the operation of the Holy Spirit of God. This grand scheme of salvation may be derived from Scripture by any simple-minded and humble reader of its pages; and if some persons have fallen into solifidian or antinomian errors, they have done so, not because of the obscurity of Scripture, but because of their own perverse wills. The remedy for such errors is not the introduction of an infallible tribunal, but the honest and candid study of the Divine Word; the true meaning of which, it seems, in this case, at least, impossible for any single-minded and teachable reader to misapprehend. At all events, if an infallible interpretation be necessary, we may fairly conclude that the Church of Rome has not yet arrived at it, inasmuch as her system of justification virtually sets aside the atonement of Christ, and assigns his place in the mediatorial office to a man's own works.

The great length to which our remarks have run, obliges us to omit some other arguments on which we wished to enlarge, and to postpone the discussion of some of Mr. Rourke's arguments on which we have not yet touched. We have the less scruple in doing so, as our readers will find every one of Mr. Rourke's objections put forward and satisfactorily answered in our correspondence with Mr. Aylmer in our first volume.

And we hope, that another time, Mr. Rourke will not "disregard our request to be brief." For his own sake we think he ought to do so. We are glad to be favoured with his communications, and should wish his arguments to be read and considered by our readers; and, yet, judging from the difficulty we found ourselves in getting through his prolix epistles, we fear that the temptation to skip may be too strong for many of our subscribers. A long letter, wandering over the entire of an extensive subject, not only leaves a vague impression on the reader's mind, but makes it impossible to give a short and pointed reply; arguments put clearly and concisely, are both more likely to be read, and it is more easy to judge whether they are or are not satisfactorily answered.

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

(Continued from page 64.)

When you insinuate my want of success, in finding purgatory in the writings of Augustine, you seem to forget that this Father says, "Cleanse me so in this life, make me such that I may not stand in need of that purifying fire, designed for those who shall be saved, yet so as by fire. And why, but because (as the Apostle says) they have built upon the foundation, wood, hay, and stubble. If they had built gold, and silver, and precious stones, they would be secured from both fires; not only from that in which the wicked shall be punished for ever, but, likewise, from that fire which shall purify those who shall be saved by fire. But because, it is said, he shall be saved, that fire is thought lightly of; though the suffering will be more grievous than anything men can undergo in this life"—Enar. in Psal. xxxvii., t. ix., p. 295. This, I maintain, without the slightest colouring of fancy, is, in verity, in an undeniable reality, the doctrine of purgatory itself. All the Fathers of the fourth century, whom I have already cited, refer with equal perspicuity to 1 Cor. iii. 12, 13, 14, 15, in evidence of this doctrine. They advance no opinion but what is supported by positive texts of Scripture; and as faithful interpreters of the Word of God. I adopt this testimony in preference to that of any man, however learned, of the present day; and with them I can find the doctrine of purgatory; not in any opinion of their own, either dogmatic or speculative, but in the Scriptures.

My argument, founded on the evidence of these Fathers, remains uncontradicted and uncontradictable. You have advanced nothing to the contrary which amounts to an argument; unless irrelevant and unfounded objections and assumptions, can be called arguments. Your attempt to bring the Fathers into disrepute is rather too stale a device to pass for current in the meridian of the nineteenth century. Your charge against priests for taking money for masses for the dead, is another of your arguments against purgatory! These and such like arguments you oppose to the evidence of these venerable and learned witnesses, of the fourth century; the most learned age of the Church of God. Then last, the dramatic agency of Job Tomkins and his witness, an invincible proof that you have nothing to offer in reply to my arguments; and a happy illustration of your position in this controversy, that of an ignorant or an interested witness.

The writings of both the Latin and Greek Fathers most clearly prove, that from the earliest dawn of Christianity, the belief of purgatory was a dogma of Catholic faith; and that the Church always offered propitiatory sacrifice and prayers entreating pardon for those who had died in the Christian faith. Mr. Johnson whom you charge me with quoting "unfairly," admits (page 291, Unbloody Sacrifice) that the ancient Church offered propitiatory sacrifice for departed souls. This doctrine he allows, is obviously and unmistakeably set forth in all the Liturgies; "there is, I suppose, no Liturgy without them"—that is, propitiatory devotions for the dead. He next refers to the authority of the Fathers in favour of this same doctrine and practice, by which he fairly grants, that this was the doctrine of the Church from the first to the fifth century, inclusive.

But, while Mr. Johnson admits, candidly, that such is the doctrine of the Liturgies, and that the same has the wisdom of the Fathers to support it, and was, by consequence, the doctrine of the Church in this time, he tells us that those "sentiments of the early Church will be thought but only too great;" but this information came too late; nor does he find it convenient to prove that the Church erred in this respect. It is worthy of remark that while Mr. Johnson thus admits the plain, obvious meaning of the Liturgies and the Fathers, you as peremptorily deny the propitiatory doctrines of the ancients; but while he proves the fact from existing monuments, you adduce no authority of more weight than your own dictum; it is merely your opinion. Page 292, he tells us "the ancients did not use those prayers, as if they thought of a purgatory;" but this we must take on his word alone. Again, "They did not allow these prayers for such as they thought ill men;" hence they were not in the pitiable condition of the Church of England; they were capable of discovering whether a sinner died impenitent or not; they did not pray indiscriminately for all.

Same page. "The ancients believed the Eucharist a propitiatory sacrifice, and, therefore, put up these prayers for their deceased friends in the most solemn part of the Eucharistic office," &c.; there is no intercessary prayer for the dead, in the Protestant Liturgy. I will show, on a future occasion, that the Church of England does not at all pray for the dead. Again, "Upon whatever grounds it was, the primitive Church received this custom of praying for the dead, it is certain they had this notion of the propitiatory nature of the Eucharist from the Scriptures, and even from Christ Jesus himself," &c.; not as you maintain "from ghost stories." It is useless to tell me these are mere assertions, and not arguments. I maintain we have in Mr. Johnson's references documentary evidence of a truly indestructible quality; evidence that he cannot pretend to ignore; that can stand the test of the most refined criticism; and that scatters to the winds every argument you have attempted to deduce from these venerable records in favour of the Protestant system of prayers for the dead.

When Mr. Johnson claims the early Church for maintaining the doctrine of prayers for the dead, as set forth in the Liturgies, and in the Fathers, he establishes an invincible argument that the doctrines of the Church, in this respect, was then totally different from that of the Protestant Church, to which he belonged. From Chrysostom, Hom. 3, in Ep. ad Philip, which he cites, it is evident the ancient Church believed that "the Apostles did not in vain command those things, that in the venerable and dreadful mysteries the dead should be remembered; for they know they would derive considerable advantage from them."

In Hom. 41, in Ep. 1. ad. Cor. he might find this same Chrysostom teaching that "the dead may be helped by prayers, and supplications, and alms, and offerings; because these things were not instituted in vain. Let us, therefore, help them; for we have before us the expiatory sacrifice of the world. Therefore, we ask confidently for all; and we name them (the other dead), with the martyrs, confessors, and priests. For we are all one body; though some members be more excellent than others. And it may happen that we may obtain a total pardon for them, by prayers, by oblations, by the saints who are named with them." He next cites St. Augustine declaring that "the souls of the dead are relieved by the piety of the living when the sacrifice of the Mediator is offered for them."—Vid. in loc. He might have added, from St. Augustine also, "That when the sacrifice of the altar or alms are offered for the faithful departed; for the very good, they are thanksgivings; for those not very good, they are propitiations; and that for those whom they profit, they are either a total remission of sins, or a more tolerable punishment." The other Fathers whom he quotes, are all vouchers of the same doctrine. Here, then, we find these venerable witnesses of the ancient Church positively maintaining a state of souls after death, wherein they are helped, favoured with a pardon of some sins, and mercifully dealt with by means of prayers, alms, and the holy sacrifice of the altar; and declaring that this was the doctrine and practice of the whole Church in their time; and that it was ordained by Christ and his Apostles. Hence, it is evident, that Popery, so far as regards the doctrine of purgatory, did not come into the world after the fifth century; and that, considering the testimony of these Fathers, whom Mr. Johnson cannot refuse to be members of the true Church, though he attempts to impugn their principles, it cannot be denied that Christianity, as it stood in the second, third, fourth, and fifth centuries, was something very different from modern Protestantism; and that it bore, in truth, a very close resemblance, in all material points, to the religion of the present Roman Catholic Church. Thus it is manifest, you will be compelled to relinquish all claim to the Fathers of the first four centuries, until you establish your title by adducing proofs of a more cogent character than those I have noticed; nor shall I offer another observation on the subject of purgatory until my statements shall have been first set aside by a more powerful authority than Job Tomkins, et hoc genus omne.

I have to apologize for the unusual length to which those observations have carried me; I shall, in future, confine myself to narrower limits.

I am sir, yours, with respect,
EDMOND POWER.

Mullinavat, March 1, 1854.

We have good hopes of coming to an agreement with Mr. Power at last. He praises the Fathers for "advancing nothing but what is supported by positive texts of Scripture;" for founding their doctrines, "not in any opinion of their own, either dogmatic or speculative, but in the Scriptures." If after so long asking in vain for proofs of Purgatory from the Fathers of the first three centuries, we get at last "positive texts of Scripture," Mr. Power has a fair chance of making converts of us. But, alas! the "positive texts of Scripture" dwindle down to one, whose reference to Purgatory Mr. Power will find it very hard to make out; and which is certainly not a positive text—if by that Mr. Power means a perspicuous one by which, Purgatory can be decisively demonstrated. Cardinal Bellarmine calls the text one of the most difficult and most useful in Scripture; and we believe its usefulness to him consisted in its difficulty. There was, in fact, a Scripture text in want of explanation, and a doctrine sadly in want of Scriptural proof. What could be more convenient than to pair them off together?

We refer to vol. i., p. 45, for a full discussion of the text, where it will be seen that several eminent Fathers interpret the passage without any allusion to Purgatory. However, now we shall only concern ourselves with St. Augustine's interpretation of the passage, and shall give a little fuller account of his views respecting it than Mr. Power (or the book from which he copied) thought proper to do. St. Augustine begins by telling us that the text is very difficult to be understood; that it was, no doubt, one of those passages in St. Paul's epistles which are "hard to be understood, and which the unlearned and unstable wrest to their own destruction." In fine, he says that he would prefer to hear the sentiments of others of more understanding and learning than himself. [Fateor me malle audire intelligentiores et doctiores.] If he is called on, however, to state his own opinion, the substance of it is this:—The being saved by fire, does not refer at all to those who die in grievous sin; and with regard to the rest, the fire spoken of is to try the work of all—as well of those whose work remaineth as of those who suffer loss. [Here we may remark is an important difference between the fire in 1 Cor. iii. and the Roman Catholic purgatorial fire, which does not try the works of the saints at all.] He goes on to explain the fire mentioned by the Apostle by referring it to the fire of earthly tribulation, and its different effects on those who sit loose to the world, and those who have suffered their affections to be too much engrossed by it. The first class, when deprived of earthly blessings, only lose that on which they have not set their hearts; the second class suffer great pain under similar privation; yet, inasmuch as they do not love these earthly things more than Christ, their final salvation is not hazarded.

St. Augustine goes on to say, that whether it be in this life only that men suffer such things, or whether something similar may take place after death; in either case, the explanation of the passage he has given is not far from the truth; in either case—that is, the interpretation which he was combating would be excluded—viz., that all sinners will eventually be saved so as by fire. If our readers will turn to the passages where St. Augustine discusses this question (viz., De fid. and op. Cap. 16, Enchirid. cap. 69. De Civ. Dei Lib xxi., c. 25), some of which we quote, in another article, p. 72, they will find, we think, that we have fairly represented his meaning. The truth is, that it was St. Augustine's private opinion—which he states in different places, with various degrees of confidence—that there might be some kind of purgatory after this life; but the hesitation he occasionally expresses that the doctrine "is not incredible"—that, "perhaps, it is true"—prove decisively that in his time the Church had no definite tradition on the subject.

In all the rest of Mr. Power's letters there is not a single quotation in proof of Purgatory. All is taken up with the old story—prayers for the dead. In his manner of conducting this controversy Mr. Power is like an artful shopkeeper, who, when not provided with the article asked for, tries to pawn off on his customer the thing most like it he has got. How often are we to tell Mr. Power that prayers for the dead are not Purgatory, and that many prayed for the dead who did not believe in Purgatory at all. In order to prove this, we need not go further than the instances Mr. Power has himself selected—Mr. Thorndike and Mr. Johnson: both believed that prayers for the dead was a laudable custom, not inconsistent with the teaching of the Church of England, and neither of them believed in Purgatory.

But Mr. Power objects, that because the Liturgy of the Church of England does not contain prayers for the dead, while such prayers are to be found in the primitive liturgies, therefore her Christianity must be very different from that of the first centuries. Now, such an objection cannot, with any consistency, be put forward by a member of the Church of Rome. For the position of that Church can only be defended by claiming for the Church of the present day a power to deviate in her public services as widely as possible from the practice of the primitive Church.

The Church of Rome acknowledges that the primitive Church used to communicate in both kinds, and yet she denies the cup to the laity. It is certain that the prayers of the primitive Church were always in a language understood by the people, and yet the prayers of the Church of Rome are in a language which but one in a hundred in this country understands. These are points in which the Church of Rome makes no scruple to deviate, not only from the practice of the primitive Church, but also to run counter to express directions of Scripture. How, then, can she find fault with the Church of England if she sees fit to discontinue prayers for the dead, for which Scripture contains no command at all?

We believe that the Church has full power to alter any parts of her ritual not enjoined in Scripture, if they are found to be practically inexpedient; and we think that the Church of England has very wisely discontinued the practice of prayers for the dead when they came to be mixed up in the minds of men with the belief that even those who had died in Christ were exposed to the most frightful torments in another state, and when this belief was made the engine for extorting money, in the most oppressive manner, from the sorrowing survivors.

FLOWERS FOR JUNE.

WE are now in the flowery month of June, and so abundant are the fair claimants on our attention, that our entire paper would fail to afford space sufficient to give them even a passing notice. So true is it, that > "He who would sing the flowers of June

> From the gray morn to blazing noon,
> Would find his summer daylight fail,
> And leave half told the pleasing tale."

But though we cannot notice all, we have no difficulty in selecting, as pre-eminent over others, the ROSE of June—the most commonly diffused, as it is the most generally admired, and cultivated of flowers. There is no considerable part of the earth, excepting Australia and South America, in which some one, or more of its 2,000 varieties, are not to be found; and, perhaps, further research may bring to light some representative of the family, even in this southern hemisphere.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the rose bears the same name in almost every language in Europe. It is the rose in English, French, German, and Danish; rosa in Italian and Spanish, as it was in the Latin; roza in Russian; ros in Irish and Welch; and rodon in the Greek. It seems as if its singular beauty had communicated its own identity to the language of civilized nations, and exempted it from the curse and confusion of Babel, that mankind might have one term in common to designate this one flower. If words be the coins that represent our thoughts and ideas, then this word fully realizes the project of a distinguished Irish prelate for an universal coinage, recognised and accepted by all civilized nations. But the rose has not only secured for itself a name of universal currency, but it has even stamped that name upon nations and countries. The beautiful island of Rhodes derives its name from the multitude of roses that grow upon it; and Syria is supposed to have acquired its name from a corruption of a word signifying the land of roses. And how many countries have claimed as their own some one variety of the rose. There is not only the rose of Damascus, which might, perhaps, be considered its birth-place, the Damask Rose (Rosa Damascena) imported into England from the Levant; and the delicate Chinese rose (Rosa Indica), which grows wild around Canton; and the French rose (Rosa Gallica), with its large open, flat, flowers; and the Provence rose (Rosa Centifolia), called from its numerous petals, closely folded over each other, like the cabbage; after which homely but respectable vegetable it is usually called. The Provence rose has for one of its varieties the beauteous moss rose, invested with a veil of moss to protect it from the chilly air of our northern latitude, which it loses when removed to the milder atmosphere of southern Europe. Then to come nearer home, we have the Scotch rose, with its varieties of pretty blush roses; and Ireland has her own peculiar rose, as we find in Mackay's "Flora Hibernica," the Rosa Hibernica, a small species of the family. So the Bourbons of France had their rose, well known by its rich, dark velvet leaves; and the royal houses of York and Lancaster had their roses; the York rose, red, and the Lancaster rose, white; and those rival emblems instead of being peaceful sisters, have confronted each other on the deadly battle-field, and were through four successive reigns, dyed in the noblest blood of England, in the memorable struggles, called the "War of the Roses," until the two royal houses and roses were united in the persons of Henry VII., of Lancaster, and Mary, of York. Since that happy event, the national badge of England has been the two roses of York and Lancaster united.

But not the least interesting of the roses is the wild dog-rose (Rosa Canina) found in our hedgerows, and among the heather, at this time of the year, in full and glorious blow. No garden rose surpasses it in the richness of its perfume; and it forms the sound and homely stock on which are engrafted all the varieties of rare and exotic roses cultivated by florists.

The ancients had a custom at their convivial meetings of suspending a white rose over the doorway, to indicate that nothing which passed at the feast was to transpire beyond. Hence, the white rose became the emblem of silence, and anything spoken under the rose (sub rosa) is expected not to be disclosed.

Our readers would be wearied were we to collect the allegorical and fanciful allusions to the rose to be found in the poetry of all nations, especially in the east where an annual festival is celebrated in honour of it.

In the sacred Scriptures, too, the rose is mentioned always with distinguished honour. The prophet Isaiah (who wrote more clearly of Christ, and the plan of free, full, perfect, and entire salvation, through his precious blood-shedding, than any other of the prophets) describes the flourishing character of Christ's kingdom, by the blossoming of the rose. The world is compared to the wilderness; but when the Sun of Righteousness shall have come, it is said "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it; the excellency of Carmel and Sharon; they shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God. And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called, the way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; no lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go thereon; but the redeemed shall walk thereon, and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—Isaiah xxxv. This is a very beautiful connection in which to find the rose mentioned; but can we pass from it without inquiring what is this way of holiness spoken of by the prophet, as about to be introduced when Christ should come. The answer is to be found in two short passages of the Bible (as well in the Douay as in the Protestant Version)—"I am the way, and the truth, and the life," says our Lord, in St. John's Gospel, xiv. 6. "Christ Jesus who of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption," says St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 30. This is the way of holiness which Isaiah foretold, and which has come to pass in the person of Christ Jesus.

In another place, Christ is represented as addressing his Church under the figure of a rose—"I am the rose of Sharon."—Canticles ii. 1. Sharon was the name of several delightful spots in Canaan, noted for the excellency of their roses; and as the rose was deemed superior in loveliness to all other flowers, so Christ presents himself to his believing Church, as combining in his person, character, office, and mediation, every excellency.

The LILY, next to the rose, is the flower, perhaps, most of all invested with traditions and associations of the past. It is, both in fiction and fact, a formidable rival of the rose. It is even said that the flowers once elected the lily as their queen, but afterwards deposed her in favour of the rose.

The white lily (Lilium candidum) appears this month in all its beauty and purity. It can scarcely be the lily mentioned in the Canticles or Song of Solomon, or in our Lord's Sermon on the Mount, as it does not grow, as a wild flower in Syria. The fields of Palestine do abound with a species of amaryllis, generally supposed to correspond with our scarlet Martagon lily (Lilium Chalcedonicum), and which, especially in Galilee, was in flower at the season of the year when our Lord delivered his discourse on the Mount, and alluded to the lilies of the field as surpassing the splendour of Solomon in the beauty of their attire. In the Canticles or Song of Solomon, the lily of the valley or of the lowly places, is introduced, perhaps, as an emblem of the humiliation of Christ, in taking our nature upon him, and dwelling among sinful men.

The lily (Fleur de lis) was the heraldic device of the French monarchy, during the long reign of the Bourbon family.

So the BROOM, a much humbler plant, was the device of a haughtier race—the Plantagenets of England. The "bonnaie broom" (Genesta scoparia), now in luxuriant blossom, with its myriads of golden flowers glittering over hill and heather, and gladdening the heart of the former, who regards its luxuriance as an earnest of a plenteous harvest, gave to the family which so long occupied the throne of England their patronymic of Plantagenet, Planta genista. One tradition maliciously reports that an ancient warrior of the race acquired the name as a soubriquet, having submitted to an ecclesiastical admonition, in the shape of a flagellation with a birch rod. Another tradition—we hope more veracious—tells that Geoffry, Earl of Anjou, having once placed a sprig of the broom in his helmet on the day of battle, thence acquired the name of Plantagenet. Be this as it may, no haughtier race ever swayed the sceptre of England than that which adopted its name and device from the lowly broom.

It is generally supposed that the same shrub is referred to in Scripture, in the history of Elijah, when the prophet, fearing a wicked woman (Jezebel), and mistrusting the power and faithfulness of his God, fled into the wilderness, and sat down under a juniper tree (Rothem, or broom shrub), and cried—"It is enough now, O Lord, take away my life, for I am not better than my fathers." Sad instance of human weakness and unbelief; and yet the angel of the Lord was at hand, and, while the prophet slept, touched him, and said, "Arise and eat."

That the broom plant is that referred to is rather confirmed by the poet Virgil, who speaks of the humble broom as giving grateful shelter to the cattle from the burning rays of the southern sun.*

We have another native of the heather and moorlands, hills and commons, in the FURZE (Ulex Europæus), whose bright-yellow flowers are known to us all, greeting us, from May till September, with their sweet perfume. With us the furze is an evergreen, and hardy enough to bear the coldest winds and frosts; but in more northern climates it will not grow; and the great naturalist, Linnæus, in vain attempted to introduce it into Sweden. It is the poor man's flower and also the poor man's firing, and affords him a more fragrant fuel, than his rich neighbour can command. In Russia, the furze is cultivated in greenhouses as a rare exotic, and Linnæus is said to have fallen on his knees, and thanked God for its loveliness, when first he beheld it; and yet how little, comparatively, do we prize it or the best gifts of God when they are most profusely bestowed.

The French call it Jonc marine, from its thriving so well on the sea shore; the Scotch call it gorse, and the Irish call it whin. There was discovered, about forty years ago, in the Marquis of Londonderry's park, in the county of Down, a very curious variety of the wild furze, with double flowers, now called the Irish whin—a very luxuriant and well furnished plant for the garden or shrubbery, and now propagated in nurseries.

Passing from the heather to the woods and bye-ways, we meet the fragrant SWEET-BRIER rose (Rosa rubigenosa)—the eglantine of the poets. It is a genuine member of the rose family, though very wild in its nature, and truly emblematic of simplicity. Here we also meet the rich red and yellow clusters of the HONEYSUCKLE, or woodbine (Caprifolium, so called from its goat-like propensities of climbing). Along the ditches we may also meet the wild scarlet POPPY. The common red poppy (Papaver rhœum) was in more esteem with the farmers of the olden times than it seems to be with the more matter-of-fact men of our day. They regarded the flowers of the poppy among their wheat as a guarantee of the richness of the soil and the success of their cultivation. Now-a-days the poppy is regarded as a most troublesome intruder, and the very emblem and personification of impudence; and, in truth, the poppies do look so proud and saucy, that, without much stretch of the imagination, we might fancy them singing—

> "We little red-caps are among the corn,
> Merrily dancing at early morn.
> We know that the farmer hates to see
> Our saucy red faces—but here are we.
> We pay no price for our summer coats,
> Like those slavish creatures, barley and oats.
> We don't choose to be ground and eat,
> Like our heavy-head neighbour, gaffer wheat.
> Who dare thrash us, we should like to know,
> Grind us, and bag us, and use us so?
> Let meaner and shabbier things than we
> So stupidly bend to utility."

But yet the reaper comes, in due season, to reap the wheat; and then the poor popples shake in their scarlet coats; and well they may, for while the corn is safely gathered and garnered up, the poppy weeds are cast into the fire to be burnt. What an emblem of the arrogance and pride of so many of our poor worldlings, who flaunt for a while in the summer sun of prosperity, and fancy they are the ornaments of the earth, and know not that, but for the righteous few, whom they despise, they would not be suffered to grow one hour, and are spared because the harvest time has not yet arrived, and that until then they cannot be separated without injury to the wheat.

Passing again from the roadside to the meadow and riverside, we meet a sweet and lowly little flower, known to everybody by the engaging name of FORGET-ME-NOT (Myosotis palustris), or water scorpion grass. It is most commonly found along the margin of a running stream, or in marshy places; another species of it is found in the fields (Myosotis arvensis). A great deal of poetry has been written about the forget-me-not, much too sentimental for our pages; but every lover of flowers must, one time or other, have admired a little flower with brilliant blossoms of intense, clear blue, like a turquoise, and a small, rich golden centre, fringing the banks of a stream during the summer months, though he may not have written verses upon it, or sung as Coleridge did of > "The blue and bright-eyed flowret of the brook, > Hope's gentle gem, the sweet forget-me-not."

One of the many legends accounting for the name of the forget-me-not, as it is narrated by a bishop, in verse, we being laymen may venture to give in prose. It says the name was taken from the dying words of a gallant knight who was drowned in the rapids of the Danube, while attempting to gather the flowers for a lady, on the banks of the river. Miss Strickland, the historian of the Queens of England, has lately given a more historical, if less romantic, derivation to the name. She says that one of the royal Plantagenet princes, the banished Henry of Lancaster, gave the flower to his fair hostess, the Duchess of Bretagne, as a parting appeal to memory, with his watchword, "Souvenyne vous de moy," and thus enlisted her active and valuable assistance and sympathy in his behalf. The forget-me-not thus became not only the emblem of remembrance, but an historical flower, like the fatal roses of York, Lancaster, and Stuart, the lily of Bourbon, and the violet of Napoleon.

With the sentimental trash, of which volumes have been indited, respecting the forget-me-not, we profess to have no sympathy; but yet it is impossible to take the sweet little flower from the hand of a friend or loved one, without paying tribute to the sentiment interwoven with its name. If our thoughts of others were to last no longer than while they are present to the eye, life would lose one of its holiest and happiest employments. The forget-me-not, as a gage of friendship to a parting friend, seems well to say—

> "Oh, think of me in the calm, holy hour,
> Devotion's own, when thou in prayer art bending.
> On thee may heaven every blessing shower;
> Still let our prayers, though absent, thus be blending.'

This sort of remembrance we find abundantly exemplified in the Scriptures. Paul, writing to Timothy, says—"I thank my God that, without ceasing, I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day."—2 Tim. i. 3. Again, to the Colossians, St. Paul writes—"We do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will."—Col. i. 9. The same Apostle appeared to set a like value on the prayers of others for himself, for he writes to the Thessalonians—"Finally, brethern, pray for us, that the Word of God may have free course and be glorified, even as it is with you."—2 Thess. iii. 6; and also he wrote to the Hebrews—"Pray for us." Heb. xiii. 18. This, however, is a very different matter from praying for the dead, for which no warrant is to be found in the Scripture, and we read of no prayers for the departed Stephen, nor the many early Christians who have died in the lifetime of the Apostles.

* "Humilesque genestæ
Aut illæ pecori frondem aut pastoribus umbras Sufficiunt."

FARM OPERATIONS FOR JUNE.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

THE present genial, dropping weather, if properly taken advantage of, must greatly facilitate all farming operations—the baked-up earth absorbing every drop of moisture, and as it falls slaking the hardened clods, and enabling the harrows, rollers, and clod-crushers to reduce them to the finest possible tilth, for the reception of either seeds or plants. The utmost exertion is, therefore, now necessary in forwarding all those operations, and in getting in all seeds and plants suitable to the season.

Carrots and Parsnips will require close attention. The same directions given for the management of Swedes and mangel are applicable to carrots and parsnips, with this difference, that the plants should be singled out to eight or nine inches, plant from plant. Spare no exertions in the extirpation of weeds, for if allowed to get a-head while the plants are young, no after-culture will restore them.

Beans and Peas, if sown in drills, will require horse-hoeing, and a little fresh earth thrown up to the plant by the double mould-board plough.

Buckwheat may be sown on exhausted land, after being ploughed and thoroughly cleaned for the purpose of ploughing it in as green manure, as a preparation for wheat or other corn crops, the crop should be rolled down with a heavy roller, and ploughed in when in flower.

Cabbages should be planted before the end of the month to insure a remunerative crop; they require good, deep land, and plenty of manure.

Potatoes should be kept thoroughly clean and well earthed up; but after the tops are grown long, the crop should not be trespassed amongst.

New and Recent Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

MORE WORLDS THAN ONE. The Creed of the Philosopher, and the Hope of the Christian. By Sir David Brewster. 6s.

THE LAND OF SINIM; or, China and Chinese Missions. By the Rev. William Gillespie. 5s.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY; with an Inquiry into the Causes of its Inefficiency: with a especial reference to the Ministry of the Establishment. By the Rev. Charles Bridges, A.M. Eighth Edition; corrected and enlarged. 10s. 6d.

PITCAIRN; the Island, the People, and the Pastor. By Rev. Thomas Boyles Murray. 3s.

FIRST FRUITS OF AN EARLY-GATHERED HARVEST. Twelve Sermons by the Rev. Moore Macintosh, A.B. With an Introductory Memoir by the Rev. Arthur Rowan, D.D. 3s.

LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, IN EXETER HALL. 1853-54. 4s.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE ORGANIZATION AND GOVERNMENT OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH. By Rev. Albert Barnes. 2s.

CLAUDE, THE COLPORTEUR. By the Author of "Mary Powell." 7s. 6d.

THE CONDITION AND PROSPECTS OF THE GREEK, OR ORIENTAL CHURCH. By George Waddington, D.D. 3s. 6d.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

RUSSIA AND THE RUSSIANS; comprising an account of the Czar Nicholas, and the House of Romanoff, with a sketch of the Encroachments of Russia from the reign of the Empress Catherine. By J. H. Cole, 21st Fusileers. 2s. 6d.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAMPAIGN OF 1828-29; with a View of the present State of the Eastern Question. By Colonel Chesney. 12s.

TURKEY, RUSSIA, THE BLACK SEA, AND CIRCASSIA. By Captain Spencer. With Coloured Illustrations and a Map. 6s.

LIVES OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, NICHOLAS I.; AND THE SULTAN OF TURKEY, ABDUL MEDJID KHAN. By the Rev. Henry Christmas. 2s. 6d.

CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOGRAPHY, containing the Lives of the most Ramarkable Individuals of all Times and Nations. Edited by E. Rich. With 150 Illustrations. 12s. 6d.

TRANSCAUCASIA. Sketches of the Nations and Races between the Black Sea and the Caspian. By Baron Von Haxthausen. 18s.

HOME TRUTHS: being Miscellaneous Addresses and Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Kyle. 3rd Series. 3s. 6d.

EXAMINATION OF MR. MAURICE'S THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS. By Robert S. Candlish, D.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HOPE DEFERRED, NOT LOST; a Narrative of Missionary effort in South America. With Journals of Captain Gardiner, &c. 5s.

THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANT REFUGEES, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Charles Weiss. 8vo. 14s.

ON THE PLURALITY OF WORLDS. An Essay. 8vo. 8s.

LECTURES ON ARCHITECTURE AND PAINTING, delivered at Edinburgh, in November, 1853. By John Ruskin. 8s. 6d.

ORR'S CIRCLE OF THE SCIENCES. A Series of Treatises on the Principles of Science, with the application to Practical Pursuits. Vol. I. 2s. 6d.

THE MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART. Edited by Dr. Lardner. Vols. I. and II. 1s. 6d. each.

THE CHEMISTRY OF COMMON LIFE. By James F. W. Johnston. Vol. I. 5s.

LESSONS and TRIALS OF LIFE. By the Author of "Bertha's Journal." 6s.

WORK: PLENTY TO DO AND HOW TO DO IT. By Margaret Maria Brewster. 4s.

THE LADY UNA AND HER QUEENDOM; or, Reform at the Right End By the Author of "Home Truths for Home Peace." 7s.

THE WORKS OF THE REV. SIDNEY SMITH. New Edition. 3 vols. Fcap. 8vo. 21s.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY: a Narrative for the Young, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. With an Introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

THE WORKS OF SIR JAMES MACRINTOSH. New Edition. 3 vols. Fcap. 8vo. 21s.

CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL ESSAYS. By the Right Hon. Thomas Babington Macaulay. 3 vols. 21s.

ALISON'S HISTORY of EUROPE, from the fall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the Establishment of Military Government in France, in 1852; being a continuation of his former celebrated Work. Vols. I., II., and III. 8vo. 15s. each.

THE LIFE OF MRS. SHERWOOD. Edited by her Daughter. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MEMOIR OF THE LIVES OF ROBERT AND JAMES A. HALDANE. By Alexander Haldane, Esq. 8vo. 12s.

THE BUD OF PROMISE: a Memoir of Eliza H. M. Græme. By the Rev. D. Pitcairn. 3s. 6d.

MY SCHOOLS AND MY SCHOOLMASTERS; or, the Story of my Education. By Hugh Miller. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CHALMERS'S DAILY SCRIPTURE READINGS. 2 vols. 10s.

CHALMERS'S SABBATH SCRIPTURE READINGS. 2 vols. 10s.

MEMOIRS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his Son-in-Law, the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D. 2 vols. 12s.

PLAIN SPEAKING. First series. Being forty short, Large-type Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle, B.A. In packet. 1s.

GRATITUDE: an Exposition of the Hundred and Third Psalm. By the Rev. John Stevenson. 8vo. 6s.

SYNONYMS of the NEW TESTAMENT. By Rev. Richard Chenevix Trench. 5s.

A SELECTION of ENGLISH SYNONYMS. Edited by Archbishop Whately. 3s.

ON THE STUDY of WORDS. By Rev. Richard C. Trench. 3s. 6d.

ON THE LESSONS in PROVERBS. By Rev. Rd. C. Trench. 3s.

A NEW DICTIONARY of SYNONYMS, arranged in alphabetical order. By D. L. Mackenzie. 3s. 6d.

QUICKSANDS on FOREIGN SHORES. Edited by Mrs. Whately. 3s. 6d.

THE DENS of LONDON: Notes and Narratives of a Six Years' Mission among them. By R. W. Vanderkiste. Cheap Edition. 1s. 6d.

BLACK'S GUIDE BOOKS for TOURISTS; with Road Maps and numerous Illustrations:—
I. England, 10s. 6d. II. Scotland, 8s. 6d. III. Ireland, 6s.

HANDBOOK of ANGLING: teaching Fly-fishing, Trolling, Bottom-fishing, and Salmon-fishing. By Ephemera. 5s.

THE SEASIDE BOOK: being an Introduction to the Natural History of the British Coasts. By W. H. Harvey, M.D. New Edition. 5s.

A BOOK for the SEASIDE. With numerous Engravings. 3s. 6d.

A POPULAR HISTORY of BRITISH SEA-WEEDS, with Notices of some of the Fresh-water Algæ. By Rev. D. Landsborough. 10s. 6d.

A POPULAR HISTORY of BRITISH FERNS, comprising all the Species. By Thomas Moore. Coloured Illustrations. 10s. 6d.

JOHNSTON'S MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR, in the Danubian Principalities. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S NEW MAP OF THE BLACK SEA, CAUCASUS, CRIMEA, ETC., with enlarged plans of Sevastopol and the Bosphorus. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S CHART OF THE NORTH SEA, and the BALTIC, with the Countries adjoining; and Enlarged Plans of Cronstadt and Revel. 1s.

Lately Published,

WILLET'S "SYNOPSIS PAPISMI." New Edition. Edited by the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. Ten vols. 8vo. Price £3.

London: JAMES MILLER, 17, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, and all Booksellers.

About June 15 will be published,

THE INSPIRATION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE, its Nature and Proof. Eight Discourses preached before the University of Dublin. By William Lee, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College.

Dublin: JAMES M'GLASHAN, 50, Upper Sackville-street. London: RIVINGTONS, Waterloo-place.

A SERMON FOR THE TIMES.

Just published, price 6d., or by Post.

A Sermon, preached at Evington, Parish of Painstown, in the Morning, also, at Carlow, in the Evening, on the Day of General Fast and Humiliation, April 26, 1854. By the Rev. William L. Pownall, A.M.

(Published by request; the profits to be devoted to the Irish Society.)

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street. Carlow: THOMAS EDWARDS.

Just Published, Fcap. 8vo., Price 2s. 6d.

I.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION: Being Comments on First Corinthians, chapter xv. By the Rev. Robert Noble, A.M., Vicar of Athboy.

II.

Fcap. 8vo., cloth, price 1s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ELOCUTION: Compiled from "The Elements of Rhetoric, by Archbishop Whately." With considerable additions and alterations.

III.

New Edition, Fcap. 8vo., cloth, Price 2s. 6d.

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND,

Catechetically Explained, Compared with Scripture, and Briefly Commented upon, with the Date and Origin of each Collect annexed. For the use of Families and Sunday Schools.

By the Rev. Charles Miller, A.B.,

With Recommendatory Preface by the Bishop of Meath.

IV.

Fcap. 8vo., Neat Cover, Price 1s.

Cloth, 1s. 6d.; Cloth, Gilt Edges, 2s.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD: Showing how Irish people talk about Irish doings, when they get a quiet place, at the back of a ditch, or under a hedge.

V.

Royal 32mo., Price One Halfpenny each.

Stories about the Mission Work in Ireland.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF A DARK CLOUD.
BIDDY LACY.
FLOWERS TRANSPLANTED.
THE SHORES OF LOUGH CORRIB.
THE FIRST SCHOOLS IN CLIFDEN.

(The Series to be continued).

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH.

CHEAP ISSUE

OF THE

SELECT WORKS OF DR. CHALMERS.

Edited by the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D.

In Monthly Parts, at . . . . 1s. 0d.
In Half Volumes—two each quarter, at 2s. 6d.
Quarterly Volumes, cloth . . . 6s. 0d.

Part I. and first Half Vol., commencing with Lectures on the Epistle to the Romans, on 1st July, 1854.

Subscribers supplied by WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

JUNE, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Gloir do Dhia an fna hárduib, agus síodcáin air an dtalamh deaghoil do na dáoinib.

Luke ii. 14.

PUBLISHED THE MIDDLE OF EVERY MONTH, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 31. JULY, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 3s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

PAGE.

The Variations and Revelations of Romanism—No. II. . . 79
Modern Worship in Rome—No. III.—Indulgences . . . 81
Extravagant of Pope John XXII.—Our Lord God the Pope . 82
Are the Doctrines and Practices of the Reformed Churches or those of the Church of Rome the more obnoxious to the charge of Heresy? 83
Spurious Works attributed to the Fathers—St. Athanasius and St. Basil 84
The Invocation of Saints—No. II. 84
General charges against the CATHOLIC LAYMAN—Proofs challenged—An honest Capuchin Friar's Plan for putting down Slander . 85
CORRESPONDENCE:
On Purgatory—by Mr. Collette 86
On Infallibility—by Mr. Rourke 87
Must the Divinely authorized Interpreters of a Revelation be necessarily infallible?—by a Kildare Churchman . . 88
Flowers for July 89
Farming Operations for July 90

VARIATIONS OF ROMANISM—No. II.

WE are told in the "Vicar of Wakefield" of a worthy lady who would never allow her daughters to go about without gold in their pocket; but the poor girls only carried the guinea in their purse under strict orders that they were on no account to change it, and were never to spend a penny of it. For our part, we would rather have a shilling that we might spend, than a guinea that we were only to make a brag of.

Now, we have good reason for thinking that the boasted infallibility of the Church of Rome is like Miss Primrose's guinea—intended for show, and not for use. We refer those of our readers, who have preserved our early numbers, to an article in our first number, "Does the Church of Rome believe in her own infallibility," for some of the grounds of our opinion. They will there see how the Church of Rome allows her members to work out their controversies among themselves, precisely in the same way as members of communities which do not profess to be infallible—they will see how she shuffles and evades decisions on disputed questions, and how the disputants themselves do not care to obtain a decision from her, as they would if they really sought to know the truth, and believed that she was able to declare it to them—and they will see how, on the other hand, the disputants interpose delays, and endeavour to prevent her deciding in favour of their adversaries, because they know that, though her ultimate decision will not necessarily be the truth, they will be bound to submit to it. The infallibility, then, in short, of the Church of Rome is a treasure which she is fond of boasting of, when in controversy with those who make no pretensions to it, but which when it is required by her own members she will not spend a penny of.

A remarkable instance of this economy of the Church of Rome is afforded by the controversy of the Immaculate Conception. Mr. Newman, somewhere or other, apologizes for the dissensions between Roman Catholics somewhat as follows:—"Catholics dispute among themselves as long as the infallible judge is silent; the judge speaks, and then all controversy is hushed." Now, he would have been far nearer to the truth if he had altered the order of the latter two clauses, and said—"All controversy is hushed, and then the judge speaks." There was a time when this subject of the Immaculate Conception was the subject of the fiercest disputes; when each of the contending parties charged each other with deadly heresy; when private Christians, puzzled by the opposite statements of learned men on both sides, must have turned anxiously to the infallible judge, in the hope to learn from him the true doctrine which they were to believe; but all this time their infallible guide was silent. He trimmed and wavered between both parties, and sought to make peace between them, without giving a triumph to either. Was this like the infallible guide of Christians? or would the most ignorant layman have acted very differently if he had the misfortune to be the governor of a body, divided into two powerful parties, and were called on to pronounce a decision between them, on a subject he knew nothing about? Now, however, that it is a subject Roman Catholics have ceased disputing about; now that a decision can give no information to anybody; now that every one knows beforehand what way the decision will go; now, we understand, the Pope intends to be kind enough to pronounce judgment on this subject—we fear we shall gain as little knowledge from the directions of such a guide as from the predictions of the celebrated infallible prophet who undertook to tell the winner of every race—after the race was run.

We are not so unreasonable as to expect that an infallible guide (if such a thing there be) should pronounce a decision on every subject which may chance to become a matter of discussion among Christians. Some points may be debated which are matters of mere speculation, and on which the Almighty has vouchsafed to give us no certain information. On such topics we think it would be no disgrace to one professing to be the infallible guide of Christendom, were he also to keep silence. But there are other matters respecting which we may be sure that one appointed by God to teach his people, without risk of error, cannot fail to be correctly informed. For instance, we should not credit the pretensions of one who claimed to be an infallible guide, if he were unable to settle the canon of Scripture; and if he could not distinguish between true Revelations from God, and the heated fancies of silly enthusiasts. Both within and without the pale of the Church of Rome, it has happened that persons whose thoughts have been much occupied about religion, have supposed themselves to be favoured with miraculous communications from God. Such persons were St. Theresa, Johanna Southcote, St. Gertrude, &c. Now, among Protestants, persons of this kind do not find it easy to get any one to listen to their pretensions; they are joined by no sober-minded person; they collect a few foolish people, for a while, into a small sect; and, in a few years, there is an end of them. But, in the Church of Rome, these pretenders not only gather a larger band of followers, but they meet with no opposition, even from those of their communion who do not believe in them. Few Roman Catholics would grudge any honours (not even excepting the title of saint) given to a pious woman of this kind, even though they think it no part of their faith to believe in her asserted Revelations.

Now, what we wish to point out is, that there can be no medium in this matter. Any one who claims to have received a Revelation from God, must be either as much deluded as Johanna Southcote, or as much inspired as St. Paul. We believe what St. Peter and St. Paul taught, not because they said it, but because God communicated their doctrine to them; and if there be any one else to whom God has revealed truths, we are bound to receive such truths with the same reverence and assent which we give to what was taught by the Apostles themselves. We complain, then, that there is in the Church of Rome a mass of teaching which claims to be Revelation from God himself, and which, as such, demands our unhesitating allegiance; that no Roman Catholic can tell, with the certainty of faith, whether such claims are well founded or not; that a difference of opinion on this subject prevails among them; and that their infallible guide has never been able to solve the difficulty. In short, there prevails in the Church of Rome the greatest uncertainty as to the grand question of the RULE OF FAITH.

There is in the Roman Catholic Church a mass of teaching which claims to be founded on direct Revelations from God, given to men and women, on whom that Church has bestowed the highest title of saints, and yet no Roman Catholic can tell, with the certainty of faith, whether these are true Revelations, or mere fanatical delusions. Why does not their infallible guide come forward and solve this difficulty? Is it that he does not know how?

The authority of these asserted Revelations is not a mere speculative question; for doctrines are founded on them; and, indeed, on them is based a great part of the teaching given by Roman Catholic pastors to their flocks. We shall take as an example to illustrate our assertion the doctrine of Purgatory, on which we made some observations in our last number. We there expressed our conviction that the belief even in the existence of such a place as Purgatory, had its origin in legends and in stories of visions and revelations. We could, if space permitted, give many examples of the kind of stories which were devoutly believed in the middle ages, and which were instrumental in fastening the belief of this doctrine on the minds of the people. Many of our educated Roman Catholic readers, we are aware, would give as little credence to such stories as we do ourselves, and will indignantly deny that such legends had any share in fostering their belief in Purgatory. And yet, how often may we observe that a man's belief in an opinion may remain even long after he has ceased to give credence to the stories in which his belief originated? How many a one who has heard in the nursery stories of ghosts and apparitions, will tremble in the dark, long after he has been convinced of the falsity of the stories out of which his fears have originated? Just so, the belief in Purgatory has survived the legends out of which it took its origin; and the arguments which educated Roman Catholics now advance in its behalf, from Scripture and tradition, are only an afterthought, contrived to afford some more plausible account of their belief than that which facts will justify.

We propose, however, in the present article, to deal not with the mere Tridentine doctrine of Purgatory, but with the improvements that have been made in the doctrine since the Council of Trent, and with the doctrine as at present popularly taught by priests of the Church of Rome.

The Council of Trent (whose rule of faith embraced only Scripture and tradition), though not wanting in courage to build a large fabric of doctrine on a narrow enough foundation of Scripture and history, yet, on this doctrine of Purgatory, was able to assert nothing more positive than the vague statement, "that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the prayers of the faithful." But modern Roman Catholics are not contented with so scanty information; and as their rule of faith embraces not only Scripture and tradition, but new revelations as well, they have access to lights which the Fathers of Trent had not. We take from Father Faber's book, "All for Jesus," of which we gave some account in the last number, the following points of doctrine concerning Purgatory, which were unknown to the Council of Trent, but are now propounded on the authority of Revelations, for the undoubting assent of the Roman Catholic laity. And our readers must remember, that the book from which we quote only treats of Purgatory incidentally; we could much enlarge our list did we make use of a work treating professedly of that subject.

We request our readers to turn back to our article on the "Variations of Romanism," in the last number, and they will find in the quotations there given how much of the doctrine of Purgatory, as taught by Father Faber, is based on asserted Revelations; and we only add here his proof of the antiquity of this line of argument. "In the subject matter of Purgatory we may, with the less scruple, make use of such Revelations, from the example of so grave an authority as Cardinal Bellarmine himself, who, in his treatise of Purgatory, as I have already said, adds always some private Revelations as a distinct head of proof"—p. 396.

We now give a list of some of the new points of doctrine taught by Mr. Faber on this authority.

(1) The Virgin Mary is Queen of Purgatory, and the Archangel Michael is her prime minister.

"Look at that vast kingdom of Purgatory with its Empress Mother, Mary"—p. 8.

"Mary's kingdom of Purgatory."—p. 9. "The glorious secretary of that wide realm, the blessed Michael, Mary's subject."—p. 9. "That still, calm, patient realm, over which Mary is crowned as Queen, and Michael, as the perpetual ambassador of her mercy."—p. 355. [Mary is] in a particular sense, the Queen of Purgatory"—p. 373. "St. Michael, Prince of Purgatory, and our Lady's Regent"—p. 376.

We should like to know on what authority Mr. Faber states all this?

(2) The souls in Purgatory cannot help themselves; Jesus cannot help them, and (what appears to Mr. Faber still more astonishing) even the Virgin Mary cannot help them; they depend altogether on us; they depend more on earth than on heaven.

"The state of the holy souls is one of the most unbounded helplessness. They cannot do penance; they cannot merit; they cannot satisfy; they cannot gain indulgences; they have no sacraments; they are not under the jurisdiction of God's vicar, overflowing with the plenitude of means of grace and manifold benedictions. They are a portion of the Church without either priesthood or altar at their command"—p. 369.

"In what strange abandonment of supernatural suffering has the love of Jesus left them! He longs for their deliverance—yet He has tied His own hands, or nearly so. He gives them no more grace; He allows them no more time for merit; He prevents them from meriting; nay, some have thought they could not pray. How, then, stands the case with the souls in the suffering Church? Why it is a thing to be meditated on when we have said it—they depend almost more on earth than on heaven, almost more on us than on Him."

"They lie like the paralytic at the pool. Not even the coming of the angel is any blessing to them, unless there be some one of us to help them. Some have even thought they cannot pray; anyhow, they have no means of making themselves heard by us, on whose charity they depend.* Some writers have said that our Blessed Lord will not help them without our co-operation; and that our Blessed Lady cannot help them, except in indirect ways, because she is no longer able to make satisfaction, though I never like to hear of anything our dearest Mother cannot do"—p .368.

It is remarkable that it does not shock Mr. Faber to hear of the Saviour's hands being tied; but the moment it is asserted that the Blessed Virgin is equally powerless, then his feelings are revolted.

"God has given us such power over the dead that they seem, as I said before, to depend almost more on earth than on heaven"—p. 349.

"Beautiful is the helplessness in which, for the love of us, Jesus mostly wills to be, with regard to His dear sponses in Purgatory, whose entrance into glory His heart is so impatiently awaiting"—p. 350.

We again ask, what is the authority on which the doctrines here taught rest? Have they any foundation in Scripture or antiquity? It is too easy to point out the interest which certain persons had in propounding it. It was a natural thought to occur to men, when asked to expend their money in masses for the souls of their departed friends in Purgatory, that the love of Jesus, to the souls whose sins were forgiven for His sake, could not suffer them to undergo any needless suffering; and that we might safely trust Him to grant them their release the moment the time of their purification was accomplished. We can readily understand how a Roman Catholic priest might become alarmed lest a notion should become prevalent so destructive to his chief source of gain; yet we are amazed at the courage of him who first dared to counteract this opinion, by asserting that Jesus wished to relieve the sufferings of those souls, but was not able; that He had tied His own hands, and put it out of His power; and that, in the prayers offered on earth now consisted their only resource.

(3) The third point of novel doctrine propounded by Mr. Faber is, that we may not only pray for the souls in purgatory, but may do any good work for the benefit of any particular soul, and forward it for his use and benefit with as great certainty of its reaching its destination as we have with regard to a letter sent through the Post-office.

"In this devotion it is His hands we are moving as we would move the unskilful hands of a child [!!]. Dearest Lord, that He should let us do these things! That He should let us do with his satisfactions what we will, and sprinkle His precious blood as if it were so much water from the nearest well! That we should limit the efficacy of His unbloody sacrifice [!], and name souls to Him, and expect Him to obey us, and that He should do so"—p. 350.

"It [a Christian soul] can speak up to heaven and be heard and obeyed there. It can spend the satisfactions of Jesus as if they were its own, and can undo bolts and bars in Purgatory, and choose by its own determinate will whom it will liberate, and whom it will pass over."—p. 95.

"The difficult doctrine of satisfaction is no difficulty to the faith of this devotion. It moves about in it with the greatest ease, makes its own arrangements, transfers its satisfactions hither and thither, one in one direction, another in another, making quite sure of God being agreeable to it all"—p. 379.

"It acts, with regard to indulgences, as if they were the most inevitable natural transactions of the world. It knows of the unseen treasure out of which they come, of the unseen keys which open the treasury, of the indefinite jurisdiction which places them infallibly at its disposal, of God's unrevealed [How can any one know what God has not revealed?] acceptance of them, and of the invisible work they do, just as it knows of trees and clouds, of streets and churches—that is, just as certainly and undoubtingly; though it often can give others no proof of these things, nor account for them to itself"—p. 379.

After this honest confession, it would be cruel to ask Mr. Faber on what authority he holds this doctrine. We shall, however, amuse our readers by quoting from Mr. Faber (p. 42) a practical puzzle arising out of it. Supposing you can send an indulgence to any soul in Purgatory you please, and you have no friend at the time in very pressing need of one, to whom had you better send one? "There was an old Spanish Jesuit, who could not for the life of him make up his mind whether it was better to gain an indulgence for the soul in Purgatory that was most neglected and forgotten, or for the soul that was nearest to its release and entrance into glory. There was a puzzle; both were sweet acts of charity; but which was the sweetest? which would Jesus most approve? He was such a kind-hearted man that good father, that he inclined very much to the poor, neglected soul, just because it was so neglected: it went to his heart to pass over that forgotten soul. But at last he decided in favour of the other; and now see the reasons—(1) Although it seems the greater mercy to offer it for the other soul, because it is most in want, seeing that it is in greater misery; notwithstanding, charity is a greater virtue than mercy; and it is a greater act of charity to offer the indulgence to the soul that was most just, and loved God most—looking singly to the greater glory of the Divine Majesty as the maker of that soul—for it is nearest to its entry into heaven, where it will at once begin to glorify God immensely by its praises and its bliss.

(2) Again, the soul is not properly the full conquest of Jesus till it is safely landed in heaven; and was it not better to keep the poor neglected soul waiting in Purgatory than to keep Jesus waiting in Heaven? and besides, all this sadness about passing over the forgotten soul, would it not make Jesus smile; and something would be done for that poor soul.'

(3) And now comes the most practical reason of all—

"Furthermore, thought the good old Jesuit, the sooner this soul, that is so near heaven, gets into heaven, the sooner will it begin to gain all manner of graces from God for my soul, and for the souls of sinners upon earth. And so away went the indulgence to the soul that was nearest its release, not without a very fervent sigh, and a very wistful look to Mary, and a very comfortable suspicion that Jesus would do something extra for the poor forgotten soul." But the good old Jesuit forgot that (if Mr. Faber's theory be true) the Redeemer had tied up his own hands. The Jesuit might do one thing or other with his indulgence, but he could not do both. If he chose to employ it in the way most profitable to his own soul, he had no grounds for his comfortable suspicion that the forgotten soul would be the better of his good wishes when he denied it more solid comfort.

Another question discussed by Mr. Faber is, whether is it better, when we gain an indulgence, to keep it for ourselves, or to give it to the souls in Purgatory. Mr. Faber decides in favour of the latter course; first, because the merit we acquire by the charity of giving away an indulgence will do us more good than the indulgence would, were we to keep it for ourselves. This is something like the charity of the greedy little boy who proposed to himself the question, is it better to spend my penny in buying a cake for myself, or in giving it to this blind beggar? He decided on giving it to the beggar, because he knew that his aunt, who was with him, would be sure to give him sixpence to reward his benevolence.

Another of his arguments is, that, by keeping the indulgence for ourselves, we should be a long time out of the interest of our money. It may be thirty or forty years before we get to Purgatory, and, meanwhile, the indulgence is doing no good to anybody. Suppose we send it on to Purgatory, and get some soul into Heaven with it, he will be bound, in honour and gratitude, to do more for us, by his prayers (which will then be all-powerful) than will make up to us the value of the indulgence which we have lost.

"*The suffering of the holy souls is without any gain or profit to themselves, whereby they can increase their merits; and so long as they are detained in Purgatory so long is the Heavenly Jerusalem deprived of her citizens, and the Church upon earth of her protectors and advocates with God. Hence comes another point of this devotion. The soul that we release from Purgatory is laid under a particular obligation to us, both because of the singular benefit it receives from entering all the sooner into glory, and, also, because of the tremendous sufferings from which it is delivered. Thus, it is bound to obtain for its benefactors perpetual graces and blessings from God. The blessed know that the good they have received is infinite, and being most grateful, they strive to show gratitude proportionate to the greatness of their enjoyment."—p. 47.

And so he goes on to prove that prayer for the souls in Purgatory is a very good speculation; and with refined and elaborate selfishness turns the whole of the practice of intercessory prayer into an advantageous mercantile bargain. It need scarcely be said that, in this point of view, prayer spent on a poor sinner on earth (who is supposed to have no greater influence with God than yourself) must be much less advantageously invested than if given to a soul in Purgatory. And this is the conclusion at which Mr. Faber arrives. He tells us (p. 345) of a dispute between two friars, as to the comparative merits of prayer for the dead, and for the living. The following is the argument which decides in favour of the former, in preference to praying for sinners:—"Sinners,' said Fra. Benedetto, 'were bound with the chains of their own will. They could leave off sinning if they pleased. The yoke was of their own choosing. Whereas, the dead were tied hand and foot against their own will in the most atrocious sufferings. Now come, dear Fra. Bertrando, tell me—Suppose there were two beggars, one well and strong, who could use his hands, and work if he liked, but chose to suffer poverty rather than part with the sweets of idleness; and the other, sick and maimed, and helpless, who, in his piteous condition, could do nothing but supplicate help with cries and tears—which of the two would deserve compassion most, especially if the sick one was suffering the most intolerable agonies? Now, this is just the case between sinners and the holy souls. These last are suffering an excruciating martyrdom, and they have no means of helping themselves. It is true they have deserved these pains for their sins, but they are now already cleansed from those sins. They must have returned to the grace of God before they died, else they would not have been saved. They are now most dear, inexpressibly dear to God; and surely charity, well-ordered, must follow the wise love of the Divine will, and love most what He loves most?

"Fra. Bertrando would not give way, though he did not see quite a satisfactory answer to his friend's objection. But the night following he had an apparition, which it seems so convinced him, that from that time he changed his practice, and offered up all his masses, prayers, and penances, for the holy souls.' It would appear as if the authority of St. Thomas might be quoted on the side of Fra. Benedetto, as he says—'Prayer for the dead is more acceptable than for the living, for the dead are in the greatest need of it, and cannot help themselves as the living can.'"

We shall not follow Mr. Faber further, although he proceeds to confirm his conclusions by the "unimpeachable authority of St. Teresa." It appears to us, that if the devil himself were desirous to contrive a means of abolishing the practice of men's intercessory prayer for each other, he could not have found a better expedient than by propagating the doctrine here taught by Mr. Faber. Just as if some malignant being were desirous of preventing a medicine being applied to the relief of some sick patient, he could not find a more effectual method of wasting the medicine than if he could persuade the nurse-tender to try the effect of pouring it down the throat of a corpse.

The length to which our article has run obliges us to stop short in our quotations from Mr. Faber, although there were several other passages which we had marked for citation. Our readers, however, have now had a specimen of one of the most modern and most popular books of Roman Catholic devotion, the first edition of which sold off in a month; and the commendations of which, in the Tablet, we quoted in our last number.

They have had enough to show them how very different a thing, the religion which is popularly taught to Roman Catholics, is from that laid down by the Council of Trent, and defended by Roman Catholic controversialists; and it would appear that some of those who have in recent times changed to the Roman Catholic Church have been very disagreeably surprised at finding their new religion so different from what they had been led to expect. We must make room for one more quotation from Mr. Faber's book—his picture of the distresses of a convert (p. 267):—

"They have obeyed grace grudgingly. When they were safe in the Church, they would see difficulties everywhere, from the Pope and Roman manners downwards, imaginary evils surrounded every step. There was temporal unhappiness; and was the faith worth it? There was the annoyance of learning a new religion and new ceremonies; and this made them snappish. The preachers said such strong things; and they must complain to a score of people of this, as if everything was to be suited to them. It was the Assumption, and the dear, good Irish wanted to hear of their Mother's coronation; but, then, this important convert was at church, and should have been consulted. It was so unkind, so injurious, in his or her presence, to say our Lady had twelve stars on her head. Were they planets or fixed stars? The whole matter is full of difficulties. Really, preachers should be more careful! Then in the confessional it was all so uncomfortable, so coarse, and vulgar, and matter-of-fact. Thus, from one cause or other, the poor convert has been miserable ever since conversion."

Should these pages chance to meet the eye of any Protestant who has dreamed of joining the Roman Church, we advise him to study well this picture, from the hand of one who ought to know, of the happiness of a convert. Let them consider well how they will like the confessional, and all the rest of it, before they take the step of embracing the Romish faith. But we must make on the extract just given one concluding reflection, which has been forced on us at almost every page we read of Mr. Faber's book. How completely has he lost the faculty of discriminating truth from falsehood, or even preferring truth to falsehood; so that when he is about to make a statement, the very last question that seems to occur to him is, Is this true? Thus, for example, if an honest man were considering whether he ought to say in a sermon that the Virgin Mary had twelve stars on her head, we conceive that he ought to decide the question on no other grounds than this—"Is the thing true or not?" Mr. Faber seems to consider the question on no other grounds than, on the one hand, "Would the dear, good Irish like to hear the thing said?" and "would this important convert be offended at it?" on the other. And the whole book is,

*. It is here taught that the souls in Purgatory depend exclusively on our prayers, and yet that they have no means of making themselves heard by us, and asking us to pray for them. It occurs to us, then, to ask, supposing it were true that we on earth depend on the prayers of the faithful in heaven, what greater reason have we to think that we have any means of making ourselves heard by them, when we ask them to pray for us?

* We ask our readers to read the above statement, and that marked in italics a little lower down, and say whether they can believe that a God of infinite love would expose the souls redeemed by his grace to sufferings so unprofitable as those described above?

In like manner, one tissue of unprincipled, reckless assertions, for which one seeks in vain for proof or evidence.

We have much sympathy for, what we believe to be, the errors of our brethren who have been brought up in the Roman Catholic religion, and who having been trained from childhood to believe in its doctrines, now use their adult reason—not in seeking for truth, but in seeking for arguments to defend the conclusions from the belief of which they cannot wean themselves.

But the case is very different with those who have given up Protestantism for Romanism. They have been able to arrive at this result only by shutting their eyes to the truth, and abandoning all exercise of their reason, and swallowing down implicitly whatever may be proposed to them by those whom they have thought proper to receive as authorities. And so they generally present the pitiable spectacle exhibited by Mr. Faber in his book, being wholly unable to discriminate between truth and falsehood; given over to strong delusion, that they should believe a lie. We can only pray God to have mercy upon them, that they may recover themselves from the snare of the devil, who have been taken captive by him at his will.

MODERN WORSHIP IN ROME.—No. III.

INDULGENCES.

Cardinal Wiseman has at length returned to England, after a residence of several months at Rome. Various speculations were put forward in the newspapers as to the cause of his protracted absence from his diocese; and some persons went so far as to say, that some cogent reasons, connected with pecuniary matters, rendered it unlikely that he would ever return; but the Cardinal's presence in England is a sufficient reply to all such uncharitable surmises. We are by no means sorry that he is once more amongst us. We like a bold and manly antagonist; and we cannot forget that, some years since, when all England was ringing with indignation on the occasion of the Papal aggression, Cardinal Wiseman had the courage to come forward, in the face of the country, and to attempt a justification of the bold step then taken by the Court of Rome—a step of which he was supposed to be the chief adviser, and by which he was certainly one of the greatest gainers. We are no friends to the assumption of undue authority, which the Church of Rome has recently made in these countries; but, at the same time, we cannot but acknowledge that we would far rather have to do with open and avowed opponents, like Cardinal Wiseman or Archbishop MacHale, than the soft, smooth, and occasionally unscrupulous antagonists of the past generation—such as Bishop Milner.

Cardinal Wiseman's first step, on his return from the Eternal City, was to issue a pastoral letter to the clergy and people of his diocese, which is given, at some length, in the Tablet of the 17th of June last. We took up the paper with a good deal of curiosity, as we were anxious to have the latest and most authentic intelligence of what the Pope and Cardinals were doing at Rome; and, moreover, we wished to learn what subjects were considered by Cardinal Wiseman himself as the most pressing and important, on such an interesting occasion.

When the father of a family pays a visit to the metropolis, we all know how eagerly the children look forward to his return; how they talk of the things that he is likely to bring home with him; and with what eager curiosity they look on, as he pulls out of his pockets the toys and presents which he has selected for each. It must have been with some such feelings, we doubt not, that the faithful people of Westminster took up Cardinal Wiseman's pastoral letter. After such a protracted absence, they must surely have anticipated that he would not return to his diocese without bringing them back some mark of regard and remembrance from the city which Roman Catholics are fondly wont to regard as the metropolis of the Christian world. In this feeling we ourselves, in some degree, participated. We knew that Cardinal Wiseman had recently taken part in the solemn inauguration of the relics of a new saint, at Amiens, in France,* whose bones had been dug up not long since, out of the catacombs of Rome; and when such presents were to be had, we thought it unlikely that the Cardinal would return to his own flock at home, without some pledge and token of Pontifical favour, to indemnify them for all the obloquy they had lately endured in the cause of the Church of Rome.

We glanced hastily over the earlier part of the pastoral, in which the Cardinal expresses in suitable terms his thankfulness for his safe return. "Before all things, dearly beloved," saith he, "we give thanks to God, that he has been pleased to bring us back safe, after a long absence, to resume the labours of our unworthy ministry among you." He then goes on to announce his intention of holding a diocesan synod at Westminster, which was shortly to commence its sittings, in order to settle some matters of pressing importance. At length, after passing over some other topics, we came to the close of the letter. Every one knows that the most important part of a lady's letter is generally to be found in the postscript; and we thought it not unlikely that the Cardinal, coming fresh from Italy, "la terra di donne e di gentilezza," might have imitated this laudable example. We hoped that he would tell us something about the last Saint that was canonised, or the last procession at which the Holy Father assisted, or the last new doctrine which the Pope and Cardinals had agreed upon; nay, perhaps, we thought it even possible that he might be able to announce to us that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, after a contest of so many centuries, had now, at last, been authoritatively declared to be a fundamental tenet of the infallible Church.

But, alas! we were sadly disappointed. The last clause of the Cardinal's letter runs as follows:—"We hereby grant to every one of the clergy or laity who shall recite the hymn of the Holy Ghost, 'Veni Creator,' in Latin or English, between the publication of this, our pastoral letter, and the close of the synod, to obtain for us the light of the Divine Spirit, an indulgence of one hundred days each time."

And is this all that the Cardinal brings back from Rome? Only one hundred days' indulgence! Really, this appears to be a very stingy and shabby proceeding on his part. One hundred days! Why, in the old Sarum Office of the Virgin,* we find mention made of an indulgence for no less than 90,000 years. "Thys three prayers be wrytten in the chappelle of the holy crosse in Rome, otherwise called Sacellum sanctæ crucis septem Romanorum, whoo that devontly say them shall obtayn 90,000 years of pardon for dedly synnes, graunted of our holie Father, John XXII., Pope of Rome." We think the Pope might have made them the full hundred thousand, when his hand was in. Perhaps he thought that some little economy was requisite, even in a Pope.

This, however, is not all. The recipient of the liberality of John XXII. was obliged to say three prayers for his Indulgence; but Cardinal Bellarmine tells us how a full plenary indulgence may be obtained, without saying any prayers at all. "We see," saith he, "that the very greatest indulgences are sometimes given for the most trifling reasons—as, for instance, when a plenary indulgence is given to every individual of the crowd that stand before the door of St. Peter's on Easter Sunday, when the Pope blesses the people." "Videmus interdum pro causâ levissimâ dari indulgentias maximas, ut cum datur Indulgentia plenaria omnibus qui ante fores Basilicæ Sancti Petri astant, dum Summus Pontifex in die Paschæ populo solemniter benedicit."—Bellarm. de Indul., lib. i., cap. xii., tom. ii., p. 453. Col., 1615.

It is right, however, to add, that Bellarmine appears to have found some difficulty in swallowing the belief of these wholesale indulgences. "If," saith he, "indulgences, granted without sufficient reason, are not good and valid, the Christian people would be grievously deceived by their pastors;"† an assertion, to the truth of which we most cordially assent.

Granting, however, for the moment, that the Pope does not deceive the good people of Rome, when he promises them a plenary indulgence for standing at the door of St. Peter's on Easter Sunday, does not the lavish profusion with which the gifts of the Church are bestowed abroad, contrast strangely with Cardinal Wiseman's niggardly and parsimonious distribution of the same gifts at home? At Westminster, a devout Roman Catholic offers up a prayer to God, and obtains a hundred days' exemption from the burning torments of Purgatory. At Rome, an Italian, who, perchance, never prays to God at all, obtains a clear quittance, perhaps of several thousand years' purgatorial tortures, merely by enduring for a moment a little pushing and jostling in a crowd! We ask our readers, in all sincerity, can such things be true? If they are, we must fairly avow, that the grounds and reasons of them are beyond our comprehension. If they are not, we can only repeat, with Cardinal Bellarmine—"the Christian people must be grievously deceived by their pastors."

We have, on more than one occasion, brought the general subject of Indulgences before our readers,‡ but the mention so recently made of them in Cardinal Wiseman's Pastoral, induces us to revert to the subject again; and we shall endeavour, in our remarks, to afford our readers some help in enabling them to form their own opinion upon a question which, if true, is of such vital and practical importance.

Many years ago, in wandering along the streets of Rome, our attention was frequently arrested by a Latin sentence which we saw deeply cut in stone over the porticoes of many of the countless churches which meet the eye at every step. The sentence ran thus:—

INDULGENTIA PLENARIA, QUOTIDIANA, PERPETUA, PRO VIVIS ET MORTUIS, TOTIES QUOTIES.

—i.e., "A plenary, daily, perpetual indulgence for the living and for the dead, as often as they are wanted." Often, as we read these words, the inquiry suggested itself to our mind, What is an indulgence? On what authority does it rest? Is there any Scriptural authority for this usage? These questions we shall endeavour briefly to discuss.

And, firstly, what is an indulgence? On this point the Council of Trent was prudently silent. It tells us that the use of indulgences is very salutary for Christian people, and approved of by the authority of sacred councils (indulgentiarum usum Christiano populo maxime salutarem, et sacrorum conciliorum auctoritate probatum, Sess. xxv.); but it cautiously abstains from telling us what an indulgence is—nay, more, it is forced to admit that very great abuses have been introduced into the Church by their means. Cardinal Wiseman, however, is more explicit than the Council of Trent. He states* very clearly his opinion, both what an indulgence is not, and what it is. "Many persons," saith he, "will be inclined to incredulity when I tell them, that an indulgence is no pardon for sin of any sort, past, present, or future. It is no more than a remission by the Church, in virtue of the keys, of a portion, or the entire, of the temporal punishment due to sin."

The learned Cardinal seemed to be well aware that this statement was one which his readers would be inclined to disbelieve, and which, therefore, he was bound to make with the utmost care and precision. And, yet, when he tells us so positively, that "an indulgence is no pardon for sin of any sort," we think that he must have relied greatly on the ignorance or simplicity of his readers. Pope Boniface VIII., as is well known, issued indulgences on a large scale, in connection with the Jubilee which he celebrated in the year 1300; and in what form of words were they drawn up? We find them given as follows in the canon law—"Non solùm plenam et largiorem, immò plenissimam concedimus omnium suorum venlam peccatorum."† "We grant not only a full and more abundant, but a most plenary pardon of all sins." So, likewise, Clement VI., in his Bull for the Jubilee of the year 1350, granted to the recipients of his indulgences, that "they should obtain a most plenary pardon of all their sins."‡ Sixtus IV. also, calls them "indulgences and remissions of sins."§ We have before us an extract of a form of indulgence granted by Leo X., taken from the well-known Roman Catholic writer Ferraris,‖ where several examples of a similar kind are given. The form of words made use of in these indulgences is very generally as follows:—"We mercifully grant in the Lord a plenary indulgence and remission of all their sins, by these presents, to be valid for all future times, with a power of applying the same plenary indulgence to the souls in Purgatory."¶

Now, we ask any of our readers, what is the plain meaning of the words "plenary remission, to be valid for all future times, of all their sins" (plenariam omnium peccatorum suorum remissionem)? Do they, or do they not, mean that the sins of the man to whom they are addressed are fully forgiven? If they do, then with what face can Cardinal Wiseman assert, that "an indulgence is no pardon for sin of any sort, past, present, or future?" If they do not, how can the Popes for many hundred years be exonerated from the charge of using language upon the most solemn of all subjects, which was calculated to lead Christian people into the most fatal error, in reference to the pardon of their sins in the sight of God?

Cardinal Wiseman was fully aware of this difficulty, which, indeed, lies at the bottom of the whole Romish theory of indulgences. It was, therefore, impossible for him to avoid taking some notice of it; and we invite the special attention of our readers to his reply. "When an indulgence," saith he, "is said to be a remission or forgiveness of sin, the phrase applies only to the outward guilt, or that portion of the evil, whereof the ancient penitential canons took cognizance." There is no weapon more convenient for a controversial writer than a bold assertion, to help him in disposing of an awkward fact, or evading an unmanageable argument; and, certainly, few writers are more expert in the use of this weapon, or have had recourse to it more frequently, than the Cardinals of the Church of Rome. The phrase forgiveness of sins, it seems, applies only to the outward guilt! Now, we ask any impartial persons who have read the extracts we have quoted above, how can they possibly believe this statement of Cardinal Wiseman's? If the forgiveness of sins, spoken of in the indulgences, meant only an exemption from the penitential discipline of the Church, why was it not so stated in these documents? Why was a form of words made use of, the most complete and comprehensive that could possibly be employed? The indulgence is called "plenaria remissio," a plenary remission; "plenissima venia," a most full pardon; "omnium peccatorum," of all sins. And what is Cardinal Wiseman's comment on these words? "The forgiveness of sins applies only to the outward guilt"! "An indulgence is no pardon for sin of any sort, past, present, or future"!! Well may the learned Cardinal anticipate the incredulity of his readers, when he makes such statements as these. We ask him, if he really wished to convey to any man the idea that his sins were entirely pardoned in the sight of God, would it be possible for him

* S. Theodosia. The ceremony took place, we believe, on the 12th of October last.—vide the Tablet of that month.

* Horæ B. V. Mariæ secundum usum Sarum, fol. lxii. b. Printed at the expense of the University of Paris, 1526.

† "Si indulgentiæ sine causa satis magna concessæ non essent ratæ, Christianus populus á Pastoribus suis graviter deciperetur."—Bellarm. Ibid.

‡ Vide Catholic Layman, vol. i., p. 114, vol. ii., p. 6.

* Vide Lectures on the Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church, col. ii. p. 71. London, 1836.

† Extravag. Comm., lib. v., c. i, De pœnit. Corpus Juris Can., vol. iii., p. 349. Lugduni, 1671.

‡ Suorum omnium obtinerent plenissimam veniam peccatorum. Id., cap. ii., vol. iii., p. 353.

§ Indulgentias et remissiones peccatorum. Id. cap. iv., vol. iii., p. 354.

‖ Vide Ferraris, Bibl. Prompt. sub voce. "Indulgentia," Tom. iv., pp. 98, 111. Bonon., 1754.

¶ "Plenariam omnium peccatorum meorum indulgentiam et remissionem misericorditer in Domino concedimus, præcordibus perpetuæ futuris temporibus valituram, cum facultate etiam eandem plenariam indulgentiam applicandi animabus in Purgatorio."—Ferraris ut supra, p. 98.

 Wiseman's Lectures, ut supra, p. 81.

to use language more full, comprehensive, and unmistakable, than that which we have quoted above from the authorized indulgences, not of one, but of several Popes? Is this a specimen of the infallible teaching of the Church of Rome, which Christian people are expected to receive in blind and unresisting submission? We confidently appeal to our readers whether, in the whole course of their experience, they have ever met with an instance of more gross and glaring contradiction?

But we need not rely merely on the language of the Papal indulgences. The history of the Church, for the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, proves, conclusively, the meaning which the Church of Rome then intended the people to put, and which they actually did put, on the indulgences issued in her name, and with her express sanction. Of this, the ancient writer, Gobelinus, furnishes us with a remarkable proof.* He says that the preachers of indulgences told the people, to encourage them to deal with them, that the indulgences were not only à pœnâ, but à culpâ too—i.e., not merely from the temporal punishment of sin, but from the fault itself, which deserved eternal punishment. This made the people look into them; and not finding those terms, but only a most plenary remission, they were unsatisfied, because they were told the fault could only be forgiven by God alone; but if they could but once find that the Pope would undertake to clear all scores with God for them, they did not doubt but the indulgences would be worth their money. "Whereupon," adds Gobelinus, "those very terms were put into them;" then the wiser men thought these were counterfeit, and made only by the pardon-mongers; but, upon further inquiry, they found it otherwise.

We may add another example from the general form of absolution, sold by Tetzel, under the direct authority of Leo X.† We need scarcely recall to the recollection of our readers, that the shameful sale of indulgences, by Tetzel and others, was the immediate cause of the Reformation in the sixteenth century. The absolution concluded as follows:—"I restore thee to the holy sacraments of the Church, and to the unity of the faithful, and to the innocence and purity conferred on thee by baptism; so that the gates of punishment may be closed against thee at thy departure, and those of the joys of Paradise be opened. Or, shouldest thou not presently die, let this grace remain in full force, and avail thee at the point of death. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.—F. B. Johannes Tetzel, Sub-commissarius, manu propria scripsit."

Can any unprejudiced person read these words without being convinced that the Church of Rome, at that time, plainly and unquestionably intended to persuade the vulgar, that whoever purchased one of these indulgences obtained the remission of all his sins, and the certainty of everlasting happiness? It cannot be disputed that the indulgence professed to confer an entire absolution, not only from all past, but also from all future sins. It is impossible, with any shadow of reason, to affix any other meaning to the concluding paragraph. The dilemma, therefore, to which Cardinal Wiseman is reduced is as follows:—either the doctrine of the Church of Rome is the same now as it was in the time of Tetzel and Leo X., or it is not. If it be the same, then Cardinal Wiseman is not to be believed when he tells us that "an indulgence is no pardon for sin of any sort, past, present, or future."—If it be different, then the Church of Rome must have changed her doctrine since the sixteenth century, and, consequently, she cannot be infallible.

We have given a specimen of the language of the documents which Tetzel sold; but we really feel some reluctance in reproducing some passages of the harangues which he is said to have addressed to the people, and in which he magnified the value of his indulgences:—"At the very instant that the money rattles at the bottom of the chest, the soul escapes from Purgatory, and flies liberated to heaven. . . . . I would not change my privileges for those of St. Peter in heaven; for I have saved more souls by my indulgences than the Apostle by his sermons. . . . . Reflect that for every mortal sin, you must, after confession and contrition, do penance for seven years, either in this life or in Purgatory. Now, how many mortal sins are there not committed in a day, how many in a week, how many in a month, how many in a year, how many in a whole life! . . . . Alas! these sins are almost infinite, and they entail an infinite penalty in the fires of Purgatory; and now, by means of these letters of indulgence, you can, once in your life, in every case except four, which are reserved for the Apostolic See, and afterwards in the article of death, obtain a plenary remission of all your penalties and all your sins. . . . There is no sin so great that an indulgence cannot remit; and even if any one (which is, doubtless, impossible) had offered violence to the Blessed Virgin Mary, mother of God, it is as clear as day-light that if he only procures an indulgence, all will be forgiven him!"‡

We should be sorry to hold the Church of Rome responsible for the daring impiety of such language as we have quoted above; but at the same time, we feel convinced, that Tetzel only carried out to their logical conclusion the principles which had been laid down by various Popes and Doctors before his time. We have not space to dwell on the fearful abuses and enormities to which such doctrines—proclaimed, be it remembered, by an ordained priest and authorized teacher of the Church of Rome—gave rise throughout Germany. When the princes of of the Empire were assembled at the Diet of Nuremberg, they made a complaint of their grievances to the Pope; and, in speaking of indulgences, they unanimously state, as the least bad consequence of them, "that the people were cheated of their money by them;" they then go on to point out far more considerable evils arising from the same pernicious source. "Christian piety," they say, "was destroyed by them; all manner of wickedness did spring from thence; men were afraid of committing no kind of sins, when at so cheap a rate they could purchase a remission of them."*

We must conclude, for the present, with noticing a prudent piece of advice about indulgences, given to members of the Church of Rome, by Cardinal Bellarmine. "Though the Church," saith he, "may have power to give indulgences, yet they may want their effect in particular persons, and, therefore, all prudent Christians do so receive indulgences, as withal to satisfy God for their sins."† We hope there are many such "prudent Christians" in Cardinal Wiseman's diocese. The plain meaning of Bellarmine's advice, if he had the courage to speak plainly, is this—that prudent Christians are too wise to believe in indulgences, and that none but fools rely on them; for if there were anything but fraud and imposture in them, why may not a prudent Christian trust a Church which he believes infallible? If Pope Pius IX., on next Easter Sunday, gives a plenary indulgence to every person in the crowd standing at the door of St. Peter's, at Rome, we desire to know why a prudent Christian of that Church may not, yea, ought not to rely upon his word? Does he suspect the head of his Church may cheat and abuse him? If he does, what becomes of infallibility? If he verily believes that the Pope cannot err, and will not deceive, why must not his word be taken? We know not how these things pass current among prudent Christians of the Church of Rome; we would only invite all sincere and earnest members of that Church, who may read what we have written, to contrast the dangerous and contradictory statements of her Popes and divines, on the momentous subject of the forgiveness of sins, with the short and simple statement of the inspired Word of God—"The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from ALL SIN."—1 John i. 7.

OUR LORD GOD THE POPE.

DOMINUS DEUS NOSTER PAPA.

THIS startling, not to say blasphemous, statement was found, during a period of two hundred years, in the Canon Law of the Church of Rome. It occurred in the Gloss upon the Extravagant of John XXII. entitled "Cum inter." The Gloss was to the following effect—"To believe that our Lord God the Pope has not the power to decree as he has decreed, is to be deemed heretical."‡ This fearful assertion was naturally laid hold of by the Reformers: and the result of their comments upon it was that the word "God" ("Deus") gradually disappeared from the Gloss, and is now no longer found in the editions of the Canon Law. That modern Roman Catholics should feel anxious to repudiate such a sentiment is not wonderful, when we bear in mind the following points:—

1. St. Paul, speaking of the "Man of Sin," says (2 Thess. ii. 4), that "he sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself as if he were God."

2. Pope Gregory the Great, writing of Antichrist, says, "since he is a damned man and a wicked§ spirit, he lyingly asserts that he is God."—Greg. in Job., c. 34.

3. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury in the 11th century, also speaking of Antichrist, uses the following words—"He shall feign himself to be religious, that he may deceive men under the colour of piety. Yea, he shall say that he is God: and he shall cause himself to be adored, and shall promise the Kingdom of Heaven."—Anselm in 2 Thess. ii.

4. Long before this, Irenæus, speaking of Antichrist, says, "Being an apostate and a robber, he wishes to be adored as God."—Iren., Contr. Hær., Lib. v., c. 25.

5. The heathen emperor Domitian headed his proclamations with the words "Your Lord God Domitian."—Sueton. in Dom., c. 13. And, similarly, the monster Caligula called himself "Deus Optimus Maximus."—Sueton. in Calig., c. 22.

We might expect that when the Reformers urged these and similar points in their controversy with Rome, the Papal authorities would repudiate, as soon as it could be conveniently done, a sentiment which, however useful in the middle ages, could no longer with safety be avowed as the teaching of the Church. It had performed its part in the great work of building up the edifice of the divine supremacy of the Pope, and might, for the future, be discarded. Yet it seems to have been judged prudent to proceed gradually in the matter. To have at once expunged the obnoxious word Deum from the Gloss, would have been too great a concession to the impertinent scruples of Bishop Jewell and other troublesome opponents of the Papal system. Accordingly, when Pope Gregory XIII. appointed a commission in 1582 (nearly twenty years after Jewell had drawn the attention of Europe to the fact that the Pope was God), for the purpose of preparing a new edition of the Canon Law, and with directions to "revise, correct, and expurgate," not only the Text but the Glosses, from unintentional errors as well as designed corruptions, the edition, so prepared (and which is, to the present day, the standard edition), retained the word Deum, without even so much as the usual "Caute lege" in the margin. The explanation of this deliberate retention of the word is, doubtless, to be found in the dogma of the spiritual supremacy of the Pope de jure divino, combined with the Papal motto of "no retreat" ("nunquam retrorsum"). A few years later, however, that is to say, in the beginning of the 17th century, we have the Jesuit Endæmon Joannes actually denying that the word "God" (Deum) was to be found in the original MS. of Zenzelini, the writer of the Gloss in question. As this MS. is deposited in the Vatican Library, and is carefully concealed from the prying eyes of Protestants, we are obliged to take this denial on trust. How little reason there is for believing Endæmon's unsupported assertion may be seen by consulting Archbishop Abbott's reply, in his Antilogia, cap. 5. Indeed, the candid Mr. Charles Butler seems to admit that this was his impression also, when, in his "Justification" (p. 126), he attempts to justify the phrase "Our Lord God the Pope" upon what he considers Scriptural principles, while he, at the same time, allows that "it is in bad taste." Mr. Butler was well aware that, although the word "Deum" has been carefully excluded from the more recent editions of the Canon Law, there are abundant other proofs of the title in question being applied to and accepted by the Popes during the middle ages. He knew that Pope Nicholas I., in the 9th century, had said—"It is sufficiently evident that the secular power cannot bind or loose the Pontiff, who, it is clear, was called God by the pious Prince Constantine; and it is manifest that God cannot be judged by men."—Dist. 96, can. 7, Satis evidenter, Decret. Gratian., Prima Pars.* Mr. Butler doubtless knew also that the famous Chancellor Gerson had said of the Popes, in the early part of the 15th century—"In imitation of Lucifer, they wish to be adored as Gods. . . . They neither fear God, nor reverence man."—De Conc. Gen., Oper. vol. ii., p. 27. Mr. Butler knew further that Christopher Marcellus, addressing Pope Julius II., in the name of the Council of Lateran (1512), made use of the following portentous words—"Do thou take care that we lose not the salvation, the life and breath which thou hast given us. For thou art our shepherd, thou our physician, thou our guide, thou, in short, a second God upon earth (tu denique alter Deus in terris).—Harduin ix., 1651." Mr. Butler knew that Cardillus, in his defence of the Council of Trent, calls the Pope an earthly God (terrenus Deus). Mr. Butler was acquainted with the ceremonies observed at the inauguration of a Pope: the following account of which is taken from an official authentic source,† published at the close of the 17th century:—

"After the election and proclamation, the Pope, attired in the pontifical habit, is borne in the pontifical chair to the Church of St. Peter, and is placed on the High Altar, where he is saluted for the third time by the cardinals, by kissing his feet, hands, and mouth. In the meantime the Ambrosian Hymn (Te Deum) is sung. The adoration being finished, and the hymn over, the dean of the Sacred College chaunts some versicles and a prayer; then the Pontiff descends from the altar, and is carried to the Vatican Palace." The ceremony takes place in the Church of St. Peter. The Pontiff is placed upon the High Altar of that Church, a spot consecrated, according to the Romish theory of the Eucharist, by the actual presence of the body, soul, and divinity of the Son of God. He sits upon that High Altar, using it as his footstool. And there, enthroned as a king, he is adored as a God! Adored by the cardinal princes of the Roman Church, who kiss the feet which rest on the altar of the Supreme! And that this is no obsolete usage any one may satisfy himself, by reading the account given of the inauguration of the present Pope, Pius IX., in the Univers, of the 27th of June, 1846.

Such being the practice of the Church of Rome at the present day, it may well seem an unnecessary concession to the heretical Reformers to have expunged the word "God" from the Gloss in the Canon Law. But upon nearer consideration the policy of doing so becomes apparent. The formal retention of such a sentiment would, undoubtedly, have proved a very great scandal in this inquiring age; while at the same time care is taken to keep up, in reality, by the practice of the Church of Rome, the claim which, in words, has been withdrawn.

---

* Gobelini Personæ Cosmodrom. Æt. 6, c. 86., p. 278. Francf. ed., 1599.

† Vide "Forma absolutionis plenariæ," apud Gerdesium, Monumenta Antiquitatis. Tom. i., no. vii., B. p. 74.

‡ This last assertion is so monstrous that we deem it right to give it in Tetzel's own published words, in which he deliberately maintained and defended it:—"Sub commissariis insuper ac prædicatoribus veniarum imperare, ut si quis per impossibile Dei genetricem semper virginem violasset, quod eundem indulgentiarum vigore absolvere possent, luce clarius est." Positiones fratris J. Tezelii, quibus defendit Indulgentias contra Lutherum, Theses 99, 100, et 101.

* Vide Centum Gravamina, in Fascic. Rer. Exp. et Fug. p. 354. London, 1690

† Bell. de Indul., l. i., c. 12, vol. 3, p. 888., col. 2. Prag., 1721.

‡ Extravag. Joan. xxii., Tit. xiv., Gloss. in cap. iv.

§ We follow the reading "nequam," instead of the common one, "nequaquam."

* It is a very significant fact, that while Bellarmine quotes the first clause of this sentence as far as the word "Pontiff," in proof of the supremacy of the Pope, he carefully omits the latter part.—Bellarm. de Sum. Pontif., lib. ii., c. 26.

† Notitia Congreg. et Tribunal. Curiæ Romanæ. a. it. Lettenburg, 1683.

ARE THE DOCTRINES AND PRACTICES OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES, OR THOSE OF THE CHURCH OF ROME, THE MORE OBNOXIOUS TO THE IMPUTATION OF HERESY.

BELLARMINE, in the seventh chapter of his Treatise upon the Notes of the Church,* asserts, that the Protestant doctrines are nothing else than a revival of certain heresies which had been condemned by the Church in former ages. And in order to establish this position, he enumerates twenty heresies, to each of which he professes to find a parallel in the writings of Luther and Calvin. This assertion, it is needless to say, did not pass unchallenged by writers upon the Protestant side; and we hope, in a future number, to show how triumphantly they refuted it.† But they did something more than this. They retorted the assertion, and showed that many of the characteristic doctrines and practices of papal Rome were most strikingly similar to those of the ancient heretics; and even of the very heretics included in the above-mentioned catalogue of Bellarmine. Our Roman Catholic readers will, we trust, bear patiently with us while we bring forward some proofs of this position, which, doubtless, will appear to many of them a very startling one. The subject is one of very great importance, and ought not to be dismissed without further inquiry, merely because it may be a disagreeable one. We shall not attempt to enumerate all the cases in which a coincidence between the doctrines and practices of the Papacy and those of heretical sects has been pointed out. More than forty-five such instances have been noticed, and it would not be difficult to add to the number. At present we shall content ourselves with indicating a few cases as examples of the rest.

First—The ascription of the title "God" (Deus) to the Popes, in the Canon Law,‡ has certainly, to say the least of it, no warrant from Scripture; and has no parallel in the past history of the Church, except the claim to divine honours made by Simon Magus, whom Irenæus calls the father of all heretics.

Another point of resemblance between the doings of this arch-heretic and those of papal Rome, is to be found in the wholesale and shameless practice of simony, (a crime which derives its name from what is recorded of Simon, Acts viii. 19, sq.), by which the Roman Curia was disgraced, prior to the Reformation. Thus, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, Gul. Durandus, one of the highest authorities of the age, says,§ that "in the Roman Church, simony reigns as if it were no sin." A little later in the same century, Marsilius of Padua, the most eminent jurist of those times, tells us,‖ that "at Rome there is a concourse of simoniacal persons from every quarter, seeing that heaven and all the elements are sold there—Earth, as often as the bodies of the dead are to be committed to the grave; water, to which the name lustral is given; the air and sound of bells; the fire of candles." "The merits," he adds, "of the living and the dead are sold; hymns, sacraments, priesthoods are sold; in fine, the remission of sins itself is sold." Still later in the same century, the famous poet, Petrarch, writes thus¶ "Simon Magus, together with his wife, Simonia, has come to life again in Rome." And, to quote no more, we have the following striking testimony from Baptista of Mantua, General of the Carmelites, and one of the most distinguished men of his time (the beginning of the sixteenth century). Speaking of Rome, he says—

> ....."Venalia nobis
> Templa, sacerdotes, altaria, sacra, coronæ,
> Ignis, thura, preces, coitum venale, Deusque."

Which, literally translated, is "For sale with us are temples, priests, altars, sacred rites, crowns, fire, incense, prayers, heaven, God."

Secondly—The Valentinians (a branch of the Gnostic heretics) taught that Scripture was imperfect, and that, consequently, Tradition was necessary, in order to ascertain the truth. Speaking of these heretics, Irenæus says, "when they are convicted out of the Scriptures, they turn and accuse the Scriptures themselves, on the ground that they (the Scriptures) are not correct, and want authority, and do not harmonize with each other; and they assert that the truth cannot be discovered by those who are ignorant of tradition." Those who are at all familiar with Roman Catholic works on controversy, will be struck with the remarkable resemblance which exists between these Gnostic views of Scripture and those which are laid down in the works alluded to, in order to establish the necessity of tradition as a part of the rule of faith, co-ordinate with Scripture. Thus, for example, we read in a work of standard authority†† the following words, "The Scriptures are, as some one, no less truly than wittily, has observed, like a nose of wax (cereus nasus) which may be easily twisted every way, and like a leaden rule which may readily be bent to any shape one pleases. To these Scriptures we must, accordingly, apply the inflexible rule, the authority and common sentiment of the tradition of the Church: which tradition," he adds, "is the very rule of truth and piety, more efficacious than Holy Writ. The Scriptures," he further informs us, "may easily be applied to favour any impious opinion." The man who penned these fearful words, Albert Pighius, was patronized by four successive Popes, to one of whom he dedicated the work from which they are taken. He was employed on confidential embassies by the Roman See, and was regarded at Rome as one of the greatest divines of his age (beginning of sixteenth century).

In connection with this subject, we may add what Irenæus tells us (Lib. i. c. 24) of the Carpocratians, another Gnostic sect—viz., that they defended their own tenets by pretending that our Blessed Lord had privately communicated certain doctrines to the Apostles which were to be reserved and kept secret from the general body of Christians, and to be communicated only to those who were worthy to receive them: to which privileged class they (the Carpocratians) of course belonged. Arius and Eutyches defended their heresies by a similar appeal to tradition: which led Basil the Great, to say, "that it was a manifest falling away from the faith, and a proof of arrogance, either to reject anything of what is written, or to introduce anything that is not." The famous Disciplina Arcani, or Discipline of the Secret, by which it was once thought, (before the doctrine of development was invented), that the silence of primitive antiquity respecting the characteristic doctrines of the Church of Rome could alone be successfully accounted for—this discipline, as explained and employed by the controversial writers of the Church of Rome, finds its exact prototype in the Carpocratian doctrine above described. And it is not a little remarkable, that the very same text which these Gnostic heretics employed in support of their tenet of a reserved secret doctrine—viz., John xvi. 12—is still one of the standard texts brought forward by Roman Catholics, in order to prove the insufficiency of Holy Scripture.

Thirdly—We learn from Irenæus (Lib. i., c. 24) and Epiphanius (Lib. i., Hær. xxvii.) that the worship of images and pictures of Christ and the Apostles was another characteristic of the Gnostic heretics. We are not, accordingly, surprised to find that the latter Father was a most uncompromising Iconoclast. The story told by Epiphanius himself, in his celebrated letter to John Bishop of Jerusalem (Epiph. oper., Tom. ii. 314), is well known, and may be seen in page 50 of the LAYMAN of last year. "I went," he says, "into a certain Church to pray; and I found there a veil, hanging on the doors of the Church, having the likeness of Christ, or some saint painted on it. So when I saw the likeness of a human being hanging in the Church of Christ contrary to the authority of Scripture, I tore it, and gave directions to the keeper of the place to roll up some poor person in it as a winding sheet." We do not wonder at the indignation of this eminent father of the fourth century, when we remember that he himself expressly notices image-worship as a characteristic of the deadly heresy of the Gnostics. Few of our Roman Catholic brethren are aware, that when they prostrate themselves before a picture or an image, even of Christ himself, they are imitating the practice not of the primitive Church, but of the early heretics; and that instead of following the injunctions of the great Church Fathers, in this particular, they are running directly counter to them.

Fourthly—It is an indisputable fact, attested by Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alex., Theodoret, Augustine, and others of the Fathers, that the notion of extraordinary sanctity, being connected with celibacy and asceticism, originated with heretics. Scripture does not contain a syllable which can be tortured into a general warrant for such practices. On the contrary, the whole spirit of the New Testament is directly opposed to such a mere carnal religion. As to the heretical origin of the practices adverted to, we shall be very brief; because, as before said, the fact is incontestable. Thus, the Marcionites, as we learn from Tertullian and Clemens Alex., highly commended celibacy. Epiphanius informs us that the Encratites did the same; though, he adds, their practice was not always conformable to their teaching. "Continentiam jactant," he says, "fallaciter omnia facientes. Nam et inter mulieres reperiantur, et mulieres undiquaque decipiunt, et simul cum iis vivunt." Would to God such scandals were confined to the heretics. But in an evil hour the Church adopted their practices, and similar results followed. Every reader of ecclesiastical history knows but too well what is meant by γυναικὶς συνεισακτοι, mulieres subintroductæ. We have no wish to dwell upon the fearful immoralities to which the celibacy of the clergy has at all times, from its first introduction, given rise; and which have drawn down the condemnations, not only of every virtuous writer in every age, but of numerous Councils, beginning with the Œcumenical Council of Nice itself. Suffice it to say, that a restriction, unnatural in itself and heretical in its origin, has borne fruits worthy of its parentage.†

Fifthly—We will conclude this article with noticing one more Roman Catholic practice, which may also be traced to a heretical origin. And it is the more important to remark this, because the practice in question seems to be gaining ground every day; and threatens, ere long, to absorb, practically, every religious act whatsoever, whether prescribed by Scripture or enjoined by the usages of the primitive Church. I mean Mariolatry, or the worship of the Virgin Mary. We have already, in the preceding volumes of the LAYMAN, examined at length what Scripture and the early Fathers tell us of the Blessed Virgin, with a view to ascertain whether we are now justified in offering her worship; and the result of our investigations has been, that we must look elsewhere than in Scripture or the records of the primitive Church, if we would find any precedent for such worship. This, in itself, must be a startling fact to a simple-minded, confiding, Roman Catholic, who believes, without inquiry, on the credit of his teachers, that he has as much reason to worship the Virgin as he has to worship her Divine Son. But how much greater must be his astonishment to learn that, whilst the Scriptures and the practice of the universal Church, from its foundation to the present hour, are his warrant for the one act of worship, the earliest precedent for the other that can be produced from antiquity is the idolatrous worship offered to the Virgin by a set of female heretics, or fanatics, called Collyridians, who, as we learn from Epiphanius (Hær. 78, 79), lived in the 4th century. The name is usually derived from a Greek word (κολλὺρα) denoting a cake, this being the offering which her votaries presented to the Virgin, perhaps in imitation of the idolatrous worship paid to the Moon by the ancient Jews (who followed their heathen neighbours), as mentioned in Jeremiah xliv. 19. This is, then, the earliest instance of that homage which is due to God and Christ alone being rendered to the Virgin. The words of Epiphanius himself, condemning the heresy in question, (which we cited in our last number), are most important; "Let Mary be honoured; but let the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit alone be adored. Let no one adore Mary.' Now, let any candid Roman Catholic compare with this injunction of the pious Bishop of Cyprus the following passages, taken from sources which reflect the authorized teaching of his own Church, and let him then say whether he believes that, with the exception of the cake, Epiphanius would have recognised any difference between the degree of worship which he condemns in the Collyridian heretics, and that which is now paid to the Virgin by the Church of Rome. The passages to which we refer are the following, taken at random from a number of others equally strong:—

1. In the Encyclical Letter of Pope Gregory XVI., written in 1832, the following passage occurs:—

"We address this letter to you, Venerable Brethren, on this most joyful day, when we solemnise the festival of the triumphant Assumption of the Holy Virgin into Heaven, that she, whom we have experienced as our patroness and deliverer amidst the greatest calamities, may also propitiously assist us whilst we write, and by her celestial inspiration may guide us to such counsels as may be most salutary to the Christian Church." That the attributes of Deity are here ascribed to the Virgin appears plainly from a comparison of the following passages of Scripture—Ps. cxliii. 2 (Douay Vers.); Ps. xxxix. 18; Is. xi. 2.

2. In the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, to the repetition of which Indulgences were attached by three Popes, we read the following prayer:—

"We fly to thy protection, Holy Mother of God, despise not our prayers in our necessities, but deliver us, at all times, from all evils, glorious and blessed Virgin." Let us compare with this what the Psalmist writes, speaking of God, Ps. lx. 10 (Douay Vers.) And let us remember that our Lord himself taught us to pray to His Heavenly Father to "deliver us from evil."

3. The following prayer is extracted from the writings of Cardinal Bona, one of the most learned ritualists of the Church of Rome, and who was intimately acquainted with the spirit of her teaching:—

"Oh most sweet Virgin Mary, Mother of God and our Lord Jesus Christ, refuge of sinners, and mother of mercy, I commit myself this day and evermore to thy peculiar protection with most humble devotion. Place me near unto thee, and protect me from all my enemies, visible and invisible. Say unto my soul I AM THY SALVATION. [The very words which David addresses to Jehovah, Ps. xxxiv. 3, Douay Version.] Direct me, thy servant, in all my ways and actions. Console me in all my griefs and afflictions. Defend and preserve me from all evils and dangers. Turn thy face unto me when the end of my life shall come; and may thy consolation repose my spirit in that tremendous hour. [David's confidence in that hour was placed upon Jehovah, Ps. xxii. 4, Douay Version.] Thou canst do all that thou wilt in heaven and earth [our Lord says, that all power in heaven and on earth was given to himself, Matt. xxviii. 18], nor can any resist thy will [applied by St. Paul to God, Rom. ix. 19]: for thou obtainest from the Almighty whatever thou seekest. Hear, therefore, and receive my prayers, and despise me not when I confide in thy mercy. Behold, I fall down before thee, most gracious Virgin, I fall down and worship IN THEE thy Son [adore in to Filium tuum]," &c.

If the Virgin were a fourth person of the Godhead, it would be difficult to conceive any terms stronger than these in which divine honour could be rendered her.

---

* Disputat. de Controv. Fid. Tom. ii., p. 112, sq. Pragæ, 1721.

† For a full discussion of this subject, see, amongst others, Gerhard Loc. Theol., tom. xi., p. 333. Ed. Cotta, 1772. Field, of the Church, book iii., ch. 22, sq.

‡ See the preceding article.

§ De Modo. Celeb. Conc. Gen., part. ii., tit. 10.

‖ Def. Pac., part ii., c. 24.

¶ Dial. de Rem. Cur. Evit.

 Iren. Cont. Hær., lib. iii., cap. 2.

†† Pighius de Controv., lib. iii., c. 2.

* Basil de Fid., c. 1.

† The Manichæans allowed the less perfect members of their body to marry, but imposed celibacy on the more perfect. The same distinction is made in the Church of Rome. The laity are allowed the use of their natural liberty; the monks and secular clergy, as being more perfect, are obliged to take vows of celibacy. The parallel is, unfortunately, closer still. Like the Encratites, the Manichæans did not practice what they taught, so that Augustine says—"They do not prohibit concubinage, but only marriage." Compare with this the notorious concubinage of the clergy, who were too perfect and holy to marry like other men, including St. Peter himself.

In the Church of Rome, then, the Virgin receives divine worship of the same kind as was paid to her by the heretical Collyridians. And no other precedent for such worship can be found in the early history of the Church.

The subject, of which we have thus briefly treated in this article, is a very large, and, it is needless to add, a very important one. We commend it most earnestly to the attention of our Roman Catholic brethren, and we entreat them to look well to the foundations of those peculiar doctrines and practices which they have been taught to believe have been transmitted from the Apostolic times, and even from the Apostles themselves, to the present day; but many of which, we solemnly and deliberately repeat it, may be ultimately traced to heretical sources.

SPURIOUS WORKS ATTRIBUTED TO THE FATHERS.

ST. ATHANASIUS AND ST. BASIL.

THERE is, perhaps, no way in which learned men could do a greater service to the cause of religious truth, or promote the cause of primitive worship more effectually, than by clearing the field of Christian antiquity of those spurious and noxious weeds which the enemy of truth has, from age to age, sown so artfully, choking in many cases the genuine and good seed, and in others mingling subtle poison with the wholesome fruits of God's truth—we mean, clearing the genuine works of eminent writers of the primitive Church from the spurious and apocryphal ones, which during past ages have been pawned upon them by either ignorant or dishonest men.

We think we should do a good service to our unlearned fellow-countrymen, both Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, if we could furnish them with a catalogue of works which once passed as unquestioned writings of eminent Fathers of the Church, but which have since been detected and discarded by learned Roman Catholics as doubtful or spurious, and which, therefore, ought never to be relied on by controversialists, without, at least, noticing that, as authorities, they cannot safely be relied on by any one desirous of arriving at the truth.

We purpose to give here one or two instances of spurious writings, which will be found not unimportant on the subject we have been considering—the Invocation of Saints.

ST. ATHANASIUS, the great champion of the Catholic faith, who was born A.D. 296, and died A.D. 373, left behind him, for the edification of the world, a number of works, admitted by all to be genuine, which demonstrate that he was a man of the most glowing piety, but a piety centering in God alone; and that he placed his whole hope and confidence, in life and in death, in the mercies of God, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, our only Mediator, Advocate, and Saviour. We have already given our readers a passage from St. Athanasius (see No. 30, p. 71), which shows what his views of prayer were; and we are satisfied that there is not a single passage to be found in his genuine writings giving countenance to any worship of the Virgin, or any other saint, or any belief in her or their power and intercession, or any invocation of any of them, even for their prayers.

We here challenge our Roman Catholic correspondents and their friends to produce any passage from the works of this eminent saint and champion of the faith to contradict what we have said; and, we are sure, they will do so, if any such passage is to be found.

The importance of having such a passage from so great an authority as St. Athanasius on the subject, if it were possible to find one, cannot be more strongly demonstrated than by the use which has been made by the most eminent Roman Catholic controversialist writers of a Homily formerly ascribed to that Father; but which has long been rejected as spurious by the most learned authorities among Roman Catholic writers, as we shall proceed to prove.

The homily referred to is to be found in the second volume of the Benedictine edition of St. Athanasius's works, p. 393 to 401,* and is entitled "On the Annunciation of the Mother of God;" or, as it is given in the Latin translation, "Sermo in Annuntiationem Sanctissimæ Dominæ nostræ Deiparæ."

Our first witness is Cardinal Bellarmine, who declares this treatise to be spurious, and that the evidence against it is so strong, that no one can doubt but that the author of it must have seen the decrees of the Councils against Nestorius, Eutyches, and the Monothelites, none of which were held until after St. Athanasius's death.†

Our second witness is Cardinal Baronius, in his letter to Thomas Stapleton, dated Rome, November, 1592, in which he deliberately decides against the genuineness of this homily, and fixes its date, at the very earliest, subsequently to the commencement of the seventh century, three hundred years after Athanasius attended the Council of Nicæa. (See this well-known epistle in full, in the same volume of the works of St. Athanasius, above cited, p. 391.)

Our third authority is that of the learned Benedictine editors themselves, who, in their second volume, page 390, not only declare this homily to be unquestionably a forgery, assigning the reasons for their decision, but fortify their own judgment, by quoting, at length, the letter of Baronius, written more than a century before.

The Benedictine editors begin their preface thus—"That this discourse is spurious, THERE IS NO LEARNED MAN WHO DOES NOT NOW ADJUDGE. The style proves itself, more clear than the sun, to be different from that of Athanasius. Besides this, very many trifles show themselves here unworthy of any sensible man whatever, not to say of Athanasius, and a great number of expressions unknown to Athanasius, so that it savours of lower Greek. And, truly, his subtle disputation of the hypostasis of Christ, and on the two natures of Christ, persuades us that the writer lived after the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon (held in 431 and 451—St. Athanasius died in 372), of which councils, moreover, he uses the identical words, whereas his dissertation on the two wills in Christ seems to argue, that he lived after the spreading of the error of the Monothelites" (which did not arise till A.D. 630, under the reign of Heraclius).

After such a decisive judgment of these most eminent writers, that the homily in question is spurious, that the evidence of it was as clear as the sun, and that no learned man could hold otherwise, one would think that no Roman Catholic writer, having the least pretension to learning and honesty, would have ever ventured to rely on it again as an authority in controversy, or a guide in practice.

Yet, how stands the case? The very same Cardinal Bellarmine, who has himself condemned it as a forgery, the evidence of which is irresistible, actually has the effrontery (or, at least, has been guilty of such unpardonable negligence) as to cite this very homily, as the authority of St. Athanasius* for the invocation of saints, without the slightest allusion to its admitted spuriousness, or even as to any doubt or suspicion being attached to it; and, in like manner, again cites it without any qualification whatever in proof of the antiquity of the Feast of the Annunciation, on which occasion this homily was alleged to have been delivered by Athanasius.†

Can any more instructive lesson be given to intelligent and honest inquirers, as to the necessity for caution touching the genuineness of the authorities relied on by their instructors, than to find such a man as Cardinal Bellarmine thus self-convicted of relying on a spurious work, given up by all learned Roman Catholics, and, amongst others, by HIMSELF?

Cardinal Bellarmine does not, however, stand alone in this painful position.

Will our readers believe that CARDINAL WISEMAN, in the middle of the nineteenth century, has been guilty of the same negligence or dishonesty in quoting the same homily as the genuine work of St. Athanasius, without the faintest shadow of an allusion to the combined judgment of Baronius, Bellarmine, and the Benedictine monks, or even to any suspicion being entertained of its being a forgery!

It is painful, even to an opponent, to be obliged to expose such reckless misrepresentation; and were not truth at stake, we should gladly draw a veil over what must assume the character of a personal charge against a person whose authority seems to have the highest place among our Roman Catholic brethren. Truth, however, calls on us fearlessly to lay open the expedients by which the worship of the Virgin Mary is attempted to be defended in our own country, and our own times; and Cardinal Wiseman owes it to his own character, to explain to the world, if he can, how he could have made such use of the homily in question. Now for our proof.

The cardinal (then Dr. Nicholas Wiseman, Bishop of Melipotamus) thus introduces and comments upon extracts from this spurious homily, in his lectures, vol. ii., p. 108. London: Booker, 1836.

"St. Athanasius, the most zealous and strenuous supporter that the Church ever possessed of the Divinity of Jesus Christ, and, consequently, of his infinite superiority over all the saints, thus enthusiastically addresses his ever-blessed mother—'Hear, now, O daughter of David; incline thine ear to our prayers; we raise our cry to thee—remember us, oh! most holy Virgin; and, for the feeble eulogiums we give thee, grant us great gifts from the treasures of thy graces—thou that art full of grace. Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; Queen, and Mother of God, intercede for us.' "Mark well," continues Dr. Wiseman, "those words, 'grant us great gifts from the treasures of thy graces,' as if he hoped directly to receive them from her. Do Catholics use stronger words than these? Or did St. Athanasius think or speak with us as with Protestants?"‡

What will our candid readers think, when we tell them that these passages are from the very homily in question, and that Cardinal Wiseman refers for his authority for these passages to the very Benedictine edition, and the identical volume of the works of St. Athanasius, which contains the irrefutable proof of their spuriousness!—Page 401, vol. ii.

Cardinal Bellarmine may have possibly cited the homily before he discovered its spuriousness; though this is not likely, for in his preface to the reader, prefixed to the volume in which the treatise De Scriptoribus Eccl. occurs, printed at Cologne, A.D., 1617, he commences by stating that he had written this treatise forty years before. But what defence can CARDINAL WISEMAN make for referring to a homily, which, if he had ever read it in his own edition he must have known had been given up as spurious for the last 250 years?

We shall be happy to hear what the Cardinal, or any of his friends or admirers, have to say in his defence, before we finally pronounce upon what appears to us to be utter recklessness, if not dishonesty; and as usual, our columns are open to any one who wishes to exculpate the Cardinal from the charge now made against him, or any others which we may feel obliged to make in our pages.*

Our next instance is one which we can dispose of more summarily.

SAINT BASIL, Bishop of Neocæsarea, died about A.D., 378. All Christians, whether in the earliest ages from his own times, or in more modern days, have agreed to do his memory honour; he is often appealed to under the title of the Great Teacher of truth, and acquired the name of the Great Basil, in contradiction to the multitude of bishops and pastors of the same name who succeeded him in other times, and were fully forty in number. We need scarcely be surprised, therefore, to find many confessedly spurious works ascribed to him; and the world is deeply indebted to the labours of the learned Benedictine editor, M. Julian Garnier, who has done so much towards the separation of the supposititious from the genuine works of this eminent writer.

In vol. iii., p. 69, Bened. Ed., Paris, 1730, the epistles attributed to St. Basil are arranged in three classes. First, those written by St. Basil before he was made bishop, A.D. 370; second, those which he wrote after he was bishop of Cæsarea, between 370 and 378; third, those without date, including many doubtful, and some spurious.

In page 462, vol. iii., appears one addressed to Julian the Apostate, numbered by the Benedictine editor 360, but originally printed as No. 205.

It is unhesitatingly ranked by the learned Benedictines, not merely as doubtful, but spurious; and no one, we apprehend, could open the book without, at once, noticing that it is so—for at the top of the page in which it occurs, are the words, printed in large capitals—S. BAS. CÆSARIÆ CAPPADOC. ARCHIEP. EPISTOLÆ SPURIÆ.—See page 462, tom. iii. Benedict., Paris, 1730.

The epistle in question is also specially condemned, and the reasons given in the life of St. Basil, prefixed to the same work (c. viii., p. lxiii).

Let us now see the use made of this spurious epistle by eminent writers of the Church of Rome.

Dr. Milner, in his defence of saint worship, in his "End of Controversy," letter 35, page 353, cites two passages only from the primitive Fathers which have the slightest bearing in support of the doctrine. The first passage, which is from Justin Martyr, our readers will find commented on in another article in our present number, page 85.

The second passage purports to be from ST. BASIL, and is as follows:—"I invoke the Apostles, Prophets, and Martyrs to pray for me, that God may be merciful to me, and forgive me my sins. I honour and reverence their images, since those things have been ordained by tradition from the Apostles, and are practised in all our Churches." Dr. Milner's reference is to Epis. 205, Paris edition (but without specifying the date).

Now, what is this 205th epistle but the very one to Julian the Apostate? and, we ask, did the Rev. Dr. Milner, who wrote in 1802, ever take the trouble of reading the epistle he thus quotes, or of looking at what the Benedictine editors, who wrote seventy years before, said of its undoubted spuriousness?

If Dr. Milner had the Benedictine edition before him when he wrote, we must pronounce him guilty of actual dishonesty, in concealing the fact that deprived the quotation of any authority; if he had not, what rashness was it for a man to assume the title of "ending controversy," when he did not even take the pains of knowing what the best writers of his own faith had written before him on the principal authority he relied on!

Truly, we cannot but be astonished at the risks which controversialists of the Church of Rome will run, when attempting to trace back the present practices of their Church to the times of our Lord and his Apostles; and whatever judgment our candid Roman Catholic readers may form of the fairness or the learning of Cardinal Wiseman or Dr. Milner, we think they must admit that the authorities relied on by such writers, require to be examined into with the utmost caution, before they allow themselves to adopt them as proofs that the modern doctrines of their Church agree with those of the Catholic antiquity of the primitive ages.

THE INVOCATION OF SAINTS.—No. II.

WE undertook, in our last number, to proceed to consider what has been said by the principal controversial writers of the Church of Rome, in support of their doctrine on this subject.

* Athanas. Opera, Tom ii., Benedict. ed. Paris, 1698.
† Bellarmine De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis. Cologne, 1617. Opera, Tom. vii., p. 50.

* Bellar., Tom. ii., page 295, De Sanct Beat. Lib. i., chapter xix., Cologne, 1615.
† Bellar., vol. ii., p. 338. De Cultu Sanct., lib. iii. c. xvi. Cologne, 1615.
‡ Dr. Wiseman's note refers to Serm. in Annunt., t. ii., p. 401, which is the exact volume and page in the Benedictine edition of 1698.

* We are amused to find, that though Messrs. Berington and Kirk, in their original work on the Faith of Catholics (London, 1830, p. 431) give the selfsame extract from this spurious work—falsely attributed to St. Athanasius—and cite it in the same way from the Benedictine edition, (Serm. in Annunt, Tom ii., p. 401), they have been discreet enough in their third and greatly enlarged edition, of 1846, to omit all allusion to it—see p. 344, vol. iii., where, under the head of Invocation of angels and saints, it ought to have been introduced between Eusebius and Hilary.

For the present, we shall limit our inquiries to two of the most conspicuous writers in the present century—Dr. Milner and Cardinal Wiseman.

We have already disposed of two of the principal authorities which are quoted by those distinguished writers, in another article, in our present number—the spurious Homily of St. Athanasius, and the spurious Epistle of St. Basil to Julian the Apostate, to which we beg to refer our readers —p. 84.

Bishop Milner, in his 35th letter, in the "End of Religious Controversy," page 353, cites but one genuine passage in any way bearing on the point; but it is one entitled to the greatest weight, if truly stated, being no less than that of JUSTIN MARTYR, whom Dr. Milner represents as writing thus—

"We venerate and worship the angelic host and the spirits of the prophets, teaching others as we ourselves have been taught." Surely, exclaims the reader, this is worth all you have said on the other side; for it shows that Justin Martyr attests that the Christians of his time, only forty years after the death of St. John the Apostle, venerated and worshipped both the angelic host and the spirits of the departed prophets; nay, more, attests that they had been taught so to do by their predecessors, which brings the testimony up to the very lifetime of St. John!

What, however, will our good readers think of the honesty and accuracy of Dr. Milner, who thus tries to end controversy on the subject, when we show them, by reference to the original, which Dr. Milner avoids, of course, that the passage is not only a grossly garbled one, but clearly mistranslated, and that Justin Martyr, in fact, never said any such thing as Dr. Milner imputes to him.

The passage referred to, and intended to be cited by Dr. Milner, occurs in Justin's first Apology, where having stated, that the Christians could never be induced to worship the demons, whom the heathens worshipped and invoked, he proceeds thus—"Whence also we are called Atheists (men without God); and we confess that, with regard to such supposed gods, we are Atheists, but not so with regard to the most true God, the Father of justice and temperance, and of the other virtues, without any mixture of evil. But both HIM and the SON, who came from Him, and taught these things to us, and the host of the other good angels accompanying and made like to Him, and the PROPHETIC SPIRIT, we reverence and worship, honouring them in reason and truth; and, without grudging, delivering the doctrine to every one who is willing to learn as we were taught."*

Now, whatever doubt a Greek scholar might possibly entertain as to the true translation of this passage in other respects, as to which we shall say a word presently, how any man of Milner's pretensions could have dared to transmute ΠΝΕΥΜΑ τὸ προφητικὸν, (the prophetic Spirit of God, worshipped by the primitive Christians, as He is still, as the third person of the Blessed Trinity), into the disembodied spirits of the prophets, is somewhat amazing! But what will not those who value short-lived victory more than permanent truth venture upon, in the vain hope that the ignorance of their readers may save them from the exposure they merit?

We admit that there is some ambiguity in the other part of the passage, and are aware, as Dr. Milner must also have been, that the ablest critics in the Roman Church are much divided as to the proper translation of the clause relating to the angels; some translating it as we do, "Him [God] and his Son who came from him, and taught us and the army of good angels those things, and the Holy Spirit we venerate and adore;" and others, "Him and his Son who came from him, and taught us those things, and the army of good angels and the Holy Spirit, we venerate and adore." The former making the word "taught" govern the words, "the army of the other good angels," while the latter makes the words, "revere and worship" govern the word, "angels." Supposing, however, each of these constructions to be possible grammatically, that the latter cannot be the true interpretation, will, we think, be clear to any one who plainly and closely considers the matter. To suppose it, would be to impute to Christians the practice of paying to the host of angels, the selfsame reverence, worship, and honour, which we pay to the Holy Trinity, the Supreme Father, His ever Blessed Son, and the Holy Spirit, and even placing the angels before the third person of the Trinity. All will revolt from such an interpretation, as not only impious, but contrary to the principles professed by the most celebrated Roman Catholic writers; and every candid man must, we think, admit, that if Justin Martyr had intended to represent the holy angels as objects of religious worship (which in no other passage of his writings is there the slightest trace of), he would have selected some more appropriate place for so stating, and would not so violently have thrust the mention of them among the Persons of the ever blessed Trinity, assigning to them a place between the second and third Persons of the eternal hypostatic union!

Feeling this strongly, and anxious to avoid the charge of impiety, some writers (and, among others, the Benedictine editor of Justin)† have attempted to draw a distinction between the two verbs in this passage, "reverence and worship," alleging that the lower degree of "reverence" expressed by the latter, applies to the angels; whilst the former verb, implying the higher degree of worship, alone relates to the Godhead. But this distinction rests on a false assumption; for the two words (σεβόμεθα) we reverence, and (προσκυνοῦμεν) we worship, are used equally to convey the idea of the highest religious worship, as is familiar to every scholar, who has studied the Septuagint and the Greek Testament.‡

In determining the true meaning of an obscure passage, grammatically susceptible of two different acceptations, the author himself is often his own best interpreter; and if he has expressed, in another place, the same leading sentiment, without the same obscurity, and free from all doubt, surely, the light borrowed from that passage ought to be used to fix the sense of the ambiguous one, and establish the author's consistency?

Now, Justin, in the very same treatise, a few passages further on, again defends the Christians against the same charge of being Atheists, and on the selfsame ground—first, "that they worship the Father, who is maker of all; secondly, the Son, proceeding from Him; and, thirdly, the Holy Ghost." In both cases he refers to the same attributes of the Son, as the teacher of Christian truth, and of the Holy Ghost, as the Prophetic Spirit. The following extracts are the only parts necessary for our present purpose—"Who of sound mind will not confess that we are not Atheists, reverencing, as we do, the Maker of the universe, and Him who taught us true things, and who was born for this purpose—Jesus Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate. . . . Instructed, as we are, that He is the Son of the true God, and holding Him in the second place; and the Prophetic Spirit in the third order, we, with reason, honour."‡ In which passage he makes no mention or allusion whatever to the angels, either before or after the Holy Spirit.

We would also, in confirmation of this view, refer our readers to another passage in the same treatise, No. 17, in which Justin distinctly says, "We adore God alone." (Θεὸν μὲν μόνον προσκυνοῦμεν.)§

We have no doubt, therefore, that the true meaning of the passage, cited in so unfair and garbled a manner (to say the least of it) by Dr. Milner, in his "End of Controversy," is as follows—"Honouring in reason and truth, we reverence and worship Him, the Father of Righteousness, and the Son (who proceeds from Him; and instructed in those things both ourselves, and the host of the true good angels following Him, and made like unto Him), and the Prophetic Spirit"—in which interpretation we follow the learned Grabe and Langus, entitled the interpreter of Justin, and other eminent writers.‖ (See S. Justini Apologia Prima cum Latina Joannis Langi versione. Edit. a J. E. Grabe, Oxoniæ, 1700, p. 11.)

We have now, we think, at least, said enough to satisfy our readers that Dr. Milner's version of the passage is not to be depended on, and that Justin Martyr cannot be considered an authority for the invocation of Angels. As to the invocation of Saints, there is not a suggestion, we venture to assert, from one end of his work to the other.

We had intended to proceed in our present number with another great controversial writer, Cardinal Wiseman, who has, in several articles, attempted to defend the practice of saint-worship; but this would embark us in a disputation too long for the state of our pages, and may, we think, be judiciously postponed till our next, especially as we have already alluded to a quotation of Cardinal Wiseman, in another article (see p. 84), which we desire to give him and his friends an opportunity of explaining before making any further attack upon the character of his authorities.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1854.

THE connection between personal interests and systems of opinions has ever proved the greatest source of intolerance, as well as the greatest obstacle to the progress of truth in the world.

It is this clashing with their personal interests which has so often led the priesthood to represent a departure from their dogmas as the worst of crimes, and made them so ready to defend, by other than intellectual means, any doctrines with which their interest, power, and importance are closely interwoven.

We can scarcely, therefore, be surprised that the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland should avail themselves of all the means in their power to deter the laity from reading any publication likely to promote discussion as to the true nature and character of their authority, or the truth and accuracy of the doctrines which they teach.

That they should iterate and reiterate in private to individuals, and in public in their chapels—in neither of which ways it is possible for us to join issue with them—that our journal is a tissue of lies and calumnies, is no more than we expected; and the vagueness and sweeping character of the assertion constitute, perhaps, its best refutation.

To meet charges of such a nature by counter assertions, that we have never wilfully stated a single falsehood, or distorted a truth, would, of course, carry no additional conviction to the mind of any one, and we shall not, therefore, waste time, by a vain attempt to persuade those whose prejudices induce them to condemn unheard all who differ with them.

We cannot refrain, however, from quoting a passage from the celebrated Pascal, when defending himself against the calumnies propagated by the Jesuit Fathers against the Jansenists:—

"Other sorts of slander are rather too easily discredited; but you have those of a more subtle character, in which you abstain from specifying particulars, in order to preclude your opponents from getting any hold, or finding any means of reply—as for example, when Father Brisacier says that 'his enemies are guilty of crimes which he does not choose to mention,' would you not think it were impossible to prove a charge so vague as this to be a calumny? An able man, however, has found out the secret of it, and it is a Capuchin friar, Fathers—Father Valerian, of the house of the Counts of Magnis. He had happily succeeded in converting Prince Ernest, the Landgrave of Hesse-Rheinsfelt; your Fathers, however, seized, as it would appear, with some chagrin, at seeing a sovereign prince converted without their having had any hand in it, immediately wrote a book against the friar, and, also, circulated a letter against him, in which they said—'Ah! we have such things to disclose as will gall you to the quick! If you don't take care, we shall be forced to inform the Pope and cardinals about it.' This manœuvre was pretty well executed, and, I doubt not, Fathers, but you speak in the same style of me; but take warning from the manner in which the friar answered it in his book, printed last year at Prague—'What shall I do,' says he, 'to counteract those vague and indefinite insinuations? How is it possible to refute charges which have never been specified? Here, however, is my plan—I declare, loudly and openly, to those who have traduced me, that if they do not discover these crimes before the whole world, they are notorious slanderers, and most impudent liars. Come forth, then, mine accusers! and proclaim your lies upon the house tops, instead of telling them in the ear, and keeping yourselves out of harm's way by so telling them. In the meantime, I shall content myself with declaring MENTIRIS IMPUDENTISSIME. If the charges they make against me be true, let them prove it; otherwise they stand convicted of falsehood, aggravated by the grossest effrontery. Their procedure, in this case, will show who has the right on his side. I desire all men to take particular observation of it; and beg to remark, in the meantime, that this precious cabal, who will not suffer the most trifling charge, which they can possibly repel, to lie upon them, make a show of enduring, with great patience, those from which they cannot vindicate themselves, and

---

* τον αληθεστατου και παγρος δικαιοσυνής και σωφροσύνης . . . . . ἀλλ' ἐκεῖνόν τι καὶ τον παρ ἀυτου υἱον ἐλθόντα και διδαξαντα ἡμᾶς ταῦτα και τὸν τῶν ἄλλων ἑπομένων και ἐξομοιουμένων ἀγαθῶν ἀγγέλων στρατὸν πνευμα τε το προφητικον σεβόμεθα και προσκυνοῦμεν.

Et colimus quidem nos talium qui habentur Deorum esse expertes et atheos, sed non veritatis Illius Dei; Patris videlicet justitiæ et temperantiæ et virtutum aliarum: verum hunc ipsum et qui ab eo venit, atque hæc nos et aliorum sequentium et assimilatorum bonorum angelorum exercitum docuit Filium et Spiritum Propheticum colimus et adoramus, rum rationi et veritati venerantes, atque unicuique discere volenti et edocti sumus, candide tradentes.—Justin Martyr, Apologia Prima, p. 11, cum notis Thirlbii, 1722.

* Opera. Justin. Paris, 1742; Præfat. Pars. II., cap. iv., p. xxii.

† Exod. xxxiv. 14; Ps. xciv. (xcv.) 6; 1 Sam. (1 Kings) xv. 25; 2 Kings (1 Kings) xvii. 36; Heb. i. 6; Acts xviii. 7, 13, xix. 27.

‡ Bened. Ed., Paris, p. 51.

§ Bened. Ed., p. 54.

‖ Any one who desires to investigate the matter further will do well to consult Bishop Kaye's excellent work on Justin Martyr, p. 59 (Second edition, London, 1836); and Mr. Tyler's Primitive Christian Worship, p. 107 to 114.

conceal, under a counterfeit virtue, their real impotency. My object, therefore, in provoking their modesty by this sharp retort, is to let the plainest people understand that, if my enemies hold their peace, their forbearance must be ascribed, not to the meekness of their natures, but to the power of a guilty conscience. Thus, has this honest friar discovered the secret of shutting your mouths; and it must be employed, on all occasions, when you accuse people without proof. We have only to reply to each slander as it appears in the words of the Capuchin, mentiris impudentissime—you are most impudent liars."

Without, however, resorting to the expedient of the good Capuchin friar, there are some practical tests, we think, by which intelligent readers, however distrustful of those with whom they have been taught to differ in matters of religion, will find no difficulty in satisfying themselves, whether our pages are trustworthy, or whether we are guilty of the charges of deliberate falsehood and calumny, with which those whom they have been accustomed to consider their spiritual guides have so unsparingly and unjustly assailed us.

First, we would call the attention of our readers to the fact, that we have never yet, though two years and a half in active and most extensive circulation, been once detected in a false statement, a garbled quotation, or any other intentional unfairness, either in argument or assertion. Our readers, who have traced our progress, cannot fail to have perceived that we have been, all through, most carefully watched by men, most able and willing to expose the slightest inaccuracy, or semblance of unfairness of any species whatsoever; and who would willingly displace us from the high ground on which we have taken our stand, as champions of fair play, and candid inquiry, and expose and disgrace us for insincerity and untruth, if they could.

If, therefore, we have not been detected, or held up to the deserved infamy which awaits dishonesty and imposture, it is not owing to our opponents being ignorant of what we write, or being either unable or unwilling to defeat us, if it were possible to do so, by so summary a method as that of exposing, in any way, the conduct of our journal as discreditable to the character of its conductors.

Secondly, we would remind our readers that not one of the able Roman Catholic writers who have come forward, so earnestly, to defend the doctrines of their Church in our pages, have ever charged us with falsehood or fraud, while they have done their best to confute our arguments, and establish their own.

Thirdly, not a single Roman Catholic periodical has yet ventured to impeach a single statement we have made, or authority we have cited, though some of them have, in general terms, reiterated against us their wholesale charges of falsehood, calumny, and blasphemy, with all the virulence and foul-mouthed invective which the English language can supply.

One charge only has ever been made against our paper, which is at all of a tangible character, and that is, that its title is a false one, and calculated to deceive an unwary reader.

Upon this we would say a few words, and a very few will suffice for our complete justification—for, in our judgment, we think we could not have chosen a title more suitable.

As to its having misled a single reader, we boldly call on our opponents to point out a single number from the commencement of our labours, which could have left any reader in doubt whether the conductors of it were members or opponents of the Church of Rome. That we were dissentients from the Church of Rome, though candid and moderate opponents, ready to hear and discuss all that could be said in her favour, and anxious only to discover and lead others into truth, was apparent to all. The most bigoted monopolist of the title Catholic, never was or could have been led into misconception as to our real views and convictions.

We have, again and again, disproved the right of any denomination of Christians, however numerous, to arrogate to themselves exclusively the title of Catholic or Universal. We think the Greek Church, the Roman Church, the English Church, the Lutheran Church, are all branches (though some of them corrupt branches) of the one Catholic Church; but none of them alone, exclusively, has a just claim to arrogate to itself that venerable title; and it is because we would permanently record, in the most practical manner, our continued protest against the ill-founded claim of any particular Church to be the whole Church of Christ; that we deliberately selected a title which claims for ourselves, while it concedes to our Roman Catholic readers also, the title to which we think both entitled, of members of the Catholic Church of Christ. We ourselves claim, in the language of the Liturgy and prayers of the Church of England and Ireland, to be members of the "one Catholic and Apostolic Church," and we never will consent to waive that title, while we hold fast to the only ancient creeds and symbols of the primitive faith—creeds which we hold in common with all Catholics (Greek or Roman) throughout the world.

In the very first number of our paper, we defended our claim to the title when stating, explicitly, that there were several doctrines which all sincere Roman Catholics and Protestants hold in common, which might, with truth, be called Catholic (i.e., universal) opinions, and demonstrated that our Roman Catholic brethren could not, consistently, deny the title of Catholic to any who are sincere believers in the Trinity, without setting at defiance both the voice of antiquity, and the language of one of the authorized formularies of both Churches—the Athanasian Creed—which is clear and explicit, where it says, in terms the most express, "This is the Catholic faith, that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity."

If the Roman Catholic priesthood of Ireland or England have any other charge to make against us, let them bring it forward manfully, in a fair spirit, and we shall rejoice to discuss the matter with them with Christian forbearance and candour; if they will not do so, but continue their present vain and inconsistent attempt to ignore our existence, while, at the very time, they are falsifying their own policy by denouncing us as liars, we shall be driven at last to retaliating on them by saying, in the words of the honest Capuchin friar, "mentiris impudentissime."

Correspondence.

IS THE DOCTRINE OF PURGATORY TAUGHT BY THE EARLY FATHERS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.*

SIR—I find the subject of Purgatory revived in your April number, by a Mr. John Duffy (No. 28, p. 52). The question was raised in your journal, Vol. I, Nos. 6 and 7, when you published a letter of "A Catholic," who wished "to know, once for all, if it (Purgatory), was or was not the doctrine of the Church of Christ in the first ages." He limited his inquiry to the writers of the "first three centuries." Mr. W. C. Search undertook to supply the information required (see Vol. I, No. 7, p. 81): and among the alleged authorities he quoted Tertullian, as follows:—

"I. Among the apostolical traditions received from the Fathers, we have oblations for the dead on the anniversary day.—De Corona Militis, p. 209."

"II. In his treatise on Monogamy, cap. x., p. 155, he advises his wife, 'Pray for the soul of your departed husband, entreating repose to him, and participation in the first resurrection—making oblations for him on the anniversaries of his death.'"

In your observations on these two passages, you state that the doctrine of Purgatory is not proved by them, and, therefore, think it unnecessary to inquire whether they "do really allude to Purgatory or not." You seem to admit that Tertullian believed in Purgatory after he became a heretic; that he learned the doctrine from an acknowledged heretic, Montanus; and the books from which the passages in question are cited were both written after he became a heretic. Every candid inquirer after Catholic truth must admit this to be a sufficient reply to the citations of Mr. W. C. Search. Mr. John Duffy, however, recurring to this subject, again quotes one of the above passages from Tertullian, and again in his (Tertullian's) book, 'De Corona Militis,' 'We make yearly oblations for the dead.'" To Mr. Duffy's citation you observe—"Though this passage might be cited to prove the practice of prayer for the dead in Tertullian's time, it is obvious that it does not bear at all on the doctrine of Purgatory." But as Tertullian speaks of a custom then existing in the Church, among some Christians, I think the passages deserve a little further investigation and explanation than that given by you, particularly as more than one great principle is involved in them. From firmly-rooted prejudices and preconceived notions, our Roman Catholic lay brethren are too apt to construe silence into a defeat. Your correspondents will still believe, and will re-quote, when opportunity offers, the passages in question as proofs that the modern Roman doctrines of Purgatory and praying for the dead did exist in the third century. Romanists appeal to these passages as proofs of an alleged historical fact; and you will permit me, therefore, to make a few additional observations as supplementary remarks to your answers.

It will be observed that Mr. Search quotes more fully than Mr. Duffy; I will, therefore, direct my observations to Mr. Search's citation; they will apply with equal force to Mr. Duffy's still more garbled extract.

I. I have to complain of two serious amissians from the first quotation, which very much affect the force and sense of the passage; and first, Mr. Search has omitted the words, "and not enforced by the positive words of Scripture," after the word "Fathers." He gives the page, without naming the edition from which he quotes. But if he consults, among other editions, Edit. Rothomagi, 1662, p. 289, he will find the missing passage. But as I will not accuse Mr. Search of intentional dishonesty, we must take for granted that he has quoted this passage from some Roman Catholic book of controversy. You, sir, have already shown him the danger of relying on such books for proofs, when he comes to measure swords with us, Protestants. (See No. 9, p. 107; No. 10, p. 119.) For their satisfaction, I would refer Mr. Search and Mr. Duffy to the handbook of Romanists—namely, "The Faith of Catholics," by Kirk and Berrington. They will find, in page 354, of the edition of 1813, and p. 356, edit. 1830, the passage in question thus translated:—

"Among the apostolical traditions received from the Fathers, and not enforced by the positive words of Scripture, he reckons oblations for the dead on the anniversary day."

The omission of these few words is very significant. Here is an admission, by the author quoted, that the custom in question is not enforced by Scripture. Tertullian reckons this among many other ceremonial usages (many of which are wholly relinquished by the Roman Church at the present day) as a matter of discipline, and not as a point of Christian faith. The book, "De Corona Militis," was written in defence of a Christian soldier, who declined to wear a crown or garland which his companions in arms wore as a direction from the emperor, and as an honour or mark of distinction, when the conduct of the Christian soldier was inquired into. The context of the passage is as follows:—

"It is easy forthwith to demand, where it is written, that we should not be crowned, but truly, where is it written that we should be crowned? for when the opposite party demands the authority of Scripture for our opinion, they, in fact, predetermine that their own side ought to possess the authority of Scripture for theirs. For if it shall be said, that it is lawful to be crowned, because Scripture does not forbid it, with equal justice may it be retorted, that it is unlawful to be crowned, because Scripture does not enjoin it. How shall discipline act? Shall it receive both opinions, because neither is forbidden? or shall it reject both, because neither is commanded? But, it may be said, that which is not forbidden is freely permitted. Yea, rather, that is forbidden which is not freely permitted.

"And how long shall we thus spend our labour to no purpose, while there exists, on our side, immemorial observance, which, by anticipating the ground, has made the principal point in the case. If no Scripture has determined the matter, it is certainly confirmed by usage, which, without doubt, flowed from tradition. For how could anything be frequently practised, if it had not been previously handed down? But thou sayest, even in the holding out of tradition, written authority is to be demanded. Let us inquire, therefore, whether tradition, though unwritten, ought not to be received. We should not hesitate to adopt the negative of this question, were the matter not prejudged by examples of other observances, which we vindicate without any support from writing, by the authority of tradition alone, from thence by the protection of custom."

* We have to apologize to the writer of the following valuable letter for so long delaying its insertion. The crowded state of our columns must plead our excuse.—Ed.

Tertullian then proceeds to enumerate some ceremonial usages of the Church, as not being taught or prescribed by Scripture, or Divine revelation, and among them "oblations for the dead, for their birth-days to heaven, on the anniversary day." Or, as Mr. Search gives it, oblations for the dead on the anniversary day; and Mr. Duffy—"We make yearly oblations for the dead." Tertullian then concludes with these words—"If for these, and other such like regulations, you demand the law of the SCRIPTURES, none can be found, (si legem expostules Scripturarum, nullam invenies). Tradition will be held up before you as originating, usage as confirming, and faith as practising them."

Now, it must be observed that Roman Catholics have also quoted this first passage in proof of the antiquity of Roman Catholic "masses." Modern Roman oblations for the dead, and masses for the dead, are almost inseparable; and it is now, also, produced as proof, that the doctrine of Purgatory was believed in the 3rd century. I ask Mr. Search and other Romanists, lay and clerical, whether they are ready to stand by the testimony of Tertullian—namely, that there is no warranty in Scripture for their doctrines of Purgatory and masses, and prayers for the dead? I do not think they will dare to make so wide an admission; and if not, they must entirely renounce the testimony of Tertullian. It may not be amiss to notice, that when Tertullian is talking of a matter of faith, as necessary to be believed, he uses a very different strain; here he makes a direct appeal to SCRIPTURE, and rejects all other authority. He "adores the fulness of Scripture." "Whether all things were made of any subject matter, I have as yet read nowhere. Let those of Hermogenes' shop show that it is written; if it be not written, let them fear that woe which is allotted to such as add or take away."* We now can appreciate the value of the omission of the words which refer to the Scriptures in the first part of the quotation.

With this second rebuke Mr. Search will be a little more careful before he quotes, second hand, from books of which personally he seems to know nothing, and I trust Mr. Duffy also will profit by the lesson.

II. I now come to the second part of the first passage quoted.

I cannot discover from whence Mr. Duffy borrows; but Mr. Search adopts the translation given by Kirk and Berrington—"We have oblations for the dead on the anniversary day." I now accuse Mr. Search of another serious omission. I have given above the proper translation—"We make oblations for their birth-days to heaven on the anniversary days." The original passage is—"Oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, annua die facimus."

To understand the meaning of this passage, a few words of explanation will be necessary. I hope to make it clear, that the oblation referred to was not the modern sacrifice of the mass, nor was it offered for souls in Purgatory. Martyrdom, among the early Christians was considered a passport to heaven. The persecutors, we read in Eusebius' history, endeavoured to destroy all traces even of their dead bodies, to prevent the survivors giving them burial; but what could be saved were honourably interred by the Christians, who, adopting the old Greek custom, celebrated their memory about their tombs, to encourage the survivors to fortitude and perseverance. We then read of the anniversary festivals, or commemorations of the day on which martyrs suffered, called the days of Nativity, as they were on that day born to a new life. By reason of the great persecutions these meetings became very frequent. At these assemblies prayers were offered up and thanksgivings that the martyrs had gained a victory, their names were rehearsed, the eucharist celebrated, almsgivings, which were afterwards called oblations, were then made to the poor. These alms were made in fruits, corn, wine, &c. That these oblations were doles or gifts only in kind is evident from the explanation given in the canons of the councils of Carthage and Vaisons.† A simple narrative is given in the Epist. Smyrn.—"We can never abandon Christ nor serve another; we adore Christ as the Son of God, and we cherish the martyrs as the disciples and followers of our Lord; we solemnize the day of their nativity, which is the day of their death, in remembrance of such as have conflicted for the truth, and in order to the exercising and exciting others to imitate their example. We hope to be made capable of the like graces, and, at last, copartners and fellow-sharers in the same glory." There is also a very remarkable passage in one of the books attributed to Origen—"Let us observe, O friends, what a change has taken place in men. For the ancients (Greeks) celebrated the natal day, loving one life, and not hoping another after this. But now we do not celebrate the natal day, because it is a begioning of gifts and temptations; but we celebrate the day of death, inasmuch as it is a laying aside of all gifts, and an escape from all temptations. We celebrate the day of death, because those die not who seem to die. Wherefore, we both observe the memorials of the saints, and devoutly keep the remembrance of our parents and friends which die in the faith; as well rejoicing for their refreshing [which cannot be in Purgatory] as requesting also for ourselves a goodly communion in the faith. Thus, therefore, we do not celebrate the day of birth; because they which die shall live for ever, and we celebrate it, calling together the religious persons with the priests, the faithful with the clergy; inviting, moreover, the needy and the poor, feeding the orphans and widows, that our festivity may be for a MEMORIAL OF REST to the souls departed (ut fiat festivitas nostra in memoriam requiei defunctis animabus, quorum memoriam celebramus) whose memory we celebrate, and to us may become a sweet savour in the sight of the eternal God"‡

That these commemorations and oblations were offered for, or in memory of martyrs, then actually enjoying eternal happiness, is evident from the writings of Cyprian, who professed himself to be a pupil of Tertullian, and a great admirer of his writings.†

Referring to certain martyrs, Cyprian says—"Finally, also, take note of the days on which they depart from life, that we may be able to celebrate their commemoration among the anniversaries of the martyrs: although Tertullus, our most faithful and most beloved brother, according to the usual anxiety and care which he shows to the brethren in every kindness and labour of love . . . has written, and does write, and signify to me the days on which in prison, OUR HAPPY BRETHREN, by issue of a glorious death, PASS TO IMMORTALITY; and oblations and sacrifices are here celebrated by us, on account of their commemorations, which we shall speedily hold in company with you, the Lord being our protector." (‡)

In the 37th Ep., p. 73 (edit. as before), he says—"Sufficiently blessed are those of you, who, journeying by these footsteps of glory, have already departed from life; and the path of virtue and faith having been completed, have arrived AT THE PRESENCE OF THE LORD (ad complexum et osculum Domini), the Lord himself rejoicing."

Ep. xi. p. 23.—"Torments which do not readily dismiss to a crown, but torture until they overthrow; unless that some one, rescued by the Divine majesty, should expire amidst the very torments, having obtained glory, not by termination of punishment, but by the quickness of dying." Again, in the 31st Ep. p. 62, he talks of others dying "confessing Christ." "The world having been abandoned, to have sought heaven—men having left to stand among angels—and all secular hindrances having been burst asunder, now to be placed, liberated, in the presence of God, to hold fast WITHOUT ANY DELAY a heavenly kingdom."

From passages such as these, which might be multiplied, we can at once comprehend the meaning of Tertullian's words, when he speaks of oblations for the dead, on these anniversary days of commemoration.

According to the modern Roman doctrine, all the faithful—all those who die in the faith of Christ—go to Purgatory, before they can be in a fit condition to appear before God; and the Trent Catechism distinctly asserts this imaginary receptacle to be a place of suffering, and which Bellarmine, and a host of writers, describe to be of a most horrible nature. This modern Purgatory, therefore, could not be the place where the martyrs, &c., named by Tertullian and Cyprian, and others, were consigned, when they offered up their "oblations" on the anniversary days of their death, as they evidently believed them to be in happiness. Cyprian even expressly states them to be in the presence of their Lord.

The second part of this first quotation in question I have translated—"We make oblation for the dead, for their birth day to heaven, on the anniversary day." Mr. Search has omitted to translate the word "pro natalitiis," which omission destroys the true sense of the phrase, "oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, annua die facimus." In adopting the translation of natalitiis, "for their birth-day to heaven," I only follow authorities of his own church. De la Cerda, the Jesuit, on this passage, says—"By natalitia Tertullian means the days on which Saints, dead to the world, are born to heaven."§ And another Roman Catholic, Priorius, says—"By natalitia Tertullian means the solemnities accustomed to be held in honour of martyrs, on the day on which, being dead to the world, they were born to heaven. From whence we make oblations on the annual day—that is, yearly."‖

The omission of the word natalitia (if intentional) is most obvious; for its appearance in the proper place clears the passage of all difficulties. Thus, then, we now come to the truth—first, that the ceremony spoken of is not warranted by Scripture, which we discover not from Mr. Search's version of it, but by consulting the original text; and, secondly, that the ceremony itself had no reference whatever to the doctrine of Purgatory, the truth of which also becomes apparent by the substitution of a word also omitted or suppressed by Mr. Search, as also by Mr. Duffy.

III. I observe that the word "apostolical" prefixed to "tradition," is a gratuitous addition made by Mr. Search or his adviser. The word does not appear in the original, and is unwarrantably foisted in, for very obvious reasons.

Thus, then, in the quotation of two lines and a half, we have two serious omissions and one interpolation, all apparently intentional, and inconsistent with that accuracy and good faith which should be scrupulously observed in religious controversies.

With your permission I will take the second quotation another time.*

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

C. H. COLLETTE.

London, 2nd May, 1854.

* Adore Scripturæ plenitudinem.—Tert. Adv. Hermog, cap, 22, Edit Rothom. 1662, p. 417. "An autem de aliqua subjacenti materiâ facta sint omnia, nusquam adhuc legi. Scriptum esse docuit Hermogenis officina. Si non est Scriptum, timeat væ illud adjicientibus aut detrahentibus destinatum.—Ibid., ibid. See Edit. Paris, 1664, p. 247.

† See Scultet. Med. Theol. Petrum. Amb. 1603, p. 307.

‡ Orig. Oper. Studio Erasmi, Basil, 1536, tom. I. p. 800, ex off. Frobeu.—Lib. iii., comment. in Job.)

† See Jerome, vol. iv., pt. ii. p. 115, edit. 1684.

‡ Ep. xii., edit. Oxon. 1682, p. 27. Tom. ii.

§ Tertullianus intelligit per natalitia dies, quibus sancti, mundo mortui nascuntur cœlo. De la Cerda e soc. Jesu, in loc. Tert. Op. Paris, 1624, p. 657.

‖ Prior, in Loc. Tert. Oper. Rig. et Prior. Annotat. adject. Lutet. 1664, p. 102.

ON INFALLIBILITY.

WE have received a long communication from our respected correspondent, Mr. Rourke. He finds it hard when his pen is set going to get it to stop; however, he has kindly divided his communication into three portions, each of reasonable length. We strongly recommend his example, in this respect, for imitation by our other correspondents. We can often find room for a short letter, when a long one is obliged to stand over, month after month, from the mechanical difficulty of making room for it without displacing other more pressing matter. And a correspondent, thus dividing his letter, will not injure his chance of seeing both parts appear in the same number, should the state of our columns admit it.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Accept my sincere thanks for your kindness in inserting my long letters, on the infallibility of the Church of Christ, in your widely-circulated journal. I beg leave to send you another letter on the same interesting subject; but it will be a short one, as I will not, for the future, "disregard your request to be brief." I most earnestly and affectionately call the attention of your truth-seeking readers to the following passages from the Sacred Volume, which invincibly and irrefragably prove the infallibility of Christ's Church. But, before I open the Holy Book, will you permit me to say that I did not, in my last letter, charge you with wilful blindness, as you declare. My meaning was that, as the Jews reading the Old Testament, by reason of their blindness, cannot see Christ in the Scriptures, but shall, when they believe in him, and have the cover removed, perceive all to be most plainly done, and spoken of him in their law and Scriptures; even so the opponents of the Church of Christ, having a far greater cover of blindness and incredulity over their hearts, in respect of the Catholic Church, which they impugn, than the Jews have concerning Christ, cannot see, though they read, or hear the Scriptures read, ever so much, the marvellous evidence of the Catholic Church and truth in all points; but when they shall return again to the obedience of the same Church, they shall find the Scriptures most clear for her and her doctrines, and shall wonder at their former blindness.

Here follow the passages above alluded to:—"For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee (the Church), nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee. And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children. In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be far from oppression, for thou shalt not fear; and from terror, for it shall not come near thee. No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment, thou shalt condemn. This is the inheritance of the servants of the Lord, and their justice with me, saith the Lord."—Is. liv. 9, 10, 13, 14, 17.

Our Lord again says—"I, the Lord, do keep it (the Church), I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day."—Isai. xxvii. 3. These are passages, sir, which, as I have said in the preface, irrefutably prove the infallibility of the Church of Christ. How, you must tell your readers, can she err if the Lord cannot be angry with her, if she is founded in righteousness, if her children are taught of the Lord, if his covenant cannot be removed from her, and if he keeps and waters her continually with heavenly truth?

Again, St. Paul says—"Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you, let him be accursed."—Gal. I. 8. Now, I ask, whether the Apostle did not here claim an infallibility in what he had preached? whether in these words he allowed the Galatians to believe that he had been under a mistake? or whether it be not plain that he demanded an entire submission to the doctrine he had taught them? and how far, then, was St. Paul from encouraging the private judgment of any man to control his decisions, since he would not allow it even to an angel from heaven, but pronounced those accursed that should pretend to reform the doctrine he had preached?

* Your correspondents may now consult "Pope's Roman Misquotations," which will enlighten them further on the subject. London, 1849.

Common sense tells us, sir, that without subordination there can be nothing but confusion in either Church or State, and that without an authority which all are bound to acknowledge there can be no subordination—that shaking off the yoke of authority to become one's own guide in the affair of religion, must tend to pride, to obstinacy, and to every species of religious phrensy;—that those famous heresies, which have from time to time distracted the Christian world, have all arisen from this want of submission;—that it is the essential character of every heresy to be maintained in opposition to the Church's authority;—which gave St. Augustine occasion to say that he might indeed err, but would not be a heretic; meaning that he was secured from heresy by his disposition of ready obedience to the Church. Common sense tells us that the bulk of mankind, through their ignorance, their weakness of understanding, and their several avocations, being incapable of examining the Scriptures, or of judging for themselves, must unavoidably rely upon authority. From these motives of plain reason the Roman Catholic is sufficiently convinced that to be guided by authority is his indispensable duty; if it be his duty, it is, therefore, what God requires of him; and surely by doing what God requires of him, he cannot go astray. Thus, even, without any help from Scripture, the Roman Catholic is assured he cannot be misled by following the authority of the Church.

But he who differs from the Roman Catholic Church has every reason to fear being led astray, by interpreting the Scripture according to his own opinion and judgment, when he considers that to be mistaken in opinion is what daily happens to thousands and thousands in other matters less difficult than those of religion. Is not this even what he himself must say of all those who, following their own opinion as he does, yet differ from him? Is it not even the nature of man to be liable to error of judgment? And what privilege can he plead to be exempt from the common lot of mankind? Is it that he seeks the truth with more candour and sincerity than others do? Such a notion, however he may flatter himself with it, must appear presumption and folly in the eyes of others. Moreover, by persuading himself he cannot go astray in his own interpretation of Scripture, he assumes to himself that infallibility he denies to the Roman Catholic Church. Besides all this, he has to encounter against the certainty of his opinion an argument which cannot possibly fail to make the deepest impression on any unbiassed mind. I mean that the sense he gives the Scripture is contrary to the sense in which it is understood by all the wise and learned men the Roman Catholic Church comprises within its pale, and contrary to what is acknowledged to have been believed by all Christendom, at least for several ages. If, after all this, he persists in saying that he is sure he is right in following his own opinion and judgment, we can only beseech God to give him what Solomon begged of the Almighty for himself—that is, a docile heart. But it is sufficiently plain to whoever is open to conviction, that he has no just cause to be assured he is not mistaken in his opinion, and of course that he has no reasonable grounds of certainty with regard to his faith.

To sum up all in a word—faith is, of its own nature, certain and infallible. Opinion is not. Whatever persuasion, therefore, is built on opinion, cannot be faith. Hence, there can be no true or real faith but what is grounded on authority—that is, not only the authority of God revealing (which all sects pretend to), but also the authority of the Church, as the only sure channel through which the sense of revelation is conveyed to us.

As this letter is comparatively short, the "temptation to skip" cannot be very strong for your readers. You will soon hear from me again.

I remain, sir,

Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

Passage East, June, 1854.

With regard to Mr. Rourke's preliminary remarks, we have to say, that we know it is quite true that the interpretation put on the Bible by a member of the Church of Rome, is quite different from that put on it by any one else. And the reason is plain enough. A member of the Church of England reads the Bible with no other object than to learn what Scripture teaches, and to govern his belief by it. A member of the Church of Rome only gets leave to read the Bible on condition that he will find in it the doctrines of his Church; he opens the Scriptures, not to seek for truth, but to look out for arguments to defend the opinions which he has been taught that he must on no account question; and so it is no wonder if the interpretation he puts on texts be very different from what any one else would pronounce to be the plain meaning of them.

Mr. Rourke's first Scripture argument is taken from the prophecies addressed by Isaiah to the Jews; and it would, at first sight, appear, that if it proved the infallibility of any Church at all, it would prove the infallibility of the Jewish Church. If a Jew, however, were to endeavour to maintain, by the help of this text, that his Church was right in rejecting our Lord for their Messiah, Mr. Rourke, no doubt, would answer, that the text was a prophecy, which had not been fulfilled in the time of our Lord, seven hundred years after the prophecy was delivered. Well, we want to know, has this prophecy yet received its complete fulfilment. We know that the Church of Christ is to exist hereafter in a glorious and triumphant state, and that there are many prophecies which describe her as she shall be in that state. Mr. Rourke seems to forget this entirely; and applies to the Church, in her present state, every prophecy which he finds about her. Mr. Rourke (we have no doubt, without any designed unfairness) leaves out two verses in the middle of his quotation, which yet would greatly assist us in forming an opinion which state of the Church the prophet is speaking of:—"I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of precious stones. And all thy children shall be taught of God," &c. Now, let our readers open the 21st chapter of the book of Apocalypse, and see whether the time the prophet refers to is not that still future time, spoken of also by the writer of the Apocalypse.

No doubt, the prophecy receives, even now, a partial fulfilment; no doubt, still whatever spiritual knowledge the children of God receive, they are taught of God; but their full measure of light and purity is, doubtless, still future. The inapplicability of these prophecies of Isaiah to the present state of the Roman Catholic Church is still more apparent from other parts of the same prophecy, which are also omitted by Mr. Rourke, but which were brought forward by a former correspondent, who cited the same text from Isaiah.—Vol. I., p. 130. "INIQUITY shall be no more heard in thy land, waste and destruction in thy borders; and salvation shall occupy thy walls, and praise thy gates."—Is. lx., 18. Is Rome without iniquity? Have not many successive Popes, by the confession of her own historians, been monsters of iniquity?

Again—"The Lord shall be to thee an everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."—Is. lx. 20.

Compare this with the letter of Pope Pius IX., dated 21st November, 1851:—"In the midst of the incessant and painful solicitudes with which the calamity of the times overwhelms us . . . it is for us no slight subject of sorrow, to behold what a sad and lamentable spectacle is presented by our holy religion and civil society in these calamitous times."

Is not this sufficient to show that these prophecies of Isaiah have not found their complete fulfilment in the present times, but that they relate to that state of the New Jerusalem, spoken of in Apocalypse xxi., to which we have already referred, when "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and death shall be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor sorrow shall be any more; for the former things are passed away."

Mr. Rourke next quotes a text, on which Protestants are accustomed to rely, as a very strong argument on their side—"Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you, let him be accursed."—Gal. i. 8. This proves, decisively, that the doctrine taught by St. Paul was infallibly true; but it certainly proves nothing for the infallibility of the Church of Rome. Accordingly, we accept, as infallible authority to govern our belief, the writings of St. Paul and the other Apostles and Evangelists; and when we find the Gospel taught by them differing very materially from that taught by the Church of Rome, this text is one, among others, why we reject her claims to our submission, and why we rather fear that she has brought herself under the curse denounced upon those who substitute another Gospel for that preached by the Apostle.

Next, after his arguments from Scripture, Mr. Rourke proceeds to prove, from common sense, the necessity and the duty of submission to authority. We are no foes to authority; we inculcate the duty of submitting to authority—children to that of their parents, subjects to rulers, pupils to schoolmasters, private Christians to their spiritual teachers, &c. But there is only one authority which must be submitted to implicitly, at all times and under every circumstance—the authority of God himself. All human authority, being exercised by men liable to error, may exceed its bounds, and may require to be occasionally resisted. If Mr. Rourke's argument were good, the Mahometan and the Hindoo might, with equal force, conclude, "that to be guided by authority is their indispensable duty; that being their duty, God must require it of them; and that doing what God required, they could not possibly go astray." And they would, on Mr. Rourke's principles, be fully justified in refusing to give a hearing to the Christian missionaries who should call on them to question the authority of the religious guides to whom they had from their childhood submitted themselves. We can see, then, that a man who should implicitly submit to authority, without taking due pains to assure himself that that authority is Divine, is not only not free from the danger of being misled, but is taking the very most likely means of running into error.

It follows, then, that Mr. Rourke is very much mistaken as to the greater certainty with which he imagines his method to be attended. Mr. Rourke is obliged to follow his own opinion and judgment as well as ourselves. He uses his private judgment, once for all, in selecting an authority to submit to, and then shuts his eyes, and follows blindly. Protestants submit to authority also; but they do so with their eyes open, constantly taking pains to assure themselves that the claims of their guide are well founded, and that his directions are reasonable and consistent. Which is most likely to be mistaken? How important is it that Mr. Rourke should not be mistaken in the one exercise of private judgment which he makes.

Faith, it is true, in God is certain and infallible; but faith in any human authority is not. We may be quite sure, that whatever God has revealed must be true; but as to what any human authority teaches, our certainty can never rise any higher than whatever certainty there may be that God has commissioned that authority. Mr. Rourke's certainty can, therefore, never rise any higher than whatever probability there may be for the truth of this one proposition to which his private judgment has led him—viz., that the Church of Rome is infallible.

We beg of him, then, to examine the truth of this proposition with all the care which its importance deserves. We borrow Mr. Rourke's own words, and apply them to himself.

May he not be mistaken in this opinion? Does it not happen to thousands to be mistaken in their opinion in questions far less difficult? Is it not the nature of men to be liable to error of judgment? What privilege can he plead to be exempt from the common lot of mankind? Is it that he seeks the truth with more candour and sincerity than others do? By persuading himself that he cannot go wrong in his choice of a Church, he claims for himself individually that infallibility which his Church denies to all but herself. Besides, he must remember, that this opinion of his—that the Church of Rome is infallible—is contrary to the conviction of all the wise and learned men who are outside the pale of that Church, and contrary to the opinion of Christendom for several ages, and to that of more than half of Christendom at the present day.

Of a number of travellers through a difficult country, half endeavoured to direct their steps by the aid of a trustworthy map; half submitted themselves to the conduct of the first guide who offered himself. And while these last bragged of the greater ease and certainty of their method, how were their brethren distressed to find that the path along which this guide confidently led them was plainly marked on the map as leading to precipices and other dangers. How they would try to persuade them that their certainty of being safe could never be higher than whatever certainty there was that their guide was a safe one, and that this probability could not be high, when he disregarded the directions of the map whose authority they all acknowledged.

It is with such feelings as these that we appeal to Mr. Rourke. We respect him as a sincere and candid inquirer after truth. He has occupied our pages, not with vulgar abuse, but with a fair attempt to prove his religion by arguments, and he has taken with good humour our remonstrances when we thought him occasionally too lengthy. It is, therefore, with pain that we see one false assumption at the bottom of his whole system. We do not feel more certain of any proposition in Euclid than we are of the fact that the Church of Rome not only may err, but has erred in several important points. We, therefore, are earnest in our request to Mr. Rourke to weigh well the grounds on which he submits himself to her. Can nothing better be said for her than the mere general assertion, that in human matters we are obliged (with due caution) to avail ourselves of the guidance of authority? or that God has promised that a time shall come when his Church shall be free from sin and error?

MUST THE DIVINELY-AUTHORIZED INTERPRETERS OF A REVELATION BE NECESSARILY INFALLIBLE?

SIR—I see that your correspondent, Mr. Rourke, in common with most of the Romish controversialists, takes it for granted that those whom God appoints to teach the meaning of the Bible must, of necessity, be secured from error. But it is strange that the case of the Jewish clergy does not occur to Mr. Rourke and others; and cause them to pause.

Had not the Jewish Church a revelation, even the Old Testament? Had not the Jews a clergy to teach them the meaning of Scripture; whose lips, Malachi says, should keep knowledge, whilst the law was to be sought at their mouth? Were the Jewish clergy, or were they not, infallible in exercising their office of interpreting Scripture? If they were infallible, what becomes of Christ's pretensions? If not infallible, what of the a priori argument that the Divinely-authorized interpreters of a revelation must necessarily be secured from possibility of error?

Of course Mr. Rourke may say, though without the shadow of proof, that the Jewish clergy had forfeited their previously enjoyed attribute of infallibility before they condemned our Lord. But how could they have justly forfeited it? Not certainly by false teaching, for that must follow and not cause the loss of infallibility. How, then, except by want of humility, or zeal in holding fast the truth, or by some other fault of temper, or living? But, having lost infallibility, were they, or were they not, still the priests of God's Church? That they were no longer the priests of God at our Saviour's time, will not, I am sure, be pretended. (See John xi., 51). If they retained their office, then have we an instance of a fallible clergy divinely authorized to expound revelation. And, further, if the Jewish clergy might, through pride or immorality of life, deprive itself of infallibility, supposing them to have once possessed it; I see no reason, in the nature of things, why the Romish or any other branch of Christ's Church, might not, through unfaithfulness, forfeit any—no matter how great—gifts with which we may believe it to have been originally endowed.

But there is another answer, no doubt, ready—namely, that though the divinely-authorized expositors of the Old Testament were fallible, yet those of the New Testament cannot be so. But this gives up the question—a new position is here assumed; not that the authorized interpreters of any revelation must of necessity be infallible; but that, whereas God left the expositors of his message to man fallible, until Christ's coming, he can no longer do so with propriety. But to attempt to prove this by abstract reasoning, and without plain authority of Scripture, were absurd. We may well require God's own Word to convince us, that, what he once did, it would be derogatory to his attributes that he should do again.

Let Romanists, then, give us texts; and any which they may produce we will blind ourselves dispassionately to examine. But, if they have any fear of the guilt of blasphemy, let them beware how they represent as absurd that very arrangement which God did, confessedly, make for his Church before the time of Christ. He gave a revelation, and a clergy to explain it; he directed the laity to receive in general their clergy's instructions; and still he left the clergy exposed to error; and the people, if they would blindly follow them, he made liable to be led astray by their influence.

Such a mode of ordering things may, indeed, be condemned; but the condemnation rather befits the open infidel than any one who assumes to himself the Christian name.

Your obedient servant,
A KILDARE CHURCHMAN.

FLOWERS FOR JULY.

THE summer sun of July, of which we had but too little as yet, usually makes the most confirmed citizen pine for the open space and invigorating air of the country. Sometimes it drives him to seek the rippling stream and the sheltering wood, or tempts him to bend his footsteps towards the heather. What more delightful on a summer's day than to tread the wild HEATHER, with its gorgeous purple bell flowers around our feet? The heather belongs to the now aristocratic family of the Heaths or Ericas. Twenty-five years ago there were but four species of heath known in these kingdoms; no doubt pretty flowers, of dark purple, red, or rose colour, and most susceptible of improvement by cultivation. Since then, upwards of 300 varieties have been introduced, chiefly from the Cape of Good Hope, and form some of the most graceful and attractive ornaments of the greenhouse. Of our own native heaths, the common heather (Erica vulgaris) is the most familiar. The cross-leaved heath (Erica tetralix) is found growing on our boggy lands, and the fine-leaved heath (Erica cinerea) in the woods and thickets. Another variety has been found on the mountains of Connemara and Erris, which exactly corresponds with the Mediterranean heath. In Scotland, the heather is interwoven with many of the Highlander's dearest associations; it is often his couch and his covering. Everywhere the heath is esteemed the emblem of solitude; well may it be of that solitude to which many parts of our beloved country have been reduced by recent famine and pestilence. Emigration has added to this solitude; but it at least brings its consolation, that our exiled brethren are gone to a land of active industry and mental freedom, and are emancipated from the spiritual tyranny which sits, like a nightmare, on the faculties and free-will of too many of our countrymen at home. Alongside the heather, we are sure to meet the HAREBELL (Campanula rotundifolia), with its drooping flowers of azure and white. The extreme grace of this fair and fragile little flower, growing on moor and mountain, the delicacy of its tints, the lightness and elegance of its quivering form on its fairy-like stem, revelling in the freedom of its existence, have excited the imaginations of the poets, some even to persuade themselves that they hear its soft bells chiming,

> "Perchance to soothe the fairy queen,
> With faint, sweet tones in night serene,
> When glowworm lamps illume the scene
> And silvery daisies dot the green."

Others tell you that the harebells are in the habit of giving expression to conceits such as this—

> "No rock is too high, no vale is too low,
> For our fragile and tremulous forms to grow.
> Sometimes we crown
> The castle's darkest towers, and look
> Laughingly down
> Upon the pigmy men in the world below,
> Wearily wandering to and fro."

The corolla of the harebell is so similar to the common wild hyacinth that it is often confounded with it. In Scotland, it is the far-famed "blue-bell," the subject of many a song and glowing passage in Scottish minstrelsy. But the harebell is not more free and unconstrained in its movements than the Celtic Highlander himself, 300 years since, freed from the thraldom of a system which all experience has proved to be detrimental alike to the liberties and the moral energies of a people, as it is to their temporal and spiritual prosperity—for it is the social upas tree, under which nothing flourishes but the rank weeds of ignorance and poverty. Some time ago, we blushed to read in the page of history that Ireland, with treble the arable acres of Scotland, has, from some unhappy cause, not only not been able to contribute its own expenses to the nation, (while Scotland has yielded, for half a century, above five millions a year of clear surplus); but, that in the great famine of 1846, while Roman Catholic Ireland received eight millions sterling of alms, from the imperial treasury, Protestant Scotland—great part of which had suffered just as much—received nothing. The different condition of the Celt in Scotland from that of the Celt in Ireland is a wonderful fact, and if any doubt remained that it arises from the freedom from spiritual and ecclesiastical oppression which the former enjoys, it should be placed beyond controversy, by the prosperity of the Irish emigrant in America, when his hard taskmaster, the priest, is left behind.

But let us descend from the mountains and their congenial atmosphere of freedom to the river-side. Here we meet, in full flower, the charming White WATER-LILY. Among florists it bears the appropriate name of Nymphæa alba, or white nymph or naiad. It is a native of the British Isles and of most parts of Europe. In Ireland it is particularly abundant, and the tourist to Killarney, or Glendalough or Lough Dan, in Wicklow, or to the less frequented lakes of Connemara or Cavan, will be sure to meet specimens of this fair inhabitant of the waters. It is a sight truly refreshing to the eye on a sultry summer day, to see a pure white water-lily resting on the placid surface of a lake, or floating on the sluggish stream of a river. Its large, broad, oval leaves spread out like a fan, and so smooth and shining that the water runs over their oily surface, are the very picture of cool comfort; while the fair flower itself, of splendid white, faintly tinged with rose colour, seems to be the stately river-queen, presiding with native dignity over all around. The yellow water-lily (Nymphæa lutea), with its golden flowers, is of kindred with the white water-lily, and is also to be found growing in the lakes and rivers all over the country. The roots of the white water-lily form an excellent dye, and have been used for dying wool and yarn black, both in the Hebrides of Scotland and in Connemara.

But to proceed to the flower-garden, we have the PINK, just now in full perfection and bloom, and few flowers are more generally cultivated, or more esteemed than the pink, for its elegance of form, and rich, spicy fragrance. The various plants and flowers of the pink tribe go under the general name of Dianthus, or Jove's flower, given to them by Linnæus to express his admiration of this charming family. The popular appreciation of the pink is emphatically expressed every time we describe a thing supremely excellent, as the pink of perfection. So the particularly pleasing shade of light crimson colour, derives its distinctive name of pink from the prevailing hue of the favourite flower.

There are several species of the pink found wild in England, but in Ireland we believe but two. The pheasant eye-pink (Dianthus plumarius) is found in the County of Cork. The wild clove-pink—the parent of the carnation (Dianthus caryophyllus)—is also common in our land, and is known by its five plain petals, scolloped at the outer edge. Its chief attraction is its fragrance, like the clove, whence it derives its name. Its highly-prized offspring, the carnation, takes its name from the flesh-colour (caro) of some of its varieties. By cultivation its petals have become doubled, and assume all colours, but generally dark red, pure white, or striped, marbled, or piebald; yet it continually betrays its origin by a tendency to return to its ancient simplicity and singleness, unless carefully watched and cultured.

The Indian Pink (Dianthus Chinensis) is another well-known variety, derived from abroad. It is particularly rich and various in the combination of its colours. The Sweetwilliam (Dianthus barbatus) is another variety of clustered pink; called by the French, poet's pink, or nosegay of pinks. It grows wild in Germany and on the hills of Normandy.

It is a curious fact, that the pink appears to have been unknown to the ancients, as we may reasonably infer, not merely from the Greek and Latin poets being silent in its praise, and the naturalist, Pliny, never mentioning it, but from neither the Greek nor the Latin language having, in truth, any term to designate it. It surely could not have been known and unnoticed. The German poet, Göethe, in his "Captive Song," represents the prisoner pining for his favourite flower, the "forget-me-not," yet doing full justice to the pink.

> "The pink can no one justly slight,
> The gardener's favourite flower;
> He sets it now beneath the light,
> Now shields it from its power."

And we may fairly conclude, that the flower which Linnæus designated as worthy of being dedicated to the chief god of the heathen mythology would not have been passed unnoticed by Pliny had he been acquainted with it. In the sentimental language of flowers the pink is esteemed to be the emblem of love—its dedication is too often as senseless and unreal as if it were to Jove the imaginary god of the heathen. Selfish and imperfect, indeed, for the most part, is the love of man to his fellow; though the Scriptures teem with exhortations, such as—to abound in love—to be knit together in love—to walk in love as Christ loved us—to speak the truth in love—forbearing one another in love—serving one another in love, and continuing in brotherly love; and the spring and principle of all that is expected of us is given by St. John—"Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God—for God is love."—1 Ep. John iv., 7 and 8. If our people were taught more of this from their altars, would we not be better friends and neighbours, and better Christians, too? Would we not tell each other the truth in love, and not retort in anger, and bitterness, and rioting, and bloodshedding? and if a man told us what he thought to be the truth, although we might think it all error, yet would we not forbear in love? If the loving Apostle St. John, who understood the nature and principle of brotherly love, perhaps, more intimately than any mere man that ever lived, were among us, he would say, "Let us love one another, for love is of God, and God is love;" and he would tell you again, what he has already done, both in his Epistle and Gospel, in what remarkable manner God manifested his love to us—not, indeed, as many of our readers would naturally suppose, from what they hear and read in their rosaries, by sending the Blessed Virgin Mary, or St. Joseph, or St. Peter, or St. Alphonso, into the world; no, none of these mercies—and, no doubt, great mercies in their way, as to the New Testament saints, at least, some of them are even hinted at; but the one grand, absorbing manifestation of God's love, which obscured all others—was—"In this was manifested the love (charity, in the Douay Bible) of God towards us, because God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him." (1 Ep. St. John, iv. 8; "For God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting."—St. John iii. 16, Douay Bible. This is the simple declaration of the Douay Bible itself; and our Roman Catholic readers should inquire why it is not kept more prominently under their view? Why the bright and cheering light of these comforting truths should be obscured under a cloud of modern inventions and fables which disparage the love of God—the gift of his only begotten Son—and virtually deny that "whosoever believeth in him, shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life;" for if this truth were really received, we should never hear more of Purgatory or penance, or intercession of saints or angels.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR JULY.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

THE late rains, succeeding such a protracted drought, have stimulated the growth of weeds in no ordinary degree, and, in the majority of cases, the green crops also, which, with the general routine business of the farm—viz., haymaking and hoeing the green crops—will render the present month one of harassing and anxious care and attentive watchfulness to the farmer, to whom a well-considered and properly-organized system will be a safeguard, and carry him through with satisfaction to himself and those around him; but the want of it will bring vexation, disappointment, and loss.

Hay.—This being the most general month for cutting and saving meadow hay, much care and exertion are necessary in the various operations to secure a good and nutritious article for winter and spring provender; to do which, observe the precise period at which the greater portion of the most valuable grasses are in their prime and full of their most nutritious juices, so as to combine with the greatest possible weight the most nourishing qualities. If cut too early, it shrinks too much in drying, and the quality is not so valuable; on the other hand, if allowed to stand till the seeds become ripe the bulk may be increased; but the saccharine juices have become dissipated, and lost in maturing the seeds, and the culm is converted into woody fibre, containing very little or no nourishment. The proper period will be found by avoiding both extremes, and cut the grass, if the weather permits, when the greatest number of choicest grasses are in bloom.

Parsnips, Carrots, and Mangels, if not already singled out, should now have that operation performed without loss of time. The general treatment is similar to that already described for Swedes, except that the tap-rooted plants, in most cases, require singling by hand.

Transplanting Swedes and Mangels.—Blanks in the crops of Swedes or mangels may be filled up by transplanting. The portions of drills to be planted should be freshly turned over by the spade or fork, the plants carefully lifted, the outside leaves trimmed off, and the roots dipped in a rich puddle; they are then dibbled in, taking care not to double up the roots, and have the earth gently pressed about them. Warm, moist weather should be chosen, and if the weather comes on dry afterwards, they should be watered till they take root.

Potatoes in drills should have their final earthing given them, and all weeds eradicated.

Rape and Cabbages should be planted out after early potatoes or vetches, as fast as the land is cleared.

Odds and Ends.—Make good all requisite repairs about the homestead, barns, stables, hay and corn stadtles, &c. Cleanse the yards, sheds, ponds, water-courses, and ditches; paint all the outside woodwork, and farm implements not in use.

New and Recent Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT, with a Critically Revised Text Marginal References, and Commentary. New Edition. Vol. I., much enlarged, 32s. Vol. II, 28s. (Vol III in preparation.)

HISTORY OF THE PROPAGATION OF CHRISTIANITY. By the Rev. William Browne, M.D. 3 Vols. 8vo. 36s.

KINGDOMS OF THE GENTILES, AND THE CHURCH OF THE HEAVENLY CALLING. Post 8vo. 5s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN JAMES WEITBRECHT. By his Widow. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SUNNY MEMORIES OF FOREIGN LANDS. By Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. 2 vols. Post 8vo. 12s.

A MILITARY TOUR IN EUROPEAN TURKEY, THE CRIMEA, AND ON THE EASTERN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA; including Rontes across the Balkan into Bulgaria, and excursions in the Turkish, Russian, and Persian provinces of the Caucasian Range. By Major General A. F. Macintosh. 2 vols. 21s.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAMPAIGN OF 1828-29; with a View of the present State of the Eastern Question. By Colonel Chesney. 12s.

TURKEY, RUSSIA, THE BLACK SEA, AND CIRCASSIA. By Captain Spencer. With Coloured Illustrations and a Map. 6s.

LIVES OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, NICHOLAS I.; AND THE SULTAN OF TURKEY, ABDUL MEDJID KHAN. By the Rev. Henry Christmas. 2s. 6d.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

ALISON'S HISTORY of EUROPE, from the fall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the Establishment of Military Government in France, in 1852; being a continuation of his former celebrated Work. Vols. I., II., and III. 8vo. 15s. each.

A HANDBOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN TURKEY; describing Constantinople, European Turkey, Asia Minor, Armenia, and Mesopotamia, with Maps and Plans. 10s.

NARRATIVE OF A JOURNEY THROUGH SYRIA AND PALESTINE, IN 1851 AND 1852. By C. W. M. Van de Velde. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.

THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANT REFUGEES, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Charles Weiss. 8vo. 14s.

HOPE DEFERRED, NOT LOST; a Narrative of Missionary effort in Sonth America. With Journals of Captain Gardiner, &c. 5s.

ON THE PLURALITY OF WORLDS. An Essay. 8vo. 8s.

MORE WORLDS THAN ONE. The Creed of the Philosopher, and the Hope of the Christian. By Sir David Brewster. 6s.

LECTURES DELIVERED IN THE BETHESDA CHAPEL, DUBLIN, BY THE LATE REV. W. H. KRAUSE. Edited by the Rev. C. S. Stanford. Vol. I. 5s.

THE WARRANT OF FAITH; or a Handbook to the Canon and Inspiration of the Scriptures. By Rev. Robert Whytehead. 6s. 6d.

THE WORKS OF THE LATE REV. ALEXANDER CARSON, LL.D. Vol. III. Containing all his works on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. 5s.

EXAMINATION OF MR. MAURICE'S THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS. By Robert S. Candlish, D.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE LAND OF SINIM; or, China and Chinese Missions. By the Rev. William Gillespie. 5s.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY; with an Inquiry into the Causes of its Inefficiency: with a especial reference to the Ministry of the Establishment. By the Rev. Charles Bridges, A.M. Eighth Edition; corrected and enlarged. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE ORGANIZATION AND GOVERNMENT OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH. By Rev. Albert Barnes. 2s.

CLAUDE, THE COLPORTEUR. By the Anthor of "Mary Powell." 7s. 6d.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT; or, the Books of Genesis and Exodus. Illustrated by Existing Monuments. Fcap. 8vo. 6s.

THE TWO NATURES OF A BELIEVER, as they are Revealed in Scripture, and Evidenced by Experience in the work of Regeneration and Sanctification. By a Layman. 3s.

VESTIGES OF THE DIVINE VENGEANCE IN THE DESTRUCTION OF SODOM AND GOMORRAH. By W. E. Tayler. 3s.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND ERASTIANISM. By J. R. Pretyman. 7s. 6d.

JESUS TEMPTED IN THE WILDERNESS. By Rev. Adolphe Monod. 2s. 6d.

SABBATH MORNING READINGS IN THE BOOK OF LEVITICUS. By the Rev. Dr. Cumming. 5s.

THE ECLIPSE OF FAITH; or, Visits to a Religions Sceptic. Fifth Edition. 5s.

THE CONVENT AND THE MANSE. By Hyla. 1s. 6d.

QUICKSANDS on FOREIGN SHORES. Edited by Mrs. Whately. 3s. 6d.

GRATITUDE: an Exposition of the Hundred and Third Psalm. By the Rev. John Stevenson. 8vo. 6s.

SYNONYMS of the NEW TESTAMENT. By Rev. Richard Chenevix Trench. 5s.

A SELECTION of ENGLISH SYNONYMS. Edited by Archbishop Whately. 3s.

ON THE STUDY of WORDS. By Rev. Richard C. Trench. 3s. 6d.

ON THE LESSONS in PROVERBS. By Rev. Rd. C. Trench. 3s.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY: a Narrative for the Yonng, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. With an Introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

THE DENS of LONDON: Notes and Narratives of a Six Years' Mission among them. By R. W. Vanderkiste. Cheap Edition. 1s. 6d.

HOME TRUTHS: being Miscellaneous Addresses and Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle. 3rd Series. 3s. 6d.

PLAIN SPEAKING. First series. Being forty short, Large-type Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle, B.A. In packet. 1s.

KATHERINE ASHTON. By the Author of "The Experience of Life." 2 Vols. 12s.

THE LAMPLIGHTER. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. Cheaper Edition, 1s. 6d.

POOR PADDY'S CABIN; or, Slavery in Ireland. 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.

SHADOWS OF THE FUTURE; or, the Real Antichrist. The destinies of Rome, Constantinople, and Jernsalem. The World's Confusion, and the Coming Restorer. 6d.

WERTHEIM'S PACKET OF THIRTY TRACTS, assorted. Second series. 2s.

LIFE OF CARDINAL RICHELIEU. By J. Robson. With illustrations. 3s. 6d.

SCHAMYL AND THE CIRCASSIANS. By K. R. H. Mackenzie. 1s.

THE LADY'S COMPANION TO THE FLOWER GARDEN. By Mrs. Loudon. Sixth edition. 7s.

THE FRUIT, FLOWER, AND KITCHEN GARDEN. By the late Patrick Neill, LL.D. Fifth edition. 5s.

WANDERINGS AMONG THE WILD FLOWERS: How to see and how to gather them. By Spencer Johnson, M.D. With 173 engravings. 5s.

A POPULAR HISTORY of BRITISH FERNS, comprising all the Species. By Thomas Moore. Coloured Illustrations. 10s. 6d.

POPULAR FIELD BOTANY: A Familiar History of Plants. By Agnes Catlow. With 20 coloured plates. 10s. 6d.

A POPULAR HISTORY of BRITISH SEA-WEEDS, with Notices of some of the Fresh-water Algæ. By Rev. D. Landsborough. 10s. 6d.

THE SEA-WEED COLLECTORS' GUIDE: Containing plain instructions, for collecting and preserving. 2s. 6d.

HANDBOOK of ANGLING: teaching Fly-fishing, Trolling, Bottom-fishing, and Salmon-fishing. By Ephemera. 5s.

THE SEASIDE BOOK: being an Introdnction to the Natural History of the British Coasts. By W. H. Harvey, M.D. New Edition. 5s.

A BOOK for the SEASIDE. With numerous Engravings. 3s. 6d.

WAKEMAN'S HANDBOOK OF IRISH ANTIQUITIES. 5s.

BLACK'S GUIDE BOOKS for TOURISTS; with Road Maps and numerous Illustrations:—
I. England, 10s. 6d. II. Scotland, 8s. 6d. III. Ireland, 5s.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO DUBLIN AND THE WICKLOW MOUNTAINS. 1s. 6d.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO KILLARNEY AND THE SOUTH. 1s. 6d.

TWELVE VIEWS OF THE PICTURESQUE SCENERY IN IRELAND. In elegant enamelled cover. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR, in the Danubian Principalities. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S NEW MAP OF THE BLACK SEA, CAUCASUS, CRIMEA, ETC., with enlarged plans of Sevastopol and the Bosphorus. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S CHART OF THE NORTH SEA, and the BALTIC, with the Countries adjoining; and Enlarged Plans of Cronstadt and Revel. 1s.

8vo. boards, price 14s.

THE INSPIRATION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE, its Nature and Proof. Eight Discourses preached before the University of Dublin. By William Lee, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College.

Dublin: JAMES M'GLASHAN, 50, Upper Sackville-street.
London: RIVINGTONS, Waterloo-place.

Lately Published,

WILLET'S "SYNOPSIS PAPISMI." New Edition. Edited by the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. Ten vols. 8vo. Price £3.

London: JAMES MILLER, 17, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, and all Booksellers.

Just published,

New Edition, Royal 4to., cloth, price 5s. 6d.,

THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN,

Vol. I, with complete Indexes.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH, Paternoster-row.

Just Published, Fcap. 8vo., Price 2s. 6d.

I.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION: Being Comments on First Corinthians, Chapter xv. By the Rev. Robert Noble, A.M., Vicar of Athboy.

II.

Fcap. 8vo., cloth, price 1s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ELOCUTION: Compiled from "The Elements of Rhetoric, by Archbishop Whately." With considerable additions and alterations.

III.

New Edition, Fcap. 8vo., cloth, Price 2s. 6d.

THE COLLECTS OF THE LITURGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND,

Catechetically Explained, Compared with Scripture, and Briefly Commented upon, with the Date and Origin of each Collect annexed. For the use of Families and Sunday Schools.

By the Rev. Charles Miller, A.B.

With Recommendatory Preface by the Bishop of Meath.

IV.

Fcap. 8vo., Neat Cover, Price 1s.;
Cloth, 1s. 6d.; Cloth, Gilt Edges, 2s.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD: Showing how Irish people talk about Irish doings, when they get a quiet place at the back of a ditch, or under a hedge.

V.

Royal 32mo., Price One Halfpenny each.
Stories about the Mission Work in Ireland.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF A DARK CLOUD.
BIDDY LACY.
FLOWERS TRANSPLANTED.
THE SHORES OF LOUGH CORRIB.
THE FIRST SCHOOLS IN CLIFDEN.

(The Series to be continned.)

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.
JULY, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Gloir do Dhia añ ṡna háṁduib, agus ṡíoḃċáin air an ṫalaṁ ḟeaġḋoil do na ḋáoiniḃ.

Luke II. 14.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 32. AUGUST, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 3s. 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

PAGE.

The Benedictines of St. Maur—Mabillon 91
The Relics of St. Theodosia 92
Immutability of the Church of Rome—Tradition and Development 93
On the Succession of Irish Bishops 94
The Archbishop of Spalatro's reasons for resigning his archbishopric, A.D. 1616 94
Pasce Oves—Had St. Peter jurisdiction over the other Apostles? . 95
Talk of the Road—No. XXIV. 95
Pastoral of Dr. Cullen—Feast of the Assumption . . 96
CORRESPONDENCE:
On Infallibility—by Mr. Rourke 98
On the phrase Dominus Deus Noster Papa, by An Eoghirer . 99
On the Catholic Church—by a Roman Catholic . . . 100
On Infallibility—by W. R. 100
Flowers for August 100
Farming Operations for August 101

THE BENEDICTINES OF ST. MAUR.

In our unceasing exertions to provide our readers, month after month, with matter interesting as well as instructive, we have frequently contemplated diversifying our pages with a series of biographical sketches, such as might either illustrate the subjects we have in hand, or, at least, convey useful information to such of our readers as have not time or opportunity to acquire it elsewhere. We shall now attempt to carry our plan into effect, and think we cannot begin better than by noticing that remarkable confraternity, to whose great erudition and vast industry we are indebted for those valuable volumes, to which we have so often referred (forming, indeed, in themselves, no inconsiderable or uncostly library), the best editions which the world has ever seen of the earlier and later Fathers—Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Basil, Ambrose, Jerome, Cyril of Alexandria, Hilary, Chrysostom, Augustine, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory the Great, Cassiodorus, Gregory of Tours, Lanfranc, Anselm, and Bernard—we mean the Benedictine congregation of St. Maur, who, during the 17th century, successively produced those gigantic specimens of literary industry in the monastery of St. Germain des Prés, at Paris.

Of the hundred and five writers who divided among them this harvest of literary renown, Mabillon is the one who best deserves our notice, as he whom all the rest revered as their great example, and acknowledged, by acclamation, as their head; and in attempting to exhibit some slight sketch of that great seminary, in its days of splendour, in the reign of Louis Quatorze, we shall, perhaps, do well to confine our attention to this eminent writer, whose works have placed his name at the head of the competitors for the palm of erudition, in, perhaps, the most erudite nation of the world, at the period of her greatest eminence in learning.

Jean Mabillon was born at the village of St. Pierre Mont, in Champagne, on 23rd November, 1632. He was sent by a paternal uncle to the College at Rheims, founded by the celebrated Cardinal of Lorraine, for the education of clergymen; where, except while addressing their teachers, the pupils passed in profound silence every hour of the day, save that of noon. In 1653, he was received as a postulant at the Benedictine Monastery attached to the Cathedral Church of St. Remy, from whence, after he had taken the vows, he was sent to another monastery at Corbie, for the recovery of his health, which had seriously suffered during his novitiate, and he was afterwards transferred, by the commands of his superior, to the Royal Abbey of St. Denys. Never, perhaps, was there a more sincerely pious or obedient son of the Church, or one whose simple tastes, devout spirit, and affectionate nature would, under a more genial discipline, have produced a character more lovely, even had his diligence and critical sagacity, and extent of his knowledge been less wonderful. Even as it was, beneath the shade of what we cannot but consider many superstitions, and the burden of many errors, he soared immeasurably above the ordinary ascetics of the cloister, and obeyed, to the letter, the command of the founder of his order, by devoting every moment of his life to some useful and energetic occupation.

It was shortly previous to the birth of Mabillon that the congregation of St. Maur had taken possession of the monastery of St. Germain des Prés. At the time of his arrival at St. Denys, Dom Luc D'Achery, another Benedictine monk, was engaged in a great compilation, from the libraries of France, of the rare and valuable letters, poems, charters, and chronicles relating to ecclesiastical affairs, which had been deposited in them during a series of ages. These gleanings extended to thirteen great volumes, and were published under the name of Spicilegium. Such, however, were the bodily infirmities of the compiler, that, for forty-five years, he had never been able to leave the infirmary; and Mabillon, then in his 35th year, was withdrawn from his charge at St. Denys to the relief of this venerable scholar at St. Germains, where he passed the whole of his remaining life, with the exception of several tours, which he accomplished at a later period, through Flanders, Bargundy, Switzerland, Germany, and the whole of Italy, for the purpose of collecting and transcribing those valuable manuscripts, which were not then, as now, accumulated in the Royal Library at Paris, but dispersed in the conventual, episcopal, and other public archives through all the countries before mentioned.

The commencement of his fame was laid in a demeanour admirable for self-denial, humility, and loving kindness. To mitigate the sufferings of D'Achery, and to advance his honour, had become the devoted purpose of his affectionate assistant. Taking his seat at the feet of the old man, Mabillon humoured his weakness, stole away his lassitude, and became, at once, his servant, his secretary, and his friend. From the resources of his far deeper knowledge, guided by his much larger capacity, he enabled D'Achery to complete his Spicilegium—generously leaving him possession of the undivided honour of that contribution to the literary wealth of France.

Nor was this the only, or the greatest sacrifice, which he made to gratify the feelings of the aged antiquarian. The heads of the Benedictines had long meditated a complete history of their order. During forty successive years they had accumulated for the purpose a body of materials of such variety and magnitude as to extinguish the hopes, and baffle the exertions of all ordinary men. Having found, at length, in Mabillon, one "fitted to grapple with whole libraries," they committed to him the gigantic task, which he undertook in the spirit of obedience and love. In the printed circular he joined the name of D'Achery to his own, and kept alive the same friendly fiction by uniting their names in the title page of every volume of "the Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," which appeared in D'Achery's lifetime.

The literary annals of France, though abounding in prodigies, record nothing more marvellous than the composition of that book by a single man; and, however absurd in our eyes is the Roman Catholic hagiology profusely contained in it, yet apart from the extravagancies of his monkish legends, and in despite of them all, Mabillon's book will live in perpetual honour and remembrance as the great and inexhaustible reservoir of knowledge, respecting the ecclesiastical, religious, and monastic history of the middle ages; and, therefore, though incidentally, respecting the secular condition and intellectual character of mankind during that period. In these nine folio volumes lie, in orderly method and chronological arrangement, vast accumulations of authentic facts, of curious documents, and of learned disquisitions—picturesque narratives without end, and inexhaustible disclosures both of the strength and weakness of the human heart. Mabillon was not a mere compiler, but was also a learned theologian, and a critic and scholar of the first order. When emancipated from the shackles of human authority, he knew how to take a wide survey of the affairs of men, and could sketch their progress, from age to age, with a free and powerful hand. To each volume, which he lived to complete, he attached a prefatory survey of the epoch to which it referred; which, if republished, in a detached form, would constitute such a review of the ecclesiastical history of that perplexing period, as no other writer has yet given to the world. It would, indeed, be based throughout on assumptions which all Protestants would contradict. But if, for the immediate purpose, those assumptions were conceded, the reader of such a work would find himself in possession of all the great controversies which agitated the Christian world during several centuries, and of the best solutions of which they are apparently susceptible.

In the reign of that most orthodox prince, Louis Quatorze, it was a hazardous thing either to give assent to any fact on which the Church had not set the seal of her infallibility, or to dissent from anything which her authority had sanctioned. Meekly bowing his head to "holy obedience," Mabillon was always ready to yield to the will of his superior and the rules of his convent; yet such was his innate candour and love of historical truth, that he ventured to hazard his safety by dissenting from much which the Church had sanctioned; and this heavy charge was preferred against him by some of his Benedictine brethren, before a general chapter of the order. Among the saints of whom the fraternity boasted, there were some whose relation to the order he had disputed; some whose claims to having lived and died in the odour of sanctity he had rejected; some whose very existence he had denied. His antagonists maintained that it was culpable thus to sacrifice the edification of the faithful to a fastidious regard for historical evidence, and injurious thus to abandon a part of the glories of their society, which, by mere silence, might have been maintained inviolate. To one of those who thus invoked the censure of their superiors on the audacity of Mabillon's critical inquiries, Dom Phillippe Bastide, he addressed a defence, in every line of which his meekness and his love of truth beautifully balance and sustain each other.

"I have ever been persuaded," says he, "that in claiming for their order honours not justly due to it, monastic men offend against the modesty of the Gospel as grievously as any person who arrogates to himself individually a merit to which he is not really entitled. To pretend that this is allowable because the praise is desired, not for the monk himself, but for his order, seems to me no better than a specious pretext for the disguise of vanity. Though disposed to many faults, I must declare that I have ever had an insuperable aversion to this; and that, therefore, I have been scrupulous in inquiring who are the saints really belonging to my own order. It is certain that some have been erroneously attributed to it, either from the almost universal desire of extolling, without bounds, the brotherhood of which we are members, or on account of some obscurity in the relations which have been already published. The most upright of our writers have made this acknowledgment; nor have the Fathers Yebes and Menard hesitated to reduce the number of our saints, by omitting those whom they thought inadmissible. I thought myself also entitled to make a reasonable use of this freedom, though with all the caution which could be reconciled with reverence for truth. I commit the defence of my work to the Divine Providence. It was not of my own will that I engaged on it. My brethren did me the honour to assign the task to me; and if they think it right, I shall cheerfully resign the completion of it to any one whose zeal may be at once more ardent and more enlightened than my own."

In the Benedictine conclave the cause of historical fidelity triumphed, though not without a long and painful discussion; and as a proof of the touching candour which Mabillon exhibited as a controversialist, we are told that he spontaneously published one of the many disputations against his book, to manifest his esteem and affection for the author of it.

We must here, also, record another noble instance of fairness towards an opponent which was practised towards Mabillon himself by another very learned man, Papebrock, the Bollandist, one of the most learned members of that learned body. Papebrock had published a book on the art of verifying the charters and other ancient public acts, deposited in the various archives of Europe. In 1681, Mabillon answered him in a treatise, which he designated De Re Diplomatica.

After laying down rules for distinguishing the false instrument from the true—rules derived from the form of the character, the colour of the ink, the nature of the penmanship, the style of orthography of the instrument, the dates, seals, and subscriptions, he proceeded to show, by more than two hundred examples, how his laws might be applied as a test, and how, by the application of that test, the manuscripts which Papebrock chiefly relied on might be shown to be valueless. Whatever may be thought of the interest or merits of this dispute (which, however, involves questions of the very highest practical importance) no one, we think, can read with indifference the answer which Papebrock gave to his formidable antagonist:—

"I assure you," he says, "that the only satisfaction which I retain in having written at all on this subject is, that it has induced you to write so consummate a work. I confess that I felt some pain when I first read it, at finding myself refuted in a manner so conclusive; but the utility and the beauty of your treatise have, at length, got the better of my weakness; and in the joy of contemplating the truth exhibited in a light so transparent, I called on my fellow student here to partake of my own admiration. You need have no difficulty, therefore, in stating publicly, whenever it may fall in your way, that I entirely adopt and concur in your opinions."

We confess that to us this noble act of homage to truth, and frank admission of error, is most touching, and worthy of all admiration. How different in spirit from that contentious and vainglorious love of personal victory, which has so often obscured the dignity of men of genius and learning? When will the world cease to worship at the shrine of mere intellect, and appreciate at its due worth that greatness of soul, which is ready to sacrifice every thing at the altar of truth alone?

Mabillon, among many other controversies of the times in which he lived, had the courage to engage his pen on the delicate subject of saintly relics, which has so often been made the subject of attack by Protestant writers, and somewhat disingenuously upheld by those of the Church of Rome. In the days of Mabillon the altars of the Church were everywhere enriched by the relics of saints and martyrs, of which the catacombs of Rome afforded an inexhaustible supply. It is true that to watch over this precious deposit, and to discriminate the spurious article from the true, was the peculiar office of a congregation at Rome, selected for that purpose from the Sacred College. But though the skill and the integrity of Cardinals might, by devout Roman Catholics, be thought remote from all suspicion, who could answer for the good faith of their subordinate agents? and what was the security that the worship appropriated by the Church to the bones of the blessed, might not be actually rendered to the skeletons of the ungodly?

When teaching the art of discriminating between the osseous remains of different mammalia, Cuvier never displayed a more edifying seriousness than was exhibited by Mabillon in laying down the laws which determine whether any given bone belonged of yore to a sinner or a saint. The miracle-working criterion, though apparently the best of all (and so largely and confidently relied on in earlier as well as later times), being rejected silently, and not without very good reason, Mabillon addressed a letter, "De Cultu Sanctorum ignotorum," to Theophilus Gallus, in which he discussed the sufficiency of three other tests, which have not unfrequently been relied on since, as confidently as if their fallaciousness had never been exposed.

First, he inquired, are we sure of the sanctity of a bone extracted from a sepulchre, on which an anagram of the name of Christ is sculptured in the midst of palms and laurels? The answer is discouraging: because it is a well-ascertained fact, that the body of one Flavia Jovina was found in this precise predicament; and, yet, she was a simple neophyte. Then, secondly, are we safe if a vase stained with blood be also found in the tomb; of course, nothing could be more secure, if only we could be quite certain that the blood of martyrs was buried with them in vases, and also that the stain was sanguineous, and was not produced by the perfumes which the ancients were accustomed to heap up in such vessels.* But, thirdly, what if the word "martyr" be engraven on the stone? In that case (provided the inscription be certainly genuine), all doubt might be at an end, were it not for a sophistical doctrine of equivalents which the relic dealers have propagated. Thus, for example, at the Abbey of St. Martin, at Pontoise, the devout had long been honouring the corpse of one Ursinus, in the tranquil belief that the words of his sepulchral inscription were equivalent to a declaration of martyrdom, whereas, on examination, they turned out to be really as follows:—"Here lies Ursinus, who died on the 1st of June, after living with his wife, Leontia, 20 years and 6 months, and in the world, 49 years 4 months and 3 days. Thus poor Ursinus's only recorded martyrdom was the endurance of Leontia's conjugal society for twenty years and upwards! which passed, however, among the devout at Pontoise as proof of St. Ursinus's martyrdom 1,000 years before. If the learned Benedictine had been as happy in the canons which he laid down for the guidance of the faithful, as he was in exposing the fallaciousness of those generally relied on, Protestants might, in aftertimes, have been rivals with their Roman Catholic brethren, in the purchase of those venerable antiquities. To assert, however, that any such question was debateable at all before the tribunal of human reason, was an act of liberalism, which even a Mabillon was required to expiate. Long and anxious were the debates in the Congregation of the Index, whether the book should not be condemned, and the temerity of the author rebuked; nor would that censure have been averted, but for the interference of the Pope in person, who prudently made himself sponsor for the willingness of the learned author to explain in a new edition, whatever might be thought objectionable in the first; and the worthy but submissive Benedictine having redeemed the pledge, the letter, "De Cultu Sanctorum ignotorum," was not only acquitted of reproach by the Sacred College, but even honoured with their emphatic approbation.

Mabillon gave a yet more decisive proof of his not being disposed to any extravagant scepticism; one which, perhaps, may even excite in most of our readers, a smile at his credulity. There was living in his days a M. Thiers, a man of singular talents and remarkable courage, who had accused the Benedictine Fathers of Vendome of an egregious impostnre, in exhibiting at their convent one of those tears which fell from the eyes of Jesus when he wept at the grave of Lazarus! An angel (such was the legend) had treasured it up, and given it to Mary, the sister of the deceased. It passed some centuries afterwards to the treasury of relics at Constantinople, and was bestowed by some Greek Emperor upon some German mercenaries in reward for some services to his crown; they placed it in the Abbey of Frisingen, whence it was conveyed by the Emperor, Henry III., who transferred it to his mother-in-law, Agnes of Anjou, the foundress of the monastery of Vendome, where she deposited it. Mabillon threw the shield of his boundless learning round this tradition; maintaining that the genuineness of the relic might, at least, be reasonably presumed from the admitted facts of the case; that it had a prescriptive claim to the honours it received; and that his brethren ought to be left in peaceable enjoyment of the advantages they derived from the exhibition in their Church, at Vendome, of the Holy Tear of Bethany!

Who can wonder that where legends like this were gravely upheld by the most learned writers, and the most enlightened generation of men whom Europe had ever seen, were invited to study and believe a mass of fables, of which the most audacious Grecian mythologist would have been ashamed, that half a century did not elapse before a race of philosophers arose who availed themselves of the materials which the Benedictine annals too copiously furnished them with for that overwhelming ridicule, by which they unsparingly strove to extinguish all religion, under the debris of its mediæval superstitions?

Passing, however, from fables too puerile for the nursery, to inquiries which have hitherto perplexed the senate, Mabillon undertook to explain the right principles of prison discipline in a work entitled "Réflexions Sur les Prisons des Ordres Religieux." He insisted that by a judicious attention and mixture of solitude, labour, silence, and devotion, it was practicable to render the gaol a school for the improvement of its unhappy inmates in social unity and in moral character. We have not space to follow him in the details of his benevolent speculation; but it is admitted on all hands, that the honour, which one of his biographers, M. de Malan, challenges for him, of being the very earliest of those who have applied themselves to this difficult subject in the spirit of philanthropy and wisdom, is strictly his due; and we cordially respond to the sentiment of Sir James Stephen (to whose able article in the "Edinburgh Review" we are largely indebted for what we have here presented to our readers), that to the enlightened reformer of prisons may he cheerfully forgiven his sacred osteology, and even his defence of the Holy Tear of Vendome. Though in bondage to the prejudices of his own age, he was able to break through the bonds which have shackled so many powerful minds in later and more enlightened times; and it gives us sincere pleasure, while protesting against the errors of Mabillon and his confraternity, to do homage to their candour and learning, and claim fellowship with the piety, the wisdom, and the love, which, in the midst even of all the errors of other Christian societies, attest the Divine original of all.

* Other archæologists are of opinion that what in such phials is called blood, was the deposit of the wine used in the communion.

ST. THEUDOSIA.

OUR readers have, probably, not forgotten the history which we gave in our number for May, of the fictitious life of St. Philomena, who never existed; we invite their attention now to the history of St. Theudosia. We take our account chiefly from an article, headed "TRANSLATION OF THE RELICS of St. THEUDOSIA," in the Tablet Newspaper, of October 22, 1853.

On that occasion were assembled, in the Church of Amiens, in France, THREE CARDINALS—to wit, Cardinal Wiseman, the Cardinal Archbishops of Rheims and Tours; SIX other archbishops, among whom we find Dr. M'Hale, and Dr. Cullen, and "the Archbishop of Babylon," a rather suspicious title certainly; but some of our readers may be led to suspect that they were all archbishops of "Babylon." There were, also, present NINETEEN bishops, besides mitred abbots, deans, &c., and between 1,200 and 1,300 ecclesiastics—many of whom had come great distances to be present.

For what was this reverend assembly held?

The cardinal archbishop took his seat, having on his right and left the Bishops of Poitiers and Amiens, the deputy of the clergy, and the deputy of the faithful, who had been sent to bring back from Paris to Amiens the precious relics of St. Theudosia, which they had previously had to bring from Genoa to Paris.

A speech was then made by the deputy of the clergy (the Dean of Picquigny), from which we extract the following:—"The body of St. Theudosia touches at this moment the soil which beheld her birth, and re-appears in the midst of us, after fifteen centuries, decorated with the aureole of the saints, and the palm of the martyrs. . . ." He goes on to say, that St. Theudosia is now to repose finally in the Cathedral of Amiens, and proceeds—"There St. Theudosia, restored to our veneration, will diffuse over the episcopal city, and over the whole country, her graces and favours; shall remove from us calamities and alarms; will obtain for us the preservation of the faith for which she shed her generous blood," &c.

Then spoke the deputy of the faithful (or the laity) of Amiens (the Count of Escalopier)—". . . If, like the look-out of a ship who discovers a luminous point on a far off land, I have been fortunate enough to signalize to you the existence of a treasure, it is to you my Lord (the Bishop of Amiens), it is to your solicitude, to the peculiar affection, so reasonable and so special, which you bear towards his Holiness Pope Pius IX., that we owe the possession of the precious body of St. Theudosia, and the triumph which awaits it," &c.

The Bishop of Amiens "replied in the most gracious manner to the honourable deputies—his lordship declared that that day in which the relics of St. Theudosia were brought back to their country, was the most glorious of his life. He addressed, in the name of the clergy, his thanks to the Count of Escalopier, who, having discovered the precious treasure of which we this day take possession, was in some sort the inspirer of the great religious manifestation which will take place in the festival of to-morrow."

The cardinal archbishop then spoke, and told the assembly how much he desired "to assist at that ceremony, in order to find there the occasion of solemnly renewing his immoveable attachment to the holy Catholic Church."

Then was read a document from the Lord Bishop of Porphyrium, who had charge of the relics of St. Theudosia from Rome, to deliver them at Genoa to the Bishop of Amiens, "in exchange for those of St. Viator" (of whom we hear no more on this occasion; but, doubtless, we shall have him again in his turn).

Then the marble tombstone of the saint "was also offered to the view of all." The inscription is not reported in the Tablet; but we have got it from another source, and will give it farther on.

From all this we collect the history of St. Theudosia. She was born at Amiens; she died a martyr at Rome, fifteen centuries ago; her tombstone and body was found at Rome the other day, by the Count of Escalopier; the Pope made a present of it to the Bishop of Amiens, as a reward for the bishop's great devotion to the Pope; the Pope forwarded the box to Genoa; a deputation had been sent to bring it first to Paris, and then to Amiens; and St. Theudosia was at last returned, "all resplendent with glory," to her native city; and cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and ecclesiastics were assembled from so many distant countries to receive her with honour.

All this was only the prelude to the splendid show of the next day. No words can do justice to the procession. The decorations of the houses, the triumphal arches, the obelisks, the green velvet with fringe of gold, "the magnificent domes of verdure, suspended in the air, with pendants of green velvet and white calico," "the magnificent triumphal arch in verdure," the "red dome, sprinkled with stars of gold, suspended from two very lofty masts of verdure," the cavalry and infantry, the statues, "the magnificent gilded chariot which bore the precious relics of St. Theudosia"—of which the account in the Tablet says, "we are obliged to relinquish the attempt to describe THE TRIUMPHAL CAR of St. Theudosia: here the pen is powerless—the painter only could give the image of it"—and then the cardinals, the archbishops, the bishops, the canons, all dressed in silks and ribbons, as fine as any lady for a ball—such is but a feeble attempt to describe this magnificent display.

"The next day the relics of St. Theudosia, surrounded as with a golden crown, on which the statues of the different saints of the diocese were conspicuous, was suspended in the air, above the high altar—this decoration offered the most beautiful spectacle one could see."

We had almost forgotten the sermon which was preached by Cardinal Wiseman, of which we have room but for one extract—"Yes, Theudosia, YOUR BONES, humiliated for Jesus Christ, have this day trembled with joy, and communicated to us their transports of gladness; and this joy, this festival, will have durable results; they lay for the future the foundations of a MORE SOLID AND FIRM PIETY. What Lucy is for Syracuse, Agatha for Catania, Genevieve for Paris, Agnes for Rome, Theudosia will be, is already, for Amiens. She will become the object of a DEVOTION, daily more tender;" and then he addresses Theudosia herself—"And, if up to the present time, unknown to themselves, you have, nevertheless, prayed for them, how much more for the future, being invoked by them with fervour and confidence, will you not redouble your powerful INTERCESSIONS unto the GOD of Martyrs?"

Thus we have endeavoured to give some faint idea of this grand display and ceremonial. And, now, we think, our readers will be ready to exclaim, before we conclude—"Who is this St. Theudosia who is to do such mighty things? Tell us something of her history! tell us her miracles while living! tell us of the superhuman virtues by which she merited to become an intercessor for us with God!"

Our answer to this must be very short; for there exist no materials for a longer answer. It is this—"In all the histories of the Church, in all its records, in all its annals up to this day, there is no mention made that there ever was any such person as St. Theudosia, of Amiens; there is no trace existing in history of such a saint." This is the only answer we can give from the history of the Church! This striking fact is actually confessed by M. L'Abbe Gerbet, the Vicar-General of the Diocese of Amiens, in a tract which he has published on St. Theudosia. He says—"Nous n'avons aucun monument historique qui renferme quelques details sur Sainte Theudosie. Les anciens martyrologes, Romains et Gallicans n'ont pas recueilli son nom"—that is, "We have not any historical document which contains any details about Saint Theudosia. The ancient Roman and French martyrologies have not even mentioned her name!"

And what does it all rest upon—this splendid festival at Amiens, got up by Pope, cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and ecclesiastics? Why, upon this—The Count of Escalopier, a French nobleman of Amiens, in his travels at Rome, found a tombstone in the catacombs of Rome (an ancient burial-place), with this inscription:—

Aurelie Theudosie,
Benignissimæ et
Incomparabili feminæ,
Aurelius Optatus
Conjugi Innocentissimæ
Depos. Pr. Kal. Dec.
Nat. Ambiana
H. M. F.

TRANSLATION.

To Aurelia Theudosia,
A most benign
And incomparable woman,
Aurelius Optatus,
To his most innocent wife,
Buried 30th November,
By nation an Ambian,
To her who well deserves it,
He placed this monument.

Here you have, reader, the whole that is known on earth of Theudosia! here you have the credentials of the saint and martyr! of a new object of invocation! of a new intercessor between God and man!

This inscription is the foundation, THE ONLY FOUNDATION of the faith of those who have recourse to her intercession with God!

But for once we have made a mistake—we have forgotten a fact—in digging for the bones, a little glass bottle was dug up. Mark that, reader, for it is very important. What could that bottle have been for but to hold the blood of Theudosia? And why should her blood have been bottled, unless she was a martyr?

The Count of Escalopier (who, perhaps, came to Rome to look for something of the kind), submitted this tombstone and glass bottle to a Roman tribunal, called "the Congregation of Relics," whose duty it is to pronounce what relics are genuine. He submitted this evidence (and this alone, for there was no other evidence to submit); and on this evidence the tribunal pronounced that the bones he produced were the bones of Theudosia; that Theudosia was a saint and a martyr, and that she was a native of Amiens, in France!

The Pope himself confirmed this decision upon this evidence, and proceeded to make a decree that the name of Theudosia should now be added to the ritual of the Church of Amiens; that an office should be inserted there in her honour; and that henceforth masses should be celebrated in her honour in all the parishes in the diocese of Amiens, and an annual festival be celebrated in her memory!

Will our readers look over the inscription again, and imagine, if they can, the infallibility of the Pope who could pass such a decree upon such evidence!

But was this woman "born at Amiens?" So the Pope and congregation of relics translated Nat. Ambiana;* for Ambianum they said was the Latin name of Amiens. True, that was its name once; but too late to serve the turn; for its original name was Samanobria; and the Roman Emperor, Gratian, changed its name to Ambianis,† after the empire was become Christian, and the age of martyrdom had gone by. Will any of our readers now invoke St. Theudosia, or seek her intercession with God, on the faith of that inscription and the glass bottle? Will they believe in Pope, cardinals, archbishops (Irish ones, too), bishops, and ecclesiastics, teaching them to invoke dead women on such grounds?

Have we not proof here that the Church of Rome with all its infallibility, with all its machinery, is not fit to be trusted or followed in the question of the invocation of saints?

We hope to be able to show our readers more of this manufacture of saintly relics—of the manner in which joint-stock companies are got up, and people are invited to take shares in the buying and selling of relics as a good speculation, just as they would in a railway. And a very good investment for money it is for those who have no conscience. We hope to produce some evidence on this subject.

* It is almost inconceivable that the Congregation of Sacred Relics at Rome should be so grossly ignorant respecting Latin inscriptions as to take "nat." for a contraction of "nata," instead of for "natione," for which it always stands in such inscriptions. The inscription says nothing whatever about where Theudosia was born, but only states the nation from which she was sprung. How the poor people of Amiens have been gulled by infallibility? If infallibility be necessary in anything, it surely is necessary in directing us to true objects of worship.

† Sigibert, ad. A.D. 332.

IMMUTABILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

TRADITION AND DEVELOPMENT.

ONE of the greatest difficulties that Protestants have to contend against in their controversies with Roman Catholics is, to ascertain what is, and what is not, the authoritative teaching of the Church of Rome. That there should be any doubt upon so fundamental a point, especially in the case of a Church which claims to be infallible, may be a novel and startling statement to those of our Roman Catholic readers who implicitly believe that the doctrines of their Church are fixed, unchanged, and unchangeable—the same now as in the first ages of Christianity, and destined to remain without a shade of variation to the end of time. Nor is it, indeed, at all surprising that they should believe this. They have heard it reiterated a thousand times that "Rome is immutable;" and they very naturally acquiesce in the truth of an assertion which, while it seems to invest their own Church with one of the sublimest of all attributes, implies, at the same time, that every other form of Christian profession, must be, from its very nature, novel and transitory. Our object in the present article is to show that this idea of the immutability of the teaching of the Church of Rome, is a mere illusion. And in proof of this position, we shall not enter upon a detailed examination of the various particular points on which she has changed, but we shall limit ourselves to the consideration of one great general question, which virtually includes all the rest—viz., Has the Church of Rome adhered invariably to the same opinion respecting the Rule of Faith?

Upon this fundamental point we assert that the teaching of the modern Church of Rome is diametrically opposed to the clear and formal decisions of the Council of Trent.

Tridentine Romanism declares the standard of faith to be fixed and invariable. Modern Romanism—as represented by the most eminent divines of that communion—maintains that there resides in the Church an unlimited and illimitable power of expanding it. Tridentine Romanism holds that the Church ever continues to believe what she first believed, neither more nor less. Modern Romanism insists that the existing Church, at each particular moment of her history (ἡ ἀεὶ ἐκκλησία), possesses an inherent power of ordaining new Articles of Faith. Tridentine Romanism declares that the Rule of Faith was, once for all, stereotyped, as it were, in the primitive ages. Modern Romanism denies this, and informs us that it has been set up in moveable types,* alterable from time to time, at the will of a living, infallible, authority. The Tridentine doctrine may be termed the theory of Tradition. The modern doctrine is known as the theory of Development.

Let us first consider the Tridentine doctrine upon this point. The invariable language of the Fathers of that Council is, that all the doctrines and all the practices which they decree to be true and obligatory, have always been the received doctrines of the Catholic Church in every age, without any the slightest varintion, from the days of Christ and his Apostles, who were the first authors of the said doctrines and practices, down to the time in which the holy and œcumenical Synod of Trent assembled. Thus, for instance, the well-known decree respecting the Rule of Faith, passed in the 4th session, runs as follows:—"The sacred and holy, œcumenical and general, Synod of Trent, lawfully assembled in the Holy Ghost . . . . seeing clearly that this [saving] truth and [moral] discipline are contained in the written books and the unwritten traditions, which, received by the Apostles from the mouth of Christ himself, or from the Apostles themselves, the Holy Ghost dictating, have come down even unto us, transmitted, as it were, from hand to hand, (the Synod) following the examples of the orthodox Fathers, receives and venerates, with an equal affection of piety and reverence, all the Books both of the Old and New Testament—seeing that one God is the author of both—as also the said Traditions, as well those appertaining to faith as to morals, as having been dictated either by Christ's own word of mouth, or by the Holy Ghost, and preserved in the Catholic Church by a continuous succession."† Here all saving truth and moral discipline are declared to have been delivered by the mouth of Christ himself or His inspired Apostles, and to have been handed down either in the Scriptures or by unbroken oral tradition. The same assertion is made in several other of the decrees—e.g., speaking of the Sacrament of Penance, the Fathers say, "The universal Church has always (semper) understood, &c." (Sess. xiv., c. 5); and, speaking of matrimony, they declare, "that the holy Fathers, the Councils, and the tradition of the universal Church, always taught, &c." (Sess. xxiv). And in exact accordance with their statements, the famous Bossuet, writing against the theory of development, which had been recently propounded by Jurieu, a Calvinistic minister, thus expresses himself—"What I affirm to be true is, that the faith never varies in the Church: that it reached its perfection at once, and was well known from the very first."‡ In reference to Jurieu's assertion, that the mystery of the Trinity remained undeveloped down to the time of the Nicene Council, Bossuet designated such an opinion as a horrible libel on Christianity, worthy only of the lips of a Socinian.

* The illustration is Dr. Wordsworth's: See his Letters to M. Gondon, p. 32, 3rd edition.

† Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, translated by the Rev. J. Waterworth, pp. 11, 18.

‡ Bossuet, Avertissements, cited by Dr. Wordsworth, Letters to M. Gondon, p. 262.

"Can there," he proceeds to say, "be a greater error than to suppose that the faith of the Church only developed itself as heresies arose and according as she made explicit decisions respecting it? On the contrary, the Church never pronounced any judgments except in the way of propounding the faith of the past."* To the same effect Dr. Milner says, in his well-known work, "The End of Religious Controversy"—"It is a fundamental maxim never to admit any tenet but such as is believed by all the bishops, and was believed by their predecessors up to the Apostles themselves." And again, "It is proper to observe that this holy Church, as declaring her doctrine, does not profess to argue upon it in a controversial way, either from Scripture or tradition; much less does she pretend to make new articles of faith, or to expound the original articles in a different sense from that in which she has always held them. In short, her constant language is, Nil innovetur, nil nisi quod traditum est. Such and such is the sense of Scripture, such and such is the doctrine of her predecessors, the Pastors of the Church, since the time of the Apostles." Again, Dr. Wiseman says, "We believe that no new doctrine can be introduced into the Church, but that every doctrine which we hold has existed and been taught in it, ever since the time of the Apostles, having been handed down by them to their successors," &c.† "It must not be thought that Catholics conceive there is a certain mass of vague and floating opinions, which may, at the option of the Pope, or of a General Council, or of the whole Church, be turned into articles of faith."‡ "As we admit that no new revelation of doctrines can be made, so do we believe that the power of the Church consists in nothing more than defining that which was believed from all times, and in all her dominions."§ And, to quote no more authorities, De Maistre, in his celebrated work, "Du Pape," contends that "there is nothing new in the Church of Rome, and that she will never believe anything which she has not believed always."

Such is the Tradition theory, and such are a few of the many high authorities by which it is supported. One would hardly expect that statements so plain and explicit, solemnly propounded by the sacred and œcumenical Council of Trent, and re-echoed by many of the most renowned theologians of Rome, would be flatly contradicted not only by equally eminent divines belonging to the same communion, whose fundamental principle and perpetual boast is unity of doctrine, but even by an infallible Pope himself. And yet, strange as it may seem, the fact is so. Pope Leo X., in his famous Bull against Luther, entitled "Exsurge Domine," condemns, as heretical, the assertion "that it is not in the power of the Church or Pope to constitute new articles of faith."‖ Nor, was this a novel position. Before Leo's time, and about the middle of the fifteenth century, Cardinal Cusanus, an apostolic legate, and, as his biographer informs us, "by far the first of the theologians of his age," lays down the principle, that "the Scriptures are accommodated to the times, and are variously understood at different periods, so that at one time they are to be expounded in one way, according to the current practice of the Church, and that on the change of her practice, its sense is changed also."¶ That "the practice of the Church should at one time interpret Scripture in one way, and at another time in another way," he goes on to tell us is not surprising, because "the interpretation moves in a parallel line with the practice; and the practice which so moves is the spirit that gives life." To the same effect, exactly, the celebrated Salmeron declares that "God has not given all things to all men; that every age should rejoice in its own truths, which were unknown to preceding generations." And lastly, even Bellarmine, the great champion of Tridentine Romanism, and, consequently, a zealous upholder of the Tridentine theory, yet finds himself compelled to admit that the "stability of all dogmas depends on the authority of the existing Church,"†† and that the Church of latter time has power not only to explain and declare, but also to constitute those things which belong to faith.‡‡ This admission Bellarmine was compelled to make by the incontrovertible evidence of historical facts. He could not deny, for example, that before the fourth Lateran Council (A.D. 1215) Transubstantiation was not an article of faith. He could not deny that the practice of administering the Eucharist in both kinds existed in the Latin as well as in the Greek Church, down to the age of Thomas Aquinas (middle of the thirteenth century). He could not deny that it is declared, in the Canon Law, that "many things were allowed before the Gospel became clear which are now forbidden by the Church"—e.g., the marriage of the clergy.

We shall not stop to notice at length the remarkable application of this doctrine of a gradual development of the articles of faith which was made by the famous Jesuit Petavius, about the middle of the seventeenth century, and which called forth the great work of the English Protestant bishop Bull, "Defensio Fidei Nicenæ," for which he received, through Bossuet, the thanks of the Roman Catholic Clergy of France.§§ Suffice it to say, that

* Wordsworth, p. 264. † Wiseman, Moorfield Lectures, vol. i., p. 60. London, 1847. ‡ Ibid. p. 61. § Ibid. p. 85. ‖ Bullar. Roman. vol. v., p. 493. ¶ Cusan ad Bohem., cp. 2.  Salmeron, de 3 Ref. in ep ad Rom. †† De Sacram. ii. 25. ‡‡ Bellarm. de Sum. Pontif. lib iv., c. 2–4.

§§ See, on this subject, Dr Newman's work, "Prophetical Office of the Church," p. 72, sq.

Petavius asserted that the bishops and Fathers of the Church, prior to the Nicene Council, were nearly all of the same sentiments as those for which Arius was condemned! and, consequently, that the true faith was not fully held in the Church from the beginning, but was only gradually arrived at and developed. The infidel historian, Gibbon, gladly seized on this admission of so renowned a writer as Petavius, and very naturally concluded that he was an Arian, and that the object of his elaborate work was to overthrow the Nicene faith; but, as Dr. Newman well points out, Petavius's real object was very different, and one much more in keeping with the principles of the order to which he belonged.

In our next number we shall proceed to give a sketch of the more recent history of this development theory. Meanwhile, we request our Roman Catholic readers to bear in mind that the Church which they regard as infallible and immutable is at variance with herself upon the most important question in theology—a question which underlies all others, and which, in fact, affects the very foundation of the Christian religion—the Rule of Faith. The Council of Trent, with a host of divines, asserts that it is fixed and unchangeable—the same from the beginning, now, and for ever. The modern Church of Rome, as represented by her choicest and most renowned champions, holds, on the other hand, that articles of faith are independent of antiquity, and may be called into existence at any time that the existing Church sees fit to do so.

ON THE SUCCESSION OF THE IRISH BISHOPS.

WE have in Ireland two rival Churches, each claiming our allegiance, as being the ancient Church of Ireland, by true and canonical succession.

In such a case, it concerns all Christians to know which claim is well founded; for, clearly, both cannot be right, and we ought to belong to that which has the valid title.

A valid and canonical succession of the bishops of a Church, has always been considered an important guide in tracing the succession of a Church.

Not as if the mere fact of a regular succession in a Church of its bishops is enough, by itself, to entitle that Church to the allegiance of Christians; for the first duty of any particular Church is, to preserve the doctrines of Christ, and the articles of the Christian faith, pure and entire. When any Church requires her members to deny the articles of the Christian faith, or to believe another Gospel, or to violate the commands and teaching of Christ, then it is the duty of all Christians to come out of that Church, and be separate from it, sooner than submit to such terms of communion. In such a case, even the most valid succession gives no title to the allegiance of Christ's people. This principle is acknowledged by all.

We have hitherto discussed, in various ways, which Church in Ireland does really hold and preserve all the articles of the Christian faith whole and unadulterated. Our readers are in a position to form some opinion upon that question; and we think it time to invite discussion on the question of fact, "which Church has really preserved an unbroken succession of bishops in the Irish bishopries?"

Our Roman Catholic readers will, no doubt, suppose that here, at least, the case is clear on their side; and they will, perhaps, wonder that we should bring this subject under discussion at all. But they should remember that we have always professed to search for truth, on whatever side it may be found; and we have no disposition to shrink from any discussion which may throw light on the truth. And this gives us a right to ask them to consider this question with the same candour and patience with which they receive our discussions on other subjects.

Our Roman Catholic readers have, no doubt, heard it asserted often enough, that the Roman Catholic Church has maintained an unbroken succession of bishops in all the Irish bishopries since the Reformation, and before it. But we ask them to consider, has any Roman Catholic bishop or priest ever produced to them a list of the bishops forming the succession in any one bishopric? We think it very likely that no one of our Roman Catholic readers has ever seen such a list of the succession of Roman Catholic bishops in any one bishopric in Ireland. If any of our readers can give such a list, we are ready to publish it. If no such list can be produced, the common assertions, that a succession of Roman Catholic bishops has been regularly kept up in Ireland, are worth nothing. In this, as in all other things, we want our readers to learn the difference between ASSERTIONS and PROOFS.

We will insert in our journal, from time to time, as we have room, lists of the bishops of the Irish Church, who have been consecrated in regular succession from those Irish bishops who, at the time of the Reformation, renounced certain errors then prevailing. And we call on all Roman Catholic bishops, and priests, and laymen, to come forward with lists of Roman Catholic bishops, in regular succession from those same bishops or their predecessors. This will enable all to judge for themselves by proofs, and not by assertions, "who have really preserved the succession of bishops."

The task will be easy on our side, for our lists have always been published to the world, whereas no Roman Catholic lists have ever been published; which in itself might well lead people to suspect where the succession is really to be found.

Our lists will be taken from Sir James Ware's learned work on the Irish bishops. But where will Roman Catholics look for their lists? The following passage from an Irish Roman Catholic historian, Philip O'Sullivan Bear, in his "Historia Catholica," does not seem to afford much hope of making out the Roman Catholic lists; where we must observe that this work was first published in 1621—84 years after the first renunciation of the Roman Supremacy, and 61 years after the complete Reformation under Queen Elizabeth: "a wholesome counsel IS BEGUN, that in all places of the realm there should be priests who may have the care of souls; which, that it may be more easily understood, it must be recollected, that there are four archbishopries in Ireland, and a great many bishopries, and that ALL of them at this day ARE POSSESSED by the leaders of heresy, and that, on account of that, Catholic prelates ARE NOT APPOINTED to the titles of them (that is, of those bishopries), EXCEPT ON RARE OCCASIONS; because, without the ecclesiastical revenues, such a crowd of bishops could not appear to be able to maintain their dignity and honour; wherefore, four archbishops, who are appointed by the Roman Pontiff, constitute vicars general in the suffragan bishopries (the apostolic authority acceding), either priests, or clerics, or men of the religious orders."* Here is certainly a serious gap in the succession of Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland, and one which we believe was not stopped for some twenty years after that.

During that whole period, as O'Sullivan says, Roman Catholic bishops were rarely appointed to the TITLES of those bishopries.

This expression, "appointed to the titles of them," seems a strange one: it might seem more natural to speak of men being appointed to the bishopries than to the titles of the bishopries; yet O'Sullivan is strictly correct in so speaking, for several whom we find mentioned in his history as Roman Catholic bishops were not bishops at all, they were only persons nominated by the Pope to be made bishops, but NOT CONSECRATED, which alone can make a man really a bishop. This was the case with Eogan M'Eggan, whom we meet twice in O'Sullivan's History (pp. 78 and 244), and in each place he is called "Episcopus Rosæ designatus," which expression means that he was named for the Bishopric of Ross, but not consecrated, for the term designatus is never applied to a consecrated bishop.

We must say that this showed good taste, and a feeling of religious decency, in the Pope. For this M'Eggan was a priest who was sent over by the Pope as a political agent to conduct the war which the King of Spain was then waging in Ireland against the Queen of England: it helped the agent's proceeding, to have the name and title of a bishop, but the Pope had more decency than to consecrate him as a bishop on such grounds; and the discretion which the Pope exercised seems a wise one, when we come to read the account of M'Eggan's death in Stafford's Hibernia Pacata—"Owen M'Eggan, the Pope's apostolic vicar, so often before mentioned, to put fresh heart into his company, with his sword drawn in one hand, and his portius and beads in the other, with one hundred men led by himself, he came boldly up to the sword, and maintained a hot skirmish until he was slain with a shot."—Page 661.

Such an employment and death was certainly much more suitable to an "apostolic vicar of the Pope" than it would have been to a Christian bishop; and, therefore, it was an act of decency in the Pope to give this skirmishing priest only the title of a bishopric, and not the consecration or office of a bishop.

But while we give the Pope full credit for this feeling of decency about the episcopal office, we must remember that such "titular bishops" were not bishops in reality, since they were not consecrated, and, therefore, kept up no succession.

We must guard our readers from imagining, from what O'Sullivan has said, that a succession of Roman Catholic archbishops has been kept up in the four archbishops of Ireland; this was far from being the case. Thus, in the case of Dublin, for seventy-six years, from the year 1535 to 1611 (with the exception of the four years from 1555 to 1559) we find no archbishop of Dublin in communion with the Pope of Rome. There was, indeed, a Matthew de Oviedo, a Spaniard, called Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in the year 1600, but he too was merely an agent in the Spanish war in Ireland, put forward with the title of a bishopric, but not consecrated, and, therefore, no bishop at all.

Whether Roman Catholics can show a clear succession in the Archbishopric of Armagh, the See of St. Patrick, we will put to the proof in our next number. We will give the succession of the Archbishops of Armagh down from Primate Cromer, who was Archbishop of Armagh in 1540, before the Reformation. We now call on all Roman Catholic archbishops in Ireland (especially Dr. Dixon), on all Roman Catholic bishops, priests and laymen, to send us a list of Roman Catholic archbishops in succession from Primate Cromer, with the dates of the vacancies and appointments, and the authorities in proof of each. If any such list should be sent to us, we will publish it side by side with our own list; if no such list should be sent to us, Roman Catholics may well suspect that it is as great a puzzle to make out a Roman Catholic succession in Armagh as in Dublin.

We have now put this question in a position in which it may be fairly examined and discussed; and we trust that our readers will look with interest for the results.

* "Ut autem in omnibus regni locis sint Sacerdotes, qui animarum curam gerant, salubre consilium est initum, quod ut facilius perficiatur, in memoriam revocandum est; in Ibernia Archiepiscopatus quatuor, et Episcopatus complures esse, omnesque hodie ab Hæreticis possideri; ob idque titulis eorum Catholicos præsules nonnisi raro creari, quod sine vectigalibus Ecclesiasticis tanta Episcoporum turba dignitatem et honorem tueri non posse videatur. Quamobrem Archiepiscopi quatuor, qui sunt a Romano Pontifice inaugurati in suffraganeis Episcopatibus vicarios generales constituunt authoritate apostolica accedente, sacerdotes, sive clericos, sive religiosos." (Historia Catholica, p. 297. Dublin, 1850. Edited by the Rev. Matthew Kelly, Professor of the College of Maynooth.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF SPALATRO'S REASONS FOR RESIGNING HIS ARCHBISHOPRIC.

IN conducting controversy with Roman Catholics, Protestants are apt to overlook the great difficulties that stand in the way of a fair consideration of the arguments they may be able to adduce; themselves brought up in a Church which recognises the right and duty of all its members to weigh and consider the reasons of their belief, they forget that in the Roman Catholic Church, faith is measured by the unwavering assent, which its members are called upon to give to every dogma contained in its decrees; and that to question and discuss the grounds of belief, is prohibited as the first step to infidelity. To one thus educated and instructed, discussion and controversy is necessarily most abhorrent; and it will, we believe, be generally found, that where a change has taken place, the most difficult step in the way of the convert has been the taking into consideration at all the arguments of those who differed from them.

Indeed it is to this point also that the rulers of that Church have directed their most unwearied attention; and they never have hesitated to exercise their authority in restraining their flocks from reading or discussing the publications and arguments of those who oppose their pretensions. For this reason their Index Expurgatorius classes in the same category, the writings of a Milton with those of a Voltaire, and they silenced and imprisoned a Galileo, because his discovery of the true motions of the heavenly bodies was supposed to militate with the teachings of the infallible Church.

We have been led into these observations by the perusal of an old document, published in 1616 by Marcus Antonius de Dominis, at one time Archbishop of Spalatro, and Primate of Dalmatia and Croatia; but who lost those high offices by his seceding from the Church of Rome, and embracing the reformed doctrines. And though the subsequent career of this eminent man was not altogether consistent with his new profession, we give extracts from it to our readers, for the purpose of showing the great difficulties that stand in the way of inquiry, by even the most eminent and learned members of the Roman Catholic Church.

The document professes to state the reasons which led De Dominis to embrace the reformed doctrines; and, after stating the high dignities to which he had attained, and the prospects opened before him of reaching even higher dignities, it proceeds thus—

"For the most part, from my childhood, I was brought up among the Jesuits in holy study, according to the common doctrine of the schoolmen, and the received opinions of the Church of Rome; for which opinions I was for a long space most resolved to die, for I counted it execrable to admit the smallest doubt or ambiguity of mind or thought, much less of speeches; and being bound up in this common reverence of them, if at any time any thought had crept in against them, or my studies had suggested any doubt, I resolved to use violence against mine own reason (as the custom is in matters of faith) rather than I should admit the least doubt against those articles of faith, which I took for certain. I confess I did feel continually some sparks of the inward spirit, which, nevertheless, I resisted; yet, I could never freely acquiesce, neither free myself of a great suspicion, after I had made some progress in the studies of divinity, which suspicion was greatly augmented when I perceived they did most rigorously take heed that no book, written against our doctrine, should be held, or read, by any of us; that these books were altogether forbidden students and men of great learning, and well affected to the Catholic religion, I did ever judge (as reason will teach every man) was matter greatly to be suspected, especially as the Court of Rome suffered us not to use them, even after we had completed our course in the study of divinity and taken degrees therein; yea, and after our promotion to bishopries. This suspicion did yet more increase when I saw our masters and professors claim this authority to themselves, to be trusted in all they said; that those words and sentences which they did repeat were the words and sentences of their adversaries; and, in the meantime, the hearers were forbidden, under the pain of excommunication, to read the writings of those adversaries: in suppressing and destroying whereof, they make so great business that it is justly to be suspected something lurketh in them which our doctrine is not able to confute."

He then alludes to his promotion to a bishopric, and thus proceeds:—

"And because I did acknowledge the proper task of a bishop was to preach the Word, I set myself to read sermons and such books as are appointed for Lent, which did soon beget in me a loathing and detestation; for I saw in them, and that easily, a filthy abuse of Scripture, while it is drawn to vain, unprofitable, impertinent, yea, and a pernicious sense. I saw examples and miracles propounded, either false and feigned, or, at least, ridiculous and not worthy of credit. I saw the people miserably deceived; and the inventions of avarice and ambition superstitiously forced upon them, under colour of articles of faith. These things I was astonished to consider; and, therefore, I resolved to leave those troubled streams, and to take myself to the fountains of the Fathers; in reading of whose works I began to delight, for sermons, and holy canons, and Church government.

"From this course, now and then, some beams of new light did shine into me, as yet unwilling and refusing; for, on the one part, I did observe the sayings of the Fathers in very many things, contrary to the common doctrine which I had learned in the schools, and I did perceive that they were either passed over in silence by my masters, or not faithfully quoted, or unfairly expounded. On the other part, I did see that the rule of Church government of our time was far different from the ancient practice, whereby my former suspicions were greatly augmented; and I perceived that we did not faithfully handle the doctrine and affairs of Christ and his Church; but stuffed our theology rather with the inventions of human speculations and philosophy than with the words of Holy Scripture, of which there is a great ignorance amongst us.

"Afterwards, the holy ancient canons, the orthodox councils, the discipline of the Fathers, and the ancient customs of the Church, were, often and again, turned over by me. Whereto shall I say more? I found abundantly in these all I sought, and a great deal more than I sought. There it was easy, with opened eyes, to see that the doctrine of these reformed Churches, which are bitterly reproved and impugned by our theologians, did in little or nothing at all differ from the true and ancient doctrine of the pure Church. I did also perceive that their doctrine, both at Rome and amongst us, is abhorred and repelled, rather than lawfully impugned; not that it is indeed heretical and false, but only because it is contrary to the corrupt sense and manners of the Court of Rome, and to her fleshly plots and inventions. I saw also, and perceived most clearly, that at Rome, without any lawful ground—yea, by extreme violence—innumerable new articles of faith were daily coined and forced upon us; and that in such things as not only appertain not to divine faith, but also contain in themselves manifest falsehoods; which articles that corrupt Court will not suffer to be discussed by any, but pursueth, even to the death, all those who dare whisper against them. It was formerly an article of faith that the Universal Church, dispersed through the whole world, is that Catholic Church of Christ, whereunto Christ himself doth promise his perpetual assistance. But now our Romanists have drawn this article of faith in lesser bounds; that the Catholic Church is now to be taken for none other than the Court of Rome. And it is propounded to be believed, that in it only, yea, and in the Pope alone, the whole spirit of Christ resideth; and whatsoever of old time had been said for the honour of the universal Church of Christ, are, to the great injury of the Church, wholly applied to Rome. These things, among many others, have grieved me exceedingly.

"What, then, should I do more in the midst of a wicked and forward nation? If I would have governed mine own Church according to the ancient discipline of the Catholic Church, and propound true and Catholic doctrine, I should, by that means, hasten upon mine head great stones, and horrible tempests from Rome.

"The Church, under the Bishop of Rome, is no more a Church, but a certain human commonwealth, all of it under the Pope's temporal monarchy. It is a vineyard only to make Noah drunk. It is a flock which the shepherds do shear and clip, even to the blood; yea, to excoriate and slay them. Albeit all these things did ever and earnestly persuade me to flee, yet, I do confess, I found the hand-maid, Hagar, with her child Ishmael, for a long time troublesome to me. I mean I heard my flesh rebelling against my spirit and reasoning after this manner—'Thou art come to great dignities and wealth, under the bishop of Rome, with hope also to attain further. These things thou dost possess; these are certain; but thou knowest not what shall befall thee in other places. Dost thou not know that immediately after thy departing at Rome, and then everywhere thou shalt be noted with the name of heretic?' These and more such speeches my fleshly Hagar did often whisper in my ear; but that divine spirit suffered me not any longer to make delay, but with an effectual voice called me to himself, as he did Abraham, saying—'Come out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, and come into the land which I will show unto thee.'

"Being, therefore, encouraged with this confidence, and moved with this holy calling, I have most cheerfully undertaken this my flight. I would, indeed, most gladly have retained mine own Church of Spalatro; but because that my Church, with many others, groaneth under the tyranny of the Pope, who hateth and abhorreth reformation, and by all his power, and the fears of his adherent princes, maketh impediment to it, and having power of life and death over them who urge reformation, suffereth none of them to live; therefore, I could not choose, but leave my Church, that I myself, having cast off these bonds, and set at liberty, might be the more ready to proclaim the truth, and, with greater safety, might deplore the desolation of the Holy Church, which she suffereth from the Court of Rome.

"This my departing from my country, or rather my going out, and flight from Babel, I will that it want all suspicion of schism; for I flee from errors, I flee from abuses, and that lest I be partaker of Babel's sins, and receive of her plagues: yet will I never sever myself from the love which I owe to the Holy Catholic Church, and to all and every one who communicate with her. Let the Word of God be a lantern to our feet, and let us follow the footsteps of our holy ancestors who have been excellent lights in the Church of Christ. Let us break asunder the darkness of error and falsehood by the light of the truth of the Gospel; and let us depart far from novelties which have quite extinguished the doctrines and discipline of the holy Church, that the Church of Christ on earth may be one coupled together with the glue of concord, whereunto let us all with one spirit and one mouth praise our God, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

PASCE OVES.

SIR—I do not know whether the observations which I would wish to make in this letter may not be already familiar to your readers; but if not, and if you think them likely to be useful, I shall be glad to offer even this small contribution towards the good work in which you are engaged, and which you are conducting in a manner that must commend itself to every sincere lover of truth and peace.

Roman Catholic writers have not been slow in perceiving, that it is impossible to ground their doctrine of the universal supremacy of the Pope by Divine right, on the supremacy of St. Peter, unless they can prove, that Christ gave to St. Peter supreme jurisdiction over the other Apostles. They maintain that he did so; and one of the principal passages on which they rely is, the command given to St. Peter, in the twenty-first chapter of St. John—"Feed my lambs," "Feed my sheep;" "from which words" (I translate from Dr. Delahogue's Treatise on the Church) "the primacy of Peter over the rest of the Apostles, is manifestly collected, for to him is committed by Christ, the care not only of the lambs, but also of the sheep, or mothers of the flock—that is, of the pastors themselves—and, thence, of all Churches, and of all belonging to them."*

I quote Dr. Delahogue, not only because I have been under the impression that his work is used as a text-book in the education of the Roman Catholic priests in Ireland, but because he is very far from being an ultramontanist in his views of the supremacy. To show the value of this argument, it would be sufficient to observe, that even Roman Catholic writers have acknowledged, that St. Augustine and others of the Fathers have drawn no such conclusion from our Saviour's words. But it seems desirable to look a little more into the context.

St. John relates, that after our Saviour had given this charge to St. Peter, he pronounced a prophecy which was intended to intimate to St. Peter, that he should hereafter suffer martyrdom for his sake, and to signify by what sort of death he should glorify God. And having done this, he commanded the Apostle to follow him. While obeying this command, St. Peter turned about, and saw St. John following also; and on seeing him he said, "Lord, what shall this man do?" It is on this question, and the answer which our Saviour gave to it, that I wish to make a few observations. "Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me;" which words made so great and so general an impression, that (as St. John himself observes) they gave rise to an opinion (of which it is not requisite to say more at present) that he was never to die.

Different motives have been assigned for the question of St. Peter. I cannot think it was a reprehensible curiosity which prompted him to ask—"What shall this man do?" Considering the affection which evidently subsisted between the two Apostles, nothing could be more natural than that Peter, thus forewarned of his own death, should wish to know whether—united by their Lord in life—in death also they should not be divided. Nor is it easy to perceive why our Saviour should answer as he did, if curiosity was the fault he wished to correct. If he had merely said—"What is that to thee? follow thou me," the answer would have been plainly intended to rebuke an improper inquisitiveness. But by saying "If I will that he tarry till I come"—so far from repressing curiosity, the words rather excited it; it being impossible not to feel desirous to understand their meaning. In point of fact, they set men on thinking and speculating at the time; and, as St. John informs us, gave rise to a current opinion among Christians. But let us take these words in connection with what immediately preceded them.

The Lord had, just before this, commanded St. Peter to feed his lambs and his sheep. According to Roman Catholic writers, this command invested him with supreme jurisdiction over all the other Apostles. According to their doctrine, the command was so peculiarly and especially a conveyance of power and pre-eminence to him, that the other Apostles were only part of his flock—the sheep whom he was to rule and govern. But if this were the meaning of the words, surely it was his place and his business to ascertain his Master's wishes respecting St. John? It was, I say, on the Roman Catholic theory of the supremacy of St. Peter, strictly within the limits of his office and duty, to say to his Master—"Lord, what shall this man do?" It was something to him—it was everything. For if he was constituted supreme pastor of the Church in the room of Christ, his following of Christ must consist, not merely in the imitation of his holiness and his patience, but in copying the example which the Lord had set him in the precise and especial duties of that dignity to which he was exalted. As supreme ruler of the Church, universal and vicegerent of Christ on earth, St. Peter could not follow Christ, unless he imitated the example of his government, as well as of his life and sufferings. He could not tread in his footsteps, unless he governed the other Apostles, in the same manner and on the same principles, as Christ had governed them and him during his abode on earth.

If it was something to Christ—if it was his office, while on earth, as the great shepherd of the sheep—to know what each of his Apostles should do, it was something to St. Peter. It was his office and his place to know what they should do in his Master's absence, and standing in his room. It was his duty to assign to them their works and places in the fold of Christ, as the Lord, in whose stead he acted, would have done if present. But to do this, he must, in every instance, seek for his Master's directions and the guidance of his Holy Spirit; and, therefore, the question, under all circumstances, on his lips, must have been precisely the one which he did ask—"Lord, what shall this man do?"

If St. Peter had supreme jurisdiction over the other Apostles, he was right in asking the question. It was the very embodiment of his whole office; for if (as I have said) his office consisted in assigning them, and all other pastors, their place and work, and in seeking the Divine guidance to enable him to do this with infallible certainty, this question—"Lord, what shall this man do?"—was the question of his whole existence.

If, then, St. Peter had any thought of this being his prerogative, in consequence of his having been commanded to feed the sheep, in what words could our Saviour have more distinctly corrected such a notion than by saying—"What is that to thee?" By such a reply he, as plainly and as strongly as words could do it, declared that St. Peter had no such charge, no such duty, no such authority in his Church; that the rest of the Apostles were not under his government and jurisdiction; that the direction of their life and ministry was absolutely retained by our Saviour in his own hands; so that the question—as far as authority and jurisdiction were concerned—did not concern St. Peter, any more than it did any other of the Apostles. The words are, in fact, totally irreconcilable with the notion of our Saviour having given supremacy to St. Peter over the universal Church. The proof, if there be any, must be drawn from some other source; and, even then, it would still be necessary for the advocates of the supremacy to show, how their interpretation of Matt. xvi. 18–19, and their inferences from other passages of the New Testament, can be made to harmonize with this answer of our Saviour—"What is that to thee? Follow thou me."

X. A.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXIV.

"WELL, Pat, isn't it the quare time since I saw you to have a talk, while I was above at the railway, with hard work and fair pay? And is there anything new at Kilcommon to talk of?"

"Deed, then, Jem," said Pat, "there's the new mission to talk of."

"Well, that's not new anyway," said Jem; "sure I saw that myself afore I went to the railroad."

"Well, it is new, Jem," said Pat; "sure its a Catholic mission that's in it."

"Is it the priests at a mission, Pat?" said Jem; "why, sure a station would be more in their way."

"Aye, is it," said Pat; "five or six priests there holding a mission of their own."

"Well, Mr. Burke and Mr. Owens is making a stir among the priests anyway," said Jem; "sure that's a new thing entirely; but what was it like at all?"

"Why, the greatest confessing and preaching that ever you seen; and the chapel-yard like a fair with the booths and shops."

"And what shops at all in the chapel-yard?" said Jem.

"Why, booths and stands, all covered with jimcracks and toys, fit to bring all the children at a fair to them," said Pat.

"And do you say its selling toys for the little children the missionaries were?" said Jem.

"Well, it wasn't just that," said Pat; "for it was toys for the big children they were selling."

"What sort at all?" said Jem.

* "Christus bis illi dixit; Pasce agnos meos, et tertiâ vice Pasce oves meas; quibus verbis primatus Petri supra cæteros apostolos manifeste colligitur, namque illi non agnorum tantum, sed et ovium, seu matrum gregis, cura a Christo committitur, id est pastorum ipsorum, prolisque omnium ecclesiarum et omnium ad illas pertinentium."—Delahogue Tractat. de Eccl. Univ., p. 334. Dublin, 1829. The proposition, which Dr. Delahogue is proving, is in these words—"S. Petrus a Christo primatum accepit supra alios apostolos vi cujus inter illos omnes, non honoris et dignitatis tantum, sed etiam autoritatis et jurisdictionis eminuit."—Ib., p. 330.

"Why, there was stands there, all glittering in the sun, covered all over with little bits of tin, at halfpence apiece, with gilding on them as bright as gingerbread," said Pat.

"And what were they at all?" said Jem.

"Miraculous medals, Jem," said Pat.

"And did they work miracles?" said Jem.

"Sorrow one, that I could hear of," said Pat.

"And did the people believe there was miracles on that stand, at a halfpenny apiece?" said Jem.

"Well, you see them that bought them had to get them blessed by the missionaries, before there would be any good in them," said Pat.

"And did the missionaries say they were miraculous medals, when they were blessed?" said Jem.

So then Pat pulled a printed paper out of his pocket, and showed it to Jem, with a cross at the top, and "Jesus, Mary, and Joseph," printed under the cross, and, under that again, in big letters, "RESOLUTIONS AT THE CLOSE OF THE MISSION," and then Jem read out of it, "PRAYER OF THE MIRACULOUS MEDAL—O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee;" and then Pat took out of his pocket a little bit of gilt tin, as big as a sixpence, with the prayer, and the picture of the virgin stamped upon it; "And," said Pat, "here's the miraculous medal, Jem."

So Jem turned it about in his fingers, "And," said he, "do they think the people has got no sense at all? Sure its the height of impudence, it is, to call that miraculous."

"Well, I don't know, Jem," said Pat; "sure when grown childer can be got in plenty to buy the like of that for a miraculous medal, its a'most a miracle itself."

"Well, if bits of tin can beat the Bible in the long run, I'll call that a miracle, when I see it"—said Jem. "But did the people take to the medals, Pat?"

"Well, there was lots and lashings of them sold," said Pat, "but I don't think them that got them cared a deal for them; sure I was in Mr. Thomas's bread shop, when a boy come in, and said he had no money, and asked to buy a bit of bread with a miraculous medal, blest and all; and, indeed, Mr. Thomas gave him the bread, and took the medal, so one medal was worth something any way."*

"And what was the preaching like, Pat?" said Jem.

"Well, it wasn't like Father John's preaching at all," said Pat, "for they didn't abuse nor blackguard nobody, not even the Scripture-readers; but kept speaking to the people about their sins, and about death and judgment, and heaven and hell, quite solemn and serious, till you'd think that the people was just frightened out of their lives, and ready to look for salvation entirely; and you would see the people's hearts was stirred up in them entirely, for they never heard the like of that preaching in the chapel before; and, I'm thinking, if Father John doesn't mend his hand and try something more Christian-like, he won't go down with the people at all, after that."

"And, Pat, when the people was stirred up to look for salvation," said Jem, "did the missionaries shew them the way of salvation, or did they tell them of the blood of Christ at all?"

"Not one word about it at all, Jem," said Pat, "they just stirred up the people till you would think their minds couldn't be quiet at all about their sins, and then they just left them in the lurch, and didn't give them nothing to make their peace with God."

"And was there nothing about Jesus Christ, the Saviour of sinners, then?" said Jem.

"Nothing at all," said Pat; "there was plenty said then for the priests, but nothing at all for Christ, the Saviour of sinners! Sure, look at this paper I showed you," said Pat: "here's about death and judgment, and heaven and hell; and here's the Blessed Virgin six times over, and the prayer of the miraculous medal, and plenty of real good advice, and not one word about Jesus Christ, the Saviour, good or bad, first or last; and that's the priest's mission, Jem."

So Jem read the paper over, and he could not find one word about Christ, the Saviour of sinners, in it; and we print that paper (for a copy was sent to us) that our readers may try if they can find anything about Christ in it.

"Well," said Jem, "I think I see now what can come of it."

"And what's that, Jem?" said Pat.

"Well, it's my opinion," said Jem, "that them that's stirred up to think of their sins, and of heaven and hell, will have to look for a saviour and a way of salvation before they can get their minds quiet again—and it's clear they won't get that from priests—and who knows but they may be driv to the Bible for that."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I think you are right; sure enough, it's new work the priests are at in preaching that way, and more may come of it than they know of. If they stir the people to think in earnest about sin and their own souls, they'll maybe find they have riz what they cannot quell, for they haven't got what will satisfy them that are once in earnest about their own souls; and the Rev. Mr. Burke seemed to think that, too, for he kept writing mighty good letters to the people, showing them where they would find salvation and the way of peace with God, if they want to look for it now."

"But look here, Pat," said Jem, "see, here's a verse out of the Bible, stuck on to the end of the priest's paper; sure that's new anyway." So Jem read the verse—"Whosoever shall follow this rule, peace on them and mercy.—Galatians ch. vi., ver. 16."

"And what rule was that about," said Pat; "could it be about praying to the Blessed Virgin, and looking to her for salvation, the way it is in this paper?"

So Pat got his Douay Bible, and he read—"God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom the world is crucified to me and I to the world. For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor incircumcision, but a new creature. And whosoever shall follow this rule, peace on them and mercy."—Galatians ch. vi., v. 14, 15, 16.

"Now, Pat," said Jem, "see what the rule in the Douay Bible is, to glory in the cross of Jesus Christ, and nothing else, and the promise of peace and mercy is to them that follow that rule. And now see if this paper isn't telling every one to pray to the Blessed Virgin and to look to her for salvation, without one word about Christ the Saviour of sinners; and then they clap on to this rule of their own making the very promise that the Bible makes to them that look to Christ only. Now, is'nt that nothing else but turning the word and promise of God himself into a lie?"

"Jem," said Pat, "there's nothing else to be got out of our priests. They haven't the Gospel, and so they won't let us have the Bible; and if we want the Gospel of Jesus Christ we must have the Bible for ourselves to teach us."

We print here the paper which the missionary priests printed and circulated about their mission, that our readers may see for themselves, whether what Pat and Jem said about it was fair and true.

* This did actually happen, in the shop of a Protestant.

✠

JESUS, MARY, AND JOSEPH.

RESOLUTIONS AT THE CLOSE OF THE MISSION.

1st. Every day, either at morning or night prayers, I shall repeat and consider these great truths: God SEES ME, and beholds even the secrets of my heart. I must die, and it may be this very day. After death I must be judged, and woe to me if I be found guilty of mortal sin, not repented of. Then begins Eternity, which I must spend amidst the joys of Heaven or torments of Hell.

2ndly. Every day I shall be exact in saying my morning and night prayers; I shall examine my conscience, I shall repeat the Angelus, say grace before and after meals, read a portion of a pious book (were it only for five or ten minutes), or recite a part of the Rosary of the Blessed Virgin.

3rdly. Every Sunday I shall assist devoutly at Mass, and, if possible, at a Sermon, and I shall read a considerable portion of a pious book; I shall also consider the faults of the past week, and resolve to avoid them this week. Moreover, I shall examine how I have kept these resolutions, and I shall repeat them anew.

4thly. Every month, at least, I shall approach the Holy Sacraments of Penance and the Blessed Eucharist. But if I should have the misfortune of falling into mortal sin, I shall overcome every inconvenience, in order to go to confession as soon as possible, knowing that a person in mortal sin is liable at any moment, to everlasting damnation.

5thly. I shall avoid most carefully every person, every place, and every thing that would bring me into sin, but above all, such persons, such places, and such things, as have already led me into sin.

6thly. I shall make every effort, with the grace of God, to overcome that temptation which I know by experience to be most dangerous to me.

7thly. Every night I shall repeat the following prayer, to obtain, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin, the grace of persevering in these resolutions until death:—

PRAYER OF ST. BERNARD.

Remember, O most pious Virgin, that it was never heard of in any age that those who implored, and had recourse to thy powerful protection, were ever abandoned by thee. I, therefore, O Sacred Virgin, animated with the most lively confidence, cast myself at thy sacred feet, most earnestly and fervently beseeching thee to adopt me, though a wretched sinner, for thy perpetual child, to take care of my eternal salvation, and to watch over me at the hour of my death. O do not, mother of the Word Incarnate, despise my prayers, but graciously hear and obtain the grant of my petitions. Amen.

PRAYER OF THE MIRACULOUS MEDAL.

O MARY, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee.

SPECIAL RECOMMENDATIONS.

To THE PARISHIONERS AT LARGE.—Exact attendance at the public service of religion in the Church, zeal for the becoming style and decoration of the Church, as also for the vestments and other requisites of the altar, respect for the Clergymen, and submission to their advice.

To THE HEADS OF FAMILIES.—Instruction, vigilance, correction, and above all, good example—prayer in common, proper choice of servants, attention to their religious duties.

To HUSBANDS AND WIVES.—Affection, mutual forbearance, union and peace—send your children to good schools.

To CHILDREN.—Love, respect, and obedience to parents—peace, and concord amongst themselves.

To MEN.—A horror of blaspheming, cursing, swearing, gambling, impure conversation, bad company, drunkenness, and public houses, a love of honesty, the pardon of injuries.

To WOMEN.—Meekness, patience, charity and attention to the duties of the house.

To YOUNG PEOPLE IN GENERAL.—To avoid dangerous occasions, wakes, dances, company-keeping, and bad books.

To YOUNG BOYS.—To avoid dangerous amusements, dread of everything contrary to modesty, to practice pious reading.

To YOUNG FEMALES.—Modesty, becomingness in dress, humility, particular devotion to the Blessed Virgin, the study and imitation of her virtues.

To ALL.—A spirit of piety, watchfulness, great distrust in ourselves, and unbounded confidence in God.

"Whosoever shall follow this rule, peace on them and mercy."—GAL. vi. 16.

Whether the prayer in the above paper was really written by St. Bernard, who lived in the 12th century, we do not know; perhaps some of our correspondents can tell us. But we do think it very strange that any prayer of St. Bernard should be put along with the prayer of the miraculous medal, "O Mary, CONCEIVED WITHOUT SIN, pray for us, who have recourse to thee," for this reason, that St. Bernard condemned the notion of Mary being conceived without sin, as a FALSE DOCTRINE. If our readers will look to another article in our present number, p. 97, they will find that St. Bernard affirms that this doctrine is "neither supported by reason nor backed by any tradition;" he says it was founded on "an alleged revelation which is destitute of adequate authority." He asks, "How can it be maintained that a conception which did not proceed from the Holy Ghost—not to say that it proceeded from sin—can be holy? or how could they conjure up a holy day on account of a thing that is not holy in itself;" and he says, that the Feast of the Immaculate Conception (which is now celebrated in the Church of Rome) "either honours sin or authorizes a false holiness."

All this St. Bernard wrote; yet the Roman Catholic priests do not scruple to put St. Bernard's name side by side with a prayer, "O, Mary, conceived without sin!"

Thus the priests deal with the Fathers; thus they reverence the opinions and authority of the Fathers; but how could we expect them to deal more truly with the Fathers, than they do with Scripture itself?

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg to call the attention of our correspondents to the utility of adding their name and address to their communications.

Several papers are now in our possession which we cannot insert without alterations, which we do not feel at liberty to make without the previous concurrence of the writers.

We would request our correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1854.

SINCE the publication of our last number, a Pastoral letter has been published, addressed to the [Roman] Catholic clergy and laity of the diocese of Dublin, on the Feast of the Assumption, signed PAUL CULLEN, Archbishop, &c., which sets forth some matters, to which we think it our duty, as lovers of truth, to call attention.

The document presents so striking an illustration of the tone and style in which it is now the fashion in the Roman Catholic Church to speak of, and address the Blessed Virgin Mary, that, had our space permitted, we should have been glad to have transcribed the whole of it for our readers. Its great length, however, obliges us to content ourselves with merely giving such extracts as appear the most striking, and worthy of remark; leaving it to such of our readers as may desire it, to consult the original letter, which they will find given in full in the Tablet of the 5th instant, and in most of the other Roman Catholic journals.

"The Church (says Dr. Cullen) invites us, at this season, to celebrate the Assumption of the Holy Virgin into Heaven. . . . This festival recalls to our recollection the last moments of the great mother of God upon earth, and puts before our eyes the sublime spectacle of her passage into heaven. She passes from the darkness of this world to the regions of eternal bliss . . . where she shall be for all ages—the health of the weak, the refuge of poor sinners, the source of all spiritual graces and favours. Her body, exempted from the lot of the other descendants of Adam, is not condemned to moulder into dust, but, united again with her pure soul, is translated into heaven, and placed at the right hand of the Eternal Son."

"Acquainted, as we are, with the intensity of your devotion to the Holy Mother of God, who is the special patroness of this diocese and this city, we need scarcely exhort you to join in this Novena with fervour and zeal, and to celebrate, with the profoundest veneration and the warmest sentiments of piety, the greatest of her festivals. All the honour that we can pay to this great Virgin—to this most holy and exalted of all creatures—is nothing when compared to what is due to the sublimity of her dignity, the extent of her merits, and to the power of her patronage. . . . Choose, says St. Bernard, which you will most admire—the most beneficent condescension of the Son, or the sublime dignity of the Mother. On each side it is a subject of wonder and astonishment—that a God should obey a woman is a humility beyond example—and that a woman COMMAND a God is an unparalelled privilege."

. . . . "It is our sad lot to have been born in original sin, and to have inherited from our first parents the maledictions which they brought on themselves by transgressing God's commandments; whilst Mary, by a privilege granted to her alone among all the children of Adam, was conceived free from every stain of sin. Such is the received doctrine of all the Catholic world, and SUCH HAS IT ALWAYS BEEN. Let us humbly pray that the Holy Pontiff who now fills the chair of St. Peter will soon put the seal of infallibility upon it, by declaring to be a doctrine of the Church what is already, and HAS BEEN ALWAYS BELIEVED—thus satisfying the pious aspirations of the faithful Christians, who desire to add a new wreath of glory to the diadem of the celestial Queen, and to bring into stronger light the privileges of the most exalted of creatures."

There are several matters in the above extracts which, we confess, have startled us, not a little; and we earnestly beg the attention of our Roman Catholic readers to the calm consideration of them.

That Dr. Cullen should represent the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin to be now the received doctrine of all the Catholic world, while he, in the next sentence, admits that it has never yet been declared to be a doctrine of the Church, is in itself sufficiently strange to any one who has been in the habit of considering that it is the office of the Head of the Church to lead, and not to follow; to teach, and not to be taught, what doctrines ought to be believed by faithful Christians. And if Dr. CULLEN be right in asserting that "all the honour we can pay the Virgin Mary is nothing when compared with what is her due, and that the whole world of faithful Christians are agreed in breathing forth their pious aspirations to the holy Pontiff to add this new wreath of glory to the diadem of their celestial Queen, it does, certainly, appear to be somewhat singular that the present Pontiff, as well as all the Popes who have filled the Holy See before him, for the last six or seven hundred years, should have been so long blind to their duty, and so deaf to the prayers and pious aspirations of the whole Catholic world on the subject!

It is rather hard, we think, to believe that the Popes have been the only individuals among the faithful who were reluctant to add a new wreath of glory to the diadem of her whom Dr. CULLEN, in the intensity of his devotion, seems never to think he can eulogize sufficiently.

We cannot refrain from giving one other passage:—

"O my brethren, let us not neglect to avail ourselves of this great means of salvation. . . . . In our dangers and our difficulties let us invoke the most holy name of Mary. . . . . Let us put on the new man, and reform the tenor of our lives, in order that we may approach with confidence the throne of the Holy Virgin, and place ourselves under the shield of her protection. Let us prove that we are the children of the Queen of Angels, by our fervour in the service of God; the children of the Queen of Patriarchs, by our piety; the children of the Queen of Prophets and Apostles, by our zeal; the children of the Queen of Martyrs, by our courage and fortitude; the children of the Queen of Confessors, the children of the Queen of Virgins, the children of the Queen of Mercy," &c., &c.

"Oh! if we do so, the most Holy Virgin will not abandon us—like a pillar of light, she will go before us and direct our steps; she will defeat the attacks of our infernal enemies; she will strengthen us in our temptations, and obtain for us all the blessings and graces necessary in order to work out our eternal salvation."

Surely it would be passing strange if every Pope, who ever sat on the throne of St. Peter, was so hard-hearted as to refuse to add any new gem to the celestial crown of their grand patroness, unless some grave difficulty stood in the way of their doing so; and even if we knew no more of the matter, we confess that this reflection alone would have led us to suspect that Dr. Cullen's statements ought to be received with some little caution, and that, high as his position may be in the Roman Catholic world in Ireland, he is possibly not very accurately informed about the real state of the case, or the causes of the reluctance of the Holy See to satisfy the pious aspirations of the faithful Christians who desire to add this new wreath of glory to the diadem of their queen.

Fortunately, however, we happen to know what Dr. Cullen appears to be ignorant of, or to have forgotten; that, if it be true that it is now the received doctrine of all the Catholic world, that the Virgin was conceived free from every stain of original sin, and "that she never committed," as he adds, "the slightest fault, and never had to reproach herself with the smallest imperfections," it is as certainly false that such has always been the received doctrine of all the Catholic world. We should be sorry to suppose that any one in Dr. Cullen's position should be guilty of a wilful mistatement of such magnitude; but we beg his attention, and that of our readers, for a few moments, to the actual state of the case, as demonstrated by authorities, which even Dr. Cullen himself must admit to be irresistible.

We shall begin with St. Bernard—a witness who, singularly enough, Dr. Cullen has himself selected and quoted by name in this Pastoral, and whose notions of the dignity of the Virgin Mary must have been tolerably high, if he speaks of her, as stated by Dr. Cullen, as "a woman commanding a God"—which may, indeed, as he himself says, "well fill us with wonder and astonishment." We doubt if Bonaventura himself has ever uttered a stronger expression; and the passage seems a worthy companion to that which we cited from the works of that somewhat enthusiastic votary of the Blessed Virgin in our June number, p. 74.*

Now, how stands the actual historic fact. It may be briefly stated thus—So far is it from being true that this doctrine of the Immaculate Conception has always been the received doctrine of all the Catholic world, as asserted by Dr. Cullen, that it is no exaggeration to say that no controversy was ever waged between two great parties within the pale of the Roman Catholic Church with half the violence and bitterness that this disputed doctrine gave rise to. Until the year 1139, or 1140 (though, as an opinion, it may have been held by some individuals as early as the ninth century, and not earlier), it had no place in ecclesiastical ceremonies, or even in the arguments of the learned. About that date, however, A.D. 1139, the Canons of Lyons, in France, ventured to introduce it into the offices of their Church, and instituted a feast in the Church of Lyons in honour of the Immaculate Conception.

St. Bernard, who was then in the height of his fame, and is said by some to have possessed, in his retreat at Clairvaux, more authority in the Christian world than if seated on the throne of St. Peter, lost not a moment in publicly making known his sentiments at the innovation, and stoutly reprobated it with all the earnestness and eloquence of which he was capable. The letter which he addressed to the Church of Lyons on this occasion is contained in his works, vol. i., p. 389 (Paris, 1839), epistle 174, and is well worth Dr. Cullen's careful perusal. He will find there that St. Bernard says, "we can never wonder enough that some of you could have the boldness to introduce a feast which the Church has not the least knowledge of, which is neither supported by reason nor backed by any tradition. Are we more learned or more devout than the Fathers? It is dangerous presumption to attempt what their wisdom in such things omitted." He will there find that St. Bernard asserts that the alleged revelation on which some pretended that it was founded, was destitute of any adequate authority, and argues "How can it be maintained that a conception which did not proceed from the Holy Ghost, not to say that it proceeded from sin, could be holy? or how could a holy day be held on account of a thing that is not holy in itself? Willingly would the glorious Virgin be without that honour, by which either sin is honoured or a false sanctity introduced." And again, p. 389-391—"The royal Virgin has no need of a false honour. And what if others, on the same ground, should assert that feasts in honour of each of her parents are to be defended? And the very same thing some one might exact for her grandfathers and great grandfathers, and so it might be extended ad infinitum, and the number of holidays would be without end."† Well might the learned Du Pin observe on such passages—"Thus it may be observed that St. Bernard had no very favourable thoughts of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary!"

Great, however, as was the authority of St. Bernard, and though the powerful and widely-extended Dominican order, following their famous doctor St. Thomas Aquinas, for centuries combated the new doctrine most vehemently, as contrary to Scripture and to the tradition of the Church, and, therefore, contrary to the Catholic faith, the equally influential order of the Franciscans zealously adopted the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and Pope Sixtus IV., himself a Franciscan, threw the whole weight of his authority into the same scale, and issued, in 1483, a Bull, in which he condemned those who called the doctrine a heresy, and the celebration of the festival a sin†—applying, however, an exactly similar condemnation towards the other party, who said it was a heresy, or sin, to deny the doctrine—a pretty cogent proof, we think, that, at that time at least, all the Catholic world were not agreed upon the point, as Dr. Cullen now would have the clergy and laity of our Irish metropolis believe. The truth is, the Bulls of Pope Sixtus IV. were as little minded by the Dominicans as the letter of St. Bernard was by the Franciscans, and the controversy raged as fiercely as ever. The annual recurrence of the Feast of the Conception continued for centuries to be the signal of renewed hostilities, and often gave birth to scenes of the most scandalous kind; and even when the doctrine of original sin came to be discussed at the Council of Trent, the debate ran so high between the Dominicans and Franciscans about the Immaculate Conception, that the Pope gave orders to the Papal legates to reconcile the contending parties,

* As Dr. Cullen does not give any reference to St. Bernard's works we cannot take upon us, at present, to say whether St. Bernard has really said anything so startling; but, for the present, it is not our purpose to dispute Dr. Cullen's quotation.

* "Unde miramur satis, quid visum fuerit hoc tempore quibusdam vestrum voluisse mutare colorem optimum, novam inducendo celebritatem, quam ritus Ecclesiæ nescit, non probat ratio, non commendat antiqua traditio? Numquid Patribus doctiores aut devotiores sumus? Periculose præsumimus, quidquid ipsorum in talibus prudentia præterivit."—Page 389.

"Sed præfertur scriptum superum, ut aiunt, revelationis. Ipse mihi facilè persuadeo scriptis talibus non moveri, quibus nec ratio suppeditare, nec certa invenitur favere auctoritas."—Page 391.

"Cum hæc ita se habeant, quonam jam erit festivæ rationi conceptionis? Quo pacto, inquam, aut sanctus asseritur conceptus, qui de Spiritu Sancto non est, ne dicam de peccato est? Aut festus habebitur, qui minime sanctus est? Libenter Gloriosa hoc honore carebit, quo vel peccatum honorari, vel falsa videtur induci sanctitas."

"Virgo regia non eget falso honore . . . . Quid si alius propter eandem causam, etiam utriquo parenti ejus festos honores asserit defendendos? Sed et avis et proavis idipsum posset pro simili causa quilibet flagitare, et sic tenderetur in infinitum et festorum non esset numerus."—Page 389—391.

† This decree may be found in the appendix of any of the authorized editions of the Council of Trent.

as far as possible, without giving a triumph to either. The directions were—"Not to meddle in this matter, which might cause a schism among Catholics; to endeavour to maintain peace between the opposing parties, and to seek some means of giving them equal satisfaction; above all, to observe strictly the brief of Pope Sixtus IV., which prohibited preachers from taxing the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception with heresy."* Accordingly, the Council of Trent left the great controversy still undecided; and satisfied itself with declaring, at the close of its decree concerning original sin (Sess. v., sec. 5), that it was not the intention of the Council to comprehend in that decree, the Blessed Virgin Mary, but merely that the constitutions of Pope Sixtus IV. should be observed; which we have given the outline of above;† and the great Roman Catholic controversialist, Bishop Milner, writing more than two centuries later, says—"The Church does not decide the controversy concerning the conception of the Blessed Virgin, and several other disputed points, because she sees nothing absolutely clear and certain concerning them, either in the written or unwritten word; and, therefore, leaves her children to form their own opinions concerning them."

This, we think, accounts satisfactorily for why so many Popes have declined to add this new wreath of glory to the celestial crown of the Queen of Heaven, and leaves no other difficulty unsolved, than the one which startled us so much in reading this magniloquent Pastoral of Dr. Cullen—namely, how it is possible for a divine to hold so distinguished a post in the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, who is either so grossly ignorant of what every tyro in ecclesiastical history knows touching the progress of this much-vexed controversy, or so bold as to cite St. Bernard in almost the same sentence in which he (Dr. Cullen) proclaims as a doctrine which has always been received by all the Catholic world, the very doctrine which St. Bernard so earnestly condemned, and which for centuries rent the Catholic Church almost to its foundations! We should be glad to know, even at the present day, what the order of St. Dominic have to say upon the matter; and shall feel anxious to learn whether any of our respected Roman Catholic correspondents are disposed to vindicate Dr. Cullen's assertions, or whether they consider them mere rhetorical flourishes to amuse the vulgar, and increase the intensity of their devotion, by practising a pious fraud upon their understanding.

There is another matter set forth in Dr. Cullen's Pastoral which we propose to consider, but which will require a more full investigation than we have space to enter upon in our present number—viz., whether the alleged translation into heaven of the body of the Blessed Virgin, celebrated by the Church of Rome under the name of the Assumption, is a fact established on satisfactory historic evidence, like the translation of Enoch or Elijah, or the ascension of our Blessed Lord, for which we have the unerring testimony of the Holy Scriptures; or whether it is a mere fiction—as we seriously believe it to be—as destitute of real proof as the martyrdom of St. Philomena, St. Theudosia, or St. Ursinus.‡ It will give us much satisfaction if any of our friends will relieve us from the task, by sending us what they consider proof of the fact; and for the present shall merely say, that as far as our reading goes, we have found no trace, which can be relied on, of even any tradition upon the subject, before the time of John Damaseenus, a monk of Jerusalem, who flourished some time in the eighth century.

Should none of our Roman Catholic correspondents feel disposed to defend this great festival of their Church, by stating the grounds upon which the Church believes in the Assumption, we shall endeavour to throw what light we can upon the subject in our next number.

* F. Paul Sarpi Hist. Conc. Trid., lib ii., c. 68.

† "Declarat tamen hæc ipsa Sancta Synodus, non esse suæ intentionis, comprehendere in hoc decreto, ubi de peccato originali agitur, beatam et immaculatam Virginem Mariam, Dei genetricem, sed observandas esse constutiones fel. rec. Sixti Papæ IV. sub pœnis in eis constitutionibus contentis, quas innovat."—(Sess. v., s. 5., 17th June, 1546).

‡ As to the former of these worthies, we refer our readers to the May number of our journal (p. 56); and as to the two latter, they will find some notice in our present number (p. 92).

Correspondence.

ON INFALLIBILITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the remarks on my letter, in the May number of your journal, I find the following sentence—viz., "This paragraph is pervaded by Mr. Rourke's old fallacy, that what is said in Scripture of the Church must necessarily be understood of the Church of Rome—a Church which actually did not exist at the time to which the passage in Acts ii. refers."

In answer to this "rhetorical flourish," I have only to say, that it will be proved in this letter, beyond the power of refutation, that the Church of Rome is the Church of Christ; and, by consequence, what is said in Acts ii. 47, and other parts of the most holy book of the Church, refers to her.

When we say that the Church of Rome is the only true Church, we neither mean the city nor the diocese of Rome; for that is but a part of the true Church; and any Catholic city or diocese in the world is as much a true Church as the city or diocese of Rome. No Catholic, therefore, ever was so weak as to mean this; but their true and only meaning is, that that body, or society of Christians (wherever dispersed, throughout the whole world), which is united in faith and communion with the Bishop of Rome, is alone the true Church of Christ upon earth; and we prove it thus:—

There is but one faith, and one Catholic Church. The first is expressly taught by St. Paul, saying—"One Lord, one faith, one baptism" (Eph. iv. 5); and we profess the other in the creed, so that, if there be more than one true faith, St. Paul is mistaken; and if there be more than one true Catholic Church, the creed deceives us. And since it is impious to say either the one or the other, it only remains to show, that the Church of Rome is this true Catholic Church, which I prove from this uncontested principle—viz., that there was a true Catholic Church upon earth before the Reformation. For if there was not, it will follow that this article of the creed—"I believe in the Holy Catholic Church" was false for many hundred years together, because the pretended Reformation only began in the year 1517.

Here, then, Mr. Editor, you must do one of these two things. You must either grant that the Church of Rome was this true Catholic Church before the Reformation, or mark out some other visible body or society of men in which the true Church of Christ subsisted before that time. If you grant the first, it is all we can desire; we gain our cause, and the dispute is at an end. For, if the Church of Rome was the true Catholic Church before the Reformation, she is so now, because her faith is the same now as it was then. Besides, it will follow that Protestants separated themselves, and continued separated from the true Catholic Church, which alone suffices to condemn them.

But, if you deny that the Church of Rome was the true Catholic Church before the Reformation, then you are bound to show us some other visible body or society of Christians, in which the true Church subsisted before that time; and to perform this effectually, you are bound to let us know in what part of the world this Church had her being, as, likewise, what particular countries, kings, and bishops were in her communion. And, lastly, you must specify to us the name and diocese of the bishop or bishops of this Church, by whom the first English Protestant bishop was ordained, and from whom the Church of England derives her mission. But this being a task impossible for you to perform, I do not see what other choice there is left you, but either to say that the creed was false for many hundred years before the Reformation, or own that the Church in communion with the See of Rome was the only true Catholic Church before that time. And if she was the only true Catholic Church when Protestants "reformed" her, she is so still, because she has not changed her faith since that time, as I have already observed.

The Nineteenth Article of your creed says:—"The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered, according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that, of necessity, are requisite to the same."—Book of Common Prayer.

All this is very true, but altogether unsatisfactory. For if I should ask you, where this true Church, in which the pure Word of God is preached, is to be found?—the article does not answer this question. Yet here lies the knot of the difficulty; and if it be not clearly resolved, we may easily mistake a false Church for the true one; because all Christian Churches, though ever so opposite to one another, pretend to teach pure and sound doctrine, and to administer the sacraments according to Christ's ordinance. So that the article's account of the Church of Christ is as little to the purpose as if a stranger, inquiring for the best inn upon the road, should be told that the best inn is where there is the best accommodation; for, though this be very true, yet, unless some other marks be given—as the sign of the house, the name of the man that keeps it, and the like—a stranger will be as much at a loss to find it as if nothing were said to him. In like manner, though what the article says concerning the visible Church of Christ—the only true Church—be unquestionable, yet, in respect of the greatest part of mankind, it is of no manner of use to direct them how to distinguish this one true Church from the many false ones that lay claim to it, without certain external marks, whereby it may be clearly known in what particular body or society of men this Church may be found.

Now, listen to St. Augustine, and he will tell us the marks of the Church of Christ, by which all may know her. That holy doctor writes thus against the Manichees:—"Not to speak of that wisdom which you do not believe to be in the Catholic Church, there are many other things which most justly hold me in her communion.—1. The agreement of people and nations holds me. 2. Authority, begun with miracles, nourished with hope, increased with charity, confirmed by antiquity, holds me. 3. A succession of bishops, from the See of St. Peter—to whom Christ, after his resurrection, committed his flock—to the present episcopacy, holds me. 4. And, lastly, the very name of Catholic holds me, of which this Church alone has, not without reason, so kept the possession that, though all heretics desire to be called Catholics, yet, if a stranger asks them where Catholics meet, no heretic dare point out his own house or his own Church."—Con. Epist. Fund., c. 4.

These, sir, were the external marks by which St. Augustine distinguished the true Catholic Church from false ones, and which held him stedfast in her communion—viz., 1. The agreement of people and nations. 2. The evidence of miracles. 3. A continued succession of bishops, from St. Peter, the first Bishop of Rome, to him who then sat in the apostolic chair. And, 4. The name of Catholic, attributed to the true Church by the creed itself. Let us now see to what Church these marks can be appropriated.

The first—viz., the agreement of people and nations, may justly be called the distinctive mark of the Church in communion with the See of Rome. For, though all nations never were in her communion at one and the same time; yet there is scarce a nation in the known world but has been in her communion some time or other. All the "reformed" nations in Europe were in her communion for many hundred years; and so was the whole Greek Church until the middle of the ninth century. In St. Augustine's time, though there were yet many heathen nations, there was scarce a Christian nation under the sun but was in her communion. And, excepting Russia alone, which received its Christianity from the schismatical Greeks, it cannot be shown that any one people or nation, which, upon its conversion, was not immediately united in faith and communion with the See of Rome. Now, I presume, no reformed Church will pretend to anything like this. It is, therefore, evident to common sense, that the agreement of people and nations, which is St. Augustine's first external mark of the true Church, cannot, according to his meaning, be appropriated to any but the Church of Rome. And, even at this time, when so many Churches are cut off from her by heresy and schism, her communion alone is more extended than any one, I might say, than all, the reformed Churches together.

The second mark—viz., the evidence of miracles, belongs also in a peculiar a manner to the Church of Rome, that no Protestant communion ever had the confidence to lay claim to it. On the contrary, most Protestants have thought it their best way to despise and ridicule miracles, just as the fox in the fable pretended the grapes were sour, when he could not come at them.

But the third mark—viz., a perpetual succession of bishops and pastors, derived from the Apostles—never was denied to the Church of Rome, by any man of learning. Indeed, Protestant bishops lay no claim to any such succession but by the Church of Rome. Because, without the interposition of a long catalogue of Popish bishops to make up their ecclesiastical pedigree, there is a gap of near one thousand five hundred years between the Apostles and the first Protestant bishop that ever was in the world. However, even that will not render them any substantial service; for, supposing the validity of their ordination—which, yet, was never granted—unless they can also bring down their mission, in a lineal descent, from the Apostles, and can show that Protestants have, within their own communion, a continued succession of it from them (which is somewhat more than they ever pretended to), their Church will never be admitted into the apostolical family.

Catholicity, or the fourth mark of the true Church, will be treated of in my letter of next month. I hope all my letters will soon appear in the LAYMAN.

"O happy Church (says Tertullian), to which the Apostles poured out all doctrine with their blood! Where Peter suffereth, like to our Lord's Passion—where Paul is crowned with John the Baptist's death."—De Præscript., nu. 14. The happy, the glorious Church of Rome, sir, is "walking in brightness," whilst the sects of the world are wandering in the valley of the shadow of death.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

In the beginning of his letter Mr. Rourke expresses his opinion in words to which, with very little alteration, we can cordially assent. We believe that "when we seek for the true Church, we are not to look to the city nor the diocese of Rome exclusively [nor the Churches in communion with it]: all this is but a part of the true Church; and any Catholic city or diocese in the world is as much a true Church as the city or diocese of Rome; but we must seek the true Church in the whole body or society of Christians, wherever dispersed throughout the world." Our difference with Mr. Rourke is with regard to the limitation which he has thrown in, in which he makes unity in faith and communion with the Bishop of Rome an essential mark of the true Church. We require his proof of this; we want to know on what grounds he denies the share in the title of the true Church of Christ to the Church of England, and those other bodies who are not now in communion with Rome; and we want to know on what ground he applies to the Church of Rome exclusively those texts of Scripture which were spoken of the Church of Christ before the Church of Rome existed. We look in vain through his letter for any proof of this, to him, essential point of doctrine. He has certainly one great difficulty in his way, and that is the utter silence of Scripture, as to this very simple way of knowing the true Church. We have two letters written by St. Peter for the express purpose of enabling his converts to keep the truth after his death; if he knew of so simple a safeguard against error as to tell his disciples, whatever divisions might arise among Christians, to be sure always to hold fast by the See of Rome, can we suppose that he could possibly have forgotten to tell them of it? And what need of all the marks by which Mr. Rourke tells us St. Augustine distinguished the true Church from false ones, if he could have employed this very easy mark, that the true Church was that which was in communion with Rome?

Our readers will observe that Mr. Rourke asserts that no Church is a true Church which is not united in faith with the Church of Rome, and which is not united in communion with the Church of Rome. If they will look through his letter, they will see that he has not attempted to prove the last of these two things. He tells us he will prove that the Church of Rome is the Church of Christ, but he never tries to prove that the Church of England has not an equal, or even better right to the title. Whatever arguments he has brought forward apply solely to the point that the true Church must be united in faith with the Church of Rome. We shall then consider this point solely, omitting the other for which no proof is pretended.

Mr. Rourke's proof of the first point reduces itself to the text—"one Lord, one faith, one baptism," from which he infers that in the true Church there can be no difference in faith; and that, therefore, if the Church of Rome belong to the true Church, the Church of England cannot. But, of course, when Mr. Rourke asserts, and that rightly, that there is but one faith, he does not mean to say that there are no differences of opinion on religious matters between members of the true Church; if so, he would be puzzled to account for the violent disputes that have taken place in his own Church, such as those between the Dominicans and Franciscans for example. We suppose Mr. Rourke would answer that the points in dispute in such cases, however important, are not parts of the "one faith" which belongs to the Church, and that, therefore, a difference of opinion, in such matters, may exist without either of the parties ceasing to belong to the true Church. We approve of this defence; but Mr. Rourke will not find it easy to explain in practice how it is that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, for instance, should be declared by the Pope now to be part of the "one faith" necessary to salvation; and yet that three or four hundred years ago it should not have been so, and that differences of opinion in it could then have been tolerated.

We believe that the "one faith" is always the same. Those points of doctrine, the acknowledgment of which the ancient Church deemed essential to admission to her communion, we make necessary to ours; we retain the three creeds in which she embraced these essential articles of faith: she denied the name of Catholic to none who acknowledged them, neither do we arrogate the title of Catholic exclusively to ourselves, or to any one local body of Christians; we allow the possibility of salvation to all who hold this one faith which has been handed to us, however they may have endangered their condition by unauthorized additions to their system of doctrines. Let us see whether the Church of Rome has equally followed the example of the primitive Church. She does, indeed, retain the three ancient creeds; so far, well: we, therefore, admit the possibility of salvation in her communion, and allow her to be a part, though a corrupt one, of the Church of Christ. But she is not content with holding the one faith which the Apostles delivered to us. No sooner has one of her priests said Amen at the end of his repetition of the old Nicene Creed, than, as if he had not come to an end, he goes on with the clauses of the new creed which Pope Pius IV. introduced into her system of teaching. The Church of Rome, then, has added to the old faith a number of points of doctrine, and anathematized all those who will not assent to them. We agree in faith with the Church of Rome as she once was; we cannot, at the same time, agree with her as she is now. Which are we to do? Must we change with her? By her anathemas she renders it impossible for those to remain in communion with her, who wish to preserve the faith the same as it was held by the primitive Church; and she has, therefore, as far as in her lies, inflicted a grievous breach on the unity of the Church; as far as she retains the old doctrines she preserves her right to be counted in the Church of Christ; but in her schismatical anathemas she has grievously offended. All Mr. Rourke's arguments are founded on the hypothesis of the infallibility of the Church, and have force against none who do not admit this modern notion. Let it be once supposed possible that a part of the Church may fall into error, and the whole flank of Mr. Rourke's position is turned, and every argument in his letter falls to the ground.

Mr. Rourke asks us either to grant that the Church of Rome was the Church of Christ before the Reformation, or else to point out what other body was then the Catholic Church. Now, it would be a contradiction in terms to assert that the Church of Rome was, at any time, the Catholic Church. The Church of Rome must be, by the meaning of the word, local and particular; the Catholic Church must be universal without any limitation to place. But it would be just as absurd if, while we denied the claim of the Church of Rome, to be the universal Church, we were to set up a similar exclusive claim for any other body. Mr. Rourke's alternative is founded in a complete mistake as to the position we maintain; he might just as well say "either grant that Lord Aberdeen is the House of Lords, or else point out to us what other nobleman is the House of Lords." A man who should use such an argument as this would be said to be utterly ignorant of what is meant by a House of Lords, and we think that Mr. Rourke's argument shows just as complete a misapprehension as to the nature of the Catholic or Universal Church.

Mr. Rourke's argument, then, is not enough for his purpose. He is bound to show not only that the Church of Rome was a part of the Church, but that no Church, save those in communion with the Church of Rome, has a right to the title. There were, for example, before the Reformation a great body of Eastern Christians, whose Churches were founded by the Apostles themselves, and who could claim equal antiquity with the Church of Rome, and had just as good a title to be reckoned in the true Church as she. Mr. Rourke's argument, therefore, that the Church of Rome is the Church of Christ exclusively, wholly fails.

But we can retort it on himself. We call on him to grant or deny that the Church of England and Ireland was a part of the Church of Christ before the Reformation. If he admits that it was, we call on him to explain how or why she forfeited her right to that title. The body of clergy and bishops remained the same, and the text, of which Mr. Rourke is so fond, directing the laity to "obey them which had the rule over them," had as much force after the Reformation as before. The Church of Ireland could only have ceased to be a part of the true Church if, at the time of the Reformation, she gave up any part of the "one faith," which the Church of Christ has always professed. This is what he is bound to prove: he is bound to show that any of those articles of Pope Pius's creed are contained in Scripture, or that their belief was ever professed by the primitive Church as necessary to salvation. Until he can prove both these points, he cannot say that the Church of Ireland has been guilty of any heresy in withdrawing her acceptance from these modern inventions; and he is bound, if he will not be guilty of schism, to return to the communion of the ancient Church of this country.

Nor is the Church of Ireland to be forsaken, because, at the time of the Reformation, the Church of Rome withdrew her communion with her. It is for the Church of Rome to defend her schismatical conduct, in requiring, as conditions of communion, articles unknown to the ancient Church, and in introducing, after a wide gap, a new set of bishops into a country whose Sees were already occupied.

Mr. Rourke says, that if the Church of Rome were the Church of Christ before the Reformation, she is so still, because her faith is the same then as now. We deny this altogether. First, let it be remembered that, at the time of the Reformation, the Church of Rome changed her creed by adding twelve new articles to it. But even since then she has changed. A single question will decide the matter. Is the Immaculate Conception part of the faith of the Church now? If Mr. Rourke says it is not, the Pope will probably give him a flat contradiction before long. Well, then, was the Immaculate Conception part of the faith of the Church of Rome before the Reformation? If so, how was it that holy saints and learned doctors refused to hold it, and were, nevertheless, recognised as orthodox members of the Church?

With this question we take our leave of Mr. Rourke for the present, proposing to consider, in connection with his next letter, the four marks of the Church which he offers for our consideration.

OUR LORD GOD THE POPE.

DOMINUS DEUS NOSTER PAPA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—In reply to your article on the Pope, in the last number of the LAYMAN, I send you a few observations, compressed into a short compass, according to your often-expressed wish; but I must observe, that it is hardly fair* to expect brevity in defence, when you reserve so wide a margin for attack. Objections are easily made, and occupy but little space, whereas the answers must be more diffuse, and accompanied by references, without which they are incomplete, and lead to no conclusion whatever.

It were idle to deny that these words, in their strict and literal meaning, are (what you have called them) startling, not to say blasphemous; that they were most injudicious all will allow. Strong as the case may appear, it is extremely old, for Constantine was of the fourth century. How very prudent and how convenient it is to raise bold of an expression, used hundreds of years ago, denied, according to your own showing, in the seventeenth century! Truly the French may say, "Qui dit trop ne dit rien."

The charge is so monstrous and so gross, that it merits the reply of O'Connell:—You either believe what you say, and are a fool; or do not believe it, and are a knave. Far be it from me to include you in either of these parties. I would fain hope that you fancied that the present generation might take these words without giving them a metaphorical acceptation.

Let us, however, examine the document, which runs thus:—"Satis ostenditur, a seculari potestate nec ligari prorsus nec solvi posse Pontificem, quem constat a pio Principe Constantino Deum appellatum, nec posse Deum ab hominibus judicari manifestum est."

The gloss or note is as follows:—

The most religious man, Constantine, in the holy synod which was assembled at Nice, seeing the complaint of several bishops brought before him, said, you cannot be judged by any man, for you have been called gods; and, therefore, you cannot be judged by men.—Canon, chap. 6.

Here Constantine, not content with giving this title to the Pope alone, gives it also to the bishops. We may well exclaim, "Qui dit trop."

But are there no precedents for this inflated and hyperbolical language of Constantine? In the seventh chapter of Exodus, we find the Lord said to Moses, "Behold I have appointed thee the god of Pharao, and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet."

The note in the Douay Bible—The God of Pharao—namely, to be his judge, and to exercise a divine honour, as God's instrument over him and his people. The note in Scott's Protestant Bible takes much the same ground. Moses was the favourite minister and great prophet of the Almighty; but it is elsewhere applied to persons in ordinary authority.—Exodus xxi. 6.

"His master shall bring him to the gods."—Exodus xxii. 8.

"The master of the house shall be brought to the gods."

In Psalm lxxxi. lxxxii. 6.—"I have said you are gods, and all of you the sons of the Most High."

"The rulers of Israel, as immediately appointed by Jehovah, to be his representatives, to judge according to his law, and to be types of his anointed, were especially honoured with this high title. Ye are gods, in which other magistrates share in proportion to their religious advantages."—Scott's Prot. Bible (note).

Having endeavoured to show that Constantine figuratively based his appellation on Scripture authority, may I ask what Pope or Popes ever sanctioned such a form of address? Were they ever publicly applied to in this manner? and by whom? In order to do justice to the Popes, it is not fair to take the titles they themselves assume—not the mistaken and exaggerated language which inhabitants of warmer regions may have sometimes used.

The title which was first taken by St. Damasus, then by St. Gregory, is "Servus servorum Dei," according to the inspiration of their Divine Master and model. "He that is greater among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is the leader, as he that serveth."—St. Luke xxii. 21.

The Pope daily styles himself, before heaven and earth, a sinner; he hearkens to the prayer made by his minister, that God would have mercy on him, and pardon his sins; he has recourse to that rite of humility and penance—auricular confession—just as the lowliest of his spiritual children. During the holy week he imitates the example of our Redeemer in washing the feet of twelve mendicants. To conclude, Pope Gregory VI. (Sic in MS.) was rebuked, by a Protestant lady, for permitting divine honour to be paid to him, whereas he was but a man. The Pope meekly answered, that he thanked her for the admonition, and that his position much required the safeguard of humility. I doubt not that his present Holiness would receive your homily in good part, were it to reach him.

* We can assure our correspondent, that we never wish to cut short real argument on either side of the questions discussed in our columns; and merely urge for the sake of our readers, as well as to increase their own chance of being read, that our correspondents, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, should make their communications as brief as may be consistent with doing justice to their arguments. Were we to put no restrictions on the length of letters inserted, our journal would soon become little more than a collection of letters, which probably would be read by nobody.—ED.

You have alluded to the ceremonies attending the inauguration of the Pope, in order to show that care is taken to keep up in reality the claim, which in words has been withdrawn. This custom or ceremony is thought objectionable by many Catholics.—Vide Eustace's Classical Tour.

I remain, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ENQUIRER.

August 6, 1854.

The writer of the above letter has mistaken the gloss in which the celebrated words in question are found; and, consequently, all that he says about Constantine is irrelevant to the subject. That the word "Deus," in the gloss upon the extravagant of John xxii., was not understood in the sense of the Hebrew term "Elohim" (God), as applied to Moses and the Judges of Israel, is evident from the fact that, had this been its intended sense, it would have been sufficient to have said so, instead of stealthily withdrawing the word altogether.

Our correspondent exclaims, "How very prudent, and how very convenient it is to seize hold of an expression, used hundreds of years ago, [and] denied, according to your own showing, in the seventeenth century!" We answer, that we deem it both prudent and convenient to point out to our Roman Catholic readers the means by which the dogma of Papal infallibility was established in the middle ages. We think it judicious and useful to direct attention to the scaffolding, so to speak, by which the edifice of the Divine supremacy of the Pope was erected, though the wise builders removed it as soon as the structure was complete. Nor is it unimportant to observe, as we have done, that in the case before us, the removal was one of the fruits of the Reformation. Were it not for the indignant remonstrance of the Reformers, jealous for the honour of God, the portentous words, "Our Lord God the Pope," would, doubtless, have remained to the present day on record, a reproach and a disgrace to Christianity.

As to the title "Servus Servorum Dei" (servant of the servants of God), which the Pope assumes, we should be very happy, and universal Christendom would have reason to rejoice, were the humility denoted by it a characteristic of the Papacy. But we cannot forget that it was borne by some of the haughtiest as well as the worst of men—by a Hildebrand, a Boniface VIII., and an Alexander VI.

We are truly glad that many Roman Catholics object to the ceremonies which accompany the inauguration of the Pope. Still they exist; and their existence is a proof, as we have said, that, in the practice of the Church of Rome, the principle embodied in the words "Our Lord God the Pope," is still affirmed, though the words themselves are, for prudential reasons, repudiated.

ON THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

DEAR SIR—In your leading article for this month, you go to prove your right to the term Catholic, and very generously concede it to other Churches; and you quote Athanasius, in your defence—"This is the Catholic faith, that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in unity"—a portion of his creed against the Arians, showing the Catholic sense, and belief thereof, omitting essential articles of faith that Protestant and Catholic hold in common. The Greek and Protestant Churches, &c., would, in truth, be branches of the true Church, if they were only separated by distance, and not in belief. It does not require much argument to prove, that one only Church is Catholic; and all others, however numerous—and, God knows, they are almost numberless—have no right whatever to the title; if, as I remarked above, they all believed the one and same dogmas, ceremonies, internal and outward essentials of the true Church, they would, then, be one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church; but when they differ so widely from the parent Church, and wrangle so bitterly with each other, believing and teaching, at least, that their form, mode or conventicle, is just the thing to be saved by—the true, apostolic way—and all others, be what they may, are more or less astray from the one true path, that leads to heaven direct—comparing the Catholic Church to a tree and its branches, as a natural consequence, the branches must, and are all alike in appearance, in substance, and sap; its seedlings identical, its natural offspring essentially the same in all its propagating propensities; what more unnatural, than to see the olive tree bearing the prickly pear, the cocoa tree the rose of Sharon? "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church"—the apostolic sense is this, I believe it to be Holy, I believe it to be Universal; that it is the Church, fitted and appointed for all generations, for all ages, climes, and people; and that none other Church, be its pretensions what they may, is the Church of God; that communion with it is periling the salvation of whatever souls are subject to her teaching.

You claim not infallibility for your Church, therefore, you deny it to all Churches. You claim the title of Catholic for your Church, therefore, you concede it to all Churches, conventicles, and meetings, that prayer is their professed object. What have you gained by this? Are the numberless Churches universal in time, place, and doctrine? Were the Apostles to preach on earth again, would they recognise Catholicity in those religious denominations? Who will answer me Yes? You believe, as Catholics do, that bishops are of divine origin. The Scots Church believes them useless, an encumbrance, yea, unholy things. What think you of this? Are they Apostolic thus far? Are they Catholic for all this? And the numerous good citizens of the world, who preach the utter uselessness of baptism, are they Catholic in the true Apostolic sense? It would take more space than you could admit of to enumerate the particulars and inconsistencies of the numberless Churches that claim Catholicity for their mark; and each and all would deem themselves deeply insulted were you to question their right to said mark—Catholic.

I am, dear sir,
Yours respectfully,
A ROMAN CATHOLIC.

Carlow, July 23, 1854.

There are some Protestants who think that all Roman Catholics hold precisely the same set of religious opinions, and treat them accordingly; and many Roman Catholics return the compliment by imagining a set of opinions which they suppose all Protestants must hold.

Both parties are wrong; for Roman Catholics differ as widely (if not more widely), among themselves, about religious opinions, as Protestants do;* and few, or none, can be found among Protestants who really hold the opinions which Roman Catholics often attribute to all Protestants. Our correspondent falls into this mistake; he has in his own head a certain set of notions, which he considers "Protestant;" and then he feels quite sure that we must hold these notions, and that we must have written them too, although we defy him to find them in our paper.

What else can we say of a correspondent who writes to us thus:—"You claim the title of Catholic for your Church, therefore, you concede it to all Churches, conventicles, and meetings." . . . . "and the numerous good citizens of the world who preach the utter uselessness of baptism, are they Catholic?" We certainly have never said anything of the kind: and we have said before now that we regard baptism as the only entrance into Christ's visible Church on earth; and we certainly have never extended the term "Catholic" beyond the members of that Church.

We think it must be evident to any one who reads the article to which our correspondent refers, that we were then considering "Catholicity" only as it refers to faith. Churches which hold the Catholic creeds unchanged, as their articles of faith—those we consider Catholic in respect of faith; this was our assertion in that article, as well as in others; and to this judgment we adhere.

Where the question of Catholicity in conduct and action comes in, we do not scruple to declare our judgment, that those who cause divisions and separations in the body of Christ, are so far offenders against Catholic communion. But here we insist that facts are to be examined, and offences and divisions laid to the account of those who are truly and really guilty of them. And when this is done, we find that the Church of Rome is more guilty of offences against Catholic communion, than any other section of professing Christians in the world.

Take the case of the Lutherans, whom we mentioned in our article. The Lutherans never went out of the Church, or separated from it, by any act of their own. All they asked was to remain in communion with the whole Church—with the Church at Rome—with the Pope himself—on these terms—viz., holding the ancient Catholic creeds as the only true and complete summary of the Catholic faith; and doing nothing in the service or worship of the Church contrary to the word of God. Rome answered them by adding twelve new articles to the ancient creeds, and REFUSING TO HOLD COMMUNION with any who would not profess those new articles as part of the ANCIENT CATHOLIC FAITH. Was it not Rome that was really guilty of breaking Catholic communion? The Apostles not only directed that unity should be preserved, but they settled the terms of communion; and the ancient Church embodied and preserved those terms in the Catholic creeds. The Lutherans asked nothing, but that communion should be preserved on those apostolic terms. Rome altered the terms, and refused to communicate on the terms of the ancient Catholic creeds. And now, forsooth, on account of this, the Romanists only are Catholics, and the Lutherans are not Catholics!

It is no part of our business to prove that the Lutherans were right in everything. In the matter of the Lord's Supper, and in the matter of images, they did not sufficiently throw off all Romish errors. In some of the constitutions of an apostolic Church, they were defective; but that was not by their own choice, but by the conduct of the German bishops. And we believe that God will visit all offences on the guilty, and not on the innocent.

It is no part of our business to deny that some Protestant sects, who are Catholic in respect of their faith, have committed offences against Catholic unity; just as the Church of Rome has done, though, perhaps, seldom to the same extent. We do not justify such things. We do not wish our readers to be partakers of offences, by whomsoever committed. We show our readers a Church—the ancient Catholic Church of this country—a Church which makes no terms of communion but the ancient Catholic creeds—a Church which does not owe its existence to any act of separation—which has never committed any act of schism—and we say this is the Church to which Christians, in this country, ought to belong. Let our correspondent, if he can, bring forward a definite charge of schism against this United Church of England and Ireland, showing what specific acts of schism she has committed, and when and where those acts were committed—and we are ready to answer him. But, if he can say only that some other Protestant bodies have offended against Catholic unity, we answer that such a fact has nothing at all to do with the course which we recommend to the Irish people; and, therefore, it is foreign to the purpose of our journal to discuss it.

Our correspondent repeats the old argument, so often answered, "it does not require much argument to prove that one only Church is Catholic; and all others, however numerous, have no right whatever to the title."

Now, the word "Catholic" simply means "universal." Let us, therefore, put the word "universal" in place of "Catholic," in that sentence of his, and see what evident nonsense it becomes. "It does not require much argument to prove that one Church only can be universal, all others, however numerous, can have no right whatever to the title!"

In St. Paul's days, there was a Church of Rome, a Church of Corinth, a Church of Galatia, a Church of Jerusalem, &c., &c.; which ONE was then universal? Was not each one "universal" or "Catholic," as a part of the whole—none universal by itself alone? And how can it be otherwise now? No Church is now universal by itself alone. Each Church, so far as it holds the Catholic creeds, and adheres to the apostolic terms of communion, is "Catholic" or "universal," as being a part of the whole; and, in this sense, which is the true sense, Rome (which had added to the Catholic creeds, and refused to communicate with others on the terms settled by the Apostles) has, perhaps, the weakest title of all to the name of "Catholic."

* We beg our Roman Catholic readers to try and understand what we mean by "Protestant," we do not mean simply all who reject the peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome; Mahometans believe that the religion of Rome is false and idolatrous, yet we do not count them Protestants, because they do not hold the fundamental doctrines of the Catholic faith; we say just the same of Socinians.

INFALLIBILITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—Will you kindly insert the following questions:—

1st—If the Church is infallible, how is it that St. Paul says, there should be an apostacy, a falling away from the true faith? such a thing, I imagine, could not occur if the Church had the promise of infallibility.

2nd—Why did St. Paul, in his epistle to the ancient Church of Rome, charge them not to be high-minded but fear. For if God spared not the natural branches take heed lest he also spare not thee. Now, I think St. Paul must have thought very little of infallibility when he said that.

3rd—In the Apocalypse we find our Lord reproving, exhorting, and comforting the Seven Churches of Asia, as each required; the Church of Laodicea, especially, he rebukes very sharply, he brings against it the charge of unfaithfulness; now, surely, that Church was a partaker of the promise of the Holy Spirit "that He should guide it into all truth," as well as any other, and yet it was not infallible, it wanted life; and the Church of Sardis, also, "had a name that it liveth," and our Lord says it was dead. It is plain enough then, I think, that these two Churches were not infallible. With these instances, therefore, I think we may conclude, that no Church is infallible.

If there was no danger, why did St. Paul warn the Romans against "high-mindedness?"

If some of your Roman Catholic correspondents will kindly answer the above questions and satisfy me, they will greatly oblige

Your obedient servant,
W. R.

FLOWERS FOR AUGUST.

IF August be less prolific than the preceding month in its flowers, it is more abundant in its fruits; and the rich corn waving over the fields imparts a substantial beauty to the land, which many will regard more than the most glorious display of flowers. Along the roadsides we find in full flower the BRAMBLE (Rubus suberectus). Its two principal varieties are the Raspberry and the Blackberry. The raspberry (Rubus idæus)—so called from the rasp or roughness of its fruit—is found wild in the woods of Ireland. Its delicious fruit is too well known to need further notice. The Blackberry (Rubus fruticosus) displays its erect flowers and petals of delicate pale pink, on its long, flexible sprays in our hedges and thickets; its fruit, when ripe, is both wholesome and agreeable. Who has not gathered blackberries in the days of childhood, or even of mature age, and enjoyed the feast, which nature's bounty afforded without culture or care, with as much pleasure as the rarest fruits the garden or hothouse could give? The Bramble is the subject of the oldest apologue or fable extant, called Jothan's (or Joathan's) parable, and narrated in the Book of Judges, ix., v. 8 to 15.

Another humble, but sweet flower of the riverside and summer stream, to which we are much attached, is the MEADOW-SWEET (Spiræa ulmaria). Its flowers of yellowish-white or cream-colour, are to be gathered almost in the water itself, whence it peers out like a piece of lace-work embroidery, so soft that even the rude winds seem loth to disturb it, except to waft its sweet perfume over the meadows. Its scent resembling that of new-mown hay, hawthorn, or heliotrope, is to our taste more fresh and fragrant than any. However, we would warn our readers to beware of its effects in a closed apartment, as it contains prussic acid in such large quantities as to be dangerous to life when emitted in sleeping rooms.

As we pass along to the flower garden we observe a most attractive flower, blooming in patches and clusters along the borders, the SCARLET VERBENA (Verbena atrosanguinea). The intensity of its bright colour is so dazzling to the eye, as to render it difficult to look upon it steadily. There are several varieties of the flowering verbena (or Verbena hublesia), scarlet, rose colour, white, pale lilac, and blue. Most of them, and the splendid scarlet verbena among the number, are natives of North America. The sweet-scented verbena is no relation of the flowering plants of the same name; it belongs to a different family altogether; its botanical name is Aloisia citriodora (so called from its lemon-scented foliage).

The flowering Verbena belongs to the well-known family of plants called vervain, renowned among the ancient Romans, and much praised by our ancestors for its medicinal virtues. It was supposed to possess many potent charms, and its roots used to be worn by superstitious old people round their necks as a preservative against the king's evil; while it was a grand ingredient in the love philters of foolish, sick-brained young folk. The common vervain (Verbena officinalis) flowers abundantly on the road-sides in many parts of Ireland.

The verbena, or vervain, is frequently confounded, even in books on floriculture, with a plant similar in name, but different in nature—namely, the VERONICA, or speedwell. The veronica has leaves of pale, shining green, and flowers of pale blue, or white with blue streaks, and sometimes of flesh colour. It has many varieties in Ireland, and is found growing abundantly in most parts of the country in grassy pastures, and in moist, shady situations. The common speedwell (veronica officinalis) is met with on dry, sandy banks, barren heaths and woods, and in mountain pastures; its leaves have been sometimes used medicinally as tea. Another variety of the speedwell, called brooklime (Veronica beccabunga), with bright blue flowers, is chiefly found in ditches and rivulets. The Germander speedwell (Veronica chamædrys) has numerous flowers of large, bright blue, with starry, white rays on the petals, resembling an eye (hence, popularly called bird's eye), and is sometimes mistaken for the forget-me-not. It is generally met with in woods and on hedge-banks. There is also the water speedwell, with bluish flowers inclining to purple. The popular name of this pretty little flower the speedwell is, perhaps, given it because growing on the hedge-banks by the way side, its cheerful, bright-eyed little countenance seems to bid the weary traveller good speed or speed well; and to one who can, in fancy, catch its passing salute, it may seem as if > "Brighter than bright heaven is the speedwell blue > Clustering the banks."

The speedwell was held in much veneration by our simple ancestors, and called the Holy herb; but its Latin name, veronica, we regret to say, reveals and perpetuates a sad tale of folly and credulity, which has left its memorial even upon this sweet, innocent, little country flower. The name (veronica vera icon) means a true image, and was acquired from some story about a portrait and representation of the face of our Saviour on a relic, said to be lying at St. Peters, Rome, in the shape of a handkerchief, which was alleged by some to have covered our Saviour's face in the sepulchre, and by others to have been used on his way to Mount Calvary, whereupon it was miraculously impressed with the likeness of the face of our Blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. It is impossible to speak of the gross absurdity of a miracle with so insignificant a result, and on so contemptible a subject as a pocket handkerchief, with that degree of respect and reverence with which we would desire to treat even the errors of so-called religion, and, therefore, we forbear from observations which might possibly give offence to even one of our readers. It is, alas, too much like the astounding stories of winking virgins, at Rimini, and holy coats at Treves—insults to the understanding of the faithful, which our Roman Catholic brethren in Ireland are saved from, by the broad and open daylight of public exposure which would await such practices if attempted here.

July and August are the chief months in the year for annual flowers, those sweet and transient visitants that need but little care to secure their reproduction. We scarcely know where to begin or how we shall end if we enter upon an enumeration of the annuals. However, we select a few—and first, the nemophila insignis—a very pretty little flower called, from its love of shady places, and highly ornamental as an edging to flower-beds or shrubberies. Although its introduction from California is so late as the year 1833, its pale blue flowers are now familiar to us all.

The escholtzia is another esteemed annual, with brilliant yellow and orange-coloured bell flowers on leaves of pale sea green. It is also a native of California and of North America, and very recently introduced among us. It has a very remarkable calyx which comes off like the extinguisher of a candle.

The CLARKIAS are also Californian annuals, of great beauty and variety, chiefly of rose-colour, white, and lilac. The Calliopsis bicolor is another handsome, yellow, border annual, derived from the State of Missouri, in America. The Coreopsis tinctoria is another very pretty annual, acquired from the Arkansas, in North America. The French marigold (Tagetes patula) is an old and familiar flower, derived from Mexico, in South America, though first, perhaps, known to us through France. It is called by the Italians, Death-flower (fior de morto), from a tradition that these flowers sprung up from the ground on which the blood of the unfortunate Mexicans had been spilled, who fell victims to the love of gold, and thirst of power, which induced the Spaniards to assail and destroy these unoffending people, under the pretext of converting them to the Roman Catholic religion. The beautiful convolvulus major (Ipomæa purpurea) with its transparent bells of various colours is also an American plant, as is the more useful Convolvulus jalapa, that yields the jalap of commerce. In our hedges we have a very graceful wild convolvulus, but wanting in the exquisite colouring and shades of the American variety. The convolvulus minor bears little resemblance to the other flowers of the same name, except that it is bell-shaped. Its flowers are much larger and generally of deep azure. The wax-like phlox is another contribution we have received from America. The Marvel of Peru (Mirabilis jalapa) was once a wonderful flower, and excited the astonishment of botanists some 200 years ago, from its great diversity and change of colours, varying from white to red, purple or yellow, and from the circumstance of its opening at night.

The Fuschia, with its crimson bells, is also of American origin, introduced here from Peru or Chili, within the last sixty years. Its name is derived from one Fuchs, a German botanist.

The common Heliotrope (Heliotropum Peruvianum) is also of American extraction. Who does not know its delicate lilac flowers of sweetest perfume? There are some varieties of the heliotrope in the Southern Europe, with paler flowers of white or faint purple, but none so rich in the sweet fragrance which makes the common heliotrope such a favourite. Its name (translated into turnsole) is acquired from its blossoms, always turning towards and following the sun.

The SUNFLOWER (Helianthus annuus) is also an American plant—a native of Peru and Mexico. When the Spaniards first invaded Peru the natives were worshippers of the sun, and their virgins who officiated in the temple of the sun, were crowned with wreaths of sunflowers. The Spaniards professing the Christian faith exterminated the unfortunate idolaters instead of teaching them the mild and gentle doctrines of the Gospel.

The DAHLIA is the great flower of August, and a signal instance of the astonishing success of culture and education. It grows wild on the plains of Mexico, but is not so bright or so beautiful in colour or form as the Dahlia of our island. It is in its native plains a single flower of purple with no varieties of colour, and now, from cultivation, the florist in these countries, is enabled to exhibit it in varieties ranging through every shade from dark purple, pink, scarlet, and crimson, to white. His art has hitherto failed to produce a blue Dahlia—the great desideratum among florists. The common purple Dahlia was that introduced from Mexico into Europe, by Baron Humboldt, the great naturalist; and has become a parent of 200 varieties, now in existence. In Mexico, the root of the Dahlia is boiled and eaten as the potato is here; but it is scarcely so palatable a root.

It thus appears how deeply we are indebted to America for our annual and perennial flowers, transplanted thence to adorn our gardens here. They form so many interesting links of association between us, that our exiled brethren, leaving the home of their fathers, may recognise, in the very flowers of their new home, old and familiar, and favourite acquaintances, and may indulge the hope, that as these little flowers have grown and flourished in their new beds in the British isles, so may our hardy and industrious emigrants take root and prosper in the free soil of the Western Continent. Our annuals contributed to America, in return for their pretty flowers, are the bone and sinew of our countrymen. Of these, upwards of two millions of Roman Catholics have been transplanted to America, within the last thirty years; and we are deeply interested in the inquiry how they have thriven in their new settlements, not alone in a temporal, but in a religious sense. As to temporal prosperity, the almost incredible amounts transmitted by the poor Irish emigrants to their families and relations at home, exceeding half a million sterling in the year, sufficiently demonstrate that our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic have materially bettered their temporal condition at least. But in connection with this (we will not say as the necessary accompaniment, but our readers will judge for themselves), we have it stated by an Irish Roman Catholic clergyman—the Rev. Mr. Mullen, of Clonmellon, in the County Westmeath, sent over by the Irish bishops expressly to America—that the Roman Catholic population of America, which, by the contributions of Irish and foreign emigration, and by the stated addition of births to the previous population from 1825 to 1852, should have been 3,970,000, stood at 1,980,000, being a loss to the (Roman) Catholic Church of two millions, in round numbers. There is no bribery or souperism to account for this loss of two millions of Roman Catholics in America, announced by the Roman Catholic priest; but it is sufficiently accounted for by the freedom of inquiry and fairness of discussion—by the absence of Graigue riots and semper crusades—by the impossibility of Skibbereen mobs, incited by priestly outrage—by the harmlessness of altar denunciations, like those lately poured forth from Castlebar, and five other places, on one respectable Roman Catholic gentleman, still a member of that Church, because he dared to insist upon the property of a deceased person being lawfully and rightly appropriated and disposed of. When the Roman Catholics of Ireland shall have acquired independence enough to think, and speak, and act as free men, and exercise the prerogative which God has given to them and commanded them to use—their plain, shrewd, common sense—we have no doubt they will be able to cast back upon the Scotch historian the taunt that, while sterile Scotland sustained herself during the terrible ordeal of the famine, fertile Ireland was beholden to the subscriptions of Protestant England, Saracen Turkey, and Hindoo India; and, instead of receiving half a million yearly, from proselytised Irishmen in America, will be enabled, out of the produce of their own independent industry, exercised on their native soil, to supply their own wants and to give a helping hand to their brethren in distress.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR AUGUST.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

From the cold, wet, and dull weather which has prevailed till within the last ten days, the ripening of the cereal crops has been, in most localities, considerably retarded, though they have advanced with great rapidity since warm weather set in, and much of the hay has been got up, which, though a short crop, in most instances gives a promise of good quality, and a luxuriant crop of after-grass.

Wheat, as a general rule, should be cut some days before it is dead ripe, which may vary from six to eight days, as the weather may be more or less of a ripening character, and which will require some attention and judgment to determine. When the grain, on being pressed between the fingers, ceases to give out milk, and has a tough, doughy consistence, it may be cut; but on no account should be allowed to get hard, as then much loss will be entailed by shedding the best and plumpest grains, and when sent to the mill it will yield a less per-centage of flour, and a larger one of bran. Avoid cutting in wet weather; make the sheaves small, and stook as soon as made; if the night promises to be fair, they need not be capped; but if inclined to be wet, capping will be indispensable. When the straw and grain are thoroughly cured and dry, no time should be lost in carrying and stacking, as it deteriorates the sample considerably—both grain and straw—to allow it to get wet and dry alternately.

Barley should be allowed to stand till fully ripe, which is indicated by the head turning down. It is of the greatest importance, in malting barley particularly, that the whole of the grain should be of one uniform degree of ripeness, so that it may all sprout together.

Oats, like wheat, should be cut before it is thoroughly ripe, otherwise much loss will be sustained from the best grain shedding; it fills and ripens well in the stook, and the grain holds firmer in the chaff than when allowed to become over-ripe.

Turnips, Carrots, Parsnips, Mangels, &c., will require much and vigilant attention this month, in hoeing, singling, cleaning, and, above all things, the spaces between should be often and thoroughly grubbed to a good depth. All such operations should be well and thoroughly performed before the crops are so far advanced as to shut out all further operations.

Potatoes.—We have only to reiterate the directions given last week in case the disease should attack the crop—namely, to cut away, or cut off the haulm when the leaves become spotted, and before the stems are affected. Tread the surface well, and cover well with fresh earth. Should it be convenient to strew the beds or drills, before covering, with lime or peat charcoal, so much the better. Then sow with turnips; the following kinds will answer—white globe, yellow bullock, Maltese, yellow stone, or orange jelly; or sow rape; or the latter may be transplanted.

Meadows, after being cut, should now be top-dressed with rich compost, liquid manure, or some of the hand manures.

Laying down Land with Clover and Grass Seeds.—This is the best month in the year for sowing the land to meadow or permanent grass. A little rape—say 4 lbs. to the Irish acre—may be sown with the clover and grass seeds, with great advantage. It serves to shelter the young grass and clover, till they are established, and the bite it gives sheep has a double advantage in the sustenance it affords; and the manuring and treading of the animals, by which the vigour of the young plants and their tillering is increased.

Rape may be sown till the middle of next month, in warm, early localities; but the earlier this crop is now got in the better. If on stubble, manure should be supplied liberally, the land should be finely harrowed, then rolled and sown, well harrowed in, and finished with the roller. In dry land sow broadcast, but in wet land, six or eight feet ridges, with deep furrows between, should be adopted.

The Dairy Stock will now require more than usual attention; frequent removals to fresh grass will be indispensable; and when those begin to fail, fresh vetches, early cabbages, or green food should be supplied, otherwise they will rapidly fall off in their milk, which cannot be brought up again during the winter.

New and Recent Works

SOLD BY

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

Booksellers to the Queen,

9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT, with a Critically Revised Text, Marginal References, and Commentary. New Edition. Vol. I., much enlarged, 32s. Vol. II., 28s. (Vol III., in preparation)

HOOK'S CHURCH DICTIONARY. Seventh Edition. Revised and corrected. 16s.

EVENINGS WITH THE ROMANIST. By Rev. Hobart Seymour. 8s. 6d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK: an Introduction to the Study of Sacred Scripture. By Joseph Angus, D.D. 5s.

HELPS TO THE THOUGHTFUL READING OF THE FOUR GOSPELS. By Henry Stebbing, D.D. 8s.

THE PULPIT FOR 1854. Sermons by eminent living ministers. Vol. I., containing a hundred and three Sermons. 7s. 6d.

NARRATIVE OF A JOURNEY THROUGH SYRIA AND PALESTINE, IN 1851 AND 1852. By C. W. M. Van de Velde. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.

THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANT REFUGEES, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Charles Weiss. 8vo. 14s.

HOPE DEFERRED, NOT LOST; a Narrative of Missionary effort in South America. With Journals of Captain Gardiner, &c. 5s.

ON THE PLURALITY OF WORLDS. An Essay. 8vo. 8s.

MORE WORLDS THAN ONE. The Creed of the Philosopher, and the Hope of the Christian. By Sir David Brewster. 6s.

THE PILGRIM IN THE MISSIONS; or GOSPEL HUSBANDRY. By H. Smith, Esq. 4s. 6d.

OUR FATHER; or Jesus teaching to Pray. An Exposition of the Lord's Prayer. By Rev. Samuel Garrett. 2s. 6d.

HELPS AND HINTS FOR BIBLE READERS: Being practical comments on some of the most remarkable passages in the New Testament. By the Rev. Nicholas J. Moody. 3s. 6d.

SCRIPTURE AND THE PRAYER-BOOK IN HARMONY. England's Church and Handbook of Common Prayer, and Articles, the Scriptural antidote of Sacerdotalism and Schism. By Rev. A. R. Faussett. 3s. 6d.

MINISTERING CHILDREN; a Tale dedicated to Childhood. 5s.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT; or the Books of Genesis and Exodus, illustrated in existing monuments. 6s.

THE WARRANT OF FAITH; or a Handbook to the Canon and Inspiration of the Scriptures. By Rev. Robert Whytehead. 6s. 6d.

THE WORKS OF THE LATE REV. ALEXANDER CARSON, LL.D. Vol. III. Containing all his works on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. 5s.

EXAMINATION OF MR. MAURICE'S THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS. By Robert S. Candlish, D.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE LAND OF SINIM; or, China and Chinese Missions. By the Rev. William Gillespie. 5s.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY; with an Inquiry into the Causes of its Inefficiency: with an especial reference to the Ministry of the Establishment. By the Rev. Charles Bridges, A.M. Eighth Edition; corrected and enlarged. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE ORGANIZATION AND GOVERNMENT OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH. By Rev. Albert Barnes. 2s.

CLAUDE, THE COLPORTEUR. By the Author of "Mary Powell." 7s. 6d.

VESTIGES OF DIVINE VENGEANCE IN THE DESTRUCTION OF SODOM AND GOMORRAH. By W. E. Tayler. 3s.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND ERASTIANISM. By J. R. Pretyman. 7s. 6d.

JESUS TEMPTED IN THE WILDERNESS. By Rev. Adolphe Monod. 2s. 6d.

SABBATH MORNING READINGS IN THE BOOK OF LEVITICUS. By the Rev. Dr. Cumming. 5s.

THE ECLIPSE OF FAITH; or, Visits to a Religious Sceptic. Fifth Edition. 5s.

GRATITUDE: an Exposition of the Hundred and Third Psalm. By the Rev. John Stevenson. 8vo. 6s.

SYNONYMS of the NEW TESTAMENT. By Rev. Richard Chenevix Trench. 5s.

A SELECTION of ENGLISH SYNONYMS. Edited by Archbishop Whately. 3s.

ON THE STUDY of WORDS. By Rev. Richard C. Trench. 3s. 6d.

ON THE LESSONS in PROVERBS. By Rev. Rd. C. Trench. 3s.

THE BOOK AND ITS STORY: a Narrative for the Young, on occasion of the Jubilee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By L. N. R. With an Introductory preface, by Rev. T. Phillips. Fcap. 4s.

THE DENS of LONDON: Notes and Narratives of a Six Years' Mission among them. By R. W. Vanderkiste. Cheap Edition. 1s. 6d.

HOME TRUTHS: being Miscellaneous Addresses and Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle. 3rd Series. 3s. 6d.

PLAIN SPEAKING. First series. Being forty short, Large-type Tracts. By the Rev. J. C. Ryle, B.A. In packet. 1s.

KATHERINE ASHTON. By the Author of "The Experience of Life." 2 Vols. 12s.

THE LAMPLIGHTER. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. Cheaper Edition, 1s. 6d.

POOR PADDY'S CABIN; or, Slavery in Ireland. 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.

SHADOWS OF THE FUTURE; or, the Real Antichrist. The destinies of Rome, Constantinople, and Jerusalem. The World's Confusion, and the Coming Restorer. 4d.

WERTHEIM'S PACKET OF THIRTY TRACTS, assorted. Second series. 2s.

THE ACQUITTANCE IN FULL. Tracts for Ireland. By Fidelis. 6d.

SCRIPTURE ITS OWN AND BEST INTERPRETER. By X. Y. 4d. by post 6d.

MANNA FOR THE PILGRIM; for each morning of the Month, from the writings of the Rev. W. H. Hewitson. 8d.

THE RUSSIAN SHORES OF THE BLACK SEA, IN THE AUTUMN of 1852, with a Voyage down the Volga, and a Tour through the Country of the Don Cossacks. By Lawrence Oliphant. 8vo. 14s.

ALISON'S HISTORY of EUROPE, from the fall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the Establishment of Military Government in France, in 1852; being a continuation of his former celebrated Work. Vols. I., II., and III. 8vo. 15s. each.

TURKEY, RUSSIA, THE BLACK SEA, AND CIRCASSIA. By Captain Spencer. With Coloured Illustrations and a Map. 6s.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN JAMES WEITBRECHT. By his Widow. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SUNNY MEMORIES OF FOREIGN LANDS. By Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. 2 vols. Post 8vo. 12s. Cheaper Editions, 2s., 1s. 6d., and 1s.

THE EXPERIENCE OF LIFE. By the author of Amy Herbert. 7s. 6d.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN. By Samuel Warren, Esq. Cheaper Edition. 5s. 6d.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR. By Samuel Warren, Esq. 2 vols. Cheaper Edition. 9s.

HARD TIMES; for these times. By Charles Dickens. 5s.

MOWBRAY'S TREATISE ON DOMESTIC AND ORNAMENTAL POULTRY; a partial guide to the History, Breeding, Rearing, Feeding, Fattening, and General Management of Fowls and Pigeons. By L. A. Meall. With numerous Coloured Illustrations. 8s.

THE LADY'S COMPANION TO THE FLOWER GARDEN. By Mrs. Loudon. Sixth edition. 7s.

THE FRUIT, FLOWER, AND KITCHEN GARDEN. By the late Patrick Neill, LL.D. Fifth edition. 5s.

WANDERINGS AMONG THE WILD FLOWERS: How to see and how to gather them. By Spencer Johnson, M.D. With 173 engravings. 5s.

A POPULAR HISTORY of BRITISH FERNS, comprising all the Species. By Thomas Moore. Coloured Illustrations. 10s. 6d.

POPULAR FIELD BOTANY: A Familiar History of Plants. By Agnes Catlow. With 20 colonred plates. 10s. 6d.

A POPULAR HISTORY of BRITISH SEA-WEEDS, with Notices of some of the Fresh-water Algæ. By Rev. D. Landsborough. 10s. 6d.

THE SEA-WEED COLLECTORS' GUIDE: Containing plain instructions, for collecting and preserving. 2s. 6d.

HANDBOOK of ANGLING: teaching Fly-fishing, Trolling, Bottom-fishing, and Salmon-fishing. By Ephemera. 5s.

THE SEASIDE BOOK: being an Introduction to the Natural History of the British Coasts. By W. H. Harvey, M.D. New Edition. 5s.

A BOOK for the SEASIDE. With numerous Engravings. 3s. 6d.

WAKEMAN'S HANDBOOK OF IRISH ANTIQUITIES. 5s.

BLACK'S GUIDE BOOKS for TOURISTS; with Road Maps and numerous Illustrations:—
I. England, 10s. 6d. II. Scotland, 8s. 6d. III. Ireland, 5s. Wales, 5s.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO DUBLIN AND THE WICKLOW MOUNTAINS. 1s. 6d.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO KILLARNEY AND THE SOUTH. 1s. 6d.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO THE SHANNON AND WEST OF IRELAND. 1s. 6d.

DOYLE'S TOURS IN ULSTER; a handbook to the Antiquities and Scenery of the North of Ireland. With numerous Illustrations in tints, and Maps, &c. 8s. 6d.

CHART OF THE RAILWAY FROM DUBLIN TO BELFAST. 1s.

FRASER'S HANDBOOK FOR DUBLIN AND ITS ENVIRONS, with Maps, &c. 2s.

DUBLIN: WHAT'S TO BE SEEN, AND HOW TO SEE IT. By W. F. Wakeman. 1s.

TWELVE VIEWS OF THE PICTURESQUE SCENERY IN IRELAND. In elegant enamelled cover. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR, in the Danubian Principalities. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S NEW MAP OF THE BLACK SEA, CAUCASUS, CRIMEA, ETC., with enlarged plans of Sevastopol and the Bosphorus. 1s.

JOHNSTON'S CHART OF THE NORTH SEA, and the BALTIC, with the Countries adjoining; and Enlarged Plans of Cronstadt and Revel. 1s.

Lately Published,

WILLET'S "SYNOPSIS PAPISMI." New Edition. Edited by the Rev. J. Cumming, D.D. Ten vols. 8vo. Price £3.

London: JAMES MILLER, 17, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, and all Booksellers.

Just published,

New Edition, Royal 4to., cloth, price 5s. 6d.,

THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN,

Vol. I, with complete Indexes.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND CO., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH, Paternoster-row.

Fcap. 8vo., Neat Cover, Price 1s.;

Cloth, 1s. 6d.; Cloth, Gilt Edges, 2s.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD: Showing how Irish people talk about Irish doings, when they get a quiet place at the back of a ditch, or under a hedge.

Dublin: WILLIAM CURRY AND CO., 9, Upper Sackville-street. London: WERTHEIM AND MACKINTOSH.

Dublin: Printed by WILLIAM S. PURDON, and EDWARD PURDON, at No. 23, Bachelor's-walk, parish of St. Mary, for the Publisher, WILLIAM CURRY, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

AUGUST, 1854.

THE

CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Glóir do Dhia aṅ ṗna háṗuiḃ, agus ṗíoḋċáin air an ṫealaṁ deaġċoil do na ḋáoiniḃ.

Luke II. 14.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, AT 9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

Vol. III.—No. 33. SEPTEMBER, 1854. { Annual Subscription, 3s 6d. Payable in Advance.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

Immutability of the Church of Rome—Tradition and Development. No II. 103
Roman Catholic Literature—St. Rose of Lima—"The Young Christian's Library." 104
The Landlord's Letter 106
The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary 108
The Catholic Church 139
CORRESPONDENCE:
On the Catholic Church—by Mr. Rourke 111
On the Relics of Saint Ursula—by Viator 113
The Safe Way 113
Flowers for September 112
Farming Operations for September 113

IMMUTABILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME—TRADITION AND DEVELOPMENT.

No. II.

In our last Number we made some remarks upon the two antagonistic theories which the Church of Rome maintains respecting the Rule of Faith, and which we designated respectively as the Tridentine or tradition theory, and the modern or Development theory. We proceed now to complete the brief sketch which our space allows us to give of this most important question.

In the progress of the controversy between the Reformed Churches and the Church of Rome, the advocates of the latter found themselves perpetually embarrassed by the rigid limits within which the definitions of the Council of Trent confined them; and the absolute necessity of some more enlarged basis of dogmatic teaching forced itself upon their attention. To meet this necessity, the celebrated Möhler, Professor of Theology in the Roman Catholic University at Munich, revived the doctrine of development, which Petavius's work, notwithstanding its real design, had, doubtless, brought into disrepute. The spirit of the age was favourable to its revival. Among the so-called philosophical writers, especially of the sceptical school, it became fashionable to talk of and speculate upon the notion of a gradual and progressive development of the human race. This theory was applied, amongst other things, to prove that Christianity itself was a mere natural development of the human mind; sufficiently well adapted, indeed, to the circumstances of the world when it first appeared, but now obsolete and unsuited to the present advanced stage of man's history. A theory so complimentary to human nature could scarce fail to be popular. And, accordingly, it appeared to Möhler that it might, when properly modified, be made to render good service to the cause of Rome. The result of his labours, which he executed with consummate skill, is contained in his celebrated work, entitled "Symbolism." The main idea of this elaborate defence of the Church of Rome is the following:—That the Christian revelation was originally incomplete—an undeveloped germ, confided to the fostering care of the Church—a mere nucleus of divine truth, which was to be acted on by the growing reason and increasing wants of men; and so to be gradually unfolded into distinct propositions and explicit dogmas of belief. Möhler tells us that "the theory of the conformity of the Church's doctrine to that of Scripture [the theory, in part, of Trent], is applicable only to the substance, and not to the form." "The original doctrine expanded itself, in proportion as the human mind evolved it, in a much altered form; it remained the original, and yet it did not." "The faith is ever old and ever new." This acute writer was fully aware of the difficulty of reconciling this theory with the Tridentine notion of a fixed and invariable tradition. This difficulty he endeavours to get over by obscure and vague assertions. He resolves tradition into development. With him the former is not a fixed and definite external reality, but the living word energizing in the hearts of the faithful. It loses its objective and historical character, and becomes invested with purely subjective attributes. In fact, as it has been well remarked by Dr. Wordsworth, "in Dr. Möhler's hands, tradition loses all its traditive character; and, instead of practising the strict fidelity of the historian, it luxuriates in all the exuberant imaginativeness of the poet."

Still the principle of development, as advocated by Möhler, was too valuable and necessary to be given up. Accordingly, it has been recognised, and applied to some extent, by one of the most learned and elaborate theological writers of the present day, Perrone, Professor of Theology in the Jesuit College at Rome. If Möhler was obscure and ambiguous upon the subject, Perrone is still more oracular. Whilst, on the one hand, he strives to uphold the tradition theory of the middle ages, he, on the other, is equally unwilling to forego the advantages to be derived from the more modern doctrine of development. Hence, as might be expected from the attempt to reconcile conflicting systems, he involves his Church in an inextricable web of inconsistencies. These we need not now stop to expose, and we shall content ourselves with the following extract from the edition of his "Prælect. Theolog.," published in 1842, to which subsequent events attach some degree of interest:—

"Since the objection, that the Church (of Rome) by her definition has added new articles to the creeds, has been incessantly urged against her by Protestants, among whom Newman holds a distinguished place—who, in his work on Romanism, upbraids the Catholics with substituting the confession of Pius IV. for the creeds which the Church of England receives—I rejoice to be able to stop the mouths of our adversaries with the profound theory of the illustrious Möhler."

The distinguished Anglican, of whom the Roman professor speaks in the passage just quoted, has since, as the world knows, joined his ranks, and signalized his conversion by the publication of a work which has far eclipsed, at least in notoriety, that of Möhler. Dr. Newman, with his wonted inexorable logic, has pushed the theory of development to its extremest consequences. In his remarkable volume, "An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine," he has taken up and elaborately worked out Möhler's idea of the original Christian doctrines, or rather germs of doctrine, being intended by the Divine Founder of Christianity to be subsequently evolved into a variety of new forms and aspects. He labours to prove that such a development was antecedently natural and necessary; and that, as Möhler also took care to notice, the process was conducted under infallible guidance. Dr. Newman saw well that the cause of Rome could not be maintained on the Tridentine ground of Scripture and tradition; he was also too acute not to perceive that it could as little be defended by a mixing up of the two opposite principles of tradition and development. Being forced to make an election between the two, he chose the latter, as seeming to offer the more satisfactory explanation of the difficulties of his adopted creed, and rejected the old-fashioned, though more orthodox, notion of apostolical tradition. It has been remarked* that the preface to this work of Dr. Newman's was dated only two days prior to his having been received into the communion of the Church of Rome, so that the book was, so to speak, his passport—his profession of faith. Amongst other strong statements, it contained the assertion that there was "no formal acknowledgment of the doctrine of the Trinity till the fourth century."—p. 167. This was the very assertion which, as we have already remarked, when broached, a century and a half before, by the Calvinist Jurieu, Bossuet had pronounced to be a "a horrible libel on Christianity," only possible from the lips of a Socinian." We mean nothing personally offensive to Dr. Newman. He knows, doubtless, how to explain his doctrine so as to escape the fearful censure pronounced by anticipation against it by the great Bishop of Meaux. He also, doubtless, knows how to solve a question in casuistry, which, to more ordinary minds, seems very difficult, if not impossible, to be resolved—viz., to reconcile the principle upon which his whole book is based with that clause in the oath administered to every priest at ordination, which says, "I will never interpret Scripture except according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." The learned and ingenious author feels, we are sure, no difficulty in reconciling this, or any other seemingly hopeless discrepancy. Nothing is impossible to one who could become a convert to the religion of that very Church which, a few years before, he had described in the following portentous terms—"The Church of Rome is crafty, obstinate, wilful, malicious, cruel, unnatural, as madmen are; or, rather, she may be said to resemble a demoniac. She is her real self only in name, and till God vouchsafe to restore her, we must treat her as if she were the Evil One who governs her. And in saying this, I must not be supposed to deny that there is any real excellence in Romanism even as it is, or that any really excellent men are its adherents. Satan ever acts on a system."† And yet why should we feel surprised at the author of this famous book detecting, or, at least, acknowledging no inconsistency between its principles, and those of the Church of Rome? The lynx-eyed Inquisitors of the Congregazione dell' Indice themselves failed to discover anything objectionable in it. It has not found its way into the Index Prohibitorius, that jealous guardian of the orthodoxy of the Church. It would be just to the "Essay on Development" to say, merely, that it has escaped censure. It has been lauded to the skies by several of the most influential organs of Roman Catholic opinion both at home and abroad. Thus, for example, in an article in the "Dublin Review"—the authorship of which is usually assigned to no less a personage than Cardinal Wiseman—the Essay and the essayist are spoken of in the following terms:—"The reader must peruse this volume as the description of the process of reasoning by which the author's powerful and well-stored mind was brought to a full accordance with Catholic truth."† "Never did convert come to the Church with mind, soul, and heart, more thoroughly made over to her cause, with more complete, hearty, and filial obedience, than this work shows him to have done."‡ "The Catholic system is embraced (in it) with the fervour and simplicity of one trained from infancy in the faith."§ Nay, more, the same illustrious reviewer undertook, in the same periodical, to defend the "Essay" from the attacks made against it by the leading Roman Catholic Review in America, in which it had been denounced as subversive of the Catholic faith, and even Christianity itself.‖ "We have consulted," says the reviewer (Jan., 1847), "as high living authorities on the subject as there are in this country, and they all concur in saying that the Church can propose only what was revealed, and that the revelation committed to the Church was perfect." This, as we have seen, was the position maintained by Dr. Wiseman himself, in his Moorfield lectures, delivered in 1836. But some years' reflection, aided, doubtless, by the new lights evolved by "the powerful and well-stored mind" of Dr. Newman, so modified his opinion, that we read in the "Dublin Review" for December, 1847, the following remarkable passage—remarkable, that is to say, as contrasted with the passage, quoted in our last Number, from the "Lectures"—"The essential principle for which we [Roman Catholics] are contending, is no modern invention whatever, but as old as Catholic theology itself. The principle is, that the Church possesses the power, and has, from time to time, exercised it, of raising into the rank of doctrines of faith propositions which, previously to her definition, were not such." Here the tradition theory of the Council of Trent is plainly abandoned, and the development theory as plainly substituted for it.

But, it may be said, if the theory of development be so plainly opposed, as you assert, to the doctrine of Trent, why has it found so many advocates in recent times, and those too some of the most distinguished theologians of the Roman Church? We have already indicated the answer to this question, and we shall now state it more fully. When western Christendom was only just emerging from the night of the middle ages, during which the Scriptures had been hidden from the world, and the writings of the Church-Fathers buried in dusty MSS. in monkish libraries, it was easy for the Church of Rome to rest her system upon the asserted authority of Scripture and ancient Tradition. The documents upon which she based her claims were in her own hands, and were hardly accessible to any but such of the privileged class—the clergy—as were able to read them. But for some time previously to the Reformation, through the mighty agency of the press, the Scriptures became more generally diffused, and the works of the

* By Dr. Wordsworth, "Letters to M. Gondon," p. 10.

* Newman, "Prophetical Office of the Church," p. 103.
† "Dublin Review," December, 1845, p. 537.
‡ Ibid. p. 531.
§ Ibid. p. 534.
‖ We refer to "Brownson's Quarterly Review" (Boston), in which Dr. Newman's Essay has been assailed in a series of very able articles.

earlier Fathers more studied. The more sagacious apologists of Rome—Cardinal Cusanus for instance—perceived that new ground must be taken, and that Scripture and tradition would not suffice, without claiming for the Church an inherent right to constitute, from time to time, as occasion should arise, new doctrines of faith. The Council of Trent, afraid, probably, of sanctioning such a palpable departure from the mediæval system, which it was its great object and business to uphold, ignored the idea of anything like novelty in the Church teaching, and, accordingly, with more boldness than wisdom, stereotyped the good old principle of Scripture and Tradition, with, however, the all-important addition, that both were of equal and co-ordinate authority. The continued progress of Scriptural knowledge and patristic learning, which took place after the Reformation, soon proved that this position of the Tridentine Fathers was untenable, and that if the dogmas of Rome were to be defended at all, the aid of some new auxiliary must be called in. That auxiliary is the theory of development. Those who adopted it were not blind to the formidable objection which it would furnish Protestants with against the alleged immutability of the Church of Rome. But they had no alternative. Inconsistency in the parts of the Papal edifice was judged preferable to its total demolition.

What we have been saying leads us naturally to reflect upon the variations of the invariable Church, and that, too, on a question which, of all others, ought to admit of a definite and fixed answer—viz., What is the Rule of Faith? Is it all times unchanged and unchangeable, built upon the immutable basis of Scripture and unbroken apostolic tradition? Or does it depend on an ever-growing process of development, evolving new truths, or competent to evolve them in each succeeding age? On the one side, we have the infallible Council of Trent, with a countless array of the most renowned champions of Rome. On the other, we have an almost equal consensus of authorities, including, at least, one infallible successor of St. Peter (Leo X). Some few, as Möhler and Perrone, have undertaken the hopeless task of reconciling both theories. And some, again, as Cardinal Wiseman, have passed from one to the other, as circumstances rendered it expedient to do so. The magniloquent periods relative to the immutability of the doctrine of the [Roman] Catholic Church, which were so well adapted to the apprehensions and prejudices of a popular auditory, were laid aside when it became necessary to defend the opinions of a long-coveted and highly prized convert; albeit they are opinions which more scrupulous theologians of the same Church have pronounced to be subversive of the Catholic faith and even of Christianity itself.

This is the Church which boasts of unity of faith, and taunts Protestants with their divisions! There are, doubtless, divisions and variations enough amongst us, Protestants, upon minor points. That there should be such differences is part of the trial and discipline to which the visible Church is subjected in this lower world. But our differences do not touch upon the vital question of the Rule of Faith. Upon this, at least, we are all agreed. The Bible alone, the Written Word of God, is the immutable basis upon which the faith of Protestants is built. This foundation is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. The reflection of the mind of Him, with whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning, it continues from age to age, unchanged and unchangeable, the single fixed point amidst the ever-shifting things of time.

Let the Church of Rome then boast, if she will, of her perpetually-preserved apostolical traditions; or, if she prefers it, let her luxuriate in her ever-growing infallible developments. We envy her not. We are content to take our stand on the simple written Word of God. For we believe that this is the rock upon which the faith of the Church shall securely repose, until that blessed consummation shall arrive, when the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ.

ST. ROSE OF LIMA.

Our readers are probably aware that several Roman Catholic newspapers have, from time to time, expressed their dissatisfaction with our periodical, and have endeavoured to dissuade those with whom they have influence from reading it. It will, therefore, be considered very pardonable curiosity on our part, if we have desired to make ourselves acquainted with the literature which does obtain the commendation of the authorities referred to, and if we have tried to find out what is the kind of instruction which they consider adapted to the wants of the people. We have made known some of the results of our studies, in the articles which we have lately published on the life of St. Philomena, and on Father Faber's book, "All for Jesus;" and we intend, in the present article, to give an account of another number of "The Young Christian's Library," which has lately come under our notice. In our former articles we had occasion to remark on the recklessness with which, in these books, things not very probable in themselves were asserted positively, without a shadow of historical evidence; and we were forced to the conclusion, that one of the questions which the authors of these books cared least to be able to answer was, whether the things they wrote were true. We can conceive, however, that some persons may consider this a matter of subordinate importance. They may say, as some have said, "these lives are edifying and instructive; even if every thing related in them did not happen exactly as it is told, the histories afford useful examples for imitation; if they do not show what the life of a saint actually has been, they show, at least, what it might or ought to have been, and so they may give the readers help to become saints themselves." Well, we determined to read over one of these books solely from this point of view; not to trouble our heads about the evidence for the stories contained in it, but simply to see whether they were instructive and edifying, and whether the models proposed for our imitation were such as we should wish those for whom we had a regard, to follow. We have selected ST. ROSE OF LIMA, merely because her life was the last number of "The Young Christian's Library," published at the time of our procuring the volume; we believe, however, that she may be taken as a fair specimen of a saint, and that the stories told of her are not very different in kind from those told of the others whose names have been added within the last few hundred years to the Canon. We say within the last few hundred years, because the title of saint was obtained on much easier terms formerly, than now-a-days; every distinguished theological writer whose works are 600 years old, and free from the taint of heresy, is given this "handle to his name"; it is only in modern times that miracles, and voluntary torments, are required from a candidate for the title.

We abridge, from Mr. Duffy's volume, the following summary of the leading facts of St. Rose's life—as to the truth of which we shall not now raise any question. She was born on the 20th April, 1586, of respectable parents, at Lima, in Peru. Her first vocation to a religious life was felt when she was of the age of four years. "As she was playing one day with her little brother, he accidentally threw a quantity of mud on her hair; being neat and orderly in her attire, she was naturally vexed at this, and was on the point of going away in a sullen mood," when her brother appeased her with the excuse which would naturally occur to a child of his years, "my dear sister, do not be angry at this accident, for the curled ringlets of girls are hellish cords which enchain the hearts of men, and miserably drag them into everlasting flames." "Rose hearkened to these words as if they had been pronounced by a holy preacher of God, or as an oracle from heaven. She communed with herself, renounced this world [of which, at that time, she had such profound knowledge] for ever, and, finally, at the age of five years, by an irrevocable vow, consecrated her virginal purity to Almighty God, and solemnly promised to have no other spouse but him alone. We are taught in the fourth commandment that we should honour and obey our parents in all things lawful, and no saint has set us a brighter example of exact obedience to this law than St. Rose of Lima; but there are some things which we cannot do even to please our parents, and St. Rose has taught us the way to act in such perplexity, when it would seem clear that, while God commands one thing our parents command another."

This embarrassment soon arose with poor Rose, for her mother had eleven children to provide for, and would have been very glad if she could have married one of them off her hands; but Rose was determined to carry out the irrevocable vow which she had made, and not only to avoid marriage, but all which might lead to marriage. She was commanded, for instance, by her mother, to wear a band of flowers on her head. She obeyed; but in memory of the Redeemer's crown of thorns, "took the wreath, and fixed it on her head with a large pin, which pierced so deep into her flesh that it could not be drawn out without the aid of a surgeon, and even then with much difficulty. That she might not join in those vain assemblies and visits of which the world is so fond, she was in the habit of rubbing her eyes with pimento—a kind of burning Indian pepper—which rendered her eyes as red as fire, and so painful that she could not bear the light. To her mother, who remonstrated with her, she replied—'It would be much better for me, my dear mother, to be blind all the rest of my life than to be obliged to see the vanities and follies of the world.'"

Notwithstanding all this she remained so alarmingly beautiful that, "in order to extinguish the flames of passion which burned in the hearts of others, she used every artifice to disfigure herself. She made her face pale and livid with fasting; she washed her hands in hot lime to take the skin off them." Finally, she removed to a little village named Canta, and remained there four years without leaving the house. This last measure, however, was injudiciously adopted, and spoiled the effect of her other proceedings. Possibly it was more than female nature could bear, to witness the too great success of her efforts to disfigure herself; at all events, the son of one of the most distinguished ladies of Lima, who, we suppose, remembered her former beauty, but was prevented by her seclusion from observing the effects of the red pepper and hot lime, asked her in marriage. "The proposal was very agreeable to her mother, who, having eleven children, as before mentioned, to provide for, was happy at the prospect of an alliance so advantageous to her daughter. But Rose had given her virginity to God; and having a perfect abhorrence of the very thought of marriage, openly declared that she would never consent. Threats and caresses were alike vain. Blows and injuries were heaped upon her by her parents, but with no other effect than to make her more constant in her resolutions. She bore them all as her model, St. Catherine of Sienna, had done before her."

"In order to defeat the machinations of the enemies of her purity, she resolved to put on the habit of the third order of St. Dominic. This determination was confirmed by two miracles." We think it enough to give one of them, merely remarking that the other was an event equally supernatural.

"In the vast plains of Lima, amidst the countless butterflies that flit to and fro in the sunshine of that lovely climate, there is one prettily marked with black and white, the colours of the order of St. Dominic. One of these insects came and fluttered continually around her, and, as she was then looking about for indications of the will of God, she took this to be a second intimation from him that she should again follow the steps of St. Catherine, and become a religious of the third order of St. Dominic. She received the habit solemnly, at the age of twenty, on the 10th day of August, 1606."

Having brought our story to this point, we would, before going further, make a few remarks on one of the lessons taught to the little girls for whom their parents buy these "sweet little penny books" of Mr. Duffy's.

It seems to be one of the essential points in the life of a female saint that she should, while still a child, make a vow of perpetual celibacy. St. Philomena, it will be remembered, made such a vow at the age of ten; St. Rose, being, we suppose, twice as virtuous, made her's at the age of five. Promises so made are treated as irrevocably binding; and a child who altogether sets at nought, and defies the wishes of her parents in this matter, is described as choosing to obey God rather than man. What is here told of St. Rose and St. Philomena is repeated, with variations, in nearly all the lives of female saints that we remember; and in these religious romances the parents of the heroine fill the part which is assigned to the villain of secular romances. Those who have addicted themselves to the study of the old school of novels, know that it was the heroine's fate, after having in early life given her heart to a youth in every way worthy of it, to be invariably pursued by the machinations of a villain, from whose arts she is only finally delivered near the end of the third volume. In these religious romances it is the parents of the heroine who are intended to excite the reader's alarm (if anything can alarm a reader experienced enough to know how all such stories end); with "threats and caresses, blows and injuries" they seek to drive her from her purpose, but in vain; and her successful resistance is, at length, rewarded by reception into some distinguished nunnery.

We are inclined to believe, in charity, that the good priests who are the authors of these stories, not having any families of their own, are led into error through their ignorance as to the class of ideas of which the mind of a child of five years old is capable. We scarcely think that they would represent promises as binding made by a person ignorant of the meaning of what he was promising, or of the value of what he was giving away. If, for example, a man should prevail on a young child to promise to give him an estate to which the child was entitled when it should come of age, such an engagement would not be considered by any one as binding. Now, if our readers will try the experiment with the next child of five years old they meet, we think they will find them likely to possess a much more accurate idea, even as to what is meant by giving away an estate, than as to what is meant by "consecrating to God their virginal purity and making a vow of perpetual celibacy."

But see how the thing works in practice. A Roman Catholic little girl (if entitled to property in her own right so much the better) is asked how she would like to be a nun. Perhaps she goes to a nun's school; at all events she can form no other idea of a nun than a lady wearing a peculiar grand dress, living in a fine house, and thought holier and better than everybody else. She comes to the conclusion that to be a nun would be a very charming thing, and she forms her childish resolution accordingly. If her parents have treated her to Mr. Duffy's little books, she reads in them that such a resolution as she has taken is irrevocable; that it is an inspiration of the Holy Ghost, not to be repented of without sacrilege. If her parents disapprove of her plans she is taught that it will be the highest exercise of Christian virtue to set their wishes at defiance. We recommend any of our Roman Catholic friends, who would be sorry that their children took up these ideas, to look well to the kind of instruction they are providing for them.

We must not omit to remark how opposed to God's law are the lessons thus taught by Mr. Duffy to the "Young Christians" of Ireland. All human laws follow the dictates of common sense in this matter, and do not permit minors to enter into engagements against the consent of their parents. And so, in like manner, in the laws given by God to the Jewish nation, vows made to God, by an unmarried female, are treated as invalid if contrary to the consent of her parents.—See Numbers xxx. 5., R.C. Bible. "But if her father, immediately as soon as he heard it, gainsay it, both her vows and her oaths shall be void, neither shall she be bound to what she promised, because her father hath gainsaid it." Here we see that Moses would have decided St. Rose's perplexity in the case "where it would seem that God commanded one thing and the parents another," in precisely the opposite way from that in which St. Rose decided it. The Jews, however, are blamed by our Lord for adding to the laws which Moses gave them, traditions of man's devising; and it is singular that this very command of obedience to parents was the one which he censures them for tampering with. 'The Jewish Doctors of those days taught those who wished to be relieved from the necessity of obeying their father and mother to devote as a gift, to the service of God, whatever their parents required of them. "Well ye make void the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition. For Moses said, 'Honour thy father and thy mother; and he that shall curse father or mother dying let him die.' But you say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, Corban (which is a gift), whatsoever is from me shall profit thee; and, farther, ye suffer him not to do anything for his father or his mother; making void the Word of God by your tradition, which ye have given forth, and many such like things ye do."—Mark vii. 9-13, Douay Bible.

We think any candid mind must be struck by the resemblance between the traditions with which the Jewish teachers corrupted God's Word, and these traditions now taught in the Church of Rome; In both cases the plain command of God, "Honour thy father and mother," is set aside, under the pretext of offering God honour in some other way which he has not commanded; both have alike reason to apprehend the Saviour's rejection of such attempts to do him honour,—"In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

We return now to the history of Rose, and proceed to give an account of the merits by which she obtained the title of saint. We are told that she was humble to a pre-eminent degree. "For she always chose for herself the vilest occupations of the house, and considered herself infinitely below a servant; she would frequently cast herself at the feet of a poor country girl, named Marianne, who worked in the house, and entreat her earnestly to beat her; to spit upon her; to trample her under her feet; and treat her as the most contemptible creature in the world. She thought herself a burden useless to the world and odious to nature; and, if any misfortune befel the family, she said it was her own sins that had drawn it down as a chastisement from heaven." As Rose obtained the honours of saintship, we are bound to believe that she was quite free from affectation in all this, and that she seriously expected Marianne to take her at her word.

"Her fasts and austerities were truly astonishing, and such as only the grace of God can enable the greatest of saints to impose upon themselves. At six years of age, she began to fast three times a week on bread and water. At fifteen, she made a vow never to eat meat, unless compelled by those who had authority over her, and whom she thought she could not disobey without sin. Her mother, seeing her face pale and emaciated with long fasting, used to blame her conduct, and even wished to persuade her that she committed a mortal sin, by denying to herself the necessary nourishment for the preservation of life. She obliged her to sit at table with the rest of the family, and fare as the others did. But St. Rose would beg the servant to offer her only a sort of dish made without salt, composed of a crust of coarse bread and a handful of very bitter herbs. She was accustomed to gather wild herbs in the forest and to cultivate them carefully in her own garden, that she might have the materials for self-denial ready at hand. Her fast, in general, was so strict and rigorous that in twenty-four hours she took nothing but a piece of bread and a little water. From the beginning of Lent she left off bread, contenting herself with a few orange pippins every day of the forty that are consecrated to penance; on Fridays she took only five. She was known to make a moderate-sized loaf and a pitcher of water last fifty days Another time she remained seven weeks without drinking a drop of water or any other liquor; and towards the end of her life she sometimes passed several successive days without eating or drinking. It was generally believed in Lima that she passed weeks without eating or drinking, and that when necessity compelled her to drink a little water to assuage the burning heat which consumed her, she would drink it warm, in order to mortify the pleasure which she would have enjoyed from drinking cold water."

"Nor was she content to emaciate her delicate body by fasting alone. She daily drew from her flesh streams of blood, with iron chains, and other instruments of penance. After she became a nun, she was not content with a common sort of discipline; she made one for herself, of two iron chains, with which she gave herself such frightful blows every night that her blood sprinkled the wall, and made a stream in the middle of the room. When her confessor, alarmed at the excess of her disciplines, had ordered her to discontinue to discipline herself with her iron chain, she made it into three rows, and wore it round her body; and, after passing the ends through the ring of a padlock, she threw the key into a corner, where it could not be found. This chain very soon worked its way through the skin, and eat the flesh so deeply, that it buried itself, and was no longer visible. . . . . Besides this chain, she wore a most severe hair shirt, mixed with the points of needles; and rubbed herself with nettles and thorns, making her body one entire wound and blister. Being still insatiable in her desire of pain, she determined yet more exactly to copy her Lord and Saviour, who had worn a crown of thorns for her's and our sake. When very young she made herself a crown of pewter, studded with little sharp-pointed nails, which she wore several years of her innocent life. In after years she constructed a circlet, of a plate of silver, three fingers broad, in which she fixed three rows of sharp points, in honour of the thirty-three years which the Son of God lived on earth. Cutting off her hair that the points might enter more freely, she wore this crown beneath her veil, in such a way, that the least agitation or motion of her body caused these iron thorns to tear her flesh, and pierce her head in ninety-nine places. Every Friday she tied this circlet more tightly, and made it come down upon her forehead, till it pierced the cartilage of her ears in many places."

"She made herself a bed, in the form of a chest, and filled it with rough stones, of different sizes. The bed still seeming too soft, she added three pieces of twisted and knotted wood, and filled up the space with three hundred pieces of broken tiles, placed so as to wound and tear the body. Upon this terrible cross she never placed herself without trembling and shuddering, while the blood seemed to freeze in her veins."

We think that the account we have given of her austerities will content most of our readers; and we shall, therefore, merely say, in conclusion, that by such a course of conduct she brought herself to the grave in the thirty-second year of her age; dying in such torments that she told her friends that she believed that when she died her bones would be found reduced to ashes, and the marrow dried up, from the effects of the burning heat which she endured.

But, now that we have finished, we have still to ask, what are the merits by which she deserved the especial title of saint? What useful thing did she do during her life? How did she promote the glory of God, and the good of her fellow-creatures? We can find no satisfactory answer to these questions in Mr. Duffy's book; and, as far as he has informed us, it may be strictly true that Rose was, what she confessed herself to be, "a burden, useless to the world," "a miserable sinner, who had given much trouble and uneasiness to the house in which she lived." All that Mr. Duffy records is, that she was very ingenious in tormenting herself; but it does not appear whether she did any good to any body else.

But our Roman Catholic friends will ask, does not the mere fact of the fortitude with which she bore her self-inflicted sufferings, suffice to give her a claim to rank among the heroines of Christendom? Must we not believe that she was one of those who went straight to heaven, without passing through purgatory; for what need of purgatorial torments can one have who bore so many torments in this life?

And yet all must acknowledge that the voluntary infliction of torments such as those of Rose, is not, by itself, a proof of supernatural grace. The feats of Rose in this way—her voluntary abstinences, and her voluntary tortures—are not only paralleled, but outdone, by the heathen devotees of India. We will not venture to say how long some of them have remained without nourishment; it is no uncommon thing to find others who, in performance of a vow, have kept their arm immoveably in one position, until they have become unable to move it again. At some of their feasts they will come in succession, till the head is too weary and the heart too sick to count them, to have hot spikes thrust through their tongues, their cheeks, their arms; and to have hooks passed through the fleshy part of the back, and be swung by them at the height of thirty or forty feet from the ground.

Now, if these Indians were asked the reason why they endured these tortures, they could give a more consistent explanation of their conduct than St. Rose and the others who have acted as she is said to have done. The Hindoos worship a Deity who is supposed to take pleasure in the sufferings of mankind, to the honour of whom their rites are well adapted. But how can such practices be acceptable to the God whom we worship, a God of mercy, and tenderness, and love? It is because of the false notions as to the character of God, which such stories as Mr. Duffy circulates, are calculated to instil, that we especially feel called on to draw attention to them. God is represented throughout merely as a Being of stern justice, not to say, of cruelty; only some few heroic Christians are described as admitted to approach Him directly; and their whole lives are, in consequence, a scene of torment and suffering; while the mass of Christians, at humbler distance, are recommended to have recourse to these saintly mediators, in hope to find from them the mercy they dare not expect from the Redeemer. These are representations which fill us with sorrow and indignation.

It is true that we all believe our God to be a God of justice, and we know that we have, by our sins, grievously offended against him; but what is kept in the back ground in these books of Mr. Duffy's is, that he is also a God of infinite love, who spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up for our sakes; and that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin. The justice of God is no longer the enemy of those who love him; it has been completely satisfied by Christ's all-sufficient atonement; nor is it required of his people to attempt the impossible task of making, by their own sufferings, expiation for their sins. We own that the sufferings of Christ are alluded to in the biographies we are reviewing; but they are spoken of rather as examples for the saints to follow than as an atonement, making expiatory sufferings on their own part unnecessary.

There was once on a time a father who, when his house was on fire, rescued his two daughters from the flames—a task which he did not accomplish without severe burns and great risk of life. Both girls were filled with gratitude to their father for his sufferings on their account. The one showed her gratitude by devoted attention to her father, by striving in every way to do his will and to anticipate his wishes; the other thought the best way to make her father a pleasant return for what he had suffered for her sake was by occasionally putting her own fingers into the candle, holding hot coals in her hands, pouring boiling water inside her clothes, and in other ways making herself miserable. Nor could her sister persuade her that it gave her father no pleasure to see her suffer; that the very reason he had endured so much was to save her from pain; and that though he had acted rightly in not shrinking from suffering where there was good cause, she would not be justified in inflicting on herself gratuitous and unmeaning torments.

If such a case occurred in common life, no one would be at a loss what judgment to pass on it; yet in religious matters the first kind of gratitude finds no favour with Roman Catholic teachers, who reserve all their admiration for the second, as divine and truly heroic.

We think there can be no doubt, that such conduct as that attributed to Rose of Lima is not only not meritorious, but positively sinful. All are agreed that suicide is a grievous sin; and no one has any greater right to inflict on themselves a lingering suicide, or to shorten their lives by self-inflicted torments. But all the guilt of such conduct is not to be laid at the door of the unhappy victim of it; much must be visited on the priests and confessors, and others who, by their approbation, urge it on. For, after all, the process by which a poor nun is led down the melancholy path which ends in canonization is so simple, that we only wonder there are not more candidates for the honour. When the doors of the convent are closed upon the poor girl, if the rules of her order do not admit of her being occupied in education or in attendance on the sick, she must seek for something to fill up the place which her worldly employments had held in her thoughts; she must look for some object for her existence. What is more natural than to endeavour to make some further advance in the road to superior sanctity, of which her very entrance into the convent was the first step? She strives to make her life conformed to that of those whom her Church sets before her as models. Rose adopted her system of tortures from a desire to imitate Catherine of Sienna. What wonder that others should desire to rival Rose? It appears from her life, that Rose, by her self-inflicted tortures, obtained the frequent visits of saints and angels, and heard Christ himself uttering the words—"Rose of my heart be thou my bride." How is the poor recluse to doubt the reality of scenes attested by her Church, or to question the lawfulness of self-murder, supported by the highest of her commended models? What limits are to be placed to the zeal of her who has been taught that she can best please God by tormenting a frail body, and that a self-inflicted death will endear her to her heavenly bridegroom?

Innumerable examples have proved that people will not unfrequently be found who, without any religious motive at all to animate them, will submit to the greatest pain and privation, in order to excite the wonder, or the respect, or admiration of those with whom they live. Within the last few years two or three instances have occurred, in our own country, of impostors who pretended that they lived without eating, and who, in order to carry out the appearance of abstinence, must have practised immense self-denial, with no apparent object but that of exciting wonder and admiration. With what far greater force must such motives act when they have the sanction of religion? How are the bleeding steps of the candidate saint supported by the honour and approbation of those who surround her! What praises she receives from her confessor! What an honour to the convent to which she belongs, if they have got a genuine saint to produce—one who fasts, and scourges, and disciplines herself after the most approved models! And so it is, that by the application of moral force alone, tortures, which would be thought too severe for an atrocious criminal, are inflicted on an unoffending girl, with no other fault than that of a weak and superstitious mind.

The conclusion, then, to which we wish to bring our readers is, that self-torture is not, in itself, a virtue. We believe that the good of mankind is the only legitimate ground for the voluntary endurance of pain; and we only approve of the exercise of such moderate privations as are employed as a discipline of mind and body, in order to acquire that habit of rational self-denial, without which extensive usefulness is impossible.

We have only, in conclusion, to mention one very important particular in which our idea of saints differs from that of the compilers of "The Young Christian's Library." We believe that it is the business of all Christians to be saints; that every one of us is bound to show his gratitude to the utmost of his abilities for the mercies the Saviour has bestowed on him, and that no one has a dispensation from practising whatever rules may most tend to our Lord's glory. In our opinion, Christian biography—the lives of people who have been distinguished for holiness and virtue—is profitable reading, only if those who study their biography strive to follow their good example, so as with them to be partakers of God's heavenly kingdom. But the view held by the Roman Catholics is, that saints are a class of people to be admired rather than imitated. We do not suppose a dozen Roman Catholic parents would purchase St. Rose's life, if they thought there was much danger of their daughters imitating her red pepper and hot lime, her iron chains and broken tile mattresses. In Mr. Faber's book, which we have so often had before occasion to refer to, he modestly disclaims as absurd the notion that he should write a book for any one trying to be a saint. His aim he states to be, "affectionately to ask people to think, if they will not be saints, whether they will not love our dearest Lord as far as Calvary, without committing themselves to the crucifixion." But, after all, the real test of the goodness of doctrine is to see how it would work if everybody practised it. We can conceive no scene of greater happiness than the world would exhibit if everybody was a saint according to our notion of what is meant by the word; if everybody was full of love to God and to his neighbour; if selfishness were destroyed, sinful passions conquered, the promotion of God's glory the chief object in every one's thought—why, it would be no longer earth, it would be heaven. But suppose every one was a saint according to Mr. Duffy's model—suppose every one held the very thought of marriage in abhorrence—suppose every one endeavoured to improve on the way in which God Almighty had made him, and strove with hot lime, iron chains, dirt, and red pepper, to make his person as disagreeable to his neighbours as God, no doubt, would have made it if he had intended saints of Mr. Duffy's class to be general—suppose every one were to take as little food as nature would submit to, and that the noise of the iron discipline was continually resounding; that nothing was to be seen but pale faces, livid flesh, and bleeding shoulders—what a scene the world would present! it would be no longer earth, it would be—purgatory. Now, if any of our readers will but just look about him in the world, and see how God has made every natural object beautiful to the eye—how every sight, and scent, and sound of nature is full of pleasure, except where sin has depraved and polluted it—we are content to leave it to his decision to say which of these two kinds of saints is the kind with which the Author of Nature wished His world to be full.

THE LANDLORD'S LETTER.

I DON'T know whether any of those who now read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN ever heard of such a place as Ballintubber. Once on a time I wrote one or two accounts of some of the doings there, which were printed in this paper; but it is so long ago that you have had time to forget it; and, besides, I hear that a great many more read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN now than used to do then. Well, at any rate, I was reminded that I had not then time to tell any of the reasons the people of Ballintubber had for not liking Mr. Grip, the agent, so I may as well tell you now; and as what I am now going to tell you happened before any of the things I told of before, those that didn't read the old numbers of this paper will be the better able to understand my story.

If Mr. Grip didn't turn out well as an agent, it was no blame to those that appointed him, for the ageney had been in his family for about a hundred years; and there never was an honester man or one that managed better than his grandfather, old Anthony Grip. However, it was a great temptation to them, things being left so much in their power. The Sherwins lived altogether on the Continent, and the agent might do very much as he pleased. As long as old Anthony lived, things went on very well; but the son was a very different man from his father; and if he was bad, the grandson was worse. By degrees they introduced a good many new rules into the management of the estate; and the object of all these rules was the screwing money out of the tenantry, very little of which, I may tell you, went into the landlord's pocket. The way they managed was—first to make some little change in one of the old rules; they would generally choose the time when one of the tenants died to change the rule a little, and make some new exaction from the son; and if he objected, they bullied him, or they told him "it was always so"—It was one of the "regulations of the estate"—"they must know better than he;" and so when they got one rule well established, they tried another, and so on, until the tenantry were in such a bad condition that you would never know the place for the same it had been in old Anthony's time.

One thing, perhaps, which made the tenants submit to all this was the state of ignorance they were kept in; you could hardly blame the Sherwin family for this, for they had founded good schools on the estate, and left fine endowments for the master; but O'Reilly, the schoolmaster, was son-in-law to Mr. Grip, and played into his hands; It suited his laziness not to give his pupils more instruction than he could help; and, besides, perhaps he thought the less the people knew the more likely they would be to submit to those they knew to be wiser than themselves, and the less chance there would be of any complaints reaching the landlord's ears.

The first thing that made a great change in Ballintubber was, that some of the boys that found it hard to live there went over to America and throve very well there; you may be sure they were anxious to let their friends at home know of their good luck; and their poor fathers and mothers, at Ballintubber, wanted to send them news of home, from time to time, and it was then they found reason to be sorry for their want of education. Those that were best taught of them thought it a great thing if they could spell their way through one of the stories in the reading book, miscalling half the words; and when they grew up they generally forgot what they knew; and as for writing, not one of them was ever taught such a thing. The poor boys in America had to go about looking for some one to write their letters for them; and, when the letters came over, Mr. O'Reilly, who was postmaster, had to read them as well to the people, and to write their letters back again for them. If he had had an idle life before, I can tell you his place then was no easy one; however, if his ill-wishers are to be believed, he did not lose by his trouble. At least I was told of several remittances of money that were said to be sent over by the boys in America to their families, and I know that nothing was ever heard about them by the people in Ballintubber, who, to be sure, had to be contented with knowing as much of their letters as Mr. O'Reilly was pleased to tell them. I don't think they suspected anything, but, at any rate, they did not like this state of things; and Tim Callaghan, in particular, came to Mr. O'Reilly, and insisted that his son Pat should be taught to write: so did Michael Kelly, and several others of the people of the village. Mr. O'Reilly tried to laugh and talk them out of this foolish notion, and wanted to know why they wanted their children to be wiser than any of the people of Ballintubber for the last hundred years; and asked whether the education that had been good enough for themselves was not good enough for their children. However, the people were positive, and, at last, Mr. O'Reilly thought it best to give in; for he knew very well that writing was one of the things which, as schoolmaster, he was bound to teach. So there was a writing class in Ballintubber school; and Pat Callaghan, especially, took to the writing greatly, and could not only write a fair hand himself, but he could read writing-hand as well as some of them could read printed books. Now, Pat was a sharp lad, and it happened that one evening that he had been sent up to Mr. O'Reilly's to buy some trifle or other—for Mrs. O'Reilly had a little shop, and sold threads and tapes, and other little odds and ends—Pat noticed a paper on the chimney-piece behind the counter, and brought back word to his father that there was a letter directed to him at Mr. O'Reilly's. So, next morning, Tim Callaghan went up, and Pat with him, and asked Mr. O'Reilly for the letter for him.

"There's no letter for you," said Mr. O'Reilly.

"No letter!" said Tim, looking rather blank.

"No," said Mr. O'Reilly; "what letter should there be? there has been no American mail these three weeks."

"Why, sir," says young Pat, as sharp as you please, "there's the letter I mean on the chimney-piece."

"Oh, that letter," said Mr. O'Reilly; not stirring to give it him. "I thought, of course, you expected a letter from America; that letter is nothing but the letter from the landlord, Mr. Sherwin."

"A letter from the landlord," cried Tim; "well, if his honour has been pleased to write to me, sure that's the letter, of all others, I'd like to have."

"It's not to you, man, in particular," returned Mr. O'Reilly; "it's a circular to all the tenantry, containing some of the rules for the management of the estate, and directions for the cropping of your land."

"I'm delighted to hear it, sir," said Tim; "it will be of great use to us; will you hand it over to me if you please, sir."

"Use to you! What use would it be to you? Do you think, that ignorant people like you would understand it properly? Mr. Grip has got the circular, and understands it all, and you'll just take your directions from him, as usual, without troubling your own heads about it."

"But, sir," said Tim, "if Mr. Sherwin had intended the letter for Mr. Grip only, would not he have sent it straight to him? When he directed the letter to us, it looks like a poor compliment to the master if we wouldn't try and read it, and try and get as much good as we can by it. So, if you please, sir, I will take it home with me and try to understand it, and if I can't, why, if it does me no good it can do me no harm."

"No," said Mr. O'Reilly, "the mischief would just be that you'd be fancying you understood it, and going as you thought by it, when, in reality, you'd be going all wrong. So I have strict orders from Mr. Grip not to let any one have a copy of the letter except those that bring me written orders from him."

"But, sir," says Tim, "when the letter is directed to me, aren't you bound to give it to me?"

"Are you going to teach me my duty as postmaster?" says Mr. O'Reilly. "Do you think the government would have set me over the letters if I wasn't to have my discretion who to give letters to or not? What difference does it make to you whether you get it or not? Sure you're bound to take the meaning of it from me. You'd never know there was a letter at all here for you if I did not tell you or show it to you. Only for me you'd not know how to read a line of it. Many's the letter has come from America that you couldn't have made sense of at all, if I didn't expound it to you. So you may be as well be content to take it from me first as last. You can't help depending on me; and it's as good for you just to take the meaning of Mr. Sherwin's letter from the rules we give you, without troubling your own head about it."

"Then won't I get the letter, sir?" said Tim.

"Will you be off out of that, and not be crowding up the place all day?" cried Mr. O'Reilly, in a thundering voice; and Tim Callaghan moved off, not knowing exactly what to say, and yet not more than half satisfied.

When Tim came home he spoke to several of the tenants, and told them there was a letter for them from the landlord, that they could not get. However, when he explained to them the reason why, there was only Michael Kelly and one or two more that grumbled a little; the rest said, "why if we couldn't understand it what good would it be to us?" And Michael Kelly only said, "I wonder the master hadn't more sense than to go to the trouble of writing us a letter that we can't understand."

The more Tim thought of the matter the less he was pleased at not being allowed to see this letter; for there was another of the "regulations of the estate" of which I must tell you a little now, which he found very hard to make agree with this. It was one time that the tenantry had become dissatisfied with something or other, or had some favour to ask, I forget what, from the landlord, and having no one else to come to, they came to Mr. O'Reilly, to get him to write for them. He didn't make any difficulty about writing. Quite the contrary; he told them that it was the landlord's wish that they should send him a letter, once a week, giving him a report of the state of the farms, and telling him what they wanted him to do; that they should come up, once a week, to Mr. O'Reilly, and he would read over for them the letter he was going to send, and they should pay him so much a week for his trouble. Well, they all agreed to this; and the first week they went up, full of expectation, to hear what fine words Mr. O'Reilly would put their wishes in. But when he began to read, how they did stare at each other; one scratched his head; another would have interrupted him only for shame's sake; not a word could they understand from one end to the other. When Mr. O'Reilly had finished, he said, "There, boys; I defy any one to give you better value for your money than that letter; it shall go by this night's post, and all that are here present will be sure to find the good of it."

"Sir," says Tim Callaghan, "I have no doubt it's a very fine letter, but if I may make bold to say so, sorra word of it I could understand."

"How could you be expected to understand it, man," said Mr. O'Reilly; "sure its Latin."

"Latin!" said Tim; "why, then, wouldn't you tell his honour in plain English what it was we wanted."

"You ought to know," said Mr. O'Reilly, "that it's one of the regulations of the estate that no letter should ever be sent to the landlord except in Latin."

"Yerra, then," said Tim, "if that isn't the quare rule; and what's the reason of that, sir?"

"It ought to be reason enough for you," said Mr. O'Reilly, "that it is one of the regulations of the estate, and that's all need be said about it; however, I may tell you this—that Mr. Sherwin has tenants in France, too, and how would it look, if some of his tenants wrote to him in French and some of them in English; he likes uniformity you know. And if you were travelling in France, and if any of the tenants there asked you to join them in one of their petitions, how would you know what you were putting your name to, if the letter was in French?"

"Why, then, sir," says Tim, "if the Latin letters is no use till I come to travel in France, it's little good they are; and if the letter you read was in French itself, I'd understand as much of it as I do now; and, to my thinking, the best kind of uniformity would be, if every one was to write in the language they understood. However, sir, if it's one of the regulations of the estate there's nothing to be said again it. But, I suppose, sir, you won't want me to come up to hear the letter read every week. Sure I am willing to agree to it all without coming, since I'd be no wiser if I came."

"That won't do, at all, Tim," said Mr. O'Reilly; "it's only they that come and hear it read, and put their names to it, will get any benefit by it."

Well, I am afraid you'll think I am losing the thread of my story, by telling you all these regulations about the Latin letters; but, if I hadn't told you, I could not well have explained to you how it was that Tim was fairly gravelled now, when he could not get the landlord's letter. "Well," said he to himself, "that bates all, for quareness. Mr. O'Reilly won't give me the landlord's letter, becanse, he says, I couldn't understand it, and maybe he's right; but, if things I can't understand is bad for me, why does he make me go up every week to hear the Latin letters, that's written in a language that I'm told the devil himself can't understand. And, if the Latin I hear does me no harm, what harm could the landlord's letter do me, for it can't be harder than the Latin, supposing, even, there's not a plain word in the whole of it?"

It often happens that when one can't get a thing, that's the very reason one wishes for it, and so it was with Tim Callaghan; he came to be mighty curious about Mr. Sherwin's letter, and wondering what was in it, and how he could get it. And he remembered that Mr. O'Reilly said that he might give the letter to those that could bring him written orders from Mr. Grip. So the next time Tim was up paying his rent, he contrived to have some talk with Mr. Grip; and at last he brought the subject round to the letter, and to Mr. Grip not allowing it to be read by the tenantry. But, though Tim had spoken respectfully enough, as he thought, Mr. Grip fired up at once. "Who dare say such a thing," says he, "as that I would be against the tenantry knowing anything the landlord wished them to be told. There's nothing that I wish more than that every tenant on the estate should be able to see the letter." This was joyful hearing for Tim. But Mr. Grip went on—"Of course," said he, "all I wish is, that the tenantry should know the landlord's wishes; and if any of them were so ignorant that they would take a meaning out of the letter quite the opposite of what Mr. Sherwin meant, then, it stands to reason, they'd be better without the letter than with it. So, all I require is, that people should bring me a certificate from the schoolmaster that they are educated men, and have sense enough to put no bad meaning on it, and then I give them an order to get it."

Says Tim—"I think I can get that same certificate easy enough, and I'll just step down for it."

"There's another thing I should mention," said Mr. Grip; "and that is, before I give you the order, you must sign an engagement that you'll never put any meaning on the letter except the meaning I bid you; and, in particular, that you'll never go about saying that any of the regulations of the estate, that I go by, are contrary to the words of the letter."

"Bless your honour," said Tim, "who'd ever suspect your honour of going against the words of the master's letter. Sure we all know you wouldn't make any regulations contrary to his authority; it's little occasion for me to sign such an engagement as that."

"I know better," said Mr. Grip. "I never yet let letters from the landlord get carelessly into the hands of any of the tenants, that they were not sure to say that they were contrary to some of my regulations. I had trouble enough, when you were a lad, with some scoundrels who had got hold of a letter from the landlord, and who had the impudence to say he condemned some of my rules; however, I soon settled their hash for them. I had them well punished, and bundled them out of the estate. And I am determined to take good care never to have such trouble again; so you either must sign the engagement, to put my meaning on the letter, and nothing else, or the letter you shan't have."

"Well," says Tim, "I have confidence in your honour, who to be sure is wiser than me; and I'd like to see the letter, so I'll sign the engagement."

"Then," said Mr. Grip, "you have only to bring me the schoolmaster's certificate, and I will give you an order to have the letter on payment of the postage."

"Postage," cried Tim; "and is there much postage to pay?"

"Only a pound," said Mr. Grip.

"A pound!" cried Tim; "why 'twould take me six months to save that much."

"You wouldn't have us treat the landlord with so much disrespect as to make his letters too common, or only to charge the same for them as for the scrawls your brother might send you from America."

"Sir," said Tim, "a pound is a great deal of money; and, after all, if I had the letter, since it only confirms the regulations you go by, I believe it will answer just as well to hear them from you."

"Just as well," said Mr. Grip; "now you speak like a man of sense. I read Mr. Sherwin's letter carefully enough; and as you have me to give you the meaning of it, you may just as well save your money. You will get on as well without it."

"Stay, sir," said Tim; "even though the letter contains nothing but your regulations, still, I think, I should like to have them all in black and white; for I often hear you tell us things are regulations, that I was never told of before; and as you say you never make a new rule, I would be glad to have the letter which gives, I suppose, a list of them all."

"And do you think," said Mr. Grip, "that all the regulations are in that letter? Why there's not the tenth part of them. My grandfather, Anthony, heard them all from Mr. Sherwin, that was then, and he taught them all to my father, and my father to me. It's only a few of the rules that are in the letter. But the great rule is to mind my bidding, and that's rule enough for you."

"I suppose that rule is in the letter, sir," said Tim.

"No, it isn't," said Mr. Grip, turning on him as if he would eat him up. "That's the principal of the things my father told me I was to impress upon you all. If the master forgot to put it in the letter, I suppose it was because he knew I would be sure not to let you forget it. But just take my advice, mind your potato field, and don't trouble your head about the letter, or you'll become a troublesome, rebellious fellow, like those I had to get rid of."

"Why, then, sir," said Tim, "I believe your advice is good; and I'll put the letter out of my head, for 'twould only cost me a mint of money, and I'd be no wiser after all."

After this conversation with Mr. Grip, Tim Callaghan gave up the idea of trying to see the landlord's letter, and things went on as usual, until Loughmanagh fair day, where he had to go over to sell a cow. He wasn't there very long before he sold her well, to Mr. Robinson, a stout farmer of Kilpatrick; he didn't stay very long after that; and on the way home, he overtook Mr. Robinson, and they walked together, for Tim's way lay through Kilpatrick. Another time, perhaps, he might have been shy of talking to Mr. Robinson, for there was bad blood between the Kilpatrick boys and the Ballintubber boys, and desperate faction fights there used to be between them, though now the police had put a stop to it; but this day Tim had Mr. Robinson's guineas chinking in his pocket, and he was not inclined to answer him surly when Mr. Robinson spoke friendly to him. So they walked on together, and by the time they got to Kilpatrick, they were such friends that Mr. Robinson asked him in to rest himself and eat a bit of dinner with him. And, after dinner, he took him round his place and showed him his way of farming; and Tim saw a great many things he never saw before, and was greatly delighted with it all—for he had no notion so much could be got out of the land. So, at last, he asked his new acquaintance, where it was that he had learned all these plans that were so new to himself. I wonder they should be new to you said Mr. Robinson; why I only go according to the directions Mr. Sherwin gave us in his circular.

"And is Mr. Sherwin your landlord, too?" said Tim Callaghan.

"Oh, yes; all this country belongs to him."

"But, how could it be that Mr. Grip would give you one explanation of the letter and us another—for he teaches us quite a different way?"

"I don't care how Mr. Grip explains it," said Mr. Robinson, "I go by the plain words of Mr. Sherwin's own letter."

"Then, have you got the letter?" cried Tim, all in surprise, "and how did you get Mr. Grip to allow you to have it?"

"I didn't ask his leave," said Mr. Robinson.

"And wern't you afraid of his turning you off the estate?"

"I have nothing to say to Mr. Grip," said Mr. Robinson; "he has no power over me."

"But," said Tim, quite overpowered with all the strange news he heard, "Mr. Grip told us, often and often, that Mr. Sherwin hadn't an acre of property anywhere, but he was agent over it."

"Don't believe a word of it," said Mr. Robinson; "we all lived in Ballintubber, when I was a lad, and were under Mr. Grip until my father got the landlord's letter and found out, from that, some of the tricks Mr. Grip was playing, and so he earned his ill-will, and Mr. Grip put him out of Ballintubber. And then my father wrote to Mr. Sherwin, so he gave him this farm we hold now, and we have nothing to say to Mr. Grip ever since."

"Ah," said Tim, "it's well your father was a learned man; but I dare not bring Mr. Grip's anger on me, for there's not a soul in Ballintubber could write to the master, but Mr. O'Reilly, and, to be sure, he wouldn't go again his father-in-law."

"And isn't there a soul in Ballintubber can write but one?" cried Mr. Robinson, whose turn it was now to be astonished.

"My own son, Pat, could write, if that was all," returned Tim; "but it's the Latin letters we're not up to."

"Oh, the Latin," cried Mr. Robinson, laughing, till he could hardly stand, "I had forgotten that. Well, Grip has certainly played you a great many tricks, but of all the barefaced humbugs I ever heard of, that's the most outrageous. Do you think that any gentleman, of common sense, would make a rule that he would'nt take letters except they were written in a language that the people that sent them didn't understand? No, it's no rule of Mr. Sherwin's; but do you know the reason of this rule?"

"Yes," said Tim; "I remember Mr. O'Reilly telling me some of the reasons for the rule; but, to tell the truth, I didn't think any of them good ones."

"I warrant he didn't tell you the true reason; and that is, there's nothing Grip is so much afraid of, as of the tenantry's going straight to the master without going through his hands; he knows, if they did, his rogueries would soon come to light; so that is why he puts every difficulty he can in the way of the tenantry making their wants known to Mr. Sherwin, or of his making his wishes known to them. And now, if you would like it, I will give you a copy of the master's letter to take home with you."

"There's nothing would delight me more," said Tim; "but is the letter you have got the same as the letter that was sent to me?"

"Exactly the same," said Mr. Robinson; "and if you want to be sure of it, just get Mr. Grip to read out some of the letter to you, and do you compare it with the letter I am giving you, and try if every line isn't the same. But do you know the reason the master's letter was kept from you so long?"

"Yes, sir, I do," said Tim; "it's because it's too difficult and hard for me to understand."

"You never made a worse hit than that," returned Mr. Robinson, laughing again; "it's because it's too easy to understand."

"And where could be the harm of that?" said Tim.

"No harm to you, perhaps; but great harm to Mr. Grip. It's very easy to understand the letter, but very hard to get a meaning out of it that will agree with his doings. No wonder, it must be a clever fellow that would get his meaning out of the letter. Just let me read you a little, and you shall judge for yourself."

So Mr. Robinson just read part of the letter in which Mr. Sherwin desired that his letter should be read out for them all—men, women, and children—and that they were to get it by heart, and teach it to their children, and talk about it when they were walking on the road, and in the evenings when they were going to bed, and in the mornings when they were getting up. "Well, Mr. Callaghan, how does this agree with Mr. Grip's not letting any of you have a copy of the letter?"

Then he read several other parts of the letter, which there's no use in my telling you, unless I had time to tell you of the strange rules Mr. Grip had made, that were quite contrary to the letter; another time I may tell you some of his tricks, if any of you care to read them. And some of the rules Mr. Grip laid most stress on were not mentioned in the letter at all; though any one could see they were a kind of thing that would not be left out if the landlord had wished them to be observed.

Tim could hardly sleep a wink that night, with thinking of all the new things he had learned that day; and, next day, he set to work reading over the letter; and before many days were past, he knew it so well, that he had it almost by heart. Somehow or other he was not in a hurry to go tell his discovery to Mr. Grip; but he could not help telling many of his neighbours how it could be proved that Grip kept many of their rights back from them, and how they weren't at all bound to pay many of the dues he exacted from them; and he began to alter his own plan of farming to agree with what was directed in the circular, and which he had seen work so well at Mr. Robinson's. So it could not be long kept a secret from Mr. Grip, and he sent up for Tim one morning, and asked him, "what new-fangled ways those were that he had the impudence to introduce into Ballintubber?"

Tim answered, "that he only did according to what was in the master's letter."

This made Mr. Grip furious. "What business have you, or the like of you, with his honour's letter; and where did you get a copy of it?"

Tim told him, from Mr. Robinson, of Kilpatrick.

"That's not the right letter you could have got from him," said Mr. Grip.

So, then, Tim did as Mr. Robinson had ordered him; and he offered to let Mr. Grip read out his letter, and compare the two, and see if they were not as like as two peas.

"Show your letter here," said Mr. Grip; so Tim did so very simply, thinking he was going to compare the two; but the agent just took the letter Tim handed him, and put it inside the bar of the grate, and held it tight with the poker, until it was burnt to ashes.

When Tim saw his treasure disappear in this way, he cried out at the disrespect of treating the master's letter in such a way.

"The master's letter, indeed," said Mr. Grip; "it's the devil's own letter for throwing the whole place into confusion. I wish I had this poker within reach of the fellow that gave it to you. And as for you, if I see any more of these new-fangled plans with you, or if I hear any more talk about letters from you, you don't remain another week upon the estate."

Now, Tim had plenty of courage; and besides, there were several of the tenantry in the office that he was sure would take his part, since, if he could put down any of Grip's rogueries, they would all be the better of it; so he told Grip stoutly that he had a right to the landlord's letter, and he would have it; and that as for his being put off the estate, that was more than Grip could do, if he did nothing wrong beyond asking for his own, and that the master had plenty of estates that Grip had nothing to say to.

To this Mr. Grip abused him like a pickpocket; and called him a liar; and swore, that Mr. Sherwin hadn't a foot of land but he was agent over it. If Tim had expected that the tenantry would take his part he was wofully disappointed. In the first place, they were all in great dread of Mr. Grip, who made out his power over them to be far greater than it really was; and besides, he took a very cunning advantage of the ill-will between them and the Kilpatrick boys. He turned on Tim, and said, ought not you to be ashamed, for a Ballintubber boy, to go and sell himself to the Kilpatrick faction? How much did Robinson pay you for introducing discontent into this estate?

Well, Tim could not deny that he had sold his cow to Mr. Robinson, and got his dinner from him; and then there was no end to the vile names Grip called him. He told every Ballintubber man to kick him, and every Ballintubber woman to spit upon the rascal, that sold himself to the Kilpatrick faction for a dinner. He finished by taking the horsewhip to Callaghan, who only escaped this, because the crowd hustled him out of the office.

"Boys, boys," he cried, "wont you listen to me. What would I sell myself to the Kilpatrick people for? or what good would it do them to buy me? Supposing I can get as fine crops out of my fields as Mr. Robinson, what would the Kilpatrick people be the better of it? And if we can get our rents lowered, and get rid of some of the agent's dues, who'll be the worse of it, except Mr. Grip? Isn't it foolish of you to take his part against me, when I often heard you complain of these same things between ourselves?

Tim's words were drowned in cries of "Hurroo for Ballintubber," "Down with the Kilpatrick vagaboad;" and the only answer he got was, the rap of a sod of turf on his right ear; and as he saw there was harder coming, he cried, "well, boys, if you haven't sense to know your friends, that's no reason why I should stay to be made a shilly cock of;" and with that he cut for his life, and glad enough he was when he found himself at home.

THE ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN.

In our last number we undertook to give our readers some information about the Festival of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, celebrated on every 15th August by the Church of Rome.

As some of our Protestant readers may be ignorant enough not to know what event or doctrine is meant to be commemorated by that festival, we must begin by informing them what it is that Roman Catholics mean by the "Assumption."

They believe, as a matter of fact, that, after the Blessed Virgin died and was buried, which they say took place A.D. 47 or 48, her body was supernaturally removed from her coffin, and taken up into heaven; which miraculous removal is denominated, by the Church of Rome, her "Assumption."

The death and burial of the Blessed Virgin are not, therefore, the matters in dispute—the only controversy is, as to the truth or falsehood of the alleged fact, that after her death and burial her dead body was taken up to heaven, in the same miraculous manner that the living body of our Lord, after his resurrection from the dead, ascended into heaven.

Now, that such a miracle was just as possible and as easy for the Almighty to perform as the ascension of our Blessed Lord, or the translation of Enoch or Elijah, no Protestant doubts. The only question is, did God work this particular miracle, and what kind and amount of testimony have we that He did so.

We admit, fully, the possibility (we might even, perhaps, a priori, admit the probability) that God would distinguish so highly-favoured a vessel of mercy, by raising her to the beatified and glorified state before the ordinary period; but were we to allow our minds to speculate about probabilities in such matters, we should deem it more probable that the Blessed Virgin would not have died at all, but that she would have ascended visibly into heaven, or been visibly translated, as Jesus and Elijah. Descending, therefore, from the regions of imagination and a priori reasonings, to the humble sphere of historical facts, let us see what is the evidence that the dead body of the Blessed Virgin was taken up into heaven. Who saw, and who recorded, this miraculous event; and where did it take place?

Now, it is worthy of notice, we think, in the first place, that although the sacred historians bring down the record of events to a considerably later date (fifteen years, at least, after the death of the Holy Virgin), not one of them takes the slightest notice of this wonderful miracle. The Holy Scriptures are absolutely and profoundly silent about any such event having taken place; and have not a single word about either the time, the manner, or the place of Mary's death; or even as to whether she accompanied St. John in his travels or not. All that the Scriptures tell us is, that immediately after the crucifixion that disciple (St. John) took her to his own home.*

We must choose some other occasion for observing upon the affecting and edifying incident which St. John records as having occurred, relative to the Blessed Virgin, while the Lord Jesus was hanging on the cross; for the present, we shall only say, that if it had been our Lord's will that his beloved mother should be exalted into an object of religious adoration, and that all his followers should look to her as the channel through which the favours and blessings of heaven were to be conveyed to mankind, his words and conduct towards her, on that occasion, would, up to this hour, seem to be inexplicable; as would be also the words of the evangelist, St. John, closing his narrative, by the simple words—"And from that hour that disciple took her to his own home."

The silence of Scripture, however, may be, perhaps, made up for by the clearness and consistency of the uninspired testimony of other faithworthy writers; and the time, the place, the circumstances, may be recorded in such authentic histories, or supported by such early primitive traditions, that no fair and impartial inquirer can refuse credence to it. Let us see whether this be the case.

We had hoped that some of our Roman Catholic correspondents or readers would have saved us the trouble of searching for such evidence, by furnishing us with it themselves, or, at least, referring us to some writer of acknowledged orthodoxy and ability, in whose works it might be found. As, however, we have been disappointed in that, we think not unreasonable, hope, we must only do the best we can to elucidate the matter ourselves; though, in doing so, we feel very like a man attempting to grope his way in the dark, or to see through an impenetrable mist, which grows more dense and foggy the further he goes into it.

The first thing that strikes us is, that the very place where this astonishing event is said to have taken place, is a matter of dispute and uncertainty. Some maintaining that the Blessed Virgin breathed her last at Ephesus, while others affirm, that her departure from this world took place at Jerusalem. If, as the later writers affirm, the Virgin was buried in the Valley of Jehosaphat, in the Garden of Gethsemane, we think it rather singular that neither St. Jerome or St. Epiphanius, who are the two Fathers most likely to have heard of it, for the reasons we shall presently state, should have taken the least notice of it. M. Le Quien (Ordinis FF Prædicatorum), the Roman Catholic editor of the works of John Damascenus, observes on the silence of those two eminent writers on the subject, and says, that though St. Jerome passed a great part of his life at Bethlehem, and purports to enumerate in his "Epitaph on Paula," all the places in Palestine distinguished by any remarkable event, he has yet said nothing of this; and further says, that Epiphanius, though he lived long in Palestine, actually declares, that nothing was known as to the death or burial of the Blessed Virgin.* We cannot help agreeing with M. Le Quien, that it is passing strange that neither St. Epiphanius, who died A.D. 370, or St. Jerome, who died, A.D. 418, knew anything of the miraculous removal to heaven of the Blessed Virgin's body, if the Church then believed it! Was the feast of the Assumption celebrated on every 15th of August in their days?

The silence of Epiphanius and Jerome, however, may, perhaps, be amply made up for by the testimony of the rest of the Fathers; and it may be thought that they did not notice it, because it had been so frequently recorded by others.

What, however, will our readers think when we tell them, that not one of the writings of the primitive Fathers contain the slightest hint that they believed, or had even heard of such a tradition in their days.

Ignatius is silent; so is Justin Martyr. So are Irenæus, the two Clements, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Methodius, and Lactantius. So are Athanasius, Cyril, and Hilary, as well as Epiphanius and Jerome.

Will any Roman Catholic deny this to be the case? and is it possible that none of them ever heard the story? or had they so little zeal for the honour of the Virgin as not to record or even allude to it?

How ominous is such dark silence, how inexplicable, on any other hypothesis than the one we conceive to be the true one, either that the story had not then been invented; or, if it existed at all, that it was universally considered as a fabulous legend, unworthy of serious notice.

We believe that the modern doctrine of development has not yet been applied to the discovery of long-concealed historical facts; otherwise, perhaps, we ought to have said that there is another way of explaining the matter—viz., by supposing that the fact of the Assumption had not yet been developed, and that the silence of the Fathers may be attributable to their unhappily having lived too soon!

Let us grope on, however, and, perhaps, still we may be fortunate enough to arrive at some glimmering light on this mysteriously dark subject.

The earliest testimony we have ever seen referred to is a short supposed entry in a chronological work (long since lost), called the Chronicon of Eusebius, of which we shall have more to say another time, which is said to record (if such an entry can be considered a record) that some persons (whom he does not name, and the date even of whose writings he states nothing about), had written, not what they knew or had heard as a matter of fact, or received by tradition, but that a revelation had been made to them of a fact alleged to have taken place nearly 300 years before the time of that writer! The supposed entry is as follows:—"A.D. 48, Mary, the Virgin, the mother of Jesus, was taken up into heaven, as some write that it has been revealed to them."†

Now, suppose that this passage really came from the pen of Eusebius himself, is this the way he would have mentioned a universally known and believed historical fact, annually commemorated in the Christian Church on the 15th August, in the Festival of the Assumption, and in which he believed himself, as a doctrine of the Church?

So far, however, is this supposed entry, from deserving the name of Eusebius, that the above passage is now acknowledged to be a palpable interpolation, even in the alleged Latin translation, which is all that now exists of the Chronicon of Eusebius, which was written in Greek. There are seven manuscripts of this Latin translation in the Vatican library alone, not one of which contains anything of the kind, and Bishop Arnaldus Pontacus, the Roman Catholic editor of the Chronicon, printed at Bourdeaux, A.D. 1604, p. 566, tells us naively enough, that he was restrained from expunging it, only because nothing certain, as to the Assumption of the Virgin, could be substituted in its place!‡ Its spuriousness, however, is now no longer a question of dispute or doubt; for it is excluded from the Milan edition of 1818, by Angelus Mains and John Zohrab;§ and no trace of it is to be found in the Armenian version, published by the monks of the Armenian convent, near Venice, in 1818.

The next testimony is an anonymous work called the "Transitus," or Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, which appears (though we believe it is no longer extant) to have gained some currency in the fifth century. Who was its writer, or what statements it contained, we are unable to state; but it is a curious fact that, at the close of that century (A.D. 494) the council of Rome, with Pope Gelasius at its head, among the books not received, specifies as apocryphal, the book which is called the Transitus, or the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin.*

Well, we must admit that as yet we seem to be still getting deeper into the mist, and if the next authority be any better as helping to prove that in the course of the 5th century part of the Christian world were disposed to believe in this late-discovered miracle, we fear it will not much assist in establishing its existence as a generally believed historical fact, handed down by tradition from the earliest ages.

Whatsoever be its value, however, we shall, as impartial inquirers, give it to our readers, as we find it.

It is a letter said to have been written by Sophronius, the presbyter, about the beginning of the 5th century, entitled "Ad Paulam et Eustochium de Assumptione B. M. Virginis," and may be found in the 5th vol. of Jerome's works, p. 82 (Ed. Benedic. Paris, 1706). It was originally ascribed to St. Jerome, and is, therefore, included in that volume. We are not surprised that Baronius expresses much dissatisfaction with the writer; but, by assigning to the letter a still later date than the works of Sophronius, the Cardinal obviously only adds force to the argument for the comparatively recent origin of the story of the Assumption. That the letter is of ancient origin cannot be doubted, for our readers will readily believe that no Protestant forgeries were ever admitted among the works of St. Jerome, or could possibly, for a moment, have been mistaken for his. Whoever penned the letter, however, whether we look to the sensible and pious sentiments contained in it, or to its undisputed antiquity, we think the following extract cannot fail to be interesting; and we beg the earnest attention of such of our Roman Catholic readers to it as have been accustomed to treat the fact of the Assumption as if it stood upon the same undoubted testimony as the fact of the resurrection of our Blessed Lord himself.

"Many of our people," says the writer,† "doubt whether Mary was taken up together with her body, or went away, leaving the body. But how, or at what time, or by what persons, her holy body was taken hence, or whither removed, or whether it rose again is not known; although some will maintain that she is already revived, and is clothed with a blessed immortality with Christ in heavenly places, which very many have affirmed also of the blessed John the Evangelist, his servant, to whom, being a virgin, the Virgin was intrusted by Christ; because in his sepulchre, as it is reported, nothing is found but manna, which also is seen to flow forth. Nevertheless, which of these opinions should be thought the more true, we doubt; yet it is better to commit all to God, to whom nothing is impossible, than to wish to define rashly, by our own authority, any thing which we do not approve of. . . . . . Because nothing is impossible with God, we do not deny that something of the kind was done with regard to the Blessed Virgin Mary; although, for caution's sake, salvâ fide, preserving our faith, we ought rather, with pious desire, to think than inconsiderately to decide, what, without any danger may remain unknown."

We think no one can deem the writer of the above letter a reviler of the Blessed Virgin, or unwilling to yield to the uniform testimony of antiquity, if any such had existed in his time. It is obvious, however, that, in his time, whenever he wrote, the tradition regarding the Blessed Virgin's Assumption was not generally received in the Church, but that it was, at best, a point of grave doubt and discussion among the faithful, many of whom thought it an act of pious forbearance to abstain from pronouncing any decided opinion upon the subject.

What, then, is the first testimony in favour of the alleged fact, for hitherto we seem to have rather been dealing with evidence against it.

As we have already stated in our last number, the earliest author in whose works the tradition is found, so far, at least as we have been able to discover, is John Damascenus, a monk of Jerusalem, who flourished somewhat before the middle of the eighth century, and who, therefore, stood, in point of date, relatively to the period of the Virgin's death, pretty much as Dr. Cullen would now do, as to any ecclesiastical miracle which he might think proper to narrate now, as having occurred at Canterbury or elsewhere in the reign of William the Conqueror!

John Damascenus gives it, moreover, not on his own authority, but by way of extract, out of a work which he calls the Enthymiac History (not now extant), and about even the general character of which the learned are not agreed. Lambecius maintains that what Damascenus here quotes was not an ecclesiastical history, written by Enthymius, who is said to have died A.D., 472, but a biographical history of Enthymius himself, written by one Cyril, a monk, who died, A.D. 531. This opinion of Lambecius is combated by Cotelerius, and the discussion only adds to the denseness of the mist, which envelopes the whole from first to last. Whether Enthymius was the

* St. Epiphanius, towards the end of the fourth century, observes, that in the sacred Scriptures there was no mention made concerning the death of Mary—whether she was dead or not, buried or not buried; also, that the Scriptures were silent whether, when St. John went into Asia, she was the companion of his journey. "In quibus nullum de Mariæ obitu mentionem reperiet, mortua sit neene, sepulta an non sepulta fuerit. Ac cum Joannes interim in Asiam profectus sit nusquam tamen B. Virginem itineris comitem secum illum habuisse significat; sed de ea re penitus Scriptura conticuerit"—Epiphanius adv. Hæres. lib. iii, tom. ii., cap. xi., Oper., vol. i., p. 1013. Paris, 1622.

* Nam falsse ignotum Hieronymo qui magnam vitæ partem Bethlemi hand procul a Sancta civitate egit, ultam ejus sepulcrum indicat, præsertim vero in epitaphio S. Paulæ viduæ, in quo sacra Palæstinæ loca omnia accura è recensetur. Sanctum quoque Epiphanium genere Palæstinum, qui diu in Palæstina versatus est, norunt omnes palam declarasse, incompertum esse, B. Virgo mortua sit, necne. Quod viri quidam eruditi non ita quidem affirmaverunt eam Ephesi defunctam esse, ac sepultam in Ecclesia, quæ Idcireo in ejus honorem consecrata est, et de ejus nomine nuncupata in qua Synodus tertia generalis cele brata est, hoc Epiphanii verba falsi arguunt."—Joh. Damasceni, oper tom ii., p. 858. Paris ed., 1712.

† Latin Transl., Bourd. Ed., p. 158. "Maria Virgo Jesu Christi mater ad filium cœlum assumitur, ut quidem fuisse sibi revelatum scribant."

‡ Non extant in A.L.M. Septem Vatica, et meritu delenda, si vera est Epiphanii et Cedreni opinio, &c. Verum nil immutandum duximus, quod nil certi constet ex priscis auctoribus de tempore et modo obitus ipsius." Pontacus honestly enough did all he dared to do by printing the spurious passage in a different type to call attention to it.

§ See p. 374.

* Sacr. Concil., Labbe and Cossart, tom. iv., p. 1264. Paris, 1671.

† St. Jerome's works, Bened. ed., tom v., p. 83.

author or the subject of the work, however, signifies, perhaps, but little; the work is lost—an epitome only survives—but even that abridgment throws no light upon the subject, for no trace is to be found in the epitome of the passage which John of Damascus purports to quote from it; and we are, therefore, correct in stating, that the earliest extant author in whose works the tradition is found is Damascenus, in the middle of the eighth century.

The passage occurs in the 2nd of the three homilies on "the Sleep of the Virgin," "Dormitio* Virginis," a term generally used by the Greeks as equivalent to the Latin "Assumptio," and affords a striking example of the manner in which Christian orators used to indulge in addresses and appeals, not only to the spirits of departed men, but even to things which never had life. Here the speaker, in his sermon, addresses the tomb of Mary, as if it had ears to hear, and an understanding to comprehend; and then represents the tomb as having a tongue to answer, and as calling forth from the preacher and his congregation an address of admiration and reverence. Such apostrophes, we think, cannot be too steadily borne in mind, when arguments are sought to be drawn from similar salutations, by ancient Christian orators, to saints or angels, or the Blessed Virgin herself.

"Thou, O tomb, of all holy sepulchres most holy," says John of Damascus, in this homily, "(for I will address thee as a living being), where is the much-desired and much-beloved body of the Mother of God?"† The answer of the tomb begins thus, "Why seek ye her in a tomb, who has been taken up on high to the heavenly tabernacles?" In reply to this the preacher, first deliberating with his hearers what answer he should make, thus addresses the tomb.‡ "Thy grace, indeed, is never-failing and eternal, &c., &c." He then introduces the alleged passage—"Ye see, beloved fathers and brethren, what answer the all-glorious tomb makes to us, and in proof that those things are so, in the Enthymiac history, the 3rd book and 40th ch., it is thus written word for word." "It has been above said that the holy Pulcheria built many churches to Christ at Constantinople, of these, however, there is one which was built in Blachernæ, in the beginning of [the reign of] Marcion of divine memory. These, therefore—namely, Marcion and Pulcheria—when they had built a venerable temple to the greatly-to-be celebrated and most holy Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary, and had decked it with all ornaments, sought her most holy body, which had conceived God. And having sent for Juvenal, § Archbishop of Jerusalem, and the Bishops of Palestine, who were living in the royal city on account of the Synod then held at Chalcedon,‖ they say to them, 'We hear that there is at Jerusalem the first and famous Church of Mary Mother of God and ever Virgin, in the garden called Gethsemane, where her body, which bore the Life, was deposited in a coffin; we wish, therefore, her relics to be brought here for the protection of this royal city.' But Juvenal answered, 'In the holy and divinely-inspired Scripture, indeed, nothing is recorded of the departure of the holy Mary, Mother of God; but from an ancient and most true tradition, we have received that at the time of her glorious falling asleep, all the holy Apostles, who were going through the world for the salvation of the nations, in a moment of time, borne aloft, came together to Jerusalem, and when they were near her, they had a vision of angels, and divine melody of the highest powers was heard; and thus with divine, and more than heavenly glory, she delivered her holy soul into the hands of God, in an unspeakable manner. But that which had conceived God, being borne with angelic and apostolic psalmody, with funeral rites, was deposited in a coffin in Gethsemane. In this place the chorus and singing of the angels continued for three whole days. But, after three days, on the angelic music ceasing, since one of the Apostles had been absent, and came after the third day, and wished to adore the body that had conceived God, the Apostles who were present opened the coffin; but the body, pure and every way to be praised, they could not at all find. And when they found only those things in which it had been laid out and placed there, and were filled with an ineffable fragrance, proceeding from those things, they shut the coffin. Being astonished at the miraculous mystery, they could form no other thought but that He who, in His own person, had vouchsafed to be clothed with flesh, and to be made man of the most holy Virgin, and to be born in the flesh—God the Word and Lord of Glory—and who, after birth, had preserved her virginity immaculate, had seen it good, after she had departed from among the living, to honour her uncontaminated and unpolluted body by a translation before the common and universal resurrection."

And is this, indeed, the evidence on which this great fact is to be believed? A monk of Jerusalem, in the eighth century, cites a passage from a book which he calls the Enthymiac history, whose author is unknown, and which work now exists only in an epitome which is wholly silent on the matter, which passage records that Juvenal (an Archbishop it would seem of somewhat doubtful fame) informed the Emperor that a tradition had reached him concerning a miraculous event nearly 400 years before, that the body of Mary was taken out of her coffin without the knowledge of the Apostles who had deposited it there; which, reduced into general terms, amounts to this, that a man who lived 700 years after an alleged miraculous event says, that the writer of a book (since lost) stated that another man, whose character is doubtful, told another man that he had heard and believed that such a miracle did take place 400 years before! Whilst the primitive and inspired account (recording most minutely the journeys and proceedings of some of those very Apostles before and subsequent to the supposed event, and the letters of others), makes no mention at all of any transaction of the kind; and of all the intermediate historians and writers of every character, not one gives the slightest intimation that any rumour of it had ever reached them! And is this, indeed, the kind of evidence on which one of the most solemn religious festivals of the Church of Rome, "the crown and consummation of them all,"* is built? A says that B wrote that C told D that he C had heard and believed that a miracle occurred at Jerusalem 400 years before!!

What, we ask, would those eminent judges, Chief Justice Monahan, or Chief Baron Pigot, think of such evidence in the Courts of Exchequer or Common Pleas? or how would such eminent lawyers as Sergeant O'Brien, Mr. Fitzgerald, or Mr. O'Hagan, like to argue upon such evidence in the Court of Queen's Bench? and is it possible that any educated Roman Catholic can be satisfied with it, in a matter of such infinitely greater importance than any question likely to arise in any of our courts of justice?

Can, or will none of the eminent Roman Catholics we have ventured to name, or none other of our Roman Catholic friends and readers, have the manliness to go to Dr. Cullen and place this paper in his hands, and adjure him by that allegiance, that "intensity of devotion," which he has so earnestly expressed towards the Blessed Virgin, to come forward and publish whatever better evidence his Church can adduce in support of this stupendous miracle? This is no matter of mere political party, or polemical strife, nor a point to stand on punctilios or etiquette. Where souls are the stake, the game is a solemn one. The safety of immortal souls is in the balance; and will Dr. Cullen refuse or withhold any evidence within his power? The question is, whether we shall open the eyes of our Roman Catholic countrymen to things by which their salvation may be perilled, or will Dr. Cullen open the eyes of Protestants on a matter on which their eternal salvation may depend?

If Dr. Cullen or any of his clergy attend to this appeal, anything he or they may think fit to write will, we can assure them, meet with our most respectful attention; but if Dr. Cullen shrinks from this most sacred duty, we tell him plainly and solemnly, that his devotedness to his Celestial Queen, and much boasted zeal for her honour, will henceforth be set down by thinking men as little more than a zeal which explodes in high-sounding epithets, but really means nothing but this, that, as far as he is concerned, all the world may believe or not, just as it pleases them; but as to giving a reason for the faith that he professes, he will not condescend to do so to any one, even to save him from the deadly sin of heresy on the one hand, or the fatal abyss of infidelity on the other. We will not, however, anticipate. We shall see.

* Græcè Κοίμησις.

† Jam vero, O Sacrorum omnium sepulchrorum sacratissimum, (tecum enim tanquam animatum ea-se, mihi sermo erit) . . . . ubi sacratissimum illud atque amabilissimum corpus Dei genetricis? (Sepulchri responsio). Quid eum in sepulchro quæritis, quæ ad cœlestia tabernacula elata est? . . . . . "Quid porro nos vicissim ad sepulchrum dicemus? Tua quidem gratia perennis atque indeficiens est," &c.—Opera. Damasc., Vol. II., p. 878. Paris ed., 1712.

‡ P. 881.

§ Le Quien, the editor of the works of John Damascenus, insinuates the possibility of this Juvenal (whose character he makes no scruple to stigmatize) having invented the whole story, in order, for his own sinister purposes to deceive Marcion and Pulcheria. Just, he says, as Juvenal forged certain writings for the purpose of securing to himself the primacy of Jerusalem—a crime laid to the charge of Juvenal by Pope Leo the Great, in his letter to Maximus, Bishop of Antioch.—"Caterum Marcianum et Pulcheriam certiores factos esse a Juvenale Hierosolymitano de Delparæ Virginis Assumtione hentiquam austin infideli uti nec affirmare, hæc periude conficta esse ab eodem Juvenale, ac commentitia illa scripta, quæ ab eo producta falsæ ad obtinendum Palæstinæ principatum, Leo Magnus queritur in epistola ad Maximum Antiochenum." Id. p. 879. See also, Leo's works, vol. I., p. 1215, epist. cxix., where our readers will still find the charge referred to by Le Quien.

‖ If this story of Archbishop Juvenal, when attending the Council of Chalcedon, having told the Emperor this remarkable tradition be true, is it not somewhat strange that in the Acts of this Council there is not the faintest trace of any allusion to the supposed fact or alleged tradition, though the transactions of that council, in many of its most minute details, are recorded, and though its discussions brought the name and existence of the Virgin Mary continually, and with the most lively interest, before the minds of all who attended it?

* The Assumption of the Virgin Mary is the greatest of all the festivals which the Church celebrates in her honour."—Alban Butler, vol. viii. p. 178.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We thank "A Friend to the Layman" for his obliging letter and useful information.

We have again to apologize to several of our friends for postponing their valued communications. If our correspondents would recollect the limited space of our columns, when forwarding letters or articles, it would prevent much embarrassment and disappointment.

We beg to call the attention of our correspondents to the utility of adding their name and address to their communications.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1851.

Our Roman Catholic correspondents have latterly applied themselves chiefly to the question of the Catholic Church—of whom does it consist, and to whom does the name rightly belong? but, we think, they have not taken a sufficiently comprehensive view of the subject; and we ask their candid consideration of the method we now propose.

The Church has been more universal in respect of time than of place. It is the Church of all ages, still more than the Church of all nations. Those who would form any right idea of the Catholic Church—what it is, and of whom it consists—must study it from its first beginning. None of our correspondents have yet thought of doing this; here lies the source of their errors; and to correct this is our present object.

The question our correspondents have raised is about Churches, rather than about individuals; to this question, therefore, we confine ourselves for the present.

What was the constitution of the Church as established by the Apostles? What was necessary then to entitle a Church, in any particular place, to call itself a portion of the Church universal—to claim to itself the title of Catholic? Those who have not considered this question, cannot be prepared to decide what is necessary now. Let us, therefore, take a survey of the Church as the Apostles left it.

We read in Scripture of a Church at Jerusalem, a Church at Antioch, a Church at Corinth, a Church at Ephesus, a Church at Philippi, the Church of the Smyrneans, the Church of the Laodiceans, the Churches of Asia (Rom. xvi. 19), &c., &c.

Will any one say of these (as some of our correspondents say now), "it is evident that one only can be Catholic, or universal; all others, however numerous, can have no claim to the title?" Does not every one see that all of them together, made up one Catholic or universal Church; and that each of them had, in this sense, as good a claim as any other to the title of Catholic?

In what did their unity consist?

All these Churches were bound to preserve, pure and unchanged, "the faith once delivered" to them. They were bound to preserve the ministry which the Apostles had established in them. And each Church was bound to preserve communion and Christian fellowship and love, on the terms settled by the Apostles, with all the others. As each Christian was bound to communicate with the Church in that place in which he lived, so the Church, in each place, was bound to communicate with the Churches in all other places. Corinth could not intrude into Rome, to set up a second Church or society of Christians there; nor Rome into Corinth. Wherever a Christian went, he found one Church in that place; and he found himself a member of that Church. In this consisted the unity of one Catholic Church. But we nowhere find in Scripture that any one of these Churches was bound to be subject to any other of them. If there be such a place in Scripture, let our Roman Catholic correspondents produce it.

Christ prayed for the unity of his Church (John, ch. xvii., v. 21-23), and his Apostles commanded it (Rom. xvi. 17), so it was worthy to be put in the Catholic creed, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church." About holding that article of the creed, there is no difference between Roman Catholics and us; it is in our creed as well as in theirs: we believe it as well as they.

Where, then, lies the difference between us? Take up the creed of Pope Pius IV. and you will see. That creed contains a SECOND article about the Catholic Church; one which never was found in any ancient Catholic creed: "I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church as the mother and mistress of all Churches." And that creed goes on to say, "this is the true Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved." To this we say—that that article is a plain, downright falsehood; and that it cannot be necessary to salvation to believe a lie.

THIS is the question about which Roman Catholics and we do differ: "Is the Roman Church the mother and mistress of all other Churches?" If this be the Catholic faith, then all Churches that refuse to acknowledge her as mother and mistress have thereby ceased to be Catholic, and have forfeited all right to the name; but if this be false, then no Church ceases to be Catholic by refusing to believe it.

We trust we have stated this question fairly. We invite Roman Catholics to join with us now in producing and examining the proofs.

Was the Roman Church the mother and mistress of all other Churches in the times of the Apostles? Was the Roman Church the mother of the Church of Jerusalem, the Church of Antioch, and of many other Churches which flourished before there was a Roman Church at all? Is there any proof in Scripture that the Roman Church was their mistress in the days of the Apostles? If there be, let it be now produced, that we may discuss it.

Did all other Churches acknowledge the Roman Church as their mother and mistress in the second, third, fourth, and fifth centuries? If they did, let the proofs be produced; if they did not, let it be acknowledged that this was then no part of the Catholic faith.

If there be any instances in those centuries of other Churches submitting to Rome as their "mother and mistress," let Roman Catholics now at last produce those instances. We can find no such instances, and, therefore, cannot produce them. But we do find strong and plain instances to the contrary, and those we will produce.

When first, after the Apostles' times, a great question arose in the Church (about the time of keeping Easter), the venerable Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, and disciple of St. John, went to confer about it with Anicetus, Bishop of Rome. The following account of what passed between them is given by Eusebius, who took it from an epistle written by Irenæus, a disciple of Polycarp:—

"And the blessed Polycarp having come to Rome, in the the time of Anicetus; and having some small difference between each other, about some other things, immediately they were reconciled, not disputing much with one another on this head (the dispute about Easter). For neither could Anicetus persuade Polycarp not to observe those things which he had always observed along with John, the disciple of our Lord, and the other Apostles with whom he had lived; neither did Polycarp persuade Anicetus to keep those things; he saying that he ought to hold the custom of those who were elders before him. And these things being thus, they communicated with each other, and in the church Anicetus yielded to Polycarp the office of celebrating the Eucharist, as it were out of reverence; and they departed from each other in peace—those who observed, and those who did not, having the peace of the whole Church."*

Does not this prove that there was then no such notion in the Catholic Church as that all other Churches must follow Rome, and be subject to her? If such a rule had then existed, would not Polycarp have set the example of obedience? But he thought it his duty to say, that what he had learned from the Apostles was different from what was practised in the Church of Rome. But both parties continued Catholic by preserving communion with each other: they were still one Catholic Church.

Roman Catholics will, perhaps, tell us, that the question was one of little consequence. Let them wait a little.

What we have related above took place, probably, soon after the year 100. For about seventy years from that time, both parties continued to follow their own customs, without any dissension or division arising between them on that account; and then Victor, Bishop of Rome, held a council about it at Rome; and so did the French bishops, at Lyons; and the Bishops of Palestine, and of Pontus, and of several other places: and all these separate councils decided that the custom which the Asiatic Churches had followed, from St. John and St. Polycarp, ought to be given up. On this, Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, and all the bishops of Asia, wrote to Victor, to say that they were only following the custom which St. John, and Polycarp, and others had established and handed down in Asia, and that they would not give it up. We tell the rest of the story in the words of Eusebius:—

"Upon this, Victor, Bishop of Rome, attempted at once to cut off from the common unity, as heterodox, the dioceses of all Asia, together with the neighbouring Churches; and he proscribed them by letters, pronouncing all the brethren there wholly excommunicated. But these things did not please all the bishops; they, therefore, exhorted him, in turn, to study the things that concern peace and unity, and love towards his neighbour. Their words are in existence, very cuttingly reproving Victor."*

And then, as a specimen of those letters, Eusebius gives the letter of Irenæus, which holds up the conduct of Anicetus to Polycarp, as we have related above.

Here it is clear, that even those Churches which preferred the custom of Rome to that of Asia, did not dream that it was necessary that Asia should follow Rome; but did all unite in condemning the Bishop of Rome for breaking off communion with the Churches of Asia; and did never suppose that the Churches of Asia had ceased to be a part of the Catholic Church, merely because the Bishop of Rome had presumed to pass his sentence of excommunication upon them.

There is no greater name among the Fathers than St. CYPRIAN, and he shall be our next instance.

About the year 256, Novatian having established a new sect, and some who had been baptized in that sect having been converted to the Church, a question arose whether it were necessary or right to baptize such persons over again on their admission to the church.

St. Cyprian thought all such persons must, in every case, be baptized over again.

Stephen, the Pope or Bishop of Rome, was of an opposite opinion; and his opinion is thus given by Cyprian, from Stephen's own letter:—"If, then, any shall come to you from any heresy whatsoever, let there be no innovations beyond what has been handed down, that hands be laid on such to repentance." *

The force of this is thus explained by St. Cyprian—"He has forbidden one coming from any heresy whatever to be baptized in the Church."

Of this decision of Pope Stephen, Cyprian says, "He endeavours to uphold the cause of heretics against Christians, and against the Church of God." And St. Cyprian says further, "If this be commanded in the Gospels, or in the Epistles, or Acts of the Apostles, then let this divine and holy tradition be observed." And, again, "But if in times past it was nowhere at all commanded or written, that hands only should be laid on a heretic to repentance, and so communion be granted to him. . . . What obstinacy is that, or what presumption, to prefer human tradition to divine ordinances, and not to perceive that God is displeased and angered, as often as human tradition relaxes and sets aside the Divine command." In which it is clear that St. Cyprian had no notion that the Church of Africa must submit to the Church of Rome. St. Cyprian clearly thought, that in any such question we must go back to the written Scriptures for a decision, without paying any regard to the tradition of the Pope of Rome.

That Stephen did, upon this, proceed to excommunicate the Churches both of Asia and Africa, is plain, from a letter from St. Firmilian, a famous Bishop of Asia, to St. Cyprian; which letter also makes it plain how little they cared for such excommunication.

"What can be more lowly and meek than to have disagreed with so many bishops throughout the whole world, breaking peace with them severally, in various modes of discord, now with the Eastern Churches, now with yourselves, who are in the south? . . . This is to have kept the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, to cut himself off from the unity of charity, and in all things to make himself an alien to the brethren, and with the fury of contumacious discord to rebel against the sacrament and the faith. . . . And yet Stephen is not ashamed to give support to such (heretics) against the Church, and for the upholding of heretics to divide the brotherhood; nor, further, to call Cyprian FALSE CHRIST, and FALSE APOSTLE, and DECEITFUL WORKER. He, conscious that all these marks are IN HIMSELF, has been beforehand, and falsely objected to another WHAT HIMSELF DESERVED!"

It was thus that the Pope's excommunications, by which he made divisions in the Church, were then regarded by CATHOLICS. And yet no one, either then or since, has ever ventured to deny that Cyprian and Firmilian were Catholics, or to say that the Churches of Africa and Asia, thus rejected out of the communion of Rome, were not still parts of the universal Church, and entitled to the name of Catholic.†

St. Augustine is our next instance. If Rome be the mother and mistress of all Churches, to which all other Churches are bound to submit, then Rome has a right to revise and correct whatever decisions any other Church may make.

This is the foundation of the right of appeals to Rome.

About the year 416 Pope Zozimus claimed this right over the Churches of Africa; yet he durst not venture to put it on this ground. So he sent them a Canon of the General Council of Nice, giving him this power over all Churches.

---

* Και τοῦ μακαριου Πολυκαρπου επιδημησαντος τῃ Ρωμῃ επι Ανικητου, και περι αλλων τινων μικρα σχοντες προς αλληλους, ενθυς ειρηνευσαν. περι τουτου τοῦ κεφαλαιου μη φιλεριζησαντες προς ἑαυτους. ουτε γαρ ὁ Ανικητος τον Πολυκαρπον πεισαι ἐδυνατο μη τηρεῖν ἁ τε μετ' Ιωαννου τοῦ μαθητοῦ τοῦ κυριου ἡμων και τῶν λοιπῶν Αποςολῶν οἷς συνδιετριψεν, αει τετηρηκοτα. ουτε μεν ὁ Πολυκαρπος τον Ανικητον επεισε τηρεῖν, λεγοντα την συνηθειαν τῶν προ αυτοῦ Πρεσβυτερῶν οφειλειν κατεχειν. και τουτων ὀντως ἐχοντων ἐκοινωνησαν ἑαυτοῖς, και εν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ παριχωρησεν ὁ Ανικητος την Ευχαριςιαν τῶ Πολυκαρπῳ κατ' ευτροπην δηλονοτι, και μετ ειρηνης απ' αλληλων απηλλαγησαν, πασης της εκκλησιας ειρηνην ἐχοντων και των τηρουντων, και των μη τηρουντων.—Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., book v., c. 24.

* επι τουτοις ὁ μεν της Ῥωμαιων προεςως Βικτωρ, αθροως της Ασιας πασης ἁμα ταις ὁμοροις ἐκκλησιαις τας παροικιας αποτεμνειν ὡς ἑτεροδοξουσας, της κοινῆς ἑνωσεως πειρᾶται. και ςηλιτευει γε δια γραμματων, ακοινωνητους αρδην παντας τους ἐκεῖσε ανακηρυττων αδελφους. αλλ' ου πᾶσι γε τοῖς επισκοποις ταῦτ' ηρεσκετο. αντιπαρακελευονται δητα αυτῳ, τα τῆς ειρηνης και τῆς προς τους πλησιον ἑνωσεως και αγαπης φρονειν. φερυνται δε και αι τουτων φωναι, πληκτικωτερον καθαπτομενων τοῦ Βικτορος.—Euseb., Eccl. Hist., book v., c. 24, p. 192.

* Ep. 74. Ed. Oxford, 1844.

† It is hardly to our purpose to enter into the merits of that question; but it may interest our readers to know that, in the next ages, St. Augustine clearly proved, that both Pope Stephen and St. Cyprian were wrong, in going into opposite extremes; and that a middle course should be taken, admitting the baptism of those sects which baptized in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, and rejecting the baptism of such as did not use that form. This course was approved, and adopted by the whole Church ever since. The Council of Trent pronounced an anathema on any one who should maintain the doctrine of St. Cyprian.—Sess. vii. de Baptismo, Can. iv. Yet the Roman Catholic priests follow St. Cyprian's practice now by rebaptizing Protestants.

The Churches of Africa replied that they would obey all the Canons of Nice; but that there was not any such Canon among them as that which he sent! The dispute waxed hot with his two successors, Boniface I. and Celestine; Augustine and the African bishops sent to Constantinople and Alexandria for certified copies of the Canons of Nice, and from both places they got proof that there was no such Canon among the Canons of Nice, as that which the Pope said was among them. Accordingly, St. Augustine and TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY bishops of Africa wrote to Pope Celestine that the Council of Nice had passed no such Canon as he said; but "had clearly committed both the clergy of the lower order, and also the bishops themselves to their own metropolitans; and had most prudently and justly provided that all affairs of whatever kind should be finally determined in their own localities, in which they arose;" and they say, "is there any one who could suppose that our God would inspire justice in examination into any one person whatsoever (meaning the Pope especially), and yet refuse it to a multitude of prelates collected in council."* They, therefore, flatly refused to submit to the Pope's authority, or to let him alter their decisions. They did more—they passed a decree that any clergyman of Africa, who should presume to appeal from the judgment of the Church of Africa to any place beyond the sea† should not be allowed the communion of the Church within Africa. This decree was repeated more than once: we find it in the African code;‡ in a collection of African canons;§ in the second Council of Milevis, in Africa;‖ and we find it also in the Canon law, Decret. Gratian. 11, quest. iii., c. 34; and, again, 2, quest. vi., ch. 35, in which last place Gratian adds a note of his own, "unless, perhaps, they should have appealed to the Roman See;" but this exception was added by Gratian 700 years after the Canon was made; and only seems to show his Notion, then, of what the Canon ought to have been, but, was not.

If Rome was "mother and mistress" then, this was a flagrant violation of her authority. Any Church that should pass such a Canon now, would immediately be condemned at Rome, as cut off from the Catholic Church. Well, then, was the Church of Africa cut off then? It is a curious and an interesting question, which we must try to answer. We have an epistle of Pope Boniface II., said to have been written about the year 530, as follows:—

"For Aurelius, formerly bishop of the aforesaid Church of Africa,¶ with his colleagues, at the instigation of the devil, began, in the times of our predecessors, Boniface (I.) and Celestine, to set himself up against the Roman Church; but Eulalius, now seeing himself cut off from the communion of the Roman Church by the sins of Aurelius, humbly recollected himself, and seeking the peace and communion of the Roman Church, by subscribing together with his colleagues, condemned by apostolic authority all writings which were made against the privileges of the Roman Church, under whatever pretence."††

From this letter it would appear that Aurelius and Augustine, and the other African bishops, with the whole African Church, had been cut off from the Church of Rome, under Pope Celestine—that is, about the year 420; and that the African Church had continued so cut off until the year 530, when Boniface II. was Pope, and Eulalius Primate of Africa—that is, for one hundred and ten years—and yet we never find that any one has ventured to say that St. Augustine, and Aurelius, and the African bishops, during that time, were not Catholics!

But Cardinal Baronius, and Cardinal Bellarmine, and Archbishop Binius all say that this letter of Pope Boniface II. is forged; and Binius affirms that Augustine and the African Church were never separated for a single day from the Church of Rome. Now, we are quite ready to admit that that letter of Pope Boniface II., like so many other letters of the Popes of Rome, was a forgery. But, what follows then? No one says that the letter of St. Augustine and the African bishops to Pope Celestine was a forgery. Well, then, it appears confessed, that in those ages a Church might resolve finally to settle all its own affairs within itself, and for that purpose might disown, resist, and defy the authority of the Roman Church, without being thereby separated from the communion of the Catholic or universal Church.

We commend these facts to the consideration of Roman Catholics. Let them discuss and settle with us, first, what was the constitution of the Catholic Church in early ages; and then we will go on and discuss with them, which, the Roman Church, or the Church of England and Ireland, has violated that constitution in later times.

Let them remember that the question turns upon this, whether the Roman Church be "mother and mistress of all Churches." If that be true, their creed is right, and we must submit; if that be false, we are not bound to believe a lie.

We ask them to tell us "how old is that doctrine?" We find in the second General Council, which they themselves acknowledge to be a general council, that Jerusalem is the mother of all other Churches.* Will Roman Catholics now tell us where they find that the Roman Church is "the mother and mistress of all Churches?" Let them produce the oldest document in which they find that stated. Bring it forth. Why not? Let all men behold the origin of this doctrine, and see whether it can be traced to anything but the FORGED decretal epistles of the Popes!

If it cannot, will Roman Catholics then call on us to believe that to be a part of THE CATHOLIC FAITH, or necessary to salvation, which they cannot show to have any other origin than forgery and falsehood?

---

* Labbe and Coss. vol. ii. p. 1675. Ed. Paris, 1672.

† N.B.—The Pope, with whom their dispute was, lay just across the sea from Africa.

‡ Ad transmarina autem qui putaverit appellandum, a nullo intra Africam in communionem suscipiatur. Codex canonum Afric. Can. 125, Labbe and Coss., vol. ii., p. 1,129. Ed., Paris, A.D. 1672.

§ P. 1,667, Can. 92.

‖ P. 1,542, Can. 22.

¶ This Aurelius was Bishop of Carthage and Primate of Africa, at the time when the letter of the African bishops, above mentioned, was written to Pope Celestine.

 St. Augustine was one of these colleagues, "instigated by the devil."

††"Aurelius enim præfatæ Carthaginensis ecclesiæ olim episcopus, cum collegis suis (instigante diabolo) superbire temporibus prædecessorum nostrorum Bonifacii et Celestini contra Romanam ecclesiam cœpit; sed videns se modo peccatis Aurelii Eulalius e Romanæ ecclesiæ communione segregatum, humilians recognovit se, pacem et communionem Romanæ ecclesiæ petens, subscribendo una cum collegis suis, damnavit apostolica auctoritate omnes scriptoras quæ adversus Romanæ ecclesiæ privilegia facta quoquo ingenio fuerunt."—Bon. Pap. II., Ep. I., L. and Coss., vol. iv., p. 1,681, Paris, 1672.

* "Ecclesiæ Hierosolymitanæ, quæ est aliarum omnium mater." Letter of the second General Council (Constantinople) to the Bishop of Rome and the other bishops assembled there.—L. and Coss., vol. ii., p. 965.

Correspondence.

ON THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Catholicity, which is the fourth mark of the true Church, insisted upon by St. Augustine, and is professed in the creed as an essential part of her character, belongs to the Church in communion with the Bishop of Rome, by so unquestionable a title that no heretics (as St. Augustine observes) ever had the confidence to dispute it with her in his time. Nor could any of the present reformed Churches ever get the possession of it, though some of them have endeavoured with their utmost power. For truth and good sense have always prevailed, in spite of all their efforts. Go to what country you please, where there is a mixture of Roman Catholics and Protestants, we are as well known by the name of Catholics as a spade is known by the name of spade. And if a stranger asks a Protestant where the Catholic Church is, he will never direct him to his own Church, but to some Popish chapel. Now, if Papists be truly Catholics, I am sure of two things—1st, that the Church, in communion with the See of Rome, is the Church of Christ, upon earth; and, 2nd, that she is the only true Church upon earth; or else the creed, which describes the true Church of Christ to be one and Catholic, is false. But why cannot the reformed Churches pretend to be Catholics, as well as the Church of Rome?

The answer is plain, because there is a two-fold universality belonging to the Church of Christ—viz., universality of time, and universality of place; and, therefore, no Church can assume to herself the title of Catholic, unless she can show, that the faith she professes, is universal, both as to time and place, which no reformed Church can do.

Here, then, let us consider whether (for example) the faith of the Church of England, as it differs from Popery, can be called universal, either as to time or place. The Church's universality, in respect of place, must, certainly, be understood in a limited sense, or it will follow that Christ never had a Catholic Church upon earth: because there never yet was a time, wherein her communion was so universally received by the whole world, but that great numbers of heretics, and many heathen nations, were out of it. Yet, in Scripture language, she is styled the Church of all nations. Thus, St. Paul says:—"The truth of the Gospel, which is come unto you, as it is in all the world."—Col. i. 5, 6. And so he applies to the Apostles that of the psalmist—"yea, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world"—Rom. x. 18. The Church of Christ is, therefore, called Catholic or universal—1st., because she has been at all times, since the Apostles, the Church of many nations; 2dly, because she is the great body of Christians, from which all went forth; and, 3dly, because she either has been, or will be in every nation before the end of the world; that so all nations may be blessed in the seed of Abraham, according to God's promise.—Gen. xxii. 17, 18.

This is the true meaning of the Church's universality, in respect of place. But her universality in respect of time is without limitation—that is, it suffices not that she be the Church of many ages, but it imports that she is the Church of all ages, since the time of the Apostles, and derived originally from them, both as to her faith and communion. Whence it follows, that Catholics, truly so called, are the standing body of Christians, throughout all ages, from which all societies of heretics and schismatics have been cut off, as so many branches from the body of a tree, which continues standing and growing, whatever branches are lopped from it.

Now, let us see whether the reformed Church of England can make good her universality, either of time or place. Is she in the communion of that great body of Christians, from which all heretics and schismatics went forth, ever since the time of the Apostles? Alas! she herself broke off from it a little before the middle of the sixteenth century. Can she be styled the Church of all nations?

She who, three hundred years ago, was not the Church of any one nation in the world! Has her faith, contained in the thirty-nine articles, been preached in France, Spain, Italy, Greece, &c., &c., or any other nation under the sun, but what belongs to the crown of Great Britain? No man is so weak as to say it has. It is, then, a plain case she has no universality of place, even in the limited sense in which I have explained it.

Again, as to what we call universality of time (which, as I have remarked, comprehends all ages, from the Apostles down to us), she may as well pretend to have received the system of her whole faith and religion, by a continued succession of pastors, from Noah as from the Apostles. For how is it possible she could receive it from the Apostles, when Popery was in possession of the whole kingdom, for nine hundred years before the Reformation? And the book of Homilies declares, that all Christendom was drowned in Popery during all that space of time. Where, then, was that faith of the reformed Church of England in all those ages? By what external body, or society of men was it possessed? Finally, where was her succession of Protestant bishops for so many hundred years before the Protestant religion had a being? Was she a Christian Church, and yet in part of Christendom? For I am sure in Christendom she could not be, because all Christendom was overrun with Popery, even our enemies being judges. The plain truth, then, of the matter is, that she had no being at all before the sixteenth century; and she wants about one thousand five hundred years of universality of time. So that in effect Protestants may as well style themselves antediluvians as call themselves Catholics.

From what has been said it follows very plainly, that the Church in communion with the See of Rome is the Church of Christ, the only true Church. For the Catholic Church cannot but be the true Church; and if she be the true Church, there can be no other true one.—See Ephes. iv. 4, 5.

> "Thus one, thus pure, behold her largely spread,
> Like the fair ocean, from her mother-bed;
> From east to west, triumphantly she rides,
> All shores are watered by her wealthy tides.
>
> "As one yielded, so from errors free;
> As one to faith, so one in sanctity;
> Thus, she, and none but she, the humbling rage
> Of heresies opposed, from age to age."

St. Cyprian says, "there is one God, and one Christ, and one Church, and one chair, by our Lord's voice founded upon Peter. Another altar to be set up, or a priesthood to be made, besides one altar and one priesthood is impossible. Whosoever gathereth elsewhere scattereth. It is adulterous, it is impious, it is sacrilegious, whatsoever is instituted by man's fury to the breach of God's divine disposition. Get ye far from the contagion of such men, and fly from their speeches as a cancer and a pestilence, &c."—Lib. de unit. Eccles. nu. 5. Whereby we learn that this unity of the Church, commended so much unto us, consists in the mutual fellowship of all bishops with the See of St. Peter.

Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

We come now to consider the four notes of the Church which Mr. Rourke adopts from St. Augustine. We might remark that St. Augustine only uses them as presumptions, acknowledging that any argument founded on them would be overthrown if there were plain Scriptural evidence on the other side;* but we think it of far more importance to hasten on to the discussion—are these good marks of the Church or not?—than to spend time in disputing as to St. Augustine's opinion on the matter. No one would be more shocked than the good saint himself if any were to maintain that every argument, thrown out by him in the heat of controversy, was to be accepted as valid and not to be contradicted. None knew better than St. Augustine how to distinguish between the unhesitating reverence with which the dictates of inspiration are to be submitted to, and the wise discrimination with which we are to receive the teaching of the best of fallible men. "We ought not," says he, "to esteem the statements of any persons, however Catholic and of whatever repute, as the canonical Scriptures; so that it may not be lawful for us, without infringing on the honour due to these men, to blame or reject this or that in their writings if perchance we shall have found that they have been of a different opinion from what truth requires—truth, as understood by divine aid, either by others or by ourselves. Such is my feeling when reading the writings of others, and such I wish to be the views of others when considering the meaning of mine."† We need, then, no other authority for passing on at once to discuss each of Mr. Rourke's four notes on their own merits, to examine as to each of them, is it a good mark of the Church, and does the Church of Rome possess it.

His first mark is "the agreement of people and nations." Now, we beg to refer Mr. Rourke to an article in our last volume, p. 40, "Are numbers a test of truth?" in which we have considered whether this is a good mark or not. We shall only repeat thus much of what we there said—"The religion which God gave the Jews was certainly true; yet, the professors of it were always a very small minority of the inhabitants of the earth. No nation, in short, agreed with them. For many hundreds of years the Christians were a minority in every nation of the world into which Christianity had spread. Christianity grew and converted so many nations, by despising, denying, and refuting this argument of numbers as a test of religious truth." We then ended our article by saying, that "we distrusted this argument from numbers because we know it cannot stand in the judgment hereafter; and no argument can be worth anything now which cannot prevail then. Suppose any poor mortal should then presume to say to the Great Judge, 'I always tried to be of the religion of the majority,' will not Christ say to him, 'I gave you this warning from the beginning, and if you had searched the Scripture you would have found it—Enter ye in at the narrow gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who go in thereat. How narrow is the gate and strait is the way that leadeth to life, and few there are that find it.—Matthew vii., 13, 14.—Douay Bible.

But, if the consent of nations be a good argument it will certainly never benefit the cause of the Church of Rome. We were amused at the desperate ingenuity with which Mr. Rourke attempted to bring this argument to bear. He leaves heathen nations and Russia out of count altogether, and then he counts as consenting with the Church of Rome every nation which had at any time been in communion with her, even though their consent with her may not have existed since the ninth century; or, in other words, though they may have dissented from her a greater number of centuries than they have agreed with her.

Put special pleading out of the case, and is it not a plain matter of fact that there is not a general agreement of nations with the Church of Rome: some of the largest and most powerful, and some of the most intelligent nations of Christendom dissent from her communion. We need only mention England, America, Australia, Prussia, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Saxony, part of Switzerland, &c., &c. If, then, the agreement of nations be a note of the true Church, we need not discuss whether the Church of Rome ever had this note, for, certainly, she has lost it now.

Mr. Rourke's second note is "the evidence of miracles." He is prudently very brief on this head. His difficulty plainly is, that while his Church claims, in general terms, the possession of miraculous powers, she is too wise to pledge herself absolutely to the truth of any particular miraculous stories; and the very same tales are devoutly believed in by one set of Roman Catholics, laughed at by another set, equally orthodox, while a third set—the least respectable of all—repeat them without believing them, and say, that if these particular miracles did not take place, no doubt others did. We believe that Mr. Rourke is a little too intelligent to receive the stories of winking pictures, &c., which Roman Catholic newspapers circulate for the amusement of the vulgar, and we can, therefore, easily understand why he talks of the "evidence of miracles" in general terms, but carefully abstains from going into particulars.

His third head is the "succession of bishops." If this be a good note of the Church, the Church of Rome in those kingdoms certainly cannot lay claim to it. We have treated of this subject in a separate article in our last number; we shall therefore merely say here, that at the time of the Reformation, the majority of the Irish bishops retained their sees and handed them down in regular order to their legitimate successors—the present bishops of the Church of England and Ireland—whereas, if you were to ask one of the Roman Catholic bishops to show you his list of his predecessors you would, in all probability, find a great gap of a hundred years or so in the middle, a considerable time having elapsed in most of the Irish sees before any foreigner attempted to dispute possession with the lawful successors of the old Irish bishops. And in England the very names of the sees claimed by the Roman Catholic bishops remind us that they are new things founded within the last half-dozen years, and that those bishops cannot even pretend to be the successors of the early occupants of the sees of Canterbury and York and the other ancient sees of England.

Mr. Rourke's last note is the name, "Catholic." He says, "if a stranger ask a Protestant where the Catholic Church is, he will never direct him to his own Church but to some Popish chapel." We have always thought that as good an answer as this argument deserves is to retort it on himself—"if a stranger ask a Roman Catholic in this country where 'the Church' is, he will never direct him to a Popish chapel, but to the nearest Church of England place of worship." Is it not plain, then, by their own acknowledgement, that the Roman Catholics do not belong to the true Church of Ireland." The argument is just as good on the one side as on the other. But, in point of fact, what is really worth attending to is not what names things are in the habit of being called, but what they have a right to be called. The whole foundation of Mr. Rourke's argument arises out of a general unwillingness among Protestants to quarrel about words or names, and an anxiety not to give offence to their neighbours. If we give the name of "Papists" to those who acknowledge the Pope as the head of their Church, they cry out—we do not know why—that we wound their feelings, and mean to insult them; and if we call those Romanists who pride themselves on their union to Rome, ten to one but they call this name insulting also. Well, then, if any Protestants, either from thoughtlessness or from kindness and good nature, give them the name of Catholics, they turn round and say—"There, now, you recognise that we are the Catholics, it is plain that you are the heretics!" Is not this a poor return to Protestants for their unwillingness to offend them? Is it not a manly and generous mode of arguing?

Whatever be the force of Mr. Rourke's argument, it has none against us. He could never have taken up our periodical without seeing that we bore on our front the title of Catholic, in which the Church to which we belong has always claimed her share. We have never pushed our good nature so far as to allow our opponents to use the name as a distinctive title for themselves. They must see that it is not we who are insulting them by refusing them the exclusive use of this title, but they who are insulting us by denying us our share in it. When we have had occasion to speak of them, we generally have chosen Roman Catholics as the least offensive name consistent with truth. And this name serves well enough to distinguish the Irish Catholics, whose bishops are the successors of St. Patrick and his fellow-labourers, from the Roman Catholics, whose bishops were introduced into this country by the bishops of Rome a couple of hundred years ago.

It now only remains to say something as to the two-fold universality of time and place which he says the Church must possess. The Church's universality in point of place must, he says, be understood in a limited sense. Certainly, if the Church of Rome be exclusively the Church, it must be understood in a very limited sense indeed. That Church is barely holding its ground in the old countries of the world, while in the vast emigration that is going on she is left immeasureably behind, and the new countries of the world are filling fast with a population which refuses to submit to her. Test by this mark, and then say which is the right notion of the Catholic Church—Mr. Rourke's notion, which limits the name to less than the half of Christendom, or ours, which embraces every Church in the world which retains the old faith embodied in the creeds which the ancient Church handed down to us.

As to universality in point of time, one would think Mr. Rourke had never looked into the Thirty-nine Articles, and that he imagined that the Church of England taught some new religion invented three hundred years ago. Why, he believes many of the Thirty-nine Articles himself without knowing it. Every one of the doctrines contained in the creeds of the Church of England (such as the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Redemption of the world by our Saviour, the gift of the Holy Ghost) is universal in point of time. There is no dispute about it; the Church of Rome confesses it as well as ourselves. The dispute is as to the new articles of Pope Pius's creed. We call for proofs that these are universal in point of time. Let any one show that the ancient Church worshipped images, had communion in one kind, prayed to the saints, and so forth. Thus we have tried the Church of Rome by Mr. Rourke's own tests, and found her wanting. We reject her because her creed is not universal in point of time, and her communion is not universal in point of place.

RELICS OF SAINTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Your strictures on the inscriptions found on the tombs of the apocryphal saints, Philomena, Theodosia, and Ursinus, remind me of another inscription, that of St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgins, whose remains are to be seen to this day preserved in glass-cases all round one of the Churches at Cologne, and which may be new to some of your readers. The inscription appears to have been somewhat obliterated by age, as antiquarians were divided in opinion about it. Some say that it was "St. Ursula, et XI.M.V.—i.e., et 11 Martyres Virgines," (eleven virgin martyrs), which, through ignorance, or wilful deceit, has been converted into undecim millia virgines—11,000 virgins. Other antiquarians say, that the inscription meant "SS. Ursula et Undecimilla martyres virgines," and that Undecimilla, which was the proper name of a virgin martyr, was mistaken, by some ignorant copyist, for an abbreviation of undecim millia, 11,000. What a slight foundation serves for a pious legend in the Church of Rome! which, in the course of a few centuries, takes a tangible and visible form, as in this case, where cart-loads of bones, removed, no doubt, from some neighbouring church-yard, are enshrined in glass-cases round a Church, in the 16th century, as the bones of eleven thousand virgins!!

